The next day the press was full of stories of Prabhupāda and his movement. The Times of India picked up on a particular angle: "U.S. MILLIONAIRE'S SON SEEKS SOLACE IN KRISHNA SOCIETY." The article told of Girirāja's renouncing his father's wealth to join Prabhupāda's movement. One newspaper quoted Girirāja: "My father works hard and earns fabulous money. He also fights with my mother. My sisters ran away from the house. Thus, in spite of material comforts, nobody is happy." Quoting Śyāmasundara: "My father is very rich, but he has to take sleeping tablets every night." And there were other articles.

Soon letters appeared in the letters column of the Times of India.

As far as my knowledge goes, these foreign Hindus of the Hare Krishna movement cannot be equal to the native original brahmanas and Hindus. They will have to be relegated to the lower castes. It is significant to see one of the newly converted sadhus, Sri Gopal dasa, formerly Charles Poland of Chicago, stated that he was a construction worker formerly. Doing sudra's work, it would thus become necessary to allot the three lower castes to these foreign converts according to their profession.

Another letter stated, "The Hare Krishna movement is just a sporadic fad of sentimentalists."

Prabhupāda said these letters should be answered, and he personally outlined replies, delegating their writing to specific disciples. Within a few days, Prabhupāda's replies appeared in the press.

In India even amongst the brahmanas in different provinces there is no social intercourse. So if they are socially accepted or not doesn't matter. For example, amongst the qualified legal practitioners in different provinces there may not be social intercourse, but that does not mean they are not qualified lawyers. This is a cultural movement, and if the whole world accepts this cult, even though Indian brahmanas do not accept it will do no harm at all... We are not striving for social or political unity, but if Krishna consciousness is accepted there will automatically be political, social and religious unity...

The fact that one of our boys was a construction worker does not mean that he belongs to the sudra community. The sudra community is the less intelligent class or illiterate class who have no information of the value of life. In America even the highest cultured and educated person can go to work as an ordinary construction worker because they accept the dignity of labor. So although a boy was working as a construction worker in America, he is not a sudra.

But even if he is accepted as a sudra, Lord Krishna says that anyone who comes to Him is eligible to be elevated to the highest position of going back to home, back to Godhead.

In a letter signed by Girirāja, Prabhupāda refuted the charge that his movement was a "sporadic fad of sentimentalists."

... How can our movement be sporadic when this science was taught in the Gītā five thousand years ago and instructed to the sun-god millions of years before that? How can it be called sporadic when our activity is sanatana-dharma, the eternal occupation of the living entity? Would faddists give up all meat-eating, intoxicants, illicit sex, and gambling for over five years now? Would faddists give up friends, family, and money and get up at 4:00 A.M. daily, ready to go to any country in the world and preach in any conditions immediately on the request of their spiritual master?

Prabhupāda saw all news coverage of the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement as an aid to propagating Kṛṣṇa consciousness. Even by criticizing the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement, he said, the papers were broadcasting the holy name of Kṛṣṇa. And Kṛṣṇa's name was absolute.

Mr. Seksaria held a special program for many important dignitaries of Bombay. Although he had expected no more than two hundred persons, many more came. They were Bombay's elite—the women dressed in expensive silk sārīs and wearing gold and jewels, the men in silk Nehru-collared suits or white starched dhotīs and kurtās.

Prabhupāda held kīrtana with his disciples, and then he spoke, briefly and gravely. "You are all very intelligent persons," he said. "You are all very learned and educated. You are all very great persons. I beg you—I take the straw of the street between my teeth, and I beg you—just chant Hare Kṛṣṇa. Please chant Hare Kṛṣṇa."

After his talk, Prabhupāda left, and the devotees showed slides of the Hare Kṛṣṇa movement's activities around the world. They also made their first public life membership appeal, and Mr. G. D. Somani, one of India's leading industrialists, as well as Mr. Seksaria, signed on as members.

Although Prabhupāda was happy to see the number of ISKCON's life members increasing, that his shipment of books from Dai Nippon had not yet arrived made him anxious. The devotees were promising life members books, but where were these books? Every day the problem became more and more pronounced.

Prabhupāda learned of a Calcutta port strike. His books had apparently arrived, but the ship, unable to unload cargo in Calcutta, had left port. He worried that the ship would unload the books in some other Indian port. The exact whereabouts and condition of the books, however, remained unknown. Prabhupāda was greatly concerned. He decided to send a competent disciple, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, to Calcutta to try and retrieve the books. Meanwhile he would continue preaching, depending on Kṛṣṇa.

Amritsar

Accompanied by a group of disciples (seven men and two women), Prabhupāda began the two-day train ride from Bombay to Amritsar. Years ago Prabhupāda had traveled as a preacher in India alone, riding the trains to Jhansi, Delhi, Kanpur, Calcutta, and Bombay to publish Back to Godhead and solicit support. After only five years in the West, he now had the great advantage of sincere disciples, and now the Indians were taking notice.

He had stationed Acyutānanda Swami, Jayapatāka Swami, Hamsadūta, and others in Calcutta; Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, Śyāmasundara, and others in Bombay. His disciples would make life members and try to establish permanent ISKCON centers in two of India's major cities. His Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement was beginning in India, and he wanted to travel with his disciples wherever there was an opportunity to preach. Just as he had worked in America—never settling comfortably in one place, but always traveling, speaking about Kṛṣṇa, meeting new people and offering them devotional service—so he would also work in India.

The train arrived at Kurukṣetra station. "Near here," said Prabhupāda, "Lord Kṛṣṇa spoke Bhagavad-gītā five thousand years ago. They say it does not exist—a mythological place. It is a symbol of the field of the body and the senses, they say. It is an allegorical place. But here we are at the station." As he spoke, the sun was setting, and a bright, orange sky shone over the flat land.

"How can they say Kurukṣetra is not a real place?" he continued. "Here it is before us. And it has been a historical place for a long, long time."

When the train arrived at Amritsar station, members of the Vedanta Sammelan committee received Prabhupāda and escorted him and his disciples to a park on the outskirts of the city. They showed him the large paṇḍāl the Niketan Ashram had erected for the Vedanta Sammelan and assigned him and his disciples their quarters—three small rooms. Prabhupāda took one room, the two women the second room, and four of the men crowded into the third, leaving three men to sleep outdoors on cots. The first night in the northern climate was cold. Available bedding was meager, and none of the devotees had brought warm clothing.

At four the next morning the devotees congregated in Śrīla Prabhupāda's room for maṅgala-ārati and kīrtana before the Deities of Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa—the same Deities who had been traveling with Prabhupāda for the past one and a half years. Despite the austere conditions, the devotees felt fortunate to have such intimate contact with Prabhupāda and Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa. Prabhupāda played mṛdaṅga, leading the chanting of prayers to the spiritual master. Afterward, he had the pūjārī distribute to each devotee a bit of the fruit and sweetmeats that had just been offered to the Deities. It was still before sunrise, and the room was chilly. As the devotees sat huddled beneath a naked bulb, Prabhupāda had them read aloud from Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam.

That same morning Prabhupāda attended the Vedanta Sammelan. There were thousands of people in the audience, and since most of them did not understand English, Prabhupāda spoke in Hindi. His presentation pleased everyone, and the committee members honored him by making him president of the Vedanta Sammelan.

Although the program was scheduled only for several hours in the morning and evening, Prabhupāda did not limit his preaching to these times; he preached every hour of the day. While he sat in his room, a constant stream of guests came to him, hundreds of pious Hindus seeking his blessings. Recognizing this vestige of Vedic culture, he pointed it out to his disciples. "Just see," he said, "how they treat a saintly person."

Prabhupāda also began receiving the usual flood of invitations to visit the homes of Hindu families. He accepted as many invitations as possible—more than possible, it seemed to his disciples.

Prabhupāda moved quickly. When the cars were ready, he would come out of his room and go, leaving behind anyone who wasn't ready. After each engagement, he would get into his car and go directly to the next. Latecomers would sometimes find he had already left. They would then jump into bicycle rickshas and try to catch him. A wrong direction or a missed turn might make them miss the next engagement. And when at last they would catch up, they would find Prabhupāda coolly, gravely in the midst of a lecture on Bhagavad-gītā or laughing and taking prasādam with his host.

Every day brought at least a half-dozen engagements—"Come to our temple for darśana," "Come to our house for prasādam." And whenever Prabhupāda would return to his āśrama, he would find a long line of guests waiting to spend a few moments with him.

None of the devotees could match Prabhupāda's pace and enthusiasm. His energy seemed never to wane. For his disciples, being invited insistently to take a full meal at half a dozen homes in one day was too much. They tended to overeat, and some of them got sick. But Prabhupāda knew how to handle the situation expertly. He would fully satisfy each host, speak about Kṛṣṇa consciousness, hold kīrtana, take a little prasādam, and move on.

One evening, in response to an invitation, Prabhupāda visited the home of Baladeva Indra Singh, a descendant of one of ancient Punjab's ruling families. Although nearing sixty, Mr. Singh was still a robust Punjabi kṣatriya, handsome, tall, and sporting a big black mustache. He showed Prabhupāda and his disciples through his elegant home, with its large portraits of ancestors, uniformed kṣatriyas with their helmets and swords. In the trophy room, which had many animal skins and stuffed heads mounted on the wall, Mr. Singh brought Prabhupāda and his disciples before his prize trophy, a large tiger's head. Prabhupāda approached closely. "You have killed this?" he asked.

"Yes," Mr. Singh replied. And he described the details of the hunt. The man-eater had killed many people in a nearby village, Mr. Singh explained. "So I went and shot it."

Prabhupāda's eyes widened, and he turned to his disciples. "Oh, very nice!"

Later, Prabhupāda sat in a chair, and Mr. Singh sat before him on the floor. He said something was troubling him. An astrologer had told him that in a previous lifetime, thousands of years ago, he had fought in the battle of Kurukṣetra—but on the side against Kṛṣṇa!

"That's not possible," Prabhupāda said. "Everyone present at the battle of Kurukṣetra was liberated. If you had actually been at the battle of Kurukṣetra, you would not still be within this material world." Mr. Singh wasn't certain whether to feel relieved or disappointed. But Prabhupāda assured him, "That's all right. Don't worry. Now you are a devotee of Kṛṣṇa."

When Prabhupāda asked Mr. Singh to become a life member of ISKCON, he agreed immediately. He confessed that when he had first invited Prabhupāda and his disciples he had actually been skeptical, but after being with Śrīla Prabhupāda for a few minutes, he said, all his doubts and suspicions had vanished. He would be happy to become ISKCON's first life member in Amritsar.

Although the devotees requested Prabhupāda to take fewer engagements, he would not slow down. It was his disciples, he said, who were finding the pace difficult. One night, after the eighth and final engagement of the day, Prabhupāda returned to his room just a little before midnight. For the devotees the day had been exhausting, and they were eager to get to bed as soon as possible. Noticing Prabhupāda's light still on, one of them went to his window. Prabhupāda was sitting at his desk, leaning back against the wall, listening to a tape recording of one of the talks he had given that day.

One afternoon Prabhupāda and his disciples went to see the famous Golden Temple of the Sikhs. A guide took them around and answered Prabhupāda's questions. Sikh businessmen, the guide explained, maintained the temple and its expenses. The Sikhs pride themselves in the assertion that no one in Amritsar goes hungry, and they daily feed dāl and capātīs to ten thousand people. This interested Prabhupāda, and he observed their massive operation. He watched the group of men rolling capātīs, flipping them deftly through the air onto a giant griddle while other men, using long paddles, turned the capātīs, held them briefly over the hot coals, and then placed them in stacks. "This is how to distribute prasādam," Prabhupāda said.

Prabhupāda signed the guest book "A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami." Under Religion he wrote "Kṛṣṇaite." And under Comments he wrote "very spiritual."

Prabhupāda and his disciples visited Rāma-tīrtha-sarovara, the lake where in a bygone age the great sage Vālmīki had his āśrama. The terrain surrounding Rāma-tīrtha-sarovara was dry and rocky, and vegetation was sparse. As they stopped at the beautiful bathing ghāṭa, its steps leading down into the lake, the devotees were in a jubilant mood, happy to be on a field trip with their transcendental father and teacher. The peaceful lake and the beautiful ghāṭa seemed an ideal setting for being with Prabhupāda.

The devotees, who knew little of Lord Rāma, listened intently as Prabhupāda began to tell some of the pastimes of the Supreme Personality of Godhead in His incarnation of Lord Rāmacandra. During the last days of His earthly pastimes, Prabhupāda said, Rāma banished Sītā, His wife and eternal consort. Pregnant and alone, Sītā sought shelter at the āśrama of Vālmīki, where she soon gave birth to a son, Lava. Vālmīki created another son for Sītā from straw and named him Kuśa.

When Sītā learned that Rāma was sending a challenge horse throughout the world, she instructed her sons to catch the horse. In this way, she concluded, they would capture their father and bring Him before her. Unfortunately, while the boys were away on their mission, they learned that Lord Rāmacandra had departed from the world. Grief-stricken, they returned to Vālmīki. To mitigate the boys' anguish of separation, Vālmīki sang to them Rāmāyaṇa, the transcendental narrative of Lord Rāma's activities. One day, as Sītā was out walking, the ground opened before her, and she returned into the earth from which she had appeared.

These events, Prabhupāda explained as he stood with his followers by Rāma-tīrtha-sarovara, had happened no less than eight hundred thousand years ago. For the devotees, it was as if Prabhupāda had opened a new door to the spiritual world.

The organizers of the Vedanta Sammelan repeatedly asked Prabhupāda and his party to play a larger part in the paṇḍāl program. The scheduled discourses were mostly on Māyāvāda philosophy: God is impersonal, all religious paths are equal and lead to the Supreme One, all is one, we are all God. Such dry speculations could not hold the public's attention, and the Sammelan organizers daily requested the devotees to hold kīrtana in the paṇḍāl. But with so much other preaching, Prabhupāda preferred holding programs of his own in private homes around the city.

A devotee asked Prabhupāda about a Māyāvāda slogan he saw posted: Tat Tvam Asi, with the English translation underneath: "You are that too." This was a favorite saying of the impersonalists, who imagine that the living entity is God, Prabhupāda said. He explained elaborately the distinction between God and the living entity and told how God, when He appears, displays certain unmistakable characteristics that identify Him as the Supreme Personality of Godhead. "These yogīs will just talk and talk Vedānta," Prabhupāda said. "It is simply mental speculation, and they never come to any conclusion. They will go on speculating for years and lifetimes, but we will realize God simply by eating." And from the plate of prasādam before him he took a sweet and popped it into his mouth.

In the midst of his activities in Amritsar, Prabhupāda continued to think of his spiritual children in various places throughout the world, and he regularly wrote them. To the devotees in Calcutta he wrote, "I am very much anxious to hear what you are doing there and if you have made any life members by this time." He asked them to register ISKCON with the government and try to establish a permanent center there.

To his disciples in Bombay he wrote, "I am very anxious to know your situation; whether you have removed to the Rāma Temple or where you are stationed now." To Karandhara in Los Angeles he wrote,

I hope everything is going on well with you in our Los Angeles World Headquarters.

Please send me a report of your general activities... and also your Governing Body Commission activities. Please offer my blessings to all the members of our Temples. How is the Deity worship being carried on?

Replying to Upendra in the Fiji Islands:

Regarding worship of demigods, the whole Hindu society is absorbed in this business, so unless our preaching work is very vigorous it is very difficult to stop them.

And to Bhavānanda in New York:

Please conduct the Samkirtan program regularly and that will give me great pleasure. Regarding our new temple in Brooklyn, Kṛṣṇa has given you very good chance to serve Him.

October 30, 1970

After ten days in Amritsar, Prabhupāda was on the train heading back to Bombay. He rode in a small first-class compartment with Guru dāsa, while the rest of his disciples rode in another part of the train. Prabhupāda's car, being close to the locomotive, caught soot from the engine's smoke stack, until he was soon flecked from head to foot with small black particles.

Yamunā: We were traveling between Amritsar and Delhi, and I decided to go see how Śrīla Prabhupāda was doing, if there was anything he wanted (because sometimes when the train stopped he would ask for a devotee to purchase fresh fruit and other things from the vendors on the train platform). So Kauśalya and I made our way through several cars to Prabhupāda's first-class compartment. He was lying back on several pillows with one knee up, looking like a monarch. He had a beautiful smile on his face.

We paid our obeisances, and Śrīla Prabhupāda looked at us with a twinkle in his eye. "Is there anything hot to eat?" he asked. "What do you mean?" I said. "Do you want me to get your lunch, Śrīla Prabhupāda?" "No," he said, "not that. Some rice, some hot rice." I said, "What do you mean, Śrīla Prabhupāda—from the train?" He said, "Well, no. If you can make me some hot rice." I said I would.

I had no idea how I was going to prepare hot rice for Śrīla Prabhupāda, but Kauśalya and I found our way to the kitchen. Nobody was there, only two men dressed in black, turmeric-stained shorts, standing over the coal stove smoking cigarettes. I didn't know how to speak Hindi, but I said the best I could, "My Guru Mahārāja wants some cāvāl, some hot rice."

The men laughed at us as if we were crazy, and so I thought we had better find someone who would give us permission. But when we found the manager of the restaurant, he said, "No. Impossible. You can't cook in the kitchen." I said, "I'm sorry, this is for my Guru Mahārāja. There is no question of choice. I have said to him that I will fix rice, and I have to fulfill this." But again he said, "No, it is impossible."

I went and found the conductor of the train and explained the situation to him. "If I can't do this for my spiritual master," I said, "then I might as well jump off the train." The conductor took us very seriously and said, "Of course, of course, you can fix whatever you like in the kitchen."

So he brought us back to the kitchen and told the head of the kitchen as well as the head of the restaurant that he was giving us permission. The coal stove was gigantic, and I was completely unfamiliar with it. All sorts of aluminum pots and dishes were hanging around the kitchen. We cleaned out one of the pots as best we could, boiled the water, and put in the cāvāl. We prepared a gigantic platter of very hot rice with butter, fresh lemon, salt, and pepper and carried it through the train to Prabhupāda's compartment.

"Here's your rice, Śrīla Prabhupāda," I said as we entered. And his eyes lit up and opened wide. He gave a huge grin. "Oh, my goddesses of fortune have come," he said. "They have brought me my rice. Thank you very much. This is just what I wanted." He ate so much from this huge plate. He took a little kacaurī and purī with it, and a little pickle. He was very pleased.

That night the train pulled into the New Delhi station, with its scurrying crowds of passengers, hawking vendors, refreshment counters, newsstands, beggars, and coolies in their dingy red jackets. The stopover would be twenty minutes.

Suddenly a man appeared in Prabhupāda's compartment, identifying himself as D. D. Gupta. Although Prabhupāda had not met him before, they had corresponded. He was a Delhi man, not especially influential or wealthy, but he wanted to help. Offering Prabhupāda a box of sweets, he invited him to stay in Delhi. Prabhupāda, however, already had other plans and had even wired ahead to notify the devotees in Bombay of his arrival.

Prabhupāda looked over at Guru dāsa, who was feeling happy and especially blessed to have this intimate contact with his spiritual master. Twelve hours they had spent in the same compartment, eating together, talking together. Just minutes before, Prabhupāda had been stressing the importance of farming and explaining how the scarcity of food was due to mismanagement, not to lack of rain or arable land. Guru dāsa was happy, and he was looking forward to the next leg of the journey with Prabhupāda, anticipating the scenery and his return to Bombay.

"This man is inviting us," Prabhupāda said. "Get down and see what you can do."

"Get down?" There was hardly time to ask questions or discuss what to do in Delhi; the train would be leaving immediately. Guru dāsa said he would stay, but he would need help. He and Prabhupāda agreed on a team: Yamunā (Guru dāsa's wife), Girirāja, Durlabha, Bruce, and Gopāla. Guru dāsa ran to tell his wife and the brahmacārīs the news.

The devotees had little trouble picking up their light bags and getting off the train, but they felt sad to be leaving Śrīla Prabhupāda. As the train pulled away they offered obeisances outside Prabhupāda's window and waved to him, praying for his mercy. This was an austerity—perhaps a tiny drop of what Prabhupāda had gone through when he had first arrived in America.

November 1970

For the next month, Prabhupāda and his disciples stayed at Manoharlal Agarwal's Sītā-Rāma temple in Chembur. Actually it was Mr. Agarwal's residence, but since he maintained the worship of Sītā-Rāma Deities he called his home Ram Sharanam, "under the shelter of Lord Rāma." Prabhupāda occupied one room, and his disciples two other rooms, with access to a kitchen and bath. The Sītā-Rāma temple and suburban neighborhood provided a peaceful atmosphere, and Prabhupāda returned to concentrated work on Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, corresponding with ISKCON centers around the world and looking after the small group of disciples who were with him. He had great hope Kṛṣṇa would provide a way for ISKCON to become well established in India.

We are just now receiving great publicity and it is reported that Bombay has now got its atmosphere filled with Krishna Consciousness. It is a fact, and the important members of the Bombay community are appreciating our Movement...

For the present I am more prominent than all swamis. People are appreciating—What are these swamis? They cannot go outside. There is a Bengali saying that a jackal is king in a small forest. The story is that a jackal became king in the forest by fooling the other animals for some time, but he remained always a jackal and his ruse was at last exposed.

Although Mr. Agarwal was honored that Prabhupāda had accepted his invitation and was now living as his guest, Prabhupāda knew that the situation would ultimately prove inconvenient for everyone involved. To open one's home to a dozen guests and feed them daily was a strain, even for a wealthy man; and for the devotees to live in those tiny quarters under the already trying conditions of irregular hours, frequent sickness, and tropical heat was not easy.

The solution, of course, was for the devotees to get their own place, an ISKCON center in Bombay. As a sannyāsī, Prabhupāda was prepared to stay anywhere, moving as often as necessary, accepting alms. He had lived that way for years before going to America. But now he had twenty spiritual children to support in India, and more on the way. They were not mature. He wanted them near him so that they could observe how he did things and imbibe the spirit of preaching in India.

When a Hindu organization in downtown Bombay requested a few devotees to attend a three-day program, Prabhupāda approved. But when the program was over and the leaders of the organization invited the devotees to stay on indefinitely, Prabhupāda said, "No. They will simply eat and sleep." Better for them to stay with him at crowded Ram Sharanam.

Mrs. Sumati Morarji, the wealthy director of Scindia Steamship Lines, had financed the printing of the third volume of Prabhupāda's Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam in 1964, and in 1965 she had provided him free passage to America. Now she invited Prabhupāda to speak at Scindia House, near Juhu Beach. Seated onstage, Prabhupāda and Sumati Morarji reminisced, celebrating Prabhupāda's success.

"I did not think you would come back alive," Mrs. Morarji said. "But I am so much pleased to see you." No longer was Prabhupāda the poor sādhu Mrs. Morarji had met six years ago. He was a success, and Sumati Morarji and her staff and friends were happy to hear about the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement in the West.

Before Prabhupāda's lecture, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa formally introduced him to the audience. "Śrīla Prabhupāda left for the West five years ago from this city. He had almost no money. He went to New York, where he chanted Hare Kṛṣṇa in a park, underneath a tree. Soon he opened a temple, where he continued his chanting and held classes on Vedic philosophy. Many people came, and gradually he opened new centers: San Francisco, Montreal, Boston, and so on. Now he has many devotees and over forty temples. In each temple there is a full-scale program of saṅkīrtana, Deity worship, and prasādam distribution. India has sent many ambassadors and ministers to the West, but none of them can say that he made the Americans give up eating meat, fish, and eggs and got them to chant Hare Kṛṣṇa. Everyone is indebted to Śrīla Prabhupāda, because he came to relieve the suffering of all the fallen souls..."

Prabhupāda sang three verses from the Brahma-saṁhitā and invited the audience to join in the chorus: Govindam ādi-puruṣaṁ tam ahaṁ bhajāmi. After speaking for half an hour, he accepted prasādam with Sumati Morarji and honored guests and dignitaries. He met Dr. C. Bali and his wife, the famous dancer and movie actress Vaijayanti Mala. He spoke only briefly with them, and they became life members of ISKCON.

Vaijayanti Mala: Swami Prabhupāda made his preaching so simple that even a layperson would understand what our great philosophy and our great teachings meant. Not only was he propagating the great culture of our Lord Kṛṣṇa, but he was making the people of other parts of the world really understand its meaning and its significance. By his simple and yet very great teachings of Kṛṣṇa, he took this message so far and so wide that it's really a marvel that a person single-handedly could do so much. He not only preached and, you know, just talked about the whole thing, but he also established so many centers in so many parts of the world. This is really amazing that he could do it in spite of all difficulties. But his perseverance and his persistence, I think, kept him on.

The public sensation of Prabhupāda's disciples chanting in the streets of Bombay and at the Sadhu Samaj had died down; the regular news coverage had stopped. Still Prabhupāda was sought after by many important people in Bombay. His accomplishments after five years in America commanded the esteem and attention of intelligent Indians, and daily he received respectable visitors who accepted him as the authority on Kṛṣṇa consciousness.

The Indians regarded Prabhupāda as unique. Even in a culture where swamis and holy men are commonly treated with respect, he was regarded as special. His visitors would beg him to come to their homes and sanctify them. And this was also in line with Prabhupāda's desire; he wanted to engage the Indians in chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa, hearing the philosophy of Bhagavad-gītā, and honoring the Lord's prasādam. He wanted them to appreciate the purity of the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement, enlist as life members of ISKCON, and help him establish a large center in Bombay.

In preaching to Indians, Prabhupāda would often urge them to return to their all-but-forgotten spiritual culture. "Our culture is Kṛṣṇa consciousness," he said before a group of Bombay citizens. "But we are forgetting and becoming too materially absorbed. Lord Ṛṣabhadeva says that this is not good, because according to the law of karma you will have to take another body. But you don't have to give up your hard struggle for material life. Arjuna was not advised to do this. He remained in his position and executed Kṛṣṇa consciousness." Prabhupāda concluded, "I am begging. I have forty-two temples in the West, and in each one there are fifty to one hundred disciples. Thousands of books have to be printed. Please help me with this movement."

Manoharlal Agarwal, Prabhupāda's host at Ram Sharanam, would often sit with him for hours, inquiring about spiritual life. Mr. Agarwal was particularly interested in hearing of Prabhupāda's work in America: How had he transformed so many Christians into Rāma bhaktas? Had he been alone, or had there been helpers? How did he dress in America? What was his approach? Prabhupāda recounted his early preaching on the Lower East Side of New York, and he explained how everything had happened by Kṛṣṇa's desire.

Mr. Agarwal doubted whether Westerners would be able to stay with Kṛṣṇa consciousness for very long. "Now in the radiance of your company," he said, "as long as you are here bodily and physically, they may continue to observe all these restrictions. But when your physical influence will not be there, one day when you will have to leave this world, then all these people that have come in contact with you, will they go bad?"

"No," Prabhupāda said firmly.

"Your claim is very tall," replied Mr. Agarwal. "Can you tell me what is the basic foundation of your claim?"

Prabhupāda reminded him that all his disciples had been initiated into the chanting of the Hare Kṛṣṇa mantra and that according to the Vedic scriptures the constant chanting of the Lord's holy name will save even the most fallen souls and protect them from falling again. Even after his passing away, Prabhupāda predicted, his disciples would not fall victim to māyā, as long as they continued their prescribed chanting.

One day Mr. Agarwal asked how long Prabhupāda and his disciples were planning to stay. Prabhupāda said that he was very happy staying where he was but would try to find a new place immediately. Mr. Agarwal insisted that he had no intention of asking Prabhupāda to leave; his home belonged to Prabhupāda, not to himself. He begged him to kindly continue to stay.

Prabhupāda said this reminded him of an incident from the Caitanya-caritāmṛta, and he told a story about Haridāsa Ṭhākura, the great devotee of Lord Caitanya. Haridāsa Ṭhākura used to live alone in a cave, where he chanted Hare Kṛṣṇa day and night. Many pilgrims would visit him, but when they learned that a python was also living within the cave, they became afraid. Although Haridāsa Ṭhākura was satisfied with his cave, he didn't want to inconvenience his visitors, so he said he would leave the cave that very day and not return again. Yet even as he spoke, the huge python came winding out from the back of the cave into the presence of all. Passing near Haridāsa Ṭhākura, the snake bowed his head to the ground and slithered away. The Supersoul within the heart of the python had impelled him to leave the cave so that Haridāsa Ṭhākura could remain.

Prabhupāda laughed as he told the story. "Agarwalji," he said, "you have said the same thing. You have said that you will go away and that we will stay. But no, no, we will go. We will go."

SPL 33: A Lot of Ground to Be Covered

CHAPTER THIRTY-THREE

A Lot of Ground to Be Covered

December 3, 1970

India continued to be like a dream for Prabhupāda's disciples, who gazed out the windows as the train moved them through India's unfamiliar rural world. The trackside bushes blossomed in yellow. Mile after mile of irrigated agricultural fields passed by—wheat, rice, sugarcane, and varieties of dāl. Small villages—mud-walled houses with straw roofs, or thatched walls with tile roofs—drifted peacefully by. An occasional village temple made of stone would rise above the surrounding simple structures. Cowherd boys with sticks tended their herds on the grassy banks of meandering streams. And the grazing cows, the oxen plowing in the ancient fields, the dung patties drying in the sun for fuel, the smoke rising from the cooking fires, and the smell of the warm earth—all were part of a peaceful, simple way of life the devotees were coming to appreciate through Prabhupāda's association.

Prabhupāda and his disciples were enroute to Indore, a city of 475,000 in the central Indian province of Madhya Pradesh, thirteen hours northeast of Bombay. The directors of the Gītā Jayanti Mahotsava, a festival to celebrate the teachings of Bhagavad-gītā, had invited Prabhupāda and his disciples to attend their convention and public meeting.

In Indore Śrīla Prabhupāda and his disciples settled into their quarters near the Gītā Bhavan, the site of the Gītā Jayanti Mahotsava. The directors of the convention had assigned Prabhupāda a bungalow with a lawn and garden and had provided nearby facilities for his disciples.

The devotees toured the grounds of the Gītā Bhavan, noting the many swamis and sādhus who had arrived from various parts of India for the Mahotsava. They saw the large paṇḍāl and stage, the eye hospital run by the Gītā Bhavan, and the diorama exhibit. The diorama exhibit they regarded as the kind of eclectic mixing of spiritual paths that Prabhupāda often referred to as "hodgepodge." Kṛṣṇa, Buddha, Jesus, Vivekananda, Ramakrishna, and demigods and animals were all on display. While admiring the energy and imagination that had produced such an exhibit, the devotees questioned the benefit of such a conglomeration.

On the first night of the festival Prabhupāda was scheduled as the last speaker. His disciples, who sat with him onstage, grew bored and restless from the ordeal of so many hours of Hindi speeches. And knowing that these speakers were presenting Māyāvāda misconceptions made the evening especially painful. Śrīla Prabhupāda sat sternly and waited, his hand in his bead bag, his head held high, his lips murmuring the Hare Kṛṣṇa mantra.

When Prabhupāda finally spoke, he began by explaining that in the West he was spreading the teachings of the Gītā as it is. Bhagavad-gītā, he said, could be properly understood only in disciplic succession, just as Arjuna, the original student of the Bhagavad-gītā, had understood it. The Gītā was for the devotee of Kṛṣṇa and should not be misinterpreted by nondevotees. To misinterpret the Gītā, he said, was to cheat in the name of religion. He also spoke strongly against pseudoincarnations.

Prabhupāda concluded his talk and asked his disciples to begin kīrtana. It was an ecstatic, spontaneous event, and Prabhupāda began dancing onstage along with his disciples. The crowd came to life and began clapping rhythmically. Hamsadūta jumped down from the stage, still playing mṛdaṅga, and began inducing members of the audience to join in chanting and dancing. Several other devotees also jumped down, and soon hundreds of people had risen to their feet, swaying, clapping, and singing: Hare Kṛṣṇa, Hare Kṛṣṇa, Kṛṣṇa Kṛṣṇa, Hare Hare/ Hare Rāma, Hare Rāma, Rāma Rāma, Hare Hare. This was the real Gītā Jayanti Mahotsava. The holy name of Kṛṣṇa was being sung, and everyone was happily united in the kīrtana.

Greatly pleased by the performance of Prabhupāda and his disciples, the paṇḍāl directors visited Prabhupāda the next day in his bungalow. Prabhupāda complained at having to wait so long before he could speak; his disciples shouldn't be required to sit through hours of speeches in a language they couldn't understand. When Prabhupāda intimated that the speeches seriously deviated from the teachings of the Gītā, the director of the Gītā Bhavan replied, "We do not favor any particular way. Followers of the Śāṅkara school and others also come to our institution. We do not subscribe wholly that Śrī Kṛṣṇa is the sole God or anything of the sort. There is a power behind Him..."

This remark drew fire from Śrīla Prabhupāda. What kind of glorification of the Gītā was this if the speakers did not accept Kṛṣṇa as He is explained in the Gītā? The Gītā declares Kṛṣṇa to be the highest truth: mattaḥ parataram nānyat. Prabhupāda advised the directors of the Gītā Bhavan to try to understand the meaning of Bhagavad-gītā. The directors did not change their opinion, but they were intelligent enough to see that Prabhupāda was a great paṇḍita and saint, and they listened respectfully. Nodding, they said they accepted his point of view.

After the men left, Prabhupāda continued, “They are thinking that there is something beyond Kṛṣṇa or that it is the spirit within Kṛṣṇa that we have to surrender to. But they do not know that the within and the without of Kṛṣṇa are all absolute, eternal, and full of bliss.”

Prabhupāda said he could see that the organizers of the Gītā Jayanti Mahotsava had invited him to draw larger crowds. But they would not make him sit again through all the Māyāvādī nonsense, he said. From now on, he would go with his disciples, speak, chant, and then leave.

The next night, however, despite promises by the paṇḍāl directors, Śrīla Prabhupāda again had to wait until the end of the program before he could speak and hold kīrtana. This night, the crowd was larger than before, and they were clearly waiting for Śrīla Prabhupāda and the foreign sādhus. When Prabhupāda's turn came at last, he spoke and then asked his disciples to begin kīrtana.

During the kīrtana one of the members of the Gītā Bhavan gestured to the devotees to jump down into the crowd as they had done on the preceding night. But what had been a spontaneous event the night before could not be artificially staged simply as a crowd pleaser. The man, however, was insistent. He came forward to the edge of the stage, reached up, and began grabbing at the feet of the dancing devotees, trying to pull them into the audience. The devotees became annoyed. Grabbing indiscriminately, the man pulled at one of the women's sārīs. Śrīla Prabhupāda was also dancing, but when he saw this he rushed to the edge of the stage, swinging his karatālas toward the man's face and shouting, “Stop this!” The man retreated, and Prabhupāda and his disciples continued their kīrtana. Although little-noticed by the crowd, Prabhupāda's burst of lionlike ferocity had amazed his disciples.

The festival directors were once again pleased with Prabhupāda's lecture and kīrtana. But Prabhupāda sent them word that he would not again sit through the other lectures, waiting his turn to speak. He had wearied of hearing opinions on Bhagavad-gītā that avoided the conclusion of Bhagavad-gītā—surrender to Śrī Kṛṣṇa, the Absolute Truth. Some speakers made the Gītā an allegory, some said Kṛṣṇa was not an actual historical personality, and some simply took advantage of the Gītā's popularity to put forward their own political or social philosophies. A person with his own philosophy should write his own book, Prabhupāda said, not use as a vehicle for his own ideas the Bhagavad-gītā, a scripture worshiped by millions and respected throughout the world. Why should a conference under the name Gītā Jayanti become a forum for speculative philosophies? Bhagavad-gītā states that the Gītā itself is the essence of knowledge, meant to benefit the entire world. To misrepresent the Gītā, therefore, was the greatest disservice. Prabhupāda felt that by sitting through such a program, he and his disciples were tacitly approving the blasphemous speeches.

On the third night of the festival, Prabhupāda and his disciples came early to the stage, having been promised by the festival directors that they would be first on the program. But when another speaker stood and began his discourse, Prabhupāda, followed by his disciples, stood and walked off the stage. The festival director was quite disturbed by this, since most of the audience had come especially for the kīrtana. He pleaded with Prabhupāda to return, but Prabhupāda refused. He did agree, however, to send his disciples every night; they would speak and hold kīrtana.

Śrīla Prabhupāda's disciples found the morning Bhāgavatam classes in Indore especially relishable. Not only was the setting intimate—ten devotees sitting with Prabhupāda in his room—but the Bhāgavatam story was intriguing, one they had never before heard.

“We are talking of Ajāmila, a brāhmaṇa residing in Kanyākubjā, presently known as Kanpur,” Prabhupāda began, and he narrated the story of Ajāmila's life, pausing from time to time to read the Sanskrit text or to elaborate on the story and its lessons. Ajāmila, a young brāhmaṇa, had strictly followed the religious principles, until he became infatuated with a prostitute. As Prabhupāda lectured he focused on the bogus speakers at the Gītā Jayanti Mahotsava.

“There are so many things to know, but these things are not being discussed here. It is very cheap to do whatever you like—you simply meditate and you become God. So much cheating is going on all over the world. The so-called yogīs say, “You meditate, and as soon as you are realized, you become God.’

“The Bhagavad-gītā is being interpreted in so many different ways. And these so-called explanations are being accepted by the innocent public as authoritative knowledge. Someone is explaining that kurukṣetra means this body, and pañca-pāṇḍava* means the senses. But this is not explaining. How can you explain the Bhagavad-gītā as it is when you do not understand it? Such an attempt is nonsense.”

In his second lecture Prabhupāda narrated more of Ajāmila's life: his leaving his chaste wife and going to live with the prostitute, his adopting illegal means for supporting her, his having ten children by her and living sinfully until his eightieth year. This story took place, Śrīla Prabhupāda said, thousands of years ago. “At that time there was only one Ajāmila, but you will find many Ajāmilas like that at the present moment, because it is the age of Kali.”

Ajāmila had great affection for his youngest son, Nārāyaṇa. And as Ajāmila lay on his deathbed and saw the agents of death approaching, he cried out for his son—“Nārāyaṇa!” Prabhupāda continued his story.

“He was just on the point of death, so—naturally he had affection for his son—so he was calling, “Nārāyaṇa! Nārāyaṇa! Nārāyaṇa! Please come here! Please come here!’ That is natural. I know my father—when he was dying, I was not at home. So he was living for one day to see me. He was always inquiring whether Abhay has come back. Like that. So father's paternal affection is like that, and similarly Ajāmila was calling, “Nārāyaṇa! Nārāyaṇa!”

Nārāyaṇa is also a name of Kṛṣṇa. And Prabhupāda said that, according to Bhagavad-gītā, if a person remembers Nārāyaṇa, or Kṛṣṇa, at the time of death, he becomes liberated. One's mentality at death determines one's next birth. Because the devotee is Kṛṣṇa conscious, he enters the spiritual world at death; and because the materialist is absorbed in sense pleasure and mental speculation, he has to take birth after birth in the material world. Prabhupāda gave an example.

“One gentleman in Calcutta was a fairly big businessman. He was dealing in shares, stocks. So at the time of death he was crying, “Kamarhati! Kamarhati!” So the result might be that he might have taken his birth as a rat in the Kamarhati mill. It is possible. At the time of death, whatever you think, that will carry you to your next type of body.”

Because Ajāmila had called on the name of the Lord, even though referring to his son, he became purified of all sins. Yet because of his sinful life, the messengers of Yamarāja, the lord of death, also appeared, to take him for punishment.

“When Ajāmila was dying, he saw that there were three ferocious persons, very fearful persons, with ropes in their hands. Sometimes a dying man cries, because he sees somebody has come to take him to Yamarāja. He sees, and he is very fearful. So Ajāmila also became fearful. The assistants of Yamarāja have hair very curled, and the hairs on their bodies are standing. Now at the time of Ajāmila's death, the assistants of Yamarāja came to take him.”

Prabhupāda paused. “We shall discuss sometime again.” And he ended his lecture.

Prabhupāda began making life members in Indore by sending Hamsadūta out alone. Hamsadūta was inexperienced and even skeptical that anyone would pay the 1,111 rupees.

Hamsadūta: One day Prabhupāda told me to go to the market with a neighbor and take these books—he had three Kṛṣṇa books—and try to make some life members. Just show them the books, he said, and tell them this is a token of our work. Then ask them to please help our mission by becoming a life member for 1,111 rupees. I was thinking that no one was going to give one thousand rupees for two or three books, so I just didn't do anything about it. I just avoided the issue. The next day Prabhupāda gave me the same instruction, but again I didn't do anything. On the third day he said I had to go, so I went next door and got a man who took me to the cloth merchants.

We went to the shop of the biggest cloth merchant in Indore. The man didn't speak English, so the neighbor who had accompanied me translated. I would say, “Tell him this. Tell him that.” And the man would translate everything. After I had exhausted my presentation, I said, “Now ask him to give a check for 1,111 rupees.” My translator relayed the message, and the merchant immediately took out his checkbook and wrote the check.

Then we visited another merchant, and the same thing happened—he immediately wrote a check. We went to another merchant, and he also became a life member. So I made three life members on the first day, and when I came back and told Prabhupāda, he was in ecstasy.

By sending disciples and by sometimes going out himself, Śrīla Prabhupāda soon had a dozen ISKCON life members in Indore. Prabhupāda, Hamsadūta, and Girirāja visited the king of Indore and invited him to become a life member, but the king declined. The devotees were disappointed, and in the car on the way back to Gītā Bhavan, Hamsadūta asked Prabhupāda, “Did I say the right thing about the books?”

“My books are like gold,” Prabhupāda replied. “It doesn't matter what you say about them. One who knows the value, he will purchase.”

Because visitors often asked Prabhupāda and his disciples what they thought of various popular spiritual teachers, Prabhupāda gave his disciples hints on answering such questions. If the teacher was not a bona fide follower of Vedic scripture, Prabhupāda said, the devotee should reply, “Swami who?” By thus indicating that he had not heard of the particular teacher, he would minimize the teacher's importance. Then the devotee should ask, “What is this swami's philosophy?” When the person explained, the devotee could defeat the particular philosophy, without attacking the person.

India had many Māyāvādī gurus, Prabhupāda explained, and they often traveled in groups from one convention to another. Although each had his particular style, primarily they were interested in capātis. “And for every capātī,” he said, “there are many Māyāvādīs. So there is competition.”

One of Prabhupāda's frequent visitors was Vairaghi Baba, an educated man who had visited America and who spoke fluent English. He regularly joined in the kīrtana with the devotees, chanting and dancing with them onstage, and when he visited Prabhupāda in his room he behaved with Prabhupāda in a familiar way—too familiar, Prabhupāda's disciples thought. But Prabhupāda tolerated him.

One day some devotees met Vairaghi Baba at a lunch engagement, and they noticed he was drinking tea. Almost naively, and yet with an air of challenge, one of the devotees asked why he was drinking tea. “Oh, I am an avadhūta,” Vairaghi Baba replied. The devotees, who had never heard this word before, reported the incident to Prabhupāda. “Avadhūta,” Prabhupāda explained, “means one who is beyond the regulative principles. Generally this refers to Nityānanda Prabhu.”* Prabhupāda disapproved of Vairaghi Baba's tea-drinking and especially of his calling himself an avadhūta.

A small group of devotees were sitting with Prabhupāda in his room one afternoon. “Śrīmatī Rādhārāṇī's excellence was Her cooking,” Prabhupāda said. “She could also sing and dance, but Her great service was Her cooking for Kṛṣṇa. Mother Yaśodā would ask Her personally to come and cook for Kṛṣṇa and the cowherd boys. So, all in a line, She would feed them prasādam.”

An Indian lady came to the door, bringing an offering of chidwa—fried cashews, potatoes, and raisins with spices. Śrīla Prabhupāda took some, then distributed the rest to the other devotees. “Do you like this?” he asked, turning to Yamunā.

“Oh, it is very, very tasty,” she replied.

“Yes,” he said, “you should learn to prepare this. I like it very much. My Guru Mahārāja was also fond of potato chidwa, and he would sometimes request it late in the afternoon. He was very fond of it.”

“Śrīla Prabhupāda,” a devotee asked, “may we publish pictures of you without tilaka?”

“Yes,” he replied, “my Guru Mahārāja has been recorded without tilaka. You have seen that picture where he is looking up from his books at his working table?”

“Yes,” the devotee replied, “I have seen that picture. I have seen you look in that very same way, with the very same expression as in the picture of your Guru Mahārāja.”

“You have only seen the glitter,” Prabhupāda corrected. “He is the gold. I am only iron. Iron can never be gold. But you have seen the glitter of real gold.”

One afternoon a renowned astrologer visited Prabhupāda and offered to read his palm. “No,” Prabhupāda replied, “I am finished with that. But you may read my disciples' palms.” The astrologer read the palms of the several devotees present, made his predictions, and then left. The devotees turned to Prabhupāda, wondering what to make of it. “As soon as you clap your hands in front of the Deities during āraṭi,” Prabhupāda said, smiling, “all the lines of your palm are changed.”

Śrīla Prabhupāda told his disciples a story about when he had lived in Vṛndāvana. A Bengali widow walked to the Yamunā River to take her bath every morning. And every morning without fail she would return with a pot of water for the Rādhā-Dāmodara pūjārī to use in bathing the Deities. Prabhupāda said he would sometimes open the gate for the woman, since he also rose very early, and she would enter and wake the pūjārī.

“Although the Vṛndāvana nights are cold in the winter,” Prabhupāda said, “the woman never once failed to come with the water. For this activity she will return back to Godhead. One who cannot rise early in the morning is not very serious about spiritual life. One must rise before the brahma-muhūrta hour—that is very auspicious. And one will take the trouble to do so if he is serious about spiritual life.”

One day Prabhupāda was sitting outside near his bungalow, chanting on his beads, when an unknown man approached, calling out the names of Kṛṣṇa. Suddenly the man fell to the ground, rolling and crying, appearing to be in great ecstasy. Prabhupāda remained seated and observed the exhibition but made no response. The man continued his crying and rolling and chanting;

Prabhupāda now ignored him completely. After several minutes, the man got up and walked away, obviously disappointed.

Early one morning as Prabhupāda sat in his room with his disciples, a gentleman entered and tearfully announced that his mother was dying. The devotees, watching for Prabhupāda's reaction, saw him remain grave. He didn't try to reassure the man or preach to him, but made only a very mild comment. Prabhupāda was unpredictable. He was always Kṛṣṇa conscious, and he always acted in accord with guru and śāstra. But exactly how he would act in a given situation was unpredictable. Whatever he did, however, was Kṛṣṇa conscious and correct, and he was always instructing them by his example.

On Prabhupāda's last morning in Indore he continued the story of Ajāmila. He explained that because Ajāmila had uttered the holy name, he had immediately obtained salvation, even though he had been so sinful.

“So Ajāmila, at the time of his death, just remembered his youngest son, whose name was Nārāyaṇa. The very name of Nārāyaṇa has got the full potency of the Supreme Personality of Godhead, Nārāyaṇa. That is the secret of this nāma-saṅkīrtana movement. By chanting the holy name of Nārāyaṇa, you immediately contact with the Supreme Personality of Godhead. Nāma, the Lord's name, is not material—it is spiritual. Kṛṣṇa and Kṛṣṇa's name, there is no difference...

“In a very appealing voice Ajāmila began to ask his son Nārāyaṇa, “Please come here. I am dying.’ He was very afraid of the Yamadūtas.

“Kṛṣṇa sent the Viṣṇudūtas to give Ajāmila shelter. The Viṣṇudūtas looked just like Lord Nārāyaṇa, with four hands. With a grave voice, they said to the Yamadūtas, “What are you doing? Stop! You cannot take this man to Yamarāja.”

Prabhupāda ended his lecture—and his stay in Indore. Having accepted an invitation to travel to Surat in the state of Gujarat and hold Kṛṣṇa conscious programs, he and his disciples would be leaving shortly. Devotees from Bombay would also join them. Prabhupāda had come to Indore for the Gītā Jayanti Mahotsava, but actually the Mahotsava was but a small part of his preaching in Indore. He had met hundreds of people, made life members and friends. He had touched their lives. His presence in Indore would leave a lasting impression.

Baba Balmukund: I've seen many sādhus and great saints in this Gītā Bhavan. I saw Śrīla Prabhupāda also in the same place. I was very much impressed by Śrīla Prabhupāda and his preaching. It was because Prabhupāda had revealed the reality about bhakti, because he was a pure bhakta, that he could change the people of the West and give them another dress, he could give them another diet, he could entirely change their culture and give them true bhakti. And this was the greatest thing Prabhupāda has done. Let the world say as it likes, but he has done a marvelous thing regarding Lord Kṛṣṇa's bhakti. What Swami Vivekananda, Swami Ram Tirtha, and others could not do, Śrīla Prabhupāda has done. It is a marvelous thing.

It was like a dream come true. Thousands lined the street for many blocks, while the devotees, playing karatālas and mṛdaṅgas and chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa, made their way along. Spectators stood on rooftops or clustered at windows and doorways, while others joined the procession. The police had stopped traffic at the intersections, allowing only the kīrtana procession to pass. The earthen road, freshly swept and sprinkled with water, had been decorated with rice flour designs of auspicious Vedic symbols. Green, freshly cut banana trees adorned either side of the way. Overhead, women's sārīs strung like bunting across the narrow roadway formed a brightly colored canopy over the kīrtana party.

Mr. Bhagubhai Jariwala, Prabhupāda's host in Surat, had advertised the daily parade routes in the local newspapers, and now, day after day, the devotees were holding a kīrtana procession through various sections of the city. While more than twenty of Prabhupāda's disciples led the daily procession, thousands of Indians chanted, cheered, and clamored to see, and women threw flower petals from the rooftops.

Often the procession would have to stop as families came forward to garland the devotees. Sometimes the devotees would receive so many garlands that their blissful faces would be scarcely visible, and they would distribute the garlands to the people in the crowd. Never before had the devotees met with such a reception.

"It is a city of devotees," Prabhupāda said. He compared the people of Surat to dry grass catching fire. By nature they were Kṛṣṇa conscious, but the arrival of Śrīla Prabhupāda and his saṅkīrtana party had been like a torch, setting the city spiritually ablaze.

The entire population of Surat seemed to turn out every morning, as tens of thousands flocked at seven A.M. to the designated neighbor hood. Men, women, laborers, merchants, professionals, the young, the old, and all the children—everyone seemed to be taking part. Cramming the streets and buildings, they would wait for the kīrtana party, and when the devotees arrived, everyone became joyous.

Prabhupāda attended only a couple of the morning processions, preferring to stay in his quarters at Mr. Jariwala's home. Each morning Prabhupāda would come out onto his second-floor balcony, just as the devotees were leaving. Although the mornings were cold and many of the devotees sick, seeing Prabhupāda on the balcony offering them his blessings eased their troubles. Prabhupāda would wave, and the devotees would set off down the street, chanting.

The devotees had no special paraphernalia other than mṛdaṅgas and karatālas—no flags, no marching band, no ratha (cart), just an enthusiastic kīrtana party. And there was no official paṇḍāl, no Sadhu Samaj, no Vedanta Sammelan, no Gītā Jayanti Mahotsava—just an entire city of Kṛṣṇa bhaktas waiting eagerly for the American Hare Kṛṣṇa chanters.

To be worshiped for chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa was just the opposite of what the devotees had experienced in the West. In Hamburg, Chicago, New York, London, Los Angeles, the devotees had been insulted, threatened with arrests, assaulted, and ignored. Of course, sometimes they had been tolerated and even appreciated, but never honored.

The daily saṅkīrtana outing was exhausting, since the route was long and the stops frequent. Many of the devotees had sore throats from singing, and the usual digestive upsets persisted. But the devotees took everything as the mercy of Lord Caitanya, who was allowing them to engage a whole city in His saṅkīrtana movement.

Twenty devotees from the West had just arrived in Surat, as had an American photographer, John Griesser, on assignment for Asia Magazine. John went out every day to shoot the kīrtana processions, and as he did he felt himself becoming caught up in something much greater than a mere photo assignment.

The people of Surat, who considered themselves Kṛṣṇa bhaktas at heart, saw Prabhupāda as a great saint. And they saw his disciples, in whom they found the true Vaiṣṇava qualities, as saints also. The devotees' dress, behavior, and way of life showed pure bhakti-yoga, and their kīrtana was genuine worship of the holy name. By honoring the Lord's devotees, the people of Surat knew they were honoring Lord Kṛṣṇa Himself. Devotion to Kṛṣṇa was the heart of their own culture, yet they had never expressed it to such a degree as now.

After several days of kīrtana processions, the mayor of Surat, Mr. Vaikuntha Sastri, closed all schools and proclaimed a holiday throughout the city. Everyone was now free to celebrate the mercy of Lord Caitanya and chant Hare Kṛṣṇa. Signs throughout the city read, in Gujarati, "Welcome to the American and European Devotees of Krishna," and "Welcome to Members of the Hare Krishna Movement."

The devotees felt tired and blissful as they returned to Mr. Jariwala's home, and Prabhupāda was waiting for them. As soon as they saw him, they all bowed down.

Cidānanda: Prabhupāda was at the foot of the stairs, greeting us. We were in complete bliss, with flower garlands all over us, big smiles on our faces. We were very happy that we had been so well received. It was as if Prabhupāda was standing there saying, "Just see how wonderful this Kṛṣṇa consciousness is! Just see how happy you are!" He was standing there smiling. He was so happy that we were happy.

The devotees were not alone, however, as they returned to Mr. Jariwala's home, for hundreds of Indians thronged behind them, eager to see Śrīla Prabhupāda. Śrīla Prabhupāda, his disciples, and a clamoring crowd of Surat devotees squeezed tightly into Prabhupāda's room. The guests— those who got in— inquired about ISKCON and its activities, while those outside pushed to get inside. The crowd around the house grew so great that traffic couldn't pass. While Prabhupāda continued to answer questions inside, the crowd outside grew larger and more restless. By their good fortune, they had realized Prabhupāda's greatness, and they wanted to be with him. As their desire became stronger, their eagerness more intense, Prabhupāda got up from his seat and walked out to the balcony. The crowd roared, "Hare Kṛṣṇa!" their arms upraised.

When Prabhupāda returned inside, the crowd remained unsatisfied, and he asked some of his disciples to try and pacify them. Several devotees went out to the people, answering their questions and telling them Prabhupāda would come out to see them again.

Bhagubhai Jariwala had come in touch with Prabhupāda's movement several years before in San Francisco, when he had donated a silver mūrti of Kṛṣṇa to the San Francisco temple. Now the Jariwala family, to accommodate their guests, had moved into modest quarters on the roof of their home and offered the rest of the house to Prabhupāda and his disciples. Hospitable hosts, they made the devotees feel welcome to stay forever.

At lunch and again in the evening, Prabhupāda would take prasādam with the devotees and guests, the devotees sitting in rows on the floor and Prabhupāda sitting at the head, in a chair at a table. Mr. Jariwala and his family would serve everyone. Often respectable citizens would also attend the lunches. Mr. Chandra Desai, the chief minister of Gujarat; Mr. Vaikuntha Sastri, Surat's mayor; the state education minister; and others attended.

The prasādam was the finest Gujarati cooking, and when a dish was particularly to Prabhupāda's liking he would ask one of his women disciples to learn from Mrs. Jariwala how to cook it. Honoring prasādam twice a day with Prabhupāda was another intimacy the devotees shared with their spiritual master in India. Had they been with him in any other part of the world, such intimacy would probably have been impossible.

Beginning at 4:30 A.M. Prabhupāda would hold kīrtana and āratī before Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa and lecture from Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam. His room would be filled with guests, including the members of the Jariwala family. Although at outside engagements Prabhupāda usually spoke Hindi, in these morning meetings he always spoke English, for his disciples. He continued lecturing on Ajāmila, focusing on Ajāmila's degradation due to bad association and on his deliverance by chanting of the holy name. To Śrīla Prabhupāda's disciples, who were all aspiring to chant Hare Kṛṣṇa purely and go back to Godhead, these topics were urgently relevant. He was speaking of them.

"Anyone who utters the name of Kṛṣṇa is immediately freed from all sinful activities. That is the power of Kṛṣṇa's name. The difficulty is that after being freed we again commit mistakes. Kṛṣṇa's name has got the power—as soon as you utter the name you immediately become freed from all contaminations. But if one thinks, 'I am chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa, so even if I commit sinful activities it will be counteracted by my chanting,' that is the greatest offense. Just like sometimes in Christian churches they go on Sundays and confess and they are supposed to be excused from sinful reaction. But again, after coming back from the church, they commit the same sin with the expectation that 'Next week when I go to the church I shall confess, and it will be counteracted.' This kind of understanding is prohibited... If you accept spiritual life and at the same time go on committing sinful activities, then you will never be able to progress."

Prabhupāda's outdoor evening engagements were well attended. The city officials made one of Surat's main intersections a festival site, rerouted all traffic, and set up a stage and sound system.

Thousands would gather nightly. The crowd was sometimes so large and excited that Prabhupāda would have difficulty speaking above the noise, so he would hold a kīrtana. In the quiet that followed, he would have one or two of his disciples speak. Then he would speak. If the audience again became noisy, he would again say, "All right, let us have kīrtana." Or sometimes he would simply sit and distribute bits of crystalized sugar candy to the thousands who approached him to touch his lotus feet and take a piece of prasādam.

Girirāja: All the area around this block was completely packed with people. They were all mad after Śrīla Prabhupāda and Kṛṣṇa consciousness. Although a very big area, still people were occupying every space available, perching on rooftops, looking out windows, sitting on odd cement boulders or blocks scattered here and there.

Everything about Prabhupāda's program was completely satisfying to everyone. The old people liked it because there was the saintly figure of Śrīla Prabhupāda with his young foreign disciples. And the intellectuals liked it because Śrīla Prabhupāda was giving such sound philosophy. And the children liked it because they could run and dance and join in the kīrtana.

Mādrī dāsī: At one program they mobbed us so, we couldn't even get out of the cars, they were so eager to see Śrīla Prabhupāda. There were so many people. Prabhupāda said, "All right, the next night will be a night for ladies only." So the next night only ladies came, but still it was just as packed, and Prabhupāda gave a wonderful lecture.

Bruce: One program was so noisy that no one stopped talking, so Prabhupāda just started chanting the Brahma-saṁhitā. That was the whole program. He just chanted the Brahma-saṁhitā. Then he gave up and went out.

Cidānanda: Before going out to attend these programs, Prabhupāda looked like a general getting ready to go out for battle. He would come out of his room, beautifully dressed and effulgent, ready to go out and fight māyā. There were thousands and thousands of people waiting. I didn't know what to make of it. I couldn't handle so many people. But Prabhupāda was waging war on māyā. He was there to convince all these people, and the more people would come, the stronger he would get.

Prabhupāda preached in the outlying villages also. He would ride in a car with Mr. Jariwala, several disciples, and his Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa Deities to Bardoli or Meol. The village dwellings were made of baked mud, with straw roofs and cow dung walls and floors. For Prabhupāda's visit the villagers drew rice flour designs on the ground outside their houses and lined their lanes with clay pots, plantain leaves, and coconuts.

Mr. N. D. Patel: The people in my village were much impressed by the presence of Prabhupāda. They used to say that he has done miracles by chanting. "He is a miracle saint, no doubt," people were saying. "So many Western people have become devotees, just by chanting the name of the Lord." The people were very much impressed by Prabhupāda's practical way of bhakti. In his lecture Śrīla Prabhupāda created such a good impression, not only on Vaiṣṇavas but so many Christians, Parsis. Even some Muhammadan friends started believing in Lord Kṛṣṇa as the universal Godhead.

With regards to all the saints, nobody has been able to spread this philosophy like this in the past. In our village we are already Vaiṣṇavas, of course, but we used to believe in Sūryajī, Durgā, Ṭhākurajī, and all these things. But after Prabhupāda's explanation of what is Gītā, what is Lord Kṛṣṇa, we are chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa, Hare Kṛṣṇa, Kṛṣṇa Kṛṣṇa, Hare Hare/ Hare Rāma, Hare Rāma, Rāma Rāma, Hare Hare. After Prabhupāda conducted his discourse here in the village, the people were so impressed that even in his absence they chant the mahā-mantra loudly and they greet people with the words "Hare Kṛṣṇa, Hare Kṛṣṇa." At the time of departure the people wished every devotee and Prabhupāda with the words "Hare Kṛṣṇa!"

When there were no outside engagements, Prabhupāda would sit in his room and receive visitors. To a member of Parliament who came to visit, Prabhupāda said that wherever he traveled he encountered the concept of India as a beggar, backward and poverty-stricken. Ambassadors from India, he said, had only reinforced that image by going to Western countries and begging, "Give me rice, give me money, give me alms." India, Prabhupāda explained, had the greatest wealth of spiritual culture and the knowledge of Bhagavad-gītā. Prabhupāda had taken this wealth to the West and given it away freely. He was not a beggar.

Yamunā: During visiting hours, riding in the car, walking, standing, or sitting, Prabhupāda was chanting japa all the time in Surat. His fingers were always moving within his saffron bead bag. He was always a Vaiṣṇava—the pure devotee of Kṛṣṇa, well groomed, with beautiful, neat tilaka on, and his hand was always in his bead bag. As he was sitting to greet people, one would be struck by his inconceivable beauty. Śrīla Prabhupāda said persons who give themselves to others are called magnanimous. And this was how Śrīla Prabhupāda was during his pastimes in Surat. He was always delivering Kṛṣṇa to everyone he met. He affected people's hearts by his great potency.

Every morning in Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam class Prabhupāda added another installment of the Ajāmila story. Sometimes he would refer to the degradation of Indian culture, citing specific examples he had seen during his India tour.

"Now I am very sorry to inform you that in your city I have seen two temples—they are known as Rama Mandir. But there is no Rāma. This cheating is going on, and you are accepting. There is no Rāma Deity worship, but a man's photo is there, Sri Rama. And people are so foolish they do not question why this is going on. In Indore I have been in the Gītā Bhavan, and so many nonsense things are there. Another place I saw Gītā Samiti, and there was not a single photograph of Kṛṣṇa, but a lamp is there. And this is in the name of dharma.

"Last night this boy informed me that Bhagavad-gītā is going to be distributed by some swami, but according to Bhagavad-gītā that swami is fool number one. He is distributing Bhagavad-gītā, and people are accepting and paying for it. This is going on. It is a very serious situation all over the world. In the name of dharma [religion], adharmā [irreligion] is going on."

Just as Ajāmila had become degraded, Prabhupāda explained, Indian culture had also become degraded. The only hope was for people to return to their rightful position of Kṛṣṇa consciousness.

“So all over the world—not only in India—there cannot be peace unless you reform the whole social structure. And that can be done only by this movement, Kṛṣṇa consciousness. Now see how this man fell down. Lusty people—they don't care for society, they don't care for elderly persons, they do it in the road, in the street, on the sea beach, anywhere, in the cinema. These things are going on. It is advertised also in the cinema nowadays to attract people. Formerly in India it was not so. But they are introducing all of this nonsense to make people more lusty. To become lusty means he is going to hell. If you want to open the door to your liberation, then you should engage yourself in serving the mahat, the pure devotees. If you want to open the door to the hellish condition of life, then you mix with those who are too much attached to women.”

He spoke of the slaughterhouse and continued to decry the public display of illicit sex. Regarding illicit sex, he said that what had been a rare incident in the time of Ajāmila was now a common affair.

“How can young people protect themselves? They are not trained up. This Ajāmila was trained up, and yet he fell down. I saw in many parks, such as Golden Gate Park, within the cars the young boys and girls... Now here it is said that this behavior is expected of the śūdra, not from the higher castes. So just try to understand. They are thinking that they are becoming advanced. But they are not becoming advanced. They are becoming degraded. The whole world is degraded, and India is also imitating their degradation. How, by degraded association, one becomes himself degraded—that this story will reveal.”

Prabhupāda had accomplished in Surat what he had intended. He had given the holy name, and the people had embraced it. The people of Surat, though not prepared to alter their lives radically and live as ISKCON devotees, appreciated that Prabhupāda had turned Westerners into devotees of Lord Kṛṣṇa and that he was teaching the pure message of the scriptures and chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa. They had responded to Prabhupāda not out of a dogma or ritual but out of an appreciation of the importance of spiritual life and a recognition that Prabhupāda and ISKCON were genuine.

For Prabhupāda's disciples, the visit to Surat had given them a glimpse of what the world would be like if everyone was a devotee.

Allahabad

January 1971

Kumbha-melā is the greatest congregation of human beings on earth. Every twelve years in Allahabad, sādhus and pilgrims from all over India gather at the Trivenī, the confluence of the three holy rivers Ganges, Yamunā, and Sarasvatī. And at an auspicious time that assures the worshiper liberation from the cycle of birth and death, as many as fifteen million people enter the sacred waters. A smaller version, the Māgha-melā, takes place annually during the month of Māgha (December-January). January of 1971, however, happened to fall halfway through the twelve-year cycle from one Kumbha-melā to the next, and the Melā was known as Ardha-kumbha-melā.

Millions would attend, and Śrīla Prabhupāda decided to take advantage of the opportunity and attend the Melā with his disciples to preach.

While his disciples took the train from Surat to Allahabad, Prabhupāda, accompanied by Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, Hamsadūta, Nanda Kumāra, and others, went briefly to Bombay and then to Calcutta, where he satisfied himself that his shipment of books from Dai Nippon was safely stored at a Scindia warehouse. He also purchased twenty-four-inch brass Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa Deities to take with him to Allahabad. On January 11 he wrote,

...tomorrow morning we are going to Allahabad to attend the Ardha Kumbha Mela festival. We shall be going all 40 strong devotees and there are an expected 7,000,000 going by there also for the month of Magh.

About twenty-five devotees had taken the train from Surat to Allahabad, and others, newcomers from the U.S. and England, would soon be arriving. After a twenty-three-hour train ride, the first group arrived. As they disembarked, they could see only fog. With the address of a brahmacārī āśrama where they were to stay until they could pitch their tents at the Melā site, they started forward.

The devotees knew little of what to expect as they crowded into several one-horse ṭāngās and proceeded toward the appointed brahmacārī āśrama. They had heard that the Kumbha-melā was the most auspicious time to bathe at the Trivenī and that the water was icy cold. In the foggy morning, they saw pilgrims along the road, riders on camels, and guards carrying rifles. Reaching the āśrama at sunrise, they could see the sacred Ganges before them.

The next morning the devotees started for the pilgrimage site, joining the stream of pilgrims funneling toward the Trivenī. As they passed the Ram Bhag train station, a sign read, "From this point the confluence of the holy rivers Ganges and Yamunā and the forts are five kilometers." Riding in bicycle rickshas, the devotees merged with the moving tide of pilgrims, and soon they saw before them, on what one week before had been an empty plain, a city of tents. From the small tents, big tents, and giant paṇḍāls with flags flying rose a dissonance of sounds—music, loudspeaker announcements in different languages, bhajanas, and the hum of prayers.

The devotees got down from their rickshas, paid their drivers, and proceeded ahead, moving with the flow of pilgrims. As they walked, the ground transformed from grass to sand to mud, and the amplified music and the din of mantras and chants increased. The entire way was lined by beggars with leprosy, elephantiasis, and deformities.

The Melā committee had given ISKCON a good location near one of the entrance gates, and a few of the experienced devotees engaged workers in setting up the tents. ISKCON's paṇḍāl was large and brightly colored, with three smaller tents close by—one for the men, one for the women, and one for Śrīla Prabhupāda. A flimsy shack of corrugated tin served as a kitchen. Prabhupāda was to arrive the next day, and the devotees worked quickly putting down hay and rolling out darīs (large carpets of coarse cotton fabric). The devotees would have to build their own fires, gather their own vegetables, wash their own clothes, and do everything for themselves—all in the middle of a cold, barren sand flat. It was a far cry from being served like princes at a life member's home.

The devotees were in the midst of a great religious festival and human spectacle, and without Prabhupāda most of them were bewildered by the strange sights and sounds. Yogīs sat all day in the same posture, while crowds stood watching. Trident-carrying Śaivites, with simple red cloth, rudrākṣa beads, and matted hair, sat smoking gañjā. A procession of elephants, followed by two long files of naked sādhus, strode by. An ascetic lay on a bed of thorns. And there were still others, extreme renunciants rarely seen by the rest of civilization. And of course the various Hindu sects abounded, their chants and prayers rising into the air to mingle with the morning mist and the smoke from the ten thousand campfires that clouded the sky above the city of tents.

When Prabhupāda arrived at the ISKCON camp the next day, the devotees were ecstatic. Eagerly they began to tell him of the bizarre sights of the Melā. One of them mentioned a guru riding on an elephant and added, "Actually, you should ride on the elephant."

"No," Prabhupāda replied, "I would put Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa there."

Prabhupāda's presence reassured his disciples, reminding them that spiritual life was neither exotic nor bewildering, but simple and practical. In Prabhupāda's presence the devotees' attractions to mystic yoga, Vedic rituals, and material blessings and benedictions vanished. They accepted that great spiritual benefit awaited the pilgrims at the Melā, but as Prabhupāda had said, "To go to a holy place means to find a holy person and hear from him. A place is holy because of the presence of the saintly persons." The devotees understood, therefore, that the greatest spiritual benefit lay in hearing from Śrīla Prabhupāda.

Sitting in his tent with his disciples, Prabhupāda explained the significance of Ardha-kumbha-melā. For millions of years, he said, this had been among the most sacred places in India. During the appearance of the tortoise avatāra, when the demons and demigods had been churning immortal nectar, a drop of that nectar had fallen here. Since then, every six and twelve years certain auspicious planets form a jug, and this jug, filled with immortal nectar, is said to pour that nectar upon the Trivenī. Lord Rāmacandra and Hanumān appeared here in Allahabad, and here Lord Caitanya taught Rūpa Gosvāmī the science of devotional service. Prabhupāda said he had also lived in Allahabad with his wife and family, and Śrīla Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī had initiated him at Allahabad's Rūpa Gosvāmī Gaudiya Math in 1932. As for the Melās, anyone who came and bathed at the auspicious times when the prāṇa was pouring down from the heavens was guaranteed either promotion to the heavenly planets or liberation.

John Griesser: I talked with other so-called gurus, and they were very impersonal. They didn't seem to care so much for persons, especially Westerners. They had a dislike, sort of a disdain, even though occasionally some of them would have a Western disciple. Prabhupāda was completely different. He didn't seem so much concerned about externals but was very concerned about a person's philosophy, his consciousness. And of course he always tried to inject Kṛṣṇa consciousness into everyone he met.

Prabhupāda said that although most of the saints and sādhus present were inauthentic, many were perfect yogīs, some of them three and four hundred years old. These yogīs, from remote parts of India, would come out for the Melā and then return to seclusion. "I have personally seen," he said,

"that they take bath in the Ganges and come up in the seven sacred rivers. They go down in the Ganges and come up in the Godāvarī River. Then they go down and come up in the Kṛṣṇā River, and go down, like that." The devotees, therefore, should respect everyone who attended the Melā.

"So actually it's true," one of the devotees inquired, "that just by bathing here they are liberated?"

"Yes," Prabhupāda said, "it's true. They come here for liberation. But we have not come for liberation. We have come to preach. Being engaged in Kṛṣṇa's unalloyed devotional service, we are already liberated. We are not interested in liberation. We have come to preach devotional service."

When Prabhupāda rose early the next morning, the temperature was near freezing. His tent had no heat. He walked to the paṇḍāl to lead the kīrtana at maṅgala-ārati, and as he sat on his vyāsāsana a disciple handed him his quilt, which he wrapped around himself. To rise and bathe in such cold was difficult for most of the devotees. A few went to the Ganges, others bathed at a nearby pump, and some refused to get up at all.

Girirāja: The program was very rigorous, because it was bitterly cold at night and we were expected to get up at four o'clock in the morning and bathe and attend maṅgala-ārati. So a few staunch devotees like Tamāla Kṛṣṇa and Haṁsadūta got up early—by three or three-thirty—and walked all the way from our camp to the Ganges to take an early-morning bath. But those of us staying in the brahmacārī tent were not so staunch, and generally when it was time to get up at four o'clock it was so cold out that we preferred to remain in our sleeping bags.

Śrīla Prabhupāda also started to notice that some of us were coming late to maṅgala-ārati and that some of us were not coming at all. Prabhupāda became very upset about this, because he knew how important maṅgala-ārati was for us. So one morning, although he was a little frail in health, he got up at four o'clock and came out in his gamchā, sat down under the pump, and took that ice-cold bath early in the morning—just to encourage us to get up, bathe, and come to maṅgala-ārati. That had a very profound effect on all of us, and we felt so ashamed that we just couldn't sleep late any more.

After kīrtana Prabhupāda lectured on Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, resuming the story of Ajāmila. This particular story, with its glorification of the Lord's holy name, seemed especially relevant. The holy name was so powerful that by chanting only once Ajāmila had been saved. Chanting, therefore, was far more beneficial than the prāṇa coming down from the constellations.

Dawn came and the sky lightened—but only barely. A damp, heavy fog from the river, mingling with the smoke from the campfires, clung to everything. Rain began to fall. The devotees were unprepared for this weather. With food hard to get and toilet facilities the crudest, the devotees wondered how they would last for the scheduled two weeks.

Prabhupāda, however, who shared with his disciples all these austerities, remained transcendental and apparently unaffected. If the sun peeked through the clouds, he would sit outside and take his massage. Then he would bathe himself, sitting in his gamchā, dipping his loṭā into warmed Ganges water, and pouring it over his body. He seemed so content, the devotees took heart. He wasn't complaining, so why should they?

Early in the morning, Prabhupāda took the devotees out chanting. He wore his gray woollen cādar and his swami hat strapped under his chin, and his disciples dressed in the warmest clothes they had—sweaters, hats, cādars. Prabhupāda led the party as they weaved and wandered through the densely populated tent city. The kīrtana was a joy to the other pilgrims. Ironically, amid such an exotic gathering of yogīs, renunciants, naked sādhus, and the like, Prabhupāda and his disciples created the greatest stir.

And they were preaching. Although other groups were uttering mantras or lecturing in their tents, there was nothing else like this. This was the only saṅkīrtana, and everyone welcomed it. With Prabhupāda stately but joyful at the head, the procession grew, and Indians joined the Western sādhus in chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa.

Prabhupāda sent the devotees out on saṅkīrtana each morning. As the kīrtana party roamed from camp to camp, many pilgrims would run up, offering prostrated obeisances, money, and respect. With strong, experienced street kīrtana drummers and chanters like Madhudviṣa, Dīnanātha, and Haṁsadūta leading the chanting party, the devotees would forget the cold and the austerity.

Prabhupāda stressed the importance of chanting; always there must be kīrtana, he said. Philosophy and lectures would not be as effective at such gatherings, because the common people would not understand. Lord Caitanya had never lectured in public, but always He had held kīrtana.

As a result of the devotees' kīrtana, thousands would stream into ISKCON's large paṇḍāl to see the Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa Deities and take prasādam. ISKCON had the only Kṛṣṇa Deity at the whole Melā, and thousands would line up to see Him. Prabhupāda would speak in English in the morning and in Hindi at night, and his evening kīrtanas in the paṇḍāl became a great success. The Western sādhus with the women and the little child were a great curiosity to behold.

Prabhupāda also arranged for mass prasādam distribution, and he as signed Revatīnandana and a few helpers to cook almost nonstop over two small wood fires in the kitchen shed. Some nights the devotees would cook vegetables and halavā or vegetables and purīs for as many as seven hundred people. ISKCON's impact on the Melā pleased Prabhupāda.

In the meantime our program for touring India has been going with all success in every place we are invited. Now we have come to the Ardha Kumbha Mela at Prayag (Allahabad) and we have got undisputed prominence amongst all groups here in the large gathering.

Śrīla Prabhupāda's lectures on Ajāmila gave life to the cold and sometimes sick devotees. This opportunity to hear from Prabhupāda was the reward for all their austerities. In each morning class, Prabhupāda continued to stress the importance of chanting the holy names purely.

“The purification of one's chanting hari-nāma means as soon as you chant the holy name of Kṛṣṇa you will see the form of Kṛṣṇa, realize the qualities of Kṛṣṇa, remember the pastimes of Kṛṣṇa. That is pure chanting of Hare Kṛṣṇa mantra. That is stated in the commentary of Śrīla Jīva Gosvāmī—that a pure devotee who chants Hare Kṛṣṇa mantra immediately realizes the nāma, rūpa, guṇa, līlā,* everything about Kṛṣṇa, simply by chanting the names. You will feel the form of Kṛṣṇa. You will remember all His qualities—"Oh, Kṛṣṇa is so qualified; He is so magnanimous.' Then you will remember His līlā, pastimes—"Oh, Kṛṣṇa instructed Arjuna. Kṛṣṇa played with His cowherd boys. Kṛṣṇa had very nice talks with the gopīs, with His mother, Yaśodā.' These things you will remember. That is the actual perfection of chanting."

Prabhupāda reiterated that the only reason he had come with his disciples to the Melā was to glorify Lord Kṛṣṇa so that others could understand the importance of the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement. But if the devotees were to successfully give Kṛṣṇa consciousness to others, they must first realize Kṛṣṇa themselves. It was possible, he said, to think of Kṛṣṇa always. He gave the example of the Indian women carrying big waterpots on their heads. Just as they have learned to keep their balance, in spite of all other movements, so a devotee, despite his activities and despite any mental agitation, should always remember Kṛṣṇa. And the best way to remember Kṛṣṇa is to practice always chanting the holy name.

"I remember one of our teachers in our school life instructed that if you always think, 'I shall pass my examination with distinction,' then you will pass in the first division. If you think, 'I shall pass my examination in the first division,' then you will probably pass in the third division. And if you think, 'I will somehow or other pass my examination in the third division,' then you will fail. This means that if you expect more than your capacity, then it may be possible that at the time of examination you will pass. So when chanting the Hare Kṛṣṇa mantra, Caitanya Mahāprabhu has said not that you chant only one hour—no. One should practice, and that practice was shown by Haridāsa Ṭhākura (who chanted almost twenty-four hours daily). But because we cannot, therefore we have to engage always in the service of Kṛṣṇa. That will make you remember Kṛṣṇa."

Prabhupāda said that the chanting of Hare Kṛṣṇa is exactly like a lion's roar. As a lion's roar frightens all small creatures, the chanting of Hare Kṛṣṇa ends all one's sinful reactions. He repeatedly warned the devotees, however, to avoid the most dangerous offense, that of committing sins on the strength of the holy name.

"But even if you fall down, there is no loss. That is the statement of Nārada. If one takes to Kṛṣṇa sincerely and executes devotional service but then again falls down, still he will come back. Just like we have practical experience. Some of our students have fallen down. But whatever sincere service he has rendered, that is his permanent credit. And one day he will be saved, just like Ajāmila."

On Prabhupāda's last day in Allahabad a Mr. Gourkishore visited him in his tent, inviting him to Benares. As chairman of the 45th annual festival commemorating Lord Caitanya's visit to Benares, Mr. Gourkishore wanted Prabhupāda to attend the festival as the honored guest. When Prabhupāda said he felt ill and that perhaps some of his disciples could go in his stead, Mr. Gourkishore persisted until Prabhupāda finally agreed. But first Prabhupāda wanted to visit Gorakhpur.

Gorakhpur

February 3, 1971

The Ardha-kumbha-melā over, some devotees went to Delhi, some to Bombay, and others to Calcutta. Prabhupāda and the remaining devotees went to Gorakhpur—a ten-hour journey on the antiquated meter-gauge railway. Prabhupāda had been invited by his only disciple in Gorakhpur, Dr. R. P. Rao (now Rāmānanda), a research chemist who had met Prabhupāda in San Francisco, taken initiation in 1967, and since returned to his family and four children to teach chemistry at Gorakhpur University.

Prabhupāda and his disciples moved into crowded quarters at Rāmānanda's modest home, and about one hundred people attended Prabhupāda's lecture that evening. Prabhupāda already had plans for a Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa temple on the Gorakhpur University campus as well as accredited courses and degrees in Kṛṣṇa consciousness—B.A., M.A., and Ph.D. He envisioned graduates going out to teach Kṛṣṇa consciousness in schools, colleges, and temples all over the world. He inspired Rāmānanda and a group of his friends to form a committee to introduce Kṛṣṇa consciousness within the university, and he initiated about one dozen disciples. Since they all professed to be following the rules against illicit sex, intoxication, and gambling and had been lifelong vegetarians, he waived the usual six-month trial period. He asked them to chant sixteen rounds daily and to make their city Kṛṣṇa conscious. In his absence they should maintain Rāmānanda's home as an active ISKCON center and try to establish courses in Kṛṣṇa consciousness at the university.

February 6, 1971

Mr. Gourkishore was counting heavily on Prabhupāda's participation in the upcoming celebration. The climax of the week-long observance of Lord Caitanya's visit to Benares would be a parade, Mr. Gourkishore said, and Prabhupāda and his disciples had an important part in it. Newspaper articles, handbills, and loudspeaker carts had announced throughout the city the presence of Śrīla Prabhupāda and his "foreign disciples." The devotees sensed they were being treated like entertainers, expected to perform as if under contract—but without salary.

On the day of the procession Prabhupāda rode in a silver chariot, the kind customarily used in extravagant wedding processions. The chariot was pulled by a pair of white horses, wearing silver crowns and decorative blankets. The leading float in the parade bore a six-foot statue of Lord Caitanya in yellow nim wood. Next followed a file of decorated elephants. One elephant carried a banner reading Harer Nama Eva Kevalam, one carried actors dressed as Lord Rāma and Sītā, another carried two actors dressed as Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa, who waved to the crowds, and another a picture of Lord Caitanya and His associates performing saṅkīrtana. Next came a decorated flatbed truck with children portraying Lord Caitanya and Lord Nityānanda, chanting and dancing. Then followed a series of professional kīrtana groups and Prabhupāda's "foreign disciples" dancing and performing kīrtana.

Behind the devotees, Śrīla Prabhupāda rode in his chariot. On either side of the chariot walked a devotee fanning Prabhupāda with a cāmara whisk, while Prabhupāda sat with his right hand in his bead bag, his left hand on his cane. He was dressed in silk, with pearl buttons on his kurtā. A wide patch of sandalwood paste covered his forehead. He didn't wave or smile or turn to see the crowds, but sat calmly, chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa on his beads.

Following Prabhupāda's chariot was a śāhnāi group, several more kīrtana parties, and finally another statue of Lord Caitanya, carried by eight men.

The festival committee said three hundred thousand attended, double what they would have had without Prabhupāda and his foreign disciples. The procession was over, however, and as the star attraction, Prabhupāda had made his appearance and drawn a large crowd, and now nothing more was required. He felt tired. He and his disciples were taken to a nearby dharmasālā and served a feast. Prabhupāda remained grave and as soon as possible returned to his quarters and his regular schedule.

A student at the University of Benares who had met Prabhupāda at the Allahabad Melā stopped by to visit. The boy's father had given him a biography of Lord Caitanya as a gift for Prabhupāda, and when the boy showed Prabhupāda a picture of his father, Prabhupāda said, "Yes, your father is a devotee. So why don't you also take initiation?"

The boy was hesitant. As he walked with Prabhupāda in the garden, Prabhupāda said, "You have got the seed of devotional service from your father, so you must now cultivate."

"But how can I shave my head?" the boy inquired. "I am a university student."

"No, it is a custom. You should shave once, and then you can keep short hair."

"But how can I wear tilaka? They will laugh at me."

Prabhupāda said the boy should not fear criticism. He should become a soldier of Kṛṣṇa. Just as the government honors its valiant soldiers, Kṛṣṇa rewards a devotee who accepts difficulties and criticism on His behalf.

"What about guru-dakṣiṇā?" the boy asked.

"Guru-dakṣiṇā is just a formality," Prabhupāda said. "It was a custom in olden days that when someone gets initiation, he goes to the various homes. It is a sign that you have become a servant of your guru, you are prepared to beg alms for your guru. It is whatever you give."

The boy returned home and told his father. The next day was an auspicious day, his father said—the appearance day of Lord Nityānanda. A good day to receive spiritual initiation.

So the next day, on Nityānanda Trayodaśī, Śrīla Prabhupāda initiated the boy, giving him the name Nirañjana dāsa. When Prabhupāda asked Nirañjana if he had any questions, Nirañjana said he wanted to know his eternal relationship with Kṛṣṇa; was it as servant, as friend, as parent?

Prabhupāda replied that servitude was the common ground in all transcendental relationships with Lord Kṛṣṇa. By chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa, Nirañjana would become more and more purified and realize more and more his relationship with Kṛṣṇa. Nirañjana asked how he would understand his relationship.

"No, don't jump," Prabhupāda said. "You have some śraddhā [faith] from your father, and now you are associating with devotees and chanting. Gradually you will realize."

Nirañjana agreed to be patient.

Prabhupāda asked Nirañjana to arrange a lecture for him on campus, and Nirañjana, with the help of his uncle, a philosophy professor, got Prabhupāda a speaking engagement for his last morning in Benares.

On the day Prabhupāda was to leave, he met with John Griesser, the American photographer traveling with him and his party since Surat. John, who had shaved his mustache and thought a lot about his future, came to say good-bye—until Bombay, where they would meet again in a few weeks.

John found Prabhupāda in the courtyard, enjoying the sunshine and eating gur (date sugar) from a clay pot. Prabhupāda asked that the pot be broken and distributed to John and the other devotees present, and while John sat licking gur from a piece of clay pot, Prabhupāda talked about his boyhood in Calcutta.

John: Prabhupāda was talking in his accented, rhythmic English about his boyhood days in Calcutta, and he described a gracious city, before the crowding and squalor of today. As a schoolboy he had seen splendid Victorian buildings of white marble, surrounded by stately lawns and trees.

Suddenly Prabhupāda looked over at me and laughed. "So, John," he said, "I think Kṛṣṇa has captured you." I agreed I had known it for quite a while, but now Śrīla Prabhupāda confirmed it.

When Prabhupāda was leaving Benares to return to Gorakhpur, many of his disciples went to the wrong train station. While Prabhupāda and a few followers waited at the correct train station, Kauśalya asked him, "How did you like it here in Benares, Śrīla Prabhupāda?"

"It is all right," he said, indifferently.

"Did you have a nice rest?" she asked, trying to think of some positive aspect of the visit.

"Rest I can have any time," said Prabhupāda. "But I like to be with my devotees."

Surrounded by luggage, Prabhupāda sat on the bench, while Tamāla Kṛṣṇa and Śyāmasundara ran from the ticket office to the train and back. The train would leave soon. But where were the other devotees? Prabhupāda watched as his spiritual sons argued with the conductor, telling him the train couldn't go until the other devotees arrived. "They do not know what they are doing," Prabhupāda said, and he smiled.

Gorakhpur

February 10, 1971

On hearing that Prabhupāda wanted to preach in Gorakhpur, Hanuman Prasad Poddar, eminent head of the Gītā Press publishing company, offered one of his properties, a two-story house (his former residence), known as Krishna Niketan. Mr. Poddar, who was bedridden in another house in Gorakhpur, had first met Prabhupāda in 1962, and he appreciated Prabhupāda's mission.

When Prabhupāda received permission to use the Krishna Niketan, he acted quickly. It was not proper, he said, that the Deities of Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa he had brought from Calcutta had been packed away in a trunk after the Ardha-kumbha-melā. They had already been worshiped, so Their worship should not be stopped. "The Deities have to be installed tomorrow," he said, and he put Kauśalyā and Nanda Kumāra in charge of the preparations.

Seeing that Nanda Kumāra and Kauśalyā needed more help, Prabhupāda called for all his disciples, and soon twenty American devotees were scurrying about, preparing for the next day's festival. Prabhupāda directed the devotees in cleaning the temple room from ceiling to floor and in building the altar. He asked Himāvatī to donate her fanciest sārī, which he hung like a curtain before the table that was to be the Deities' altar. The altar needed a backdrop, he said, and while Kauśalya stood on the table he handed her pieces of colored fabric to arrange against the wall. The backdrop completed, Prabhupāda took a rug a devotee had bought in Allahabad and placed it over the table-altar.

That night Prabhupāda surveyed the temple room. "Oh, it is very nice," he said. He retired to his room, and two devotees stayed up all night sewing clothes for Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa. The next morning the Deities were placed on the altar, and the devotees resumed Their worship, offering Them prasādam and āratī six times a day.

The devotees were living in an ISKCON temple atmosphere for the first time since they had arrived in India, and their lives became regulated and secure. The weather warmed, and the devotees—many of whom had exhausted their health in Allahabad—felt relief. The Gorakhpur temple was situated on several acres of agricultural land outside the city; it was a peaceful place. During the day Prabhupāda would rest, as the sunshine came through the window and warmed his body.

In the evenings guests would come for kīrtana and Prabhupāda's lecture. Speaking on the Sixth Canto of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, Prabhupāda referred repeatedly to Śrīdhara Svāmī's commentary, from the twelfth century.

Śrīdhara Svāmī said that simply by chanting—without any regulative principles—one becomes liberated. So how is that? Śrīdhara Svāmī replies, also, that there are regulative principles. The idea is that chanting of the holy name is so powerful that it can immediately liberate the chanter. But because we are prone to fall down again, therefore there are regulative principles...

"Morning, noon, and evening, we should daily chant Hare Kṛṣṇa mantra with devotion and faith. By doing this, one can avoid volumes of miserable conditions of life—simply by chanting. So one should be so much careful and faithful. You should know that as soon as you are chanting, Kṛṣṇa is dancing on your tongue. Therefore, how much careful and respectful we should be."

Each night Prabhupāda would take the commentaries of Śrīdhara Svāmī as his text.

"So Śrīdhara Svāmī gives this example, that without knowing that there is a very nice medicine a man takes so many thousands of medicines. Similarly, the great stalwart leaders of religious principles, without knowing this Hare Kṛṣṇa mantra, take so many troublesome ritualistic ceremonies. Actually, there is no need. The whole thing is—Śrīdhara Svāmī is giving the stress very strongly—that you can simply chant Hare Kṛṣṇa mantra without understanding any ritualistic ceremonies..."

Śrīdhara Svāmī's commentary was filled with quotations from various scriptures about the supreme benefit of chanting the holy names of Kṛṣṇa.

"Then Śrīdhara Svāmī says, akhila-ceṣṭitam. That means that any endeavor for pushing on Kṛṣṇa's glories, that is as good as chanting the holy name. When you go out for canvassing, for pushing on this movement, people might think that you are not chanting. But suppose you are canvassing for a life member—that topic is also as good as chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa mantra, because it is akhila-ceṣṭitam. One's life must be dedicated simply for Kṛṣṇa's service."

Speaking before his Indian audiences, Śrīla Prabhupāda also told about his preaching in the West. One evening he gave a personal history, describing how his spiritual master, on their first meeting, had immediately told him to preach Lord Caitanya's message to the English-speaking world.

"At that time I argued with him that we are a dependent nation, and who is going to hear about our message? So he defeated my argument. Yes. He was a learned scholar. So what I was? I was a tiny boy. So I agreed that I was defeated." Prabhupāda laughed softly.

Prabhupāda told about his business years in Allahabad and how he again met his spiritual master and became initiated. He told of starting Back to Godhead in 1944, of taking sannyāsa, and of finally traveling to America in 1965. He mentioned his struggles in New York City and how the first boys had joined him when he started his movement in a storefront on Second Avenue.

"So practically we began work from 1968. In 1966 I started, but in '67 I became very much sick, so I came back to India. And again I went there in 1968. Practically this propaganda work began vigorously from 1968. From '68, '69, '70, and this is '71. So three, four years, all these branches have grown up, and now practically throughout the whole continent of Europe and throughout America they know what is Hare Kṛṣṇa movement, due to our propaganda."

Early each morning before sunrise, Prabhupāda would sit in the temple room before his disciples and lecture from Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam. And each morning the lights would go out, leaving everyone in darkness. It was a typical Indian power failure, and Prabhupāda would stop lecturing while a devotee lit two candles by his vyāsāsana and two candles on the altar. Long shadows would mix with the luminous gold of the Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa Deities, and Prabhupāda, wearing spectacles and holding open the Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam in his hand, would appear wonderfully mysterious.

One morning Śrīla Prabhupāda sang a new song, Jaya Rādhā-Mādhava.

"I will teach you this song," he said. Reciting the first line, he had the devotees repeat it again and again. One line at a time, he went through the song.

jaya rādhā-mādhava kuñja-bihārī

gopī-jana-vallabha giri-vara-dhārī

yaśodā-nandana braja-jana-rañjana

yāmuna-tīra-vana-cārī

They should know it, he told them, by the next morning.

Only a few devotees managed to memorize the song, so the next morning Prabhupāda went through it again, line by line. During the evening lecture he explained the meaning of the song.

"Jaya rādhā-mādhava Kuñja-bihārī. Kṛṣṇa is enjoying in Vṛndāvana. That is the real picture of God—simply enjoying. The vṛndāvana-līla of Kṛṣṇa is the perfect presentation of the Supreme Personality of Godhead—He is simply enjoying.

"All the inhabitants of Vṛndāvana—the gopīs, the cowherd boys, Mahārāja Nanda, Yaśodā—everyone is simply anxious how to make Kṛṣṇa happy. They have no other business. The residents of Vṛndāvana have no other business than to satisfy Kṛṣṇa, and Kṛṣṇa has no other business. Yaśodā-nandana braja-jana-rañjana yāmuna-tīra-vana-cārī. He is acting as the little son of Yaśodā. And His only business is how to please the residents of Vṛndāvana.

"Yaśodā-nandana braja-jana-rañjana yāmuna-tīra-vana-cārī. He is wandering in the forest of Vṛndāvana on the bank of the Yamunā. This is the actual picture of the Supreme Personality of Godhead.

"But Brahma, Indra, big, big demigods, they are also bewildered. They are sometimes mistaken how this cowherd boy can be the Supreme Personality of Godhead. Just like some of us think like that. But those who are thinking like that, for them also there is manifestation of Kṛṣṇa's supremacy. Gopī-jana-vallabha giri-vara-dhārī. Although He is engaged in pleasing the residents of Vraja, when there is need He can lift up the Govardhana Hill at the age of seven years. Or He can kill the Pūtana at the age of three months.

“So many demons used to visit daily. Kṛṣṇa used to go with the calves and cows, with His friends in the forest, and every day Kamsa used to send a demon to kill Him. Aghāsura, Bakāsura, Dhenukāsura—so many.

“So also, Kṛṣṇa is playing just like a cowherd boy. His supreme mercy as the Supreme Personality of Godhead is never absent there. That is God. God is not created by meditation. God is God. God is never manufactured. We should know this.”

On the third morning after introducing Jaya Rādhā-Mādhava, Prabhupāda again sang it with the devotees responding. Then he began to explain it further. Rādhā-Mādhava, he said, have Their eternal loving pastimes in the groves of Vṛndāvana.

He stopped speaking. His closed eyes flooded with tears, and he began gently rocking his head. His body trembled. Several minutes passed, and everyone in the room remained completely silent. Finally, he returned to external consciousness and said, “Now, just chant Hare Kṛṣṇa.”

After this, the Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa Deities of Gorakhpur became known as Śrī Śrī Rādhā-Mādhava.

Kauśalya would regularly wash the temple floor while Prabhupāda gave his Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam lecture. One morning Prabhupāda interrupted his lecture. “Just see this girl,” he said—Kauśalyā was down at the other end of the room, scrubbing. “This is first-class service.”

The next day Prabhupāda called Kauśalyā forward. “Every morning you are washing the floor so nicely,” he said, “but this morning you are washing the floor like a crow takes a bath.” Prabhupāda shook his hand, as if flicking water about. “You do not know how to wash the floor. I am going to show you.” Prabhupāda came down from his vyāsāsana and walked to the other end of the room, followed by all the devotees.

“Where is your bucket?” Kauśalyā brought over her bucket. Prabhupāda asked for a rag. She gave him hers. He then crouched down and started scrubbing. “This is how you wash the floor,” he said, “—with lots of water. And you do it a section at a time.” It should be done in two stages: first with a wet rag, and then with a wrung rag.

The devotees stood in amazement, watching. Several times Prabhupāda repeated the procedure, washing a section of the floor and then drying it, careful not to touch the clean area with his feet. “See?” he said. “That is expert.”

When Tamāla Kṛṣṇa requested Prabhupāda to move on to Bombay and bigger preaching, Prabhupāda replied, “Let us see if Kṛṣṇa wants us to have this place.” Hamsadūta also became restless to preach, and Prabhupāda sent him with a group of brahmacārīs to Aligarh and Agra.

Little appeared to be happening in Gorakhpur, but Prabhupāda had plans. He was still negotiating with the university authorities for land for constructing a temple.

If we are successful in our attempt, it will be unique in all the world and soon more and more college campuses will follow... And if we can establish a seat of Krishna Consciousness then students may take their doctorate degree in Krishna Consciousness and go out and preach all over the world.

Prabhupāda had three goals: to reach the Gorakhpur university students, to introduce kīrtana into the factories, and to introduce kīrtana into the homes. The main obstacle was lack of commitment from the local people. Many were willing to attend his evening lectures, but to actually surrender time, money, and energy in the service of Kṛṣṇa was more difficult. At least the Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa temple was lively, and Prabhupāda hoped the directors of Gītā Press would turn the Krishna Niketan building over to ISKCON permanently.

Prabhupāda continued lecturing, morning and evening. For three consecutive evenings he spoke on a single verse of Caitanya-caritāmṛta, defeating the Māyāvāda arguments that the Absolute Truth is ultimately impersonal Brahman.

“The Māyāvādī philosophers say that the Absolute is impersonal and that there is no different energy. So Caitanya Mahāprabhu's challenge is that the Absolute Truth has got multienergies. Suppose someone has a big business, a big factory. So if the proprietor says, “I am all-pervading over this factory,’ that is correct. Take, for example, Birla. They say, “Birla's factory.’ Birla's name is there. Although Birla is a person and he is not personally present in that factory, everyone says, “Birla's factory.’ That means Birla's money, Birla's energy, is there. If there is any loss in that factory, the suffering goes to Birla. Or if there is any gain in the factory, the profit goes to Birla. Therefore Birla's energy is there in the factory. Similarly, the whole creation is a manifestation of Kṛṣṇa. Everything there is Kṛṣṇa, His energy. He is represented by His energy. That is called simultaneously one and different, acintya-bhedābheda-tattva.”

Discussing preaching in America, Prabhupāda said the Western world was ninety-nine percent in the modes of ignorance and passion. Although America was the richest nation on earth, its youth were becoming hippies, much to the dismay of parents and government leaders. So despite their wealth, they were unhappy. They were ripe, however, for understanding spiritual knowledge.

“This is the causeless mercy of Lord Caitanya. Now you can see that these boys, when they are chanting—how they are in ecstasy. They are immediately on the transcendental platform. Not only here, everywhere they are chanting—in every temple. The advantage of these boys and girls is that they have no hodgepodge in their head. They directly accept Kṛṣṇa as the Supreme Personality of Godhead, and they directly accept the instruction of Lord Caitanya. Therefore they are making advancement. Their fortune is that their brain is not congested with hodgepodge ideas. They have given up all other occupations and accepted Kṛṣṇa as the Supreme Personality of Godhead. So in India we can also do that. What is the difficulty? We must do this. Just accept this: kṛṣṇas tu bhagavān svayam.* And surrender unto Him.”

Prabhupāda celebrated the appearance day of Śrīla Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī in Gorakhpur. At the morning gathering he said, “We should honor this day and very respectfully pray to Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī Gosvāmī that “We are engaged in your service, so give us strength. Give us intelligence. We are being guided by your servant.’ So in this way we have to pray. And I think in the evening we shall distribute prasādam. There will be so many guests coming, so they can be distributed prasādam.”

Prabhupāda said life members and other friends should be invited for the flower offering at noon. One of the devotees asked about the feast.

Prabhupāda: "Feasting means purī and halavā and a vegetable and chutney. That's all—four things. Make it simple."

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa: "Prabhupāda? You want us to offer a feast to your Guru Mahārāja at noontime? A special plate of feast?"

Prabhupāda: "Not a special plate. The process is that whatever we offer to the Deity, that is offered to guru. And guru offers to his guru. In this way, it goes to Kṛṣṇa. We don't directly offer to Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa. No. We have no right. Nor does Kṛṣṇa accept in that way. The pictures of the ācāryas—why are they there? Actually you have to offer the plate to your guru, and he will offer to his guru, he offers to his guru, his guru. In this way, it will go to Kṛṣṇa. That is the process. You cannot directly approach Kṛṣṇa or predecessor ācāryas. That is not possible."

One day Prabhupāda visited Hanuman Prasad Poddar. Mr. Poddar had been gravely ill for some time, but he was able to sit up and speak briefly with Prabhupāda. As the pioneer of the Kalyana magazine, which printed installments of the Mahābhārata and other Vedic classics, Hanuman Prasad Poddar was a world-famous patron of Indian religious thought. His inexpensive Hindi Bhagavad-gītā translation had been distributed by the millions, so that even a poor man could have a copy of Bhagavad-gītā. Mr. Poddar had been a friend to Prabhupāda when in 1962 Prabhupāda had come to him in Gorakhpur and shown him his manuscript for the first volume of the Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam. Appreciating the importance of the work, Mr. Poddar, by his word of approval, had helped Prabhupāda get a donation for its printing from the Delhi industrialist Mr. Dalmia. Now, almost ten years later, Prabhupāda was showing Mr. Poddar his recently published books Kṛṣṇa, the Supreme Personality of Godhead, Teachings of Lord Caitanya, The Nectar of Devotion, and his magazine Back to Godhead. Mr. Poddar was impressed, and he and Prabhupāda exchanged their sincere appreciation of each other's work.

Mr. Suryakant Fogla: Hanuman Prasad Poddar was my grandfather. He was very much ill at the time Prabhupāda came here to meet him in his bedroom upstairs. There are certain things which cannot be explained, but they were talking in the language of their eyes. My grandfather expressed some gratitude, some affection, some regard by his eyes, and Prabhupāda's reply was also in the same way. The appreciation from both sides could easily be seen and appreciated by the persons who were present. A lot of Prabhupāda's disciples were there, and everyone was almost in tears when those two saints, great people, met and talked to each other.

They were talking about the spiritual world, and they were praising each other for their deeds. My grandfather also was saying that what Prabhupāda has done, it is unforgettable for anyone of the world. Because to take our Indian culture to Western countries—the credit entirely goes to our beloved Prabhupāda. And he was the only person who took Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa and the holy name outside—in such a way that nobody else could and will be able to in the future.

Since Mr. Poddar was ill and weak, Prabhupāda left after about half an hour. Prabhupāda had spent two weeks in Gorakhpur, and now he was eager to go to Bombay. Leaving two disciples behind to attend to the Deity worship and continue preaching in Gorakhpur, he left.

ISKCON's Bombay headquarters was a four-room flat on the seventh floor of the Akash-Ganga Building. Rent was nearly three thousand rupees a month, and the devotees had no guaranteed monthly income. Yet because the building was in a vital, prestigious location, Prabhupāda had taken the risk. Such a headquarters would be a necessary base for the preaching he wanted to do in Bombay, and his next preaching would be a grand eleven-day paṇḍāl program. "If you are going to hunt," Prabhupāda said, "then you should hunt for a rhinoceros. In that way, if you don't succeed, everyone will simply say, 'Oh, it couldn't be done anyway.' But if you do succeed, then everyone will be surprised. Everyone will be amazed."

As Prabhupāda revealed his plans for a gigantic paṇḍāl festival, the devotees became keenly aware that Prabhupāda's inspiration was motivating all their preaching; without him they could never attempt anything so bold and ambitious as a giant paṇḍāl festival in Bombay. Often "the American and European disciples" had been billed along with him, as if of equal importance, but the devotees saw themselves as only foolish servants trying to help the genuine pure devotee of the Lord. Although Prabhupāda credited his disciples, his disciples knew that Prabhupāda was Kṛṣṇa's empowered representative. He was their authority and personal link to Kṛṣṇa; his words and actions evinced full transcendental potency. As Kṛṣṇa was unlimited, Śrīla Prabhupāda, Kṛṣṇa's dearest friend, was entitled to demand unlimited service on Kṛṣṇa's behalf. In the service of Kṛṣṇa, no project was impossible. Impossible, Prabhupāda said, was a word in a fool's dictionary.

But as Prabhupāda unfolded his plans for the paṇḍāl festival, the devotees doubted: How could they ever raise the money? How could they erect such a huge tent? Where would they get so much food? And who would cook it? Prabhupāda seemed amused at their doubts. "You are all Americans," he said. "So what is the use of being American unless you do something wonderful?"

A Bombay paṇḍāl, Prabhupāda said, would be the perfect way to link America's ingenuity with India's spirituality. He gave the example of a blind man and a lame man. Although separately they are helpless, by cooperating—the blind man carrying the lame man on his shoulders, and the lame man giving directions—the two can work successfully. America, because of materialism and ignorance of God, was blind. And India, because of foreign invasions, poverty, and misinterpretations of Vedic knowledge, was lame. America had technological advancement and wealth, and India had spiritual knowledge. The job of the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement was to combine the two strengths and uplift the world. And one practical application would be the Bombay paṇḍāl festival.

Prabhupāda divided the work, assigning Śyāmasundara to publicity, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa to the paṇḍāl arrangements, Girirāja to fund-raising, and Madhudviṣa to the scheduled programs onstage. Catching Prabhupāda's spirit of "shooting the rhinoceros," Śyāmasundara organized a massive publicity campaign, with giant posters and banners strung across the streets, announcing "His Divine Grace A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami Prabhupāda will speak in English language about the science of God. Prasādam distribution and bhajan singing will be led by his American and European bhaktas—Hare Krishna Festival at Cross Maidan—March 25 to April 4."

Girirāja: Śrīla Prabhupāda took Bombay by storm. The whole city was alive with excitement about the Hare Krishna Festival. We had banners at all the major intersections in Bombay. We had posters up on all the walls, many posters on every wall, and we had very big advertisements in the newspaper, with a beautiful picture of Śrīla Prabhupāda superimposed over a globe, and the words Bhagavat Dharma Discourses: A Hare Krishna Festival. World Preacher of Bhakti Cult, His Divine Grace A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami.

Day by day the momentum grew more and more, and every day something new was happening. Finally, in the last two days, we got a huge billboard at Victoria Train Station, the busiest intersection of downtown Bombay. By then everyone knew so much about the festival and where it was going to be and everything that all this billboard said was Hare Krishna in huge letters. By then everyone knew, so just these two huge words Hare Krishna was enough.

Then Śyāmasundara had arranged for a big helium-filled balloon that was attached to a very long rope at the Cross Maidan site. That balloon just hovered over the city, and there was a streamer attached to the balloon, saying Hare Krishna Festival. It was real American ingenuity, flair, and dynamism.

Inspired by Śyāmasundara's lead and taking up a spirit of competition, the other devotees worked at their projects with great enthusiasm. When Prabhupāda called a meeting of the local ISKCON life members and supporters, the turnout was disappointing—only about a dozen. And even those, on hearing the proportions of Prabhupāda's plan, became hesitant. The festival would cost more than one hundred thousand rupees! Although some life members doubted whether the devotees could actually execute such a large production, a handful of stalwarts—Sadajiwatlal, Chandulal Bahl, Kartikeya Mahadevia, Kailash Seksaria, Ramchand Chabria, G. D. Somani, and others—vowed they would do their best to help raise the funds.

Prabhupāda remained actively involved, and he warned his disciples to be wary of cheaters during their business transactions. Every night the devotees would report to him, and he would ask about many details. He wanted the best location, the best work, and the best price. He wanted to know everything: What about the cooking area? Are all the devotees working to their full capacity? Is the mailing list complete? Have the invitations been sent? What about the latrines? What was the cost for the sound system? He scrutinized every detail with sharp, critical intelligence.

Girirāja's fund-raising work was going well. He had donations solicited from businessmen and had printed a souvenir pamphlet. But he was feeling a strain, and he came to Prabhupāda for solace. "Can we use force in Kṛṣṇa consciousness?" he asked.

Prabhupāda frowned. "No. We cannot use force."

"But what if we see one of the workers is lazy on the job and not doing what he is supposed to?"

"No," Prabhupāda replied. "We can never use force."

"Well, what about in making life members?"

"Force we cannot use," Prabhupāda repeated. "But we can trick them." He told a story about a boy who didn't want to do arithmetic; as soon as the teacher wrote one plus one on the board, the boy would balk. So the teacher drew a picture of a cow on the board and asked the boy, "If a man has one cow and then he buys another cow, how many cows will he have?" The boy answered, "Two." Thus the teacher began teaching him arithmetic, even though he was unwilling to learn.

"So people may be averse to serving Kṛṣṇa," Prabhupāda explained, "but we can trick them and get them to serve without their knowing it. But we can never use force. These people are all businessmen. They are always calculating profit and loss. But they are also pious, and they want to go to Kṛṣṇa. So you have to convince them that by giving this money they will gain so much by coming closer to Kṛṣṇa. And that is the truth. When they are convinced, then they will give."

Prabhupāda had ordered from Jaipur two sets of large white marble Deities (paid for by a donation from R. D. Birla). One set was to be installed in the Bombay temple and the other worshiped at the paṇḍāl and later sent to one of the temples in the West. But the devotees were anxious that the Deities be finished and shipped on time. And there were other sources of anxiety, right up until the very day of the festival. Paṇḍāl construction, prasādam distribution, seating arrangements, sound systems—whether these things would be ready on time and whether there would be enough money remained uncertain. But under Prabhupāda's direction the devotees worked steadily, with firm faith in Kṛṣṇa.

And all turned out successful, with ten thousand people attending the first day and twenty thousand that night. The devotees, including those just arrived from the West, numbered about a hundred, and the large stage easily accommodated them, with ample space for dancing kīrtanas. Onstage, within a gorgeous, golden-domed altar, surrounded by profuse flower arrangements, stood Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa. Prabhupāda's large red vyāsāsana, covered by a canopy, stood at stage center. Also onstage was a display of Prabhupāda's books. The tall and spacious paṇḍāl, built to hold more than thirty thousand, was lined with fluorescent bulbs, and the stage glowed with colorful flashing lights.

The program was kīrtana, prasādam, a lecture, and slides, more kīrtana, and more prasādam. And the Bombayites—devotees at heart, despite their sophistication and Westernization—loved these very things: Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa, kīrtana, and prasādam. And that all this was being presented by Westerners made the paṇḍāl especially attractive.

The cooks prepared prasādam at the paṇḍāl site, cooking over a hard coal fire and using big paddles to stir kicharī and halavā in woks eight feet across. Each night the devotees would serve thousands of plates.

Prabhupāda's appearance in the evening was always the high point. He would sit on his vyāsāsana, little Sarasvatī would walk out and garland him, and the crowd would cheer. He would wait for the crowd to quieten, which never happened. So he would just begin speaking, his voice ringing over the powerful sound system. He titled his first lecture “Modern Civilization Is a Failure, and the Only Hope Is Krishna Consciousness.”

Prabhupāda sat, eyes half closed in concentration, addressing the largest audience that had ever assembled to hear him. His speaking was particularly forceful, as he glorified Kṛṣṇa and criticized the enemies of Kṛṣṇa. He spoke against governments that were not Kṛṣṇa conscious and against gurus who neglected the worship of Kṛṣṇa. He stressed the necessity of teaching Kṛṣṇa's message to the whole world, while his Godbrothers from the Bombay Gaudiya Math sat in the audience, listening respectfully.

“And you are practically seeing that all over the world these Bhagavad-gītā principles—Kṛṣṇa, the Supreme Lord—is being accepted. All these boys and girls who are dancing in Kṛṣṇa consciousness—four years ago, four years back, they never heard of Kṛṣṇa. Of course, some of them knew Bhagavad-gītā, because Bhagavad-gītā is very widely read. But because Bhagavad-gītā was not properly presented, although for the last hundred or two hundred or more than that years Bhagavad-gītā is widely read all over the world, there was not a single Kṛṣṇa bhakta. But since Bhagavad-gītā is being presented as it is, within four years there are hundreds and thousands of Kṛṣṇa bhaktas. That is our point, that you present the thing as it is, without any adulteration...

“So it is our mission. It is India's culture. People are hankering after this culture, Kṛṣṇa culture. So you should prepare yourself to present Bhagavad-gītā as it is. Then India will conquer all over the world by this Kṛṣṇa culture. Rest assured. But we are hankering after help from others. Our government men go there in America: ‘Please give us wheat. Please give us money. Please give us soldiers.’ Simply begging business. But here is a thing which you can give to them. Simply begging does not glorify your country.”

Girirāja: Prabhupāda was preaching forcefully to the people of Bombay, and every evening the paṇḍāl was packed with at least twenty thousand people. Śrīla Prabhupāda would preach so strongly, emphasizing following religious principles. He knew that these people are Hindus but they are not following these principles. Prabhupāda was speaking so powerfully that I knew that what he was saying would be hard for many of the audience to accept.

“We have something to give to the whole world. That is Kṛṣṇa consciousness... Why you neglect this treasure of Vedic knowledge? And the summarized knowledge is Bhagavad-gītā. So if we simply try to understand Bhagavad-gītā as it is, we understand immediately the science of God. And because we are all parts and parcels of God, we are actually hankering after uniting with God. That is our seeking. Ānandamayo 'bhyāsāt. God is ānandamaya [by nature, full of pleasure], and we, being part and parcel of God, or Kṛṣṇa, we are also ānandamaya. But we are seeking ānanda [pleasure] in a different atmosphere, in the material atmosphere. Therefore we are being baffled. The only remedy is that you take to Kṛṣṇa consciousness and you will be happy. So it is the duty of every Indian to understand this science.”

Girirāja: At that time I was thinking that if Prabhupāda had wanted to flatter the audience or compromise his philosophy, he could have attracted millions of followers. But because he was preaching so boldly and forcefully without compromise, many of the audience did not like it, because it was a challenge to their sense gratification and to their sentiment.

“This is a science. It is not a dogmatic, bluffing thing. It is a science, and spoken by the Lord Himself, and understood by all the ācāryas. Kṛṣṇa says, ācāryopasanam: we have to understand things through the ācāryas. Ācāryavān puruṣo veda: one who is not following the footsteps of the ācāryas, he cannot understand anything. Kṛṣṇa also says, tad-vijñānārtham. That is said in the Kaṭhopanīṣad: tad-vijñānārtham sa gurum evā bhigacchet. Kṛṣṇa says, tad viddhi praṇipātena paripraśnena sevayā. So everywhere the same instruction is there, “You approach a person who is coming in disciplic succession—evam paramparā-prāptam—and try to learn Bhagavad-gītā as it is.’ Your life will be sublime. Your life will be successful. That is our mission.”

Girirāja: The fact is that people were wild about Prabhupāda and ISKCON. One night we showed slides of the Ratha-yātrā in San Francisco, and the audience was going wild. In front of ten thousand people Prabhupāda announced that we will hold Jagannātha Ratha-yātrā in Bombay, and everyone started to cheer and applaud.

Day after day, the paṇḍāl festival was a success. Bombay's most important citizens came and were impressed. White-shirted businessmen and their well-groomed wives joined in the chanting. For hundreds of thousands of Bombay citizens, coming to the Cross Maidan to attend an evening paṇḍāl program was easy enough. Some were intent on listening to the lecture and inquiring deeply into devotional service, others came mostly to see the Deity, take prasādam, or appreciate the kīrtana. In any case, A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami Prabhupāda and the Hare Kṛṣṇa devotees were a refreshing addition to the life of the city. It was the biggest public event in Bombay.

One evening Prabhupāda conducted a Vedic marriage ceremony and an initiation before thousands of people. The marriage was arranged between Vegavān who was Swedish, and Padmavatī dāsī, who was Australian. They completely enchanted the whole audience—she with her ornate red sārī and Indian jewelry, including a nose ring, and he with his nice white dhotī and kurtā and clean-shaven head. Six brahmācārīs were initiated at that time also.

Girirāja: The audience was impressed. First of all they were amazed just to see foreign devotees, foreign sādhus. Then, on top of that, to see them being initiated, and even more than that, being married in front of ten thousand people—it was overwhelming. So during the ceremony, as Śrīla Prabhupāda made the boy and girl husband and wife, he mentioned that she was from Australia and he was from Sweden. Then Śrīla Prabhupāda said, “This is the real United Nations,” and everyone burst into applause. It was the most glamorous, wonderful program.

The final night of the festival, the devotees carried the Deities of Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa in a palanquin to the seaside. Prabhupāda spoke and held kīrtana before a crowd of twenty-five thousand.

The next day, the Indian Express reported, “FITTING FINALE TO HARE KRISHNA FESTIVAL.”

It was a grand, fitting finale to the 11-day Hare Krishna festival which attracted thousands of devotees at Cross Maidan in South Bombay.

The decorated murtis of Radha and Krishna were taken in procession on a regal ratha from the venue through Dirgaum Road to Chaoupatty in the evening.

Dozens of nama-sankirtana mandalas from all over the city spearheaded the procession with loud and ecstatic chanting of the Hare Krishna maha-mantra, followed by His Divine Grace A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami Prabhu pada in an elegant horse-drawn coach chanting. Crowds chanted Hare Krishna on the road sides as the ratha was pulled by devotees along the route.

At Chaoupatty the four-foot-tall Deities, splendidly dressed and decorated with jewels and garlands, were displayed on Their magnificent "simhasana" (throne) donated to the Hare Krishna movement by Madhav Baug and Mumba devi temples.

During the celebrations Prabhupāda spoke from the Gītā and Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam daily, morning and evening. More than thirty of his foreign disciples conducted kirtana, aratika, and film shows in the specially erected pandals.

Prabhupāda will deliver his final public message to the citizens before leaving in a few weeks on a preaching tour of the major cities of Russia.

Bombayites would not soon forget the Hare Kṛṣṇa festival, and a letter from Prabhupāda to the ISKCON life members pledged that it had been only the beginning.

By the Grace of Their Lordships Sri Sri Radha and Krishna our recent festival in Cross Maidan Exhibition Ground has been counted a grand success, and quite noticeably the spirit of bhakti has been actively revived in Bombay. My blessings go especially to all of you who have joined with us in service.

As you may know, my plan is to establish in this most auspicious city a unique International Krishna Conscious Training Centre, where hundreds of persons from abroad may be educated in the Vedic way of life, while at the same time Indian boys and girls may be trained up for prachar (preaching) work in foreign countries. We will construct classrooms, workrooms, dormitories, kitchen for large-scale public prasad distribution, a lecture hall, library, and a beautiful temple for the glorification of Radha and Krishna.

We are on the threshold of bringing this important project to fruition, and we are very excited to inform you the progress made in this respect.

You will agree with me that your active participation and your direct involvement in this is most essential, and hence I appeal to you to spare your valuable time for Krishna and make it a point, inspite of your extremely busy life, to extend your unstinted co-operation. It is proposed to hold a meeting on Monday, the 25th April 1971, at 6:30 p.m., "Akash Ganga," 7th floor, 89 Bhulabhai Desai Road, Bombay-26, to discuss and to finalise plans to channel our united energies to achieve the goal. It will also be a great opportunity for like-minded Krishna devotees to meet, to have darshan of the deities, and to exchange views and suggestions to make rapid progress in spiritual life.

I very much want to meet you again, so kindly make it a “must” to attend our meeting; there is a lot of ground to be covered to spread Krishna Consciousness to millions and millions of our slumbering brothers and sisters!

That so many were accepting ISKCON and the saṅkīrtana movement as bona fide testified to the purity of Śrīla Prabhupāda's presentation of Lord Kṛṣṇa's teachings. His teachings were not sectarian; they were meant for everyone all over the world. He was teaching love of Kṛṣṇa, the universal principle for all humanity. In his lectures at the paṇḍāl he had lamented that although India was known as the land of religion, where God consciousness had traditionally permeated society, India's leaders were becoming atheists and communists. Whether Indians, polluted by the madness for sense gratification and confused by a hodgepodge of pseudoreligious teachings, could still recognize and adopt the real thing remained to be seen. But at least in Bombay, the paṇḍāl program had had a great effect—of that Prabhupāda felt satisfied.

The program had been the same program he had introduced everywhere: chanting, dancing, taking prasādam, worshiping the Deity, hearing about Kṛṣṇa. It was Lord Caitanya's program, adapted slightly according to the particular circumstances—but Lord Caitanya's program nonetheless. This saṅkīrtana was the only possible remedy for the disease of modern society. Yet people were reluctant to take the remedy. Prabhupāda, therefore, had “labeled the bottle.” The medicine was unchanged, but he had labeled it attractively: a gala evening of entertainment, music, and refreshments, featuring the youth of America and Europe transformed into Vaiṣṇavas.

The labeling was simple, nondeceptive; everyone in Bombay knew well that the Hare Kṛṣṇa paṇḍāl festival was a product of their own Vedic heritage. They were fully aware that the Hare Kṛṣṇa leader was a great ācārya in the ancient tradition. But it had come to them in such a spectacular and attractive way that they had become caught up in it.

Madhudviṣa: No one really thought Prabhupāda was leaving India. In India Prabhupāda was the cutting edge of the whole movement. He was the force. Things were moving because of Prabhupāda. In the Western world Prabhupāda would give the idea, and the devotees would expand on it; Prabhupāda was the overseer, but he didn't have such an integral, active part in the West. But in India Prabhupāda was right in the thick of it. He was checking the accounts. He was so much involved in the Indian scene that 'ṣi Kumāra, the Bombay treasurer, would have to go to Prabhupāda every other day and show him the accounts. He was very much involved in everything. The whole movement in India depended on Prabhupāda. Because of this, no one thought that Prabhupāda would really leave us.

SPL 34: Jet-Age Parivrājākācārya

CHAPTER THIRTY-FOUR

Śrīla Prabhupāda prepared for extensive world travel. Although his itinerary was indefinite, his general plan was to travel widely for a few months, then tour the U.S., visit London, and then return to India. He had sent disciples to Australia and Malaysia, and he wanted to visit them. He also wanted to go to Moscow and was awaiting a letter of permission from the Soviet government. As he had spread his movement in America, visiting major cities and preaching and then stationing a few faithful disciples there to carry on, he now expanded his field to include the whole world.

Śrīla Prabhupāda's traveling was in the mood of Nārada Muni, the eternally wandering devotee. In the First Canto of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, Śrīla Prabhupāda had translated Nārada Muni's words:

I travelled all over the earth fully satisfied and without being proud or envious... I do travel everywhere, by the Grace of the Almighty Vishnu either in the transcendental world or in the three divisions of the material world without any restriction because I am fixed up unbroken in the devotional service of the Lord. I do travel as abovementioned by constantly singing the glories of the Lord in transcendental message by vibrating this instrument of Vina charged with transcendental sound and given to me by Lord Krishna.

And in his Bhāgavatam purports, Śrīla Prabhupāda had explained,

It is the duty of a mendicant to have experience of all varieties of God's creation as Paribrajakacharya or travelling alone through all forests, hills, towns, villages etc. to gain faith in God and strength of mind as well as to enlighten the inhabitants of the message of God. A Sannyāsī is duty bound to take all these risks without any fear and the most typical Sannyāsī of the present age is Lord Chaitanya Who travelled in the same manner through the central India jungles enlightening even the tigers, bears, snakes, deers, elephants and many other jungle animals.

In the age of Kali, Prabhupāda had explained, sannyāsa is especially difficult. If, however, one did take sannyāsa,

One who may take the vow of renunciation of family life may not imitate the Paribrajakacharyas like Nārada or Lord Chaitanya but may sit down at some holy place and devote the whole time and energy in hearing and repeatedly chanting the holy scriptures left by the great Acharyas like the six Gosvamins of Vrindaban.

Yet Prabhupāda was traveling as a mendicant missionary, parivrājakācārya. Having already attained the advanced stage wherein the pure devotee resides in Vṛndāvana and chants Hare Kṛṣṇa incessantly, he was now traveling for the good of the whole world. He, like Nārada, was traveling to all parts of the world. As a news writer in India had appropriately titled him, he was "a jet-age parivrājakācārya."

A few brahmacārīs, each only recently initiated by Śrīla Prabhupāda, had been preaching alone on the tropical peninsula of Malaysia for several months. With nearly a million Indians in Malaysia, many of them wealthy and influential, the brahmacārīs were meeting with success. During one program at a Hindu temple in Kuala Lumpur, a South Indian doctor and his lawyer wife expressed their appreciation of the devotees and offered to donate a house and some land to ISKCON. When the devotees visited the property and found that the offer was serious, they informed Prabhupāda, who decided to visit.

Prabhupāda, accompanied by his disciple Vegavān, flew from Bombay to Kuala Lumpur. Since he planned to go next to Sydney and install Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa Deities in the new temple there, he carried the Deities with him, the same Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa who had presided at the Bombay paṇḍāl. Lord Kṛṣṇa rode in a wooden box in the plane's luggage compartment, and Śrīmatī Rādhārāṇī, wrapped in cloth, rested on Vegavān's lap. Within a brief time after Prabhupāda's arrival at Kuala Lumpur, he was lecturing before a large audience at his host's home.

I'm very glad to inform you that we have reached Malaysia very shortly, that on my arrival there was a nice meeting, and then we have come outside the city. Yesterday I was very busy all day.

For two days Prabhupāda stayed in the home of a wealthy Sindhi merchant of Kuala Lumpur. The house was large and luxurious, with thick carpets and large mirrors. But when Prabhupāda learned that his hosts were meat-eaters, he refused to eat anything except fruit and milk, even though his disciples offered to cook for him. His disciples, having traveled throughout Malaysia, considered eating at the homes of meat-eaters permissible, as long as the devotees could prepare their prasādam in pots not used for cooking meat. But Prabhupāda's standard was higher.

One room in the house held a large collection of marble Deities, about fifty sets of Lakṣmī-Nārāyaṇa and Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa Deities in rows. It appeared to be more of a collector's display than worship, however, and Prabhupāda was unimpressed.

Prabhupāda lectured at the Kuala Lumpur town hall and the Lakṣmī-Nārāyaṇa temple, mostly to Indians. He explained that people could be united only on the spiritual platform. "Look at the United Nations," he said. "They are adding more and more flags. And there are only more and more wars. This Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement will be the real United Nations." Prabhupāda had brought with him slides of ISKCON's activities, and he had one of his disciples narrate a slide show, coaching him on what to say. When a slide appeared of Ratha-yātrā in London's Trafalgar Square, Prabhupāda prompted the devotee, "Now it's no more Lord Nelson. Now it's Lord Jagannātha."

When Prabhupāda met the couple offering the land, he discovered that the agreement had certain important conditions. The doctor and his wife said that they would give ISKCON a large piece of land near the main highway and that their own construction company would build the temple. Within two years, however, if the company hadn't completed the building, the doctor and his wife would reclaim the property. Always eager to consider any serious donation of land, Prabhupāda accepted the conditional offer. But he knew that such offers were usually too conditional. Already the doctor and his wife had hinted of "Indian brāhmaṇas" running the temple and of ISKCON's having only a side altar.

One evening as Prabhupāda talked with the doctor, a gynecologist, the talk turned to birth control. Prabhupāda explained its sinfulness, and he gave an example. If someone poisoned the air in the room he and the doctor were sitting in, then they would have to leave the room or die. Similarly, Prabhupāda explained, contraception meant to poison the womb, denying a soul its rightful shelter.

Like Prabhupāda's previous host, the doctor ate meat, although the devotees had been pushing him to give it up. Prabhupāda was gentle. "Try to stop eating meat," he urged. It was Ekādaśī, and Prabhupāda decided to fast from all food, again showing extreme reluctance to eat in the home of a meat-eater.

The Sydney devotees weren't ready for Prabhupāda. An early telegram had informed them he was coming, but a later telegram had said, "Prabhupāda not coming now." A third telegram had come, announcing that Bali-mardana, the Australian G.B.C. secretary, was coming. When a fourth telegram had stated only "Arriving" and the date and flight number, the devotees had presumed this referred to Bali-mardana, not to Prabhupāda. The devotees had taken a small garland and had gone to meet the plane, and when the doors to the customs area opened and Prabhupāda himself walked out, they were flabbergasted.

A white attache case in his left hand, a cane in his right, a lightweight cādar around his shoulders, Śrīla Prabhupāda entered the airport. Reporters, on hand to interview Bali-mardana, came eagerly forward, one of them inquiring why Prabhupāda had come to Australia.

Replying softly, Prabhupāda said he traveled everywhere, just as a salesman travels everywhere. A salesman looks for customers wherever he can find them, and Prabhupāda was traveling, searching for anyone intelligent enough to accept his message. "There is no difference in coming to Australia," he said. "The governments have made a demarcation— 'This is Australia'—but we see everywhere as the land of Kṛṣṇa."

One of the devotees hurried to phone the temple—Prabhupāda was coming!

Like Prabhupāda's original temple at 26 Second Avenue in New York, the Sydney temple was a one-room storefront on a main business thoroughfare. On the storefront's plate glass window, one of the devotees had painted a picture of Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa. Prabhupāda entered the room and found it bare, except for a simple wooden altar with three-inch Jagannātha deities, and a big cloth-covered vyāsāsana. An old rug hid the floor. The blue haze hanging in the air was smoke from the downstairs kitchen, where a devotee was frantically burning cumin seeds to spice Prabhupāda's lunch.

Prabhupāda remained grave as he walked deliberately to the rear door and looked outside. But when he saw garbage and boards stacked high against the building, his gravity turned to sternness. "What is all this?" he asked. Someone tried an explanation. Unsatisfactory. A devotee brought a glass of milk. "Too hot," Prabhupāda said, and the devotee took it away.

Prabhupāda sat on the large vyāsāsana. He looked around the room at each face. None of the fifteen or so devotees had ever seen him before, and only a handful had been initiated (by mail). They were untrained. The carpet was dirty, he said; it should be replaced. And why were there no flowers on the altar? He had brought Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa Deities, but before the devotees could begin Their worship, everything must be very clean. The devotees would have to become brāhmaṇas before they could worship Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa.

These devotees, Prabhupāda saw, knew little of Kṛṣṇa consciousness. The devotees who had come to Australia originally, Upendra and Bali- mardana, had opened the center and left, returning but rarely. Thus an entire temple of inexperienced devotees had been virtually left on its own. Since none of the Sydney devotees could lecture well, the daily classes had consisted of readings from Prabhupāda's abridged Bhagavad-gītā As It Is, the only book they had. Yet their firm faith in Prabhupāda compensated for their lack of training. They accepted him as a pure devotee directly in touch with God, and they accepted his books as truth and Kṛṣṇa as the Supreme Personality of Godhead. But many practical things they didn't know, such as how to cook, lecture, and worship the Deities. They knew Prabhupāda wanted them to chant Hare Kṛṣṇa publicly and distribute Back to Godhead magazines to the people of Sydney, and this they did daily. Despite frequent arrests, they continued with their saṅkīrtana. Sincerity they had. They only lacked training.

A devotee brought Prabhupāda his lunch, poorly cooked—the capātis half burned, half raw, the vegetables wrongly spiced. Prabhupāda rebuked the cook, "If you didn't know how to cook, why didn't you tell me? I can show you." And he went into the kitchen. One of the cooks had tried to make kacaurīs and had failed. Although she knew that the dough had to be rolled thin, the filling put in just right, and then the edges folded over precisely, neither she nor any of the other devotees had been able to do it. Prabhupāda, using the same dough and filling, demonstrated the art and made perfect kacaurīs.

The devotees explained their difficulty in making capātis. There was no flame on their electric stove. The capātis always came out dry or raw or burned and never puffed up. The excuse only annoyed Prabhupāda, however, who showed exactly how to make capātis that puffed up every time—even on an electric burner. Then he taught the cooks a simple vegetable dish, advising as he cooked. After he left the kitchen, the devotees tried the capātis again. They wouldn't puff. It seemed a magical art only Prabhupāda knew.

Śrīla Prabhupāda had his reasons for bringing Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa to Australia—some of them apparent, others so deep that only he and Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa could understand them. Of course, he was always expanding his movement, of which Deity worship was an important part. So that was one reason for bringing Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa to Australia: to strengthen the devotees and establish more solidly his movement there.

And Prabhupāda loved these Deities. They had presided over the Bombay paṇḍāl, and when They hadn't been onstage he had kept Them in his room, where he could look at Them during the day. He had brought Them from Bombay to Malaysia to Sydney, and now he proposed to install Them in this fledgling ISKCON center. But the infinite purity of his heart and the depth of his determination to risk anything for Their Lordships Śrī Śrī Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa are unfathomable. Śrīla Prabhupāda's activities are most grave, and their deeper meaning eludes an observer. Of Lord

Caitanya, Kṛṣṇadāsa Kavirāja wrote, "I do not know the deep meaning of Śrī Caitanya Mahāprabhu's activities. I am just trying to describe them externally."

When Prabhupāda came to the temple to perform the initiation ceremony and Deity installation, the devotees weren't ready. Only one small vase of flowers decorated the almost bare altar, and the devotees had not made garlands for the Deities. Prabhupāda was displeased. The small temple was packed, however, and guests and devotees crowded the open doorway and peered through the front window. TV crews filmed the action under hot lamps.

While devotees hurriedly strung garlands for the Deities, Prabhupāda performed the initiation ceremony. There were fifteen initiates in all. To some devotees he gave first initiation, to some second initiation, and to others both first and second. Then he lovingly bathed the forms of Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa and performed the fire sacrifice. While dressing the Deities, he remarked that Their clothes had been poorly made and that the devotees should make new ones immediately. He named the Deities Śrī Śrī Rādhā-Gopīnātha.

Vaibhavī: He initiated everyone in the temple, anyone who was there— even one boy who had just joined that week and had only come across Kṛṣṇa consciousness the week before, and people who weren't living in the temple, just anyone who was there and somehow serving. He wanted Kṛṣṇa consciousness to be established in Australia, so he just initiated everybody. He gave first and second initiations at the same time, because, having installed the Deities, there had to be some brāhmaṇas.

But we didn't know anything. We weren't even ready. The altar wasn't finished. Prabhupāda explained to me that we had to string flowers for a garland—the Deity was supposed to wear one. I was running up and down the street trying to find some flowers and get some thread and make a garland.

Same with the sacred thread There were no sacred threads. Prabhupāda gave the men a sacred thread at brāhmaṇa initiation, but no one really knew what it was. So I had to run and buy some string. And while Prabhupāda was initiating people, I was sitting there in the arena making sacred threads, copying the one that Bali-mardana had taken off himself.

I made five of them, and then I was next. After the sacrifice, and after I came out of Prabhupāda's room, where he'd given me the Gāyatrī mantra, the other devotees said, "You're a brāhmaṇa now. So you have to have a sacred thread, too." They told me to make one for myself which I didn't, because someone told me later a woman wasn't supposed to wear one. We just didn't know much.

At Sydney Grammar School, an elite school for boys, Prabhupāda led his disciples and a group of students in a kīrtana procession through the schoolyard. About two hundred boys and several teachers took part, some children frolicking and laughing, some singing the mantra, some soberly following the procession, as the teachers smiled and watched. The procession ended in a large room with a row of chairs in the front. Prabhupāda sat in the headmaster's elaborately carved thronelike seat in the center and began playing karatālas, continuing the chanting of Hare Kṛṣṇa. Seeing only a few students responding, he stopped and looked around at the children sitting before him.

"So you are all beautiful boys. Why you do not join us in chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa? Is it very difficult? Will you not try to chant? Hare. Say Ha-re."

A few children: "Hare."

Prabhupāda: "All of you chant, Hare."

The children, weakly: "Hare." Some giggled.

Prabhupāda led them through the mantra, one word at a time. Still some children were reticent.

Prabhupāda: "There are only three words: Hare, Kṛṣṇa, and Rāma. Is it very difficult? Chant again—Hare."

Children: "Hare."

Teasing and prodding, Prabhupāda coaxed them. "Oh, you cannot chant? You are all dumb?" The children broke into laughter. "How is that? Three words you cannot chant? Oh, that is very astonishing. Chant! Hare!"

"Hare."

"Kṛṣṇa!"

"Kṛṣṇa!"

Prabhupāda began rhythmically ringing his karatālas, the children following him as he sang: Hare Kṛṣṇa, Hare Kṛṣṇa, Kṛṣṇa Kṛṣṇa, Hare Hare/ Hare Rāma, Hare Rāma, Rāma Rāma, Hare Hare.

After a short time Prabhupāda brought the kīrtana to a close. Sitting in the beautiful ornate chair, he smiled at the children. "Three words: Hare, Kṛṣṇa, and Rāma. Do you know what is God? Can any of you stand up and tell me what is God?"

There was silence, then whispering. Finally, one twelve-year-old boy stood. His schoolmates applauded and laughed.

"Oh, thank you," Prabhupāda said. "Come here."

The boy approached.

"Do you know what is God?" Prabhupāda asked.

"Yes," the boy replied. "God is self-realization, and God is found in the unconscious mind."

"Thank you."

Again the children applauded.

"No, wait. Don't go away," Prabhupāda said. "Now you must explain what you mean. What is self-realization?"

Boy: "It is tapping the powers of the unconscious mind and seeing yourself..."

Prabhupāda: "Do you think the mind is unconscious?"

Boy: "The mind is unconscious."

Prabhupāda: "To understand the unconscious, you have to find out what is consciousness."

Boy: "I'm not talking about consciousness—the unconsciousness."

Prabhupāda: "Unless you know consciousness, how can you describe unconsciousness?"

Boy: "The unconsciousness. The id."

Prabhupāda: "Unconsciousness is the negative side of consciousness. So you should explain what is consciousness. Then we can understand unconsciousness."

Boy: "Consciousness?"

Prabhupāda: "Yes. Try to understand what is consciousness. Then you will understand what is unconsciousness. Consciousness is spread all over the body. Suppose I pinch any part of your body. You feel some pain. That is consciousness. This feeling of pain and pleasure is consciousness. But that consciousness is individual. I cannot feel the pains and pleasures of your body, neither you can feel the pains and pleasures of my body. Therefore, your consciousness is individual and my consciousness is individual. But there is another consciousness, who can feel the pains and pleasures of your body and who can feel the pains and pleasures of my body. That is stated in the Bhagavad-gītā.

"You have heard the name of Bhagavad-gītā? You? Any of you?"

Another boy: "Yes."

Prabhupāda: "Who says yes? Please come here. Thank you. Very good. At least one of you knows what is Bhagavad-gītā. In the Bhagavad-gītā it is stated that..." And Śrīla Prabhupāda proceeded to explain the difference between the material body and the soul and between the individual souls and the Supreme Soul, Kṛṣṇa.

"You are individual knower of your body. I am knower individually of my body. So everyone is knower of his own body. But there is another person, who says, 'I know everything of everyone's body.' Just like I know something of my body, or I know something of this world. Similarly, there is another ātmā (soul), supreme ātmā, who knows everything of this universe. He is sometimes called God or the Paramātmā or Kṛṣṇa, whatever, according to different language."

After describing the soul's intimate relationship as an eternal servant of Kṛṣṇa and the soul's suffering caused by forgetting that relationship, Prabhupāda concluded his lecture.

"These teachings should be introduced in every school and college so that from the very beginning children understand what is God, how great He is, how we are related with God, and how we have to live.

"So our movement, Kṛṣṇa consciousness, is teaching that thing. Don't think that it is a sectarian religion. We are making people God conscious. It doesn't matter to what religion you may belong. If by following the principles of religion one becomes advanced in God consciousness, that is first-class religion. That is our motto, and we are preaching all over the world.

"Therefore, I request your teachers here to make the students from the beginning God conscious. Then their future life will be very peaceful, prosperous, and hopeful. Thank you very much. Hare Kṛṣṇa."

Prabhupāda also agreed to speak at Wayside Chapel, a center in downtown Sydney ministering to drug addicts and prostitutes. A Wayside sponsor met Prabhupāda at the temple and accompanied him to the Chapel. The sponsor, a long-haired young man in hippie dress, boasted of how Wayside Chapel helped drug addicts. Prabhupāda, however, took it that he was saying the Chapel supplied drugs to the addicts.

At Wayside Chapel a skeptic in the audience challenged Prabhupāda. Prabhupāda had explained that the chanting of the holy names of God was the only way to actually help people, but the cynic challenged, "What good actually is this chanting of Hare Kṛṣṇa?"

"It saves you from death!" Prabhupāda answered forcibly.

In his quarters in Sydney, Prabhupāda wrote the Preface to the upcoming edition of Bhagavad-gītā As It Is. The Macmillan Company had now agreed to print the unabridged manuscript. The contract was signed, the book was being readied for printing; only the Preface remained to be written.

Prabhupāda wrote in his Preface that although he was known for starting the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement in America, actually "the original father of this movement is Lord Kṛṣṇa Himself." Giving all credit for his own achievements to his spiritual master, Prabhupāda said that the only qualification he himself had was that he had tried to present Bhagavad-gītā as it is, without adulteration.

Instead of satisfying his own personal material senses, he [a person] has to satisfy the senses of the Lord. That is the highest perfection of life. The Lord wants this, and He demands it. One has to understand this central point of Bhagavad-gītā. Our Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement is teaching the whole world this central point, and because we are not polluting the theme of Bhagavad-gītā As It Is, anyone seriously interested in deriving benefit by studying the Bhagavad-gītā must take help from the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement for practical understanding of Bhagavad-gītā under the direct guidance of the Lord. We hope, therefore, that people will derive the greatest benefit by studying Bhagavad-gītā As It Is as we have presented it here, and if even one man becomes a pure devotee of the Lord we shall consider our attempt a success.

As Prabhupāda explained in his Preface, he was publishing the full Gītā manuscript “to establish the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement more soundly and progressively.” He would do this by presenting transcendental literature like Bhagavad-gītā. But he would also have to go, as Lord Caitanya has said, “to every town and village”—either personally or through his agents, his disciples. And wherever he went, he would preach Bhagavad-gītā to whoever would listen.

Tomorrow Prabhupāda would leave Australia for a big paṇḍāl festival in Calcutta, then on to Moscow, Paris, Los Angeles...

Lord Kṛṣṇa states in Bhagavad-gītā that no servant is more dear to Him than one who teaches Bhagavad-gītā to the devotees. And Prabhupāda, in all his activities—whether writing a Preface, lecturing to the prostitutes and drug addicts, teaching a disciple to cook capātis without burning them, or planning grand projects yet to come—was always teaching Bhagavad-gītā and therefore was always the dearest servant of Lord Kṛṣṇa.

Prabhupāda stood before the Deities of Rādhā-Gopīnātha with folded hands. After less than a week in Sydney, he was leaving. He knew that the devotees here were not up to the standard required for worshiping Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa. And he knew he was taking a risk, entrusting Their worship to neophyte disciples. Yet as an empowered ācārya and as the representative of Lord Caitanya, he had to implant Kṛṣṇa consciousness anywhere it might take root. The world was in desperate need. If his disciples followed the process he had given them—chanting, hearing, observing regulative principles—he knew they would quickly become purified.

He had given an analogy: Although in material life a man must first become a highly qualified lawyer before sitting on the judge's bench, in Kṛṣṇa consciousness a sincere devotee is first allowed to “sit on the bench,” to become a brāhmaṇa, and later, by the mercy of the holy name and the spiritual master, he becomes qualified. The devotees in Sydney, however, were particularly immature, and Prabhupāda made an extraordinary request of Rādhā-Gopīnātha: “Now I am leaving You in the hands of the mlecchas. I cannot take the responsibility. You please guide these boys and girls and give them the intelligence to worship You very nicely.”

Calcutta

Prabhupāda arrived just in time for the ten-day Calcutta paṇḍāl festival. On his orders, Girirāja and Tamāla Kṛṣṇa had come to organize the festival, just as they had the one in Bombay. Prabhupāda had written to Jayapataṅka Swami, president of ISKCON Calcutta,

In the San Kirtan festival pandel if a very big kitchen arrangement can be made, then we shall distribute prasadam daily. Try to make this arrangement. Puri, halevah, kitrie—whatever can be arranged as much as possible. Tamal Krishna and Giriraj have all the ideas.

Attendance surpassed that of the Bombay paṇḍāl, with twenty to thirty thousand people attending daily, including ministers of Parliament and other distinguished speakers. It was one of the biggest religious functions Calcutta had ever seen; the whole city became aware of the strength of the Hare Kṛṣṇa movement.

In the early afternoon the devotees would begin selling Prabhupāda's books from a booth, performing kīrtana onstage, and distributing prasādam to the masses. Around 6:30 the evening program would begin with a long, intense kīrtana, which would increase in its fervor as Prabhupāda arrived for the evening āraṭi before the Deities of Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa. Prabhupāda would lecture, sometimes in Bengali and sometimes in English. Afterward the devotees would show slides of the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement around the world, and Prabhupāda would answer questions from the audience. After the program, people would push forward to receive a morsel of the prasādam that had been offered to the Deity.

Naxalite terrorists threatened Prabhupāda's life. These young Communist terrorists, who had been active in Calcutta during Prabhupāda's visit of 1970, had never disturbed him until now. Their tactic was to approach prominent businessmen in their homes or on the street and coerce them into cooperation with Naxalite political objectives. If a businessman refused, the Naxalites would burn his home or place of business or even assassinate him. The Naxalites, who were eager for all of Bengal to turn from their religious traditions and embrace Communism, saw Prabhupāda rekindling the religious spirit in Calcutta. Prabhupāda's tremendous crowd-gathering paṇḍāl, they concluded, was undermining the principles of Communism.

"Fly or Die," read the note Prabhupāda received. He informed the police, who regretted their inability to help. The whole of Calcutta, they said, was in terror of the Naxalites. Prabhupāda, however, refused to be intimidated; he would not fly. Even if they were to attack him, he said, what better way for a Vaiṣṇava to leave his body than while preaching the glories of the Lord?

The next night as Prabhupāda came before the crowd to speak, he noticed a group of rowdy young men, Naxalites, near the stage. They were protesting the preferential seating of certain dignitaries onstage. When one young radical shouted that the radicals themselves wanted to dance onstage, the devotees invited them to join in a kīrtana. The Naxalites backed down, but continued shouting and disrupting the meeting. They began banging the seats of the wooden folding chairs, calling out Naxalite slogans, and threatening to burn the place down. Others in the audience began talking nervously among themselves, increasing the commotion. In a vain attempt to bring order, some of the devotees threatened the dissenters. Pushing and scuffling broke out in the audience.

"Cintāmaṇi-prakara-sadmasu kalpa-vṛkṣa-/ lakṣāvṛteṣu surabhīr abhipālayantam..." Prabhupāda's voice rang over the powerful loudspeaker system. Appearing uninterested in the crowd, depending only on Kṛṣṇa, he began singing prayers from Brahma-saṁhitā, and within minutes everyone quieted. Those who wanted to leave left, and those who wanted to stay sat down. The crowd subdued, Prabhupāda lectured.

Several more "fly or die" notes came, and the Naxalites returned the next night, threatening again to burn the paṇḍāl. "Call them," Prabhupāda said. "I will meet with them." The devotees thought it unsafe, but Prabhupāda insisted. In a small room behind the paṇḍāl, Prabhupāda spoke with the hostile youths. They were angry and disrespectful at first, but as Prabhupāda explained to them the Vedic concept of communism—with Kṛṣṇa at the center—he caught their interest. They agreed to allow Prabhupāda's meetings to continue without any further disruptions.

Acyutānanda Swami: The last night of the ten-day paṇḍāl program was a grand finale, with over forty thousand people attending. I had just stepped out to get sugarcane juice. The paṇḍāl was completely packed when I left, but when I got outside, I saw rivers of people flowing through the four main gates into the paṇḍāl tent. I thought this must be Kṛṣṇa's mystic power, because the tent was already packed and still thousands of people were entering it. I thought that Kṛṣṇa must be unlimitedly expanding the dimensions of space.

The climax of the evening was a big procession, beginning at the paṇḍāl and going up Park Street to the ISKCON temple on Albert Road. The Deities of Rādhā-Govinda rode on a palanquin to the temple, where They were placed on the altar. After an āratī in the temple, the remaining crowd dispersed.

Acyutānanda Swami was standing next to Prabhupāda that night in the Calcutta temple. "Prabhupāda," he said, "someone put Kṛṣṇa's flute in backward." Prabhupāda looked. It was backward. "Kṛṣṇa is all-powerful" he said, turning to Acyutānanda Swami. "He can play from the back end also."

Śrīla Prabhupāda was still striving for a plot of land in Māyāpur. Having abandoned the idea that his Godbrothers in Māyāpur might help, he had been working through Bengali friends in negotiating with Muslim farmers in Māyāpur. On returning from Australia, Prabhupāda had sent Tamāla Kṛṣṇa to Māyāpur with orders not to come back until he had purchased land. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa's mission was successful, and after six days he returned to Prabhupāda in Calcutta, having purchased nine bighas, three acres, in Māyāpur.

Conceiving the value of Māyāpur was difficult for the devotees, however. One devotee journeyed from Calcutta to see the new ISKCON property and on returning asked Prabhupāda, "What are we going to do there? It's just a big empty field. Nothing is there."

"Because there are no factories and cars," Prabhupāda replied, "therefore you think there is nothing to do. But we are going to chant Hare Kṛṣṇa in Māyāpur. We will build a big temple there, and all the devotees in the world can go out and chant Hare Kṛṣṇa in the place of Lord Caitanya's birth." On May 28 Prabhupāda wrote,

You will be glad to learn that we have purchased about five acres of land in Mayapur, the birthsite of Lord Chaitanya, and we have proposed to hold a nice festival there from Janmastami day for two weeks. At that time the foundation stone will be set down. I wish that all our leading disciples come to India at that time. There are 50 branches, so at least one from each branch should attend the function.

For months Prabhupāda had been planning to visit Moscow. Aside from his desire to preach to the Russian people, he had a specific meeting in mind with a Russian Indology Professor, G. G. Kotovsky. Professor Kotovsky headed the department of Indian and South Asian studies at Moscow's U.S.S.R. Academy of Sciences, and Prabhupāda had been corresponding with him for a year.

Kṛṣṇa dāsa in West Germany, with the help of a Dr. Bernhardt of the University of Hamburg, had obtained the names of other Russian scholars of Indology. A letter to Kṛṣṇa dāsa in December of 1970 had revealed Prabhupāda's plans for preaching in Russia.

I am very encouraged to see your enthusiasm for preaching this message to the Russian people, and your idea to send letters with the help of Dr. Bernhardt is very good. He is a big scholar and he also appreciates our movement. So if you arrange a tour of Russia for me, I am prepared to accept. Let us see what Krishna desires... If we can go to Russia with our World Sankirtan Party, I am certain that it will be very much appreciated and people will see the real peace movement is chanting process—chanting the Holy Names Hare Krishna, Hare Krishna, Krishna Krishna, Hare Hare/ Hare Rama, Hare Rama, Rama Rama, Hare Hare. So try for it.

Śrīla Prabhupāda had coached Kṛṣṇa dāsa on how to best cultivate the Russian Indologists.

You can ask them some questions like: What is the ultimate goal of life? What is your ideal ultimate goal of life? What is the difference between animal and human life? Why is religion accepted by all kinds of civilized societies? What is your conception of the original creation? In this way questions may be put to find out what is their standing. We do not grudge an atheist provided he has got some philosophical standing. In this way try to elicit some answers from the Professors. If you can finally establish one Moscow center, it will be a great credit to you. So far studying Russian language, it is not necessary, but if you do so it is all right. I want very much a center in Russia, so for the time being I shall desire that Moscow Center.

In March 1971, Professor G. G. Kotovsky had replied to Kṛṣṇa dāsa's letter.

I thank you for your information about Swami Bhaktivedanta's lecturing tour. If he would come to Moscow, the Soviet scholars doing research in ancient Indian culture would be very happy to meet him in the Institute of Oriental Studies, U.S.S.R. Academy of Sciences. I would be thankful to you for your information on the dates of Swami Bhaktivedanta's arrival and stay in the U.S.S.R.

Śrīla Prabhupāda had personally replied to Professor Kotovsky.

... it was understood that you and your university are interested in hearing about Krishna culture and philosophy. This ancient Krishna culture and philosophy is the oldest in the world or in the universe. At least from a historical point of view it is not less than 5,000 years old.

Perhaps you may know that I have started this cultural movement since 1966 and it is already spreading all over the world. Krishna culture is so popular in India that even the government attracts many foreigners by Air India time table to visit Vrindavan, the land of Krishna culture. Enclosed please find one page from the latest Air India time table (April 1971) wherein the Krishna culture is depicted for general attraction.

My life is dedicated to spreading this Krishna culture all over the world. I think if you give me a chance to speak about the great Krishna culture and philosophy in your country, you will very much appreciate this simple programme with great profit. This culture is so well planned that it would be acceptable by any thoughtful man throughout the whole world.

Having preached a year in the Eastern Hemisphere, Prabhupāda was eager to return to the West, and he planned to fly to Moscow and on to Europe. For Prabhupāda and his traveling companions, Śyāmasundara and Aravinda, getting tourist visas for Russia was simple. They would take a five-day, government-controlled tour, with every activity planned by the Soviet Tourist Bureau and everything paid for in advance.

Captain Lal, the pilot of the flight to Moscow, considered Prabhupāda an important passenger and came back to visit him during the flight. They spoke of Prabhupāda's movement, his chances for lecturing in Moscow, and of Bombay, where Prabhupāda was trying to purchase land. Captain Lal invited Prabhupāda to the cockpit, and Prabhupāda came and sat behind the captain, asking technical questions about the equipment and the flight. Prabhupāda and Captain Lal agreed to meet again in Moscow.

Prabhupāda, his secretary, and his servant cleared Soviet customs and immigration quickly and smoothly, and a government tourist guide escorted them by limousine to the Hotel National. The hotel, near Red Square, Lenin's Tomb, and the Kremlin, was expensive but plain. Prabhupāda found his room dingy and cramped, with barely space for a bed and two chairs. The room for Śyāmasundara and Aravinda was far away, and Prabhupāda decided that Aravinda should share the room with him instead, crowding Prabhupāda's room all the more.

Aravinda told the hotel manager that they would not eat the hotel fare, but would have to cook their own meals. The manager refused at first, but finally allowed them use of the maid's kitchen.

That problem solved, the next was getting food. Prabhupāda sent Śyāmasundara out. Across the street, Śyāmasundara found a milk and yogurt store, but he returned to Prabhupāda's room without any fruit, vegetables, or rice. Prabhupāda sent him out again, and this time Śyāmasundara was gone practically all day, returning with only a couple of cabbages. Prabhupāda sent him out the next day for rice. When Śyāmasundara returned with rice after several hours, Prabhupāda saw that it was a poor North Korean variety, very hard. Prabhupāda asked for fruit, but Śyāmasundara had to hike for miles through the city to find anything fresh—a few red cherries.

Prabhupāda remained peaceful and regulated, keeping to his daily schedule. He would rise early and translate, and in the cool of early morning he would go out for a walk through the all-but-deserted streets. Prabhupāda, wearing a saffron cādar, strode quickly, Śyāmasundara sometimes running ahead to photograph him.

As they would pass Lenin's Mausoleum a queue would already be forming. "Just see," Prabhupāda commented one morning, "that is their God. The people don't understand the difference between the body and the spirit. They accept the body as the real person."

Prabhupāda appreciated the sparseness of the traffic—some trolleys and bicycles, but mostly pedestrians. As he walked among the old, ornate buildings, he saw elderly women hosing the wide streets—a good practice, he said. The Russian people appeared to live structured, regulated lives, much more so than the Americans. These simple, austere people, unspoiled by the rampant hedonism so common in America, were fertile for Kṛṣṇa consciousness. But devoid of spiritual sustenance, they appeared morose.

Prabhupāda had Śyāmasundara arrange a meeting with Professor Kotovsky and invite Captain Lal to come along. The tourist bureau provided a car and guide, and Prabhupāda and his party rode outside the city to Professor Kotovsky's office in an old white brick building at the Academy of Sciences.

When Prabhupāda arrived, the middle-aged Russian professor, dressed in a gray suit, got up from his cluttered desk and welcomed Prabhupāda into his small office. Professor Kotovsky appeared a bit hesitant, however, more cautious than in his letters. When Śyāmasundara mentioned Prabhupāda's eagerness to lecture before interested scholars at the Academy, Professor Kotovsky flatly refused—it would never be allowed. Prabhupāda was disappointed.

The next moment, however, Prabhupāda seemed unaffected and began speaking in his humble, genteel manner, sitting in a straight-backed office chair beside Professor Kotovsky, who sat at his desk. Śyāmasundara turned on the tape recorder, which the professor eyed cautiously but didn't object to.

Prabhupāda: "The other day I was reading in the paper, Moscow News. There was a Communist congress, and the president declared that, 'We are ready to get others' experiences to improve.' So I think the Vedic concept of socialism or communism will much improve the idea of Communism."

Professor Kotovsky listened intently and politely as his foreign visitor explained how the gr̥hastha in Vedic culture provides for everyone living in his house—even for the lizards—and how, before taking his meal, he calls in the road to invite any hungry person to come and eat. "In this way," Prabhupāda explained, "there are so many good concepts about the socialist idea of communism. So I thought that these ideas might have been distributed to some of your thoughtful men. Therefore I was anxious to speak."

Professor Kotovsky's academic interest was piqued. "You know, it is interesting," he said, his articulate English heavily accented. "As it is here in our country, there is now great interest in the history of old, old thought." He described the accomplishments of his colleagues and himself, particularly a booklet they had recently prepared highlighting Soviet studies in Indology. He said he would like to give a copy to Prabhupāda.

Professor Kotovsky: "You will be interested to discover that we published not all but some Purāṇas, then some parts of the Rāmāyaṇa, eight volumes in Russian of the Mahābhārata, and also a second edition of the Mahābhārata, translated by different people in full and published. Manu-smṛti is also translated in full and published with Sanskrit commentaries. And such was the great interest that all of these publications were sold in a week. They are now completely out of stock. It is impossible to get them in the book market after a month. Such a great interest among reading people here in Moscow and the U.S.S.R. towards ancient Vedic culture."

Prabhupāda: "Among these Purāṇas, the Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam is called the Mahā-purāṇa." And he told of his own translation of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, "the ripened fruit of the Vedic desire tree." He would show some volumes to the professor if he was interested.

Professor Kotovsky said the Moscow and Leningrad libraries had nearly all the major texts of Indian culture in Sanskrit. These libraries housed not only ancient texts but more recent literature as well, comprising an up-to-date study of Hinduism.

"Hinduism," Prabhupāda interrupted, "is a very complex topic." And they both laughed. Professor Kotovsky acknowledged that Hinduism was more than a religion; it was a way of life. But Prabhupāda explained that the name Hindu was actually a misnomer. The real term to explain Vedic culture was varṇāśrama. Briefly Prabhupāda described the four orders: brāhmaṇa, kṣatriya, vaiśya, and śūdra.

Professor Kotovsky: "You have told that in any society there are four divisions, but it is not so easy to distinguish. For instance, one can group together different social classes and professional groups into four divisions in any society. There is no difficulty. The only difficulty is, for instance, in socialist society, in our country and other socialist societies, how can you distinguish productive group and workers?"

Prabhupāda welcomed the professor's questions, although grounded in Soviet socialist vested interests. Prabhupāda considered the professor not so much an academician as a pawn of the Soviet university system; much as one political power tries to understand its adversary, the professor was inquiring into Indian culture so that his government might penetrate it with their own ideology. Behind Professor Kotovsky's apparent interest in Vedic culture, Prabhupāda could see the view of the Communist party, a view diametrically opposed to Vedic philosophy. Nevertheless, Prabhupāda tactfully continued to present Kṛṣṇa consciousness in accord with paramparā, and he tried to convince Professor Kotovsky through scripture and logic.

Quoting Bhagavad-gītā, a śāstra with which the professor was familiar (in his own way), Prabhupāda described Lord Kṛṣṇa as the creator of the four divisions of society. Professor Kotovsky immediately countered with the theory of the Soviet scholars that the varṇāśrama divisions were a recent addition to Vedic culture. He also again registered his opinion that the divisions of varṇāśrama had no meaning within socialism.

Professor Kotovsky: "There is a great distinction between socialist society and all societies preceding socialism, because in modern Western society you can group all social and professional classes in the particular class divisions—brāhmaṇas, kṣatriyas, vaiśyas (or factory owners), and śūdras, or menial workers. But here we have no vaiśyas. Because we have administrative staff in factories, managerial staff—you can call them kṣatriyas—and then śūdras, the workers themselves, but not this intermediate class."

Prabhupāda: "That is stated, kalau śūdra-sambhavaḥ. 'In this age, practically all men are śūdras.' That is stated. But if there are simply śūdras, then the social order will be disturbed. In spite of your state of śūdras, the brāhmaṇas are there. That is necessary. So if you do not divide the social order in such a way, then it will be chaos. That is the scientific estimation of the Vedas. You may belong to the śūdra class, but to maintain the social order you have to train some of the śūdras to become brāhmaṇas. It cannot depend on the śūdras."

Prabhupāda gave his standard analogy, comparing the social body to the human body. All the parts are necessary, not only the legs but the belly, the arms, and the head. "Otherwise," he said, "it will not work properly. As long as this is going on, there will be some disturbance."

Modern society's missing point, Prabhupāda said, was an understanding of the purpose of human life. "They do not know what is the next life," he said. "There is no department of knowledge or scientific department to study what is there after finishing this body."

Professor Kotovsky objected—politely, completely. "Swamiji," he said, "when the body dies, the owner also dies." Prabhupāda marked his reply.

"No," Prabhupāda quickly replied. "This fact you must know. Why is there no department of knowledge in the university to study this fact scientifically? That is my proposition. That department is lacking. It may be as you say, it may be as I say, but there must be a department of knowledge. Now recently a cardiologist, a doctor in Montreal and Toronto, has accepted that there is a soul. I had some correspondence with him. He strongly believes that there is a soul."

Prabhupāda continued to build his argument: "We accept knowledge from authority." The professor countered that everything had to be accepted on the basis of empirical evidence. But then, in midsentence, he stopped arguing and inquired, "Have you many branches of your society in the world?"

Prabhupāda began speaking about ISKCON, with its sixty-five branches all around the world, and of how he was going next to Paris, where his disciples had recently acquired a new center, and of how the American boys and girls especially were joining his movement. He told of the four prohibitive rules (no meat-eating, no illicit sex, no intoxication, and no gambling) and of the books he had published. As Prabhupāda described the workings of his movement, Professor Kotovsky nodded approvingly.

When Prabhupāda returned to comparing Kṛṣṇa consciousness to Communism, he concluded that the two philosophies were in agreement. And both stressed surrender to an authority. The devotee surrenders to Kṛṣṇa, the Communist to Lenin.

Prabhupāda: "Our life is by surrender, is it not? Do you disagree with this point?"

Kotovsky: "To some extent you surrender."

Prabhupāda: "Yes. To the full extent."

Kotovsky: "You have to surrender to the society, for instance—the whole people."

Prabhupāda: "Yes, to the whole people or to the state or king or government or whatever you say. The surrender must be there. It may be different."

Kotovsky: "The only difficulty is we cannot have surrender to government or to a king. The principal difference is of surrender to a king, who is a single person, or to the whole society."

Prabhupāda: "No, that is a change of color only. But the surrender is there. The principle of surrender is there. Whether you surrender to monarchy, democracy, aristocracy, or dictatorship, you have to surrender. That is a fact. Without surrender there is no life. It is not possible. So we are educating persons to surrender to the Supreme, wherefrom you get all protection. Just like Kṛṣṇa says, sarva-dharmān parityajya. So surrender is there. No one can say, 'No, I am not surrendered to anyone.' The difference is where he surrenders. And the ultimate surrendering object is Kṛṣṇa. Therefore in Bhagavad-gītā it is said, bahūnām janmanām ante jñānavān mām prapadyate: "After surrendering to so many things, birth after birth, when one is factually wise he surrenders unto Me."

Professor Kotovsky agreed. But surrender had to be accompanied by revolution, he said. The French Revolution, for example, was a revolt against one kind of surrender, and yet the revolution itself was another surrender, surrender to the people. "So it is not enough to come full stop," the Professor argued. "Surrender is to be accompanied with revolt against surrender to other people."

Prabhupāda: "Yes, the surrender will be full stopped when it is surrender to Kṛṣṇa. That is full stop: no more surrender. Other surrender you have to change by revolution. But when you come to Kṛṣṇa, then it is sufficient—you are satisfied. Just like—I give you one example. A child is crying and people change laps: "Oh, it has not stopped.' But as soon as the baby comes to the lap of its mother..."

Kotovsky: "It stops."

Prabhupāda: "Yes, full satisfaction. So this surrender, the changes will go on in different categories. The sum total of all these surrenders is surrender to māyā (material illusion). But the final surrender is to Kṛṣṇa, and then you will be happy."

After only three days, Prabhupāda's mission in Moscow seemed finished. The meeting with Professor Kotovsky over, what was left? The government would allow nothing else. It had not allowed him to bring in books, and now he had been refused the opportunity to speak publicly. Foreigners were not to talk with the Russians. He could go nowhere, unless on an accompanied tour. So with no preaching and no prospects, he stayed in his cramped room, taking his massage, bathing, accepting whatever food Śyāmasundara could gather and cook, dictating a few letters, chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa, and translating Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam.

Prabhupāda took a guided tour of Moscow, riding with other tourists on a crowded bus. He saw elderly Russians going to church, armed guards stationed at the door. He soon tired of the tour, however, and the tour guide got him a taxi and instructed the driver to return him to the Hotel National.

Śyāmasundara continued to spend most of his day looking for fresh food. Hearing that oranges were available at a certain market across town, he set out across the city. With his shaved head and his white dhotī and kurtā he drew stares from everyone he passed, and as he was returning after dark, uniformed men wearing red armbands accosted him, taking him to be a local deviant. Grabbing him, they pinned his arms behind his back and shouted at him in Russian. Śyāmasundara caught the word dakumyent ("document, passport"). He replied, "Dakumyent, hotel! Hotel!" Realizing Śyāmasundara was a tourist, the officers released him, and he returned to the hotel and informed Prabhupāda of what had taken place. "There is no hope in Russia without Kṛṣṇa consciousness," Prabhupāda said.

Once Śyāmasundara was standing in line at the yogurt store when a man behind him asked him about yoga. "I really want to talk with you," the man said, and he gave Śyāmasundara his name and address and a time they could safely meet. When Śyāmasundara told Prabhupāda, Prabhupāda said, "No, he is a policeman. Don't go."

One day two young men, one the son of an Indian diplomat stationed in Moscow, the other a young Muscovite, were loitering near Red Square when they saw an amazing sight. Out of the usual regimented routine of city traffic, a tall young man with a shaved head, a long reddish ponytail, and flowing white robes approached. It was Śyāmasundara. Familiar with Śyāmasundara's dress, the son of the Indian diplomat stopped him. Śyāmasundara smiled. "Hare Kṛṣṇa, brother." And he began talking with the Indian, whose name was Nārāyaṇa. The Russian, Ivan, knew a little English and followed the conversation as closely as he could. The talk grew serious.

"Why don't you come up and meet my spiritual master?" Śyāmasundara asked. Honored, the boys immediately accompanied Śyāmasundara to the Hotel National. When they arrived, they found Prabhupāda seated on his bed, aglow and smiling, Aravinda massaging his feet. Śyāmasundara entered, offering obeisances before Prabhupāda. Ivan was completely fascinated.

"Come on," Prabhupāda said, and the three of them sat at Prabhupāda's feet. Turning first to Nārāyaṇa, Prabhupāda asked his name and his father's occupation. Nārāyaṇa liked Prabhupāda and offered to bring him green vegetables; his father, being highly placed at the Indian Embassy, had produce flown in from India.

Ivan was interested even more than his Indian friend, and Prabhupāda began explaining to him the philosophy of Kṛṣṇa consciousness, while Nārāyaṇa helped by translating. Ivan inquired with respect and awe, and Prabhupāda answered his questions, teaching as much basic information about Kṛṣṇa consciousness as was possible in one sitting. Prabhupāda explained the difference between the spirit soul and the body and described the soul's eternal relationship with Kṛṣṇa, the Supreme Personality of Godhead. He spoke of Bhagavad-gītā, of his network of temples around the world, and of his young men and women disciples all practicing bhakti-yoga.

Prabhupāda mentioned his desire to preach in Russia, which was a great field for Kṛṣṇa consciousness because the people were openminded and hadn't been polluted by sense gratification. He wanted to introduce Kṛṣṇa conscious literature in Russia through a library or a reading room or in whatever way possible. Kṛṣṇa conscious philosophy, he said, should be taught to Russia's most intelligent people, but because of government restrictions it would have to be done discreetly. Devotees would not be able to sing and dance in the streets, but they could chant quietly together in someone's home. Prabhupāda then began singing very quietly, leading the boys in kīrtana.

Ivan's taking to Kṛṣṇa was like a hungry man's eating a meal. After several hours, however, he and his friend had to go. They would return the next day.

Śyāmasundara began spending time with Ivan and Nārāyaṇa. Ivan, a student of Oriental philosophies, was very intelligent and eager to know what was going on in the outside world. He was fond of the Beatles, and Prabhupāda told him of his association with George Harrison and John Lennon. Ivan and Śyāmasundara had long talks about the ambitions and hopes of young people outside Russia, and Śyāmasundara explained to him how Kṛṣṇa consciousness was the topmost of all spiritual paths. Śyāmasundara also taught him basic principles of bhakti-yoga, such as chanting the prescribed sixteen rounds of japa daily, and gave him his own copy of Bhagavad-gītā As It Is.

Prabhupāda showed Ivan how to prepare capātīs and rice and asked him to give up eating meat. Joyfully, Ivan accepted the chanting, the new way of eating—everything. Ivan was being trained so that after Prabhupāda left, Ivan could continue on his own. Ivan would be able to feel himself changing and advancing in spiritual life, and after practicing for some time he could be initiated. Ivan said he would tell his friends about Kṛṣṇa consciousness. With only two days left in Moscow, Prabhupāda taught Ivan as much as he could. In this young Russian's eagerness and intelligence, Prabhupāda found the real purpose of his visit to Russia.

Prabhupāda gave the analogy that when cooking rice the cook need test only one grain to determine whether the whole pot of rice is done. Similarly, by talking with this one Russian youth, Prabhupāda could tell that the Russian people were not satisfied in their so-called ideal land of Marxism. Just as Ivan was keenly receptive to Kṛṣṇa consciousness, millions of other Russians would be also.

Cāṇakya Paṇḍita says that one blooming flower can refresh a whole forest and that a fire in a single tree can burn the whole forest. From the Marxist point of view, Ivan was the fire that would spread Kṛṣṇa consciousness to others, thus defeating the communist ideology. And from Prabhupāda's point of view, he was the aromatic flower that would lend its fragrance to many others.

Prabhupāda's visit to Russia was no obscure interlude, but had become an occasion for planting the seed of Kṛṣṇa consciousness in a destitute land.

Śrīla Prabhupāda had brought the movement of Lord Caitanya to yet another country. Caitanya Mahāprabhu Himself had predicted that the saṅkīrtana movement would go to every town and village, yet for hundreds of years that prediction had remained unfulfilled. Prabhupāda, however, in the few years since his first trip to America in 1965, had again and again planted Lord Caitanya's message in one unlikely place after another. And of all places, this was perhaps the most unlikely; during a brief, government-supervised visit to Moscow, he had planted the seed of Kṛṣṇa consciousness within the Soviet Union. He was like the needle, and everyone and everything connected with him was like the thread that would follow.

Professor Kotovsky had remarked that Prabhupāda's stay in an old-fashioned hotel would not prove very interesting. But Prabhupāda, unknown to Professor Kotovsky, was transcendental to Moscow or any other place in the material world. Prabhupāda had come to this place, and Kṛṣṇa had sent a sincere soul to him to receive the gift of Kṛṣṇa consciousness. This had happened not by devious espionage against the Soviet government but by the presence of Kṛṣṇa's pure devotee and his natural desire to satisfy Kṛṣṇa by preaching. In response to Prabhupāda's pure desire, Kṛṣṇa had sent one boy, and from that one boy the desire would spread to others. Nothing, not even an Iron Curtain, could stop Kṛṣṇa consciousness. The soul's natural function was to serve Kṛṣṇa. And Kṛṣṇa's natural will was to satisfy the pure desires of His devotee.

In a farewell letter to Professor Kotovsky, Prabhupāda tried to encourage further correspondence.

You wanted to see the manuscripts of my lectures, therefore I am sending herewith an Introduction to the lectures, and if you so desire I shall be glad to send essays on these subjects:

1. Vedic Conceptions of Socialism and Communism
2. Scientific Values of Classless Society
3. Knowledge by Authoritative Tradition

In a letter to Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, Prabhupāda summed up his Moscow visit.

The city is well-planned. There are big, big houses and roads and at day time the streets are busy with buses, cars, and underground trains which are far better than American or English. The underground streets are very neat and clean. The surface streets are also daily washed. But there is some difficulty in collecting vegetarian foodstuffs; still we are cooking our meals by the cooker which has saved our lives. We talked with one big professor Mr. Kotovsky, and Shyamsundar talked with many great writers and musicians. Two boys are working with us; one Indian and one Russian. So there is good prospect for opening a center, although the atmosphere is not very good. The embassy was no help. So our visit to Moscow was not so successful, but for the future, it is hopeful. Tomorrow I go to Paris for one day, then to S.F. Ratha-yātrā and then I shall come back to London.

Śrīla Prabhupāda was lying on the couch in the conference room of the Indian Tourist Office, having just come from Orly Airport. Two disciples, Ārādhana and his wife, Śantanu, had come with him in the taxi and were the only others in the room. Since there was to be a press conference later, Prabhupāda said he wanted to rest, and he closed his eyes.

At the airport, Paris immigration officials had detained Prabhupāda while some thirty European devotees, none of whom had ever met him, had waited anxiously. They had glimpsed him as he had walked from the plane to the terminal building, and they had watched him carrying his sannyaśa-daṇḍa with umbrella strapped to it. He had waved to them, holding up his bead bag. But then he had been kept from them, just beyond a thin wall, until finally, after two hours, Paris immigration had allowed him through.

The Paris devotees had not arranged a car for Prabhupāda, so when he had asked for one, several devotees had run off to hail a taxi. When the taxi had arrived, Prabhupāda, along with Ārādhana and Śantanu, had started for the Indian Tourist Office, leaving the others to join him later.

After a brief rest, Prabhupāda opened his eyes and saw Ārādhana, Śantanu, and Śyāmasundara in the room. The other devotees and the press would be arriving soon. As Prabhupāda sat up, Śantanu offered him some mango, and Śrīla Prabhupāda smiled.

Yogeśvara: I sat outside the door to Prabhupāda's room, eating the peel of the mango Prabhupāda had eaten. My heart was pounding, and I had no idea what it was going to be like after having been initiated for a year and a half and having never met my spiritual master personally—but now knowing that he was just behind that door!

Then Śyāmasundara opened the door and peered out and saw me sitting there. He stuck his head back inside the door and said, "There's a devotee here. Shall I let him in now, Śrīla Prabhupāda?" I peeked around the door, and Śrīla Prabhupāda, who had been lying down on the couch, was now sitting up with his hand on his knee very solidly, with a royal, majestic look. He responded to Śyāmasundara's question by motioning with his hand that we could all come in. It was the first perfect thing I had ever seen in my life—that one gesture. So I came in and immediately fell flat on the floor. And then I understood that "Now I am with my spiritual master."

Gradually the devotees began arriving from the airport, and they came into Prabhupāda's room. The press also arrived, as Prabhupāda spoke warmly and pleasantly with his followers, encouraging them in their preaching and telling them of his own recent preaching in Moscow. Hardly any of the devotees had ever been with their spiritual master before, and Locanānanda began introducing them to Śrīla Prabhupāda.

Hari-vilāsa: I arrived late, and when I came in I was mixed up with surprise, with elation, with egotistical pride, and with amazement that the Lord's pure devotee was there. I walked in with Ghanaśyāma, the boy who had started translating some of Prabhupāda's books into French. The room was almost filled, and Ghanaśyāma immediately sat down in the back. I was the president of the temple, and I was very proud and puffed up about it. So I made my way all the way up to the front, where Śrīla Prabhupāda was, and I sat down right next to him. I looked at him, expecting him to look at me and smile or something, some recognition. But he didn't look at me at all.

Locanānanda was introducing all the devotees to Prabhupāda. Locanānanda said, "This is Ghanaśyāma. He is the translator." Prabhupāda said, "Where is he?" And everyone looked around to Ghanaśyāma in the back. Prabhupāda said, "Let him stand up, please." Ghanaśyāma stood, and Prabhupāda looked at him and smiled and said, "Oh, thank you very much."

Right then I felt a little funny. I sat there wondering, "What have I done? I've walked all the way up to the front, and I'm expecting so much recognition."

Then Locanānanda said, "This is Hari-vilāsa. He is the president of the temple." Prabhupāda didn't even look at me. And I knew, yes, I had made a big mistake. I began to realize, "This is my spiritual master." Because immediately he had acted in such a way as to point out a great fault in me.

Reporters began their questioning, and Prabhupāda patiently answered them, taking advantage of their sometimes superficial questions to elaborate on the philosophy of Kṛṣṇa consciousness and explain the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement. The conference ran one hour.

As Prabhupāda left the Indian Tourist Office he found that there was no car to take him to the temple. While several devotees ran around trying to find a taxi, Prabhupāda waited, standing before a sidewalk cafe.

Thinking that Prabhupāda must be tired from the rigorous press conference and his long flight from Moscow, one of the devotees asked, "Śrīla Prabhupāda, would you like to sit here for a minute?" And the devotee pulled one of the cafe chairs out away from its table.

"What is this place?" Prabhupāda asked.

"This is a sidewalk cafe," the devotee replied.

"What do people do here? Do they smoke and drink?"

"Yes, Śrīla Prabhupāda, it's a cafe. They serve alcoholic beverages."

"No," Prabhupāda replied. "Guru cannot sit in such a place."

When Prabhupāda reached the temple, he bathed and took prasādam. The next day he was scheduled to leave for Los Angeles, and his one day in Paris was filled with outside engagements. He rested and again went out to preach.

The devotees had rented the Olympia Theater, a large auditorium meant to seat more than two thousand. But because the devotees had advertised Prabhupāda's lecture only two days in advance, only forty people attended. Prabhupāda was undaunted, and he lectured and held kīrtana. Afterward he went to a television studio for an interview.

By the time Prabhupāda returned to the temple, it was one in the morning. Śyāmasundara told the devotees, who had all accompanied Prabhupāda during the day, that they should rest a full six hours before rising. But the next morning Prabhupāda rose as usual, and at five o'clock he was demanding to know why there was no maṅgala-ārati. He sent his servant to wake the devotees, and as the devotees were hurrying to the temple room to begin their morning worship Prabhupāda was going out on his morning walk.

Accompanying Prabhupāda on his walk were Śyāmasundara, Ara vinda, and the Paris temple president, Hari-vilāsa. The spring morning was sunny, and Prabhupāda, walking with his cane, appeared noble. "Śyāmasundara," Prabhupāda asked, "Why are all the householders in māyā?" When Śyāmasundara couldn't reply, Prabhupāda said, "That's all right. That is their position—to be in māyā."

He said that when he had gone to America his plans had been to make sannyāsī, but when he saw the free mixing of the sexes in the West he had decided to let his disciples first get married and have a child, and then the wife could go to Vṛndāvana with the child, and the husband could take sannyāsa. Prabhupāda laughed. Man becomes entangled by his family, he said—by his home, his bank account, his animals, and so many other attachments.

Near the end of his walk, Prabhupāda spoke specifically of Paris. "Three things are prominent here," he said, "wine, women, and money. What do you think, Hari-vilāsa? Is this a fact?"

Hari-vilāsa replied, "Yes, Prabhupāda, this is definitely a fact—wine, women, and money."

Prabhupāda said that although these attachments were very strong, the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement could overcome their influence.

Prabhupāda said that the houses in the Paris suburb, with their attractive fenced-in yards, were excellent. But everything was being wasted for sense gratification. Although a French gentleman may have such a first-class house, garden, wife, bank account, and car, he has no spiritual knowledge. Therefore, he would always remain attached to his first-class possessions, and at the end of his life his great attachment would lead him to take birth as a cockroach or rat or dog within that same house.

As Prabhupāda and the devotees continued walking, Prabhupāda asked Hari-vilāsa how he thought the temple's preaching was faring. Hari-vilāsa said he thought it would be successful but that it might be a good idea to make extra income by starting a business.

"Your business is preaching," Prabhupāda said. "If there are some householders, they can do business."

When Prabhupāda and his party arrived at the temple, they found the devotees eagerly waiting for Prabhupāda's morning Bhāgavatam lecture. But there was no time. Prabhupāda had to leave at once for the airport. He was returning to America.

SPL 35: "This Remote Corner Of the World"

CHAPTER THIRTY-FIVE

"This Remote Corner

Of the World"

Although Śrīla Prabhupāda had been away from America for a year, his Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement had flourished, by Kṛṣṇa's grace, and the devotees' attachment for him had grown. His disciples, having heard reports and seen photos of his triumphant tour of India, had felt inspired to increase their own preaching. In each American center new devotees had been joining and were learning Prabhupāda's teachings from the senior devotees. Already accepting Śrīla Prabhupāda as their spiritual master, hundreds of newcomers were eagerly awaiting initiation.

How different from Prabhupāda's first arrival in America, alone in 1965. Walking the cold streets with no money and no temple, he had been ignored. Sometimes he had thought of quitting, taking a boat back to India. But he had maintained absolute faith. And now, less than six years later, in dozens of ISKCON centers throughout America, hundreds of disciples worshiped him and would throng ecstatically to receive him.

When Prabhupāda had left Los Angeles a year ago, the political turmoil there had troubled his mind, but on returning he found the devotees recovered. Faithfully they were executing his orders to chant publicly, distribute Back to Godhead magazine, and worship the Deity of Rukmiṇī-Dvārakādhīśa. In the gorgeously decorated Los Angeles temple, Prabhupāda performed a large initiation ceremony, accepting dozens of new disciples.

On June 27 Śrīla Prabhupāda traveled from Los Angeles to San Francisco for the fifth annual Rathayātrā. Two hundred followers met him at the airport.

"How many devotees do you have?" a reporter asked.

"Unlimited," Prabhupāda said. "Some admit and some don't admit. Admit you are a servant of Lord Kṛṣṇa, and your life will be a success."

After two days in San Francisco, Prabhupāda returned to Los Angeles and on July 16 flew to Detroit. Bhagavān dāsa, Prabhupāda's Governing Body secretary for the Midwest, had preached vigorously in his zone, opening centers in St. Louis, Chicago, and other cities. Almost three hundred devotees, most of whom had never seen Prabhupāda, assembled at the Detroit airport to receive him.

Sureśvara: Devotees had come from all over the midwestern U.S. and eastern Canada to greet Śrīla Prabhupāda at Detroit's Metro Airport. A red and gold throne stood in the center of the reception room, and the devotees were chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa and dancing, awaiting Prabhupāda's arrival. When the plane finally landed, all bliss broke loose. The disembarkation dolly joined the plane, but we couldn't see Śrīla Prabhupāda. I became anxious—when would he enter the room? Suddenly a cry went up, and I looked around. Devotees were bowing down.

Urukrama: Śrīla Prabhupāda entered the room as bright as the sun, and everyone immediately prostrated themselves on the floor. Not like the other times when we bowed down together, but this was like an overwhelming force hit us and we were being thrown to our knees. When I stood up, I couldn't believe my eyes. There was Prabhupāda! Almost everyone in the room was crying.

Indradyumna: My first glimpse of Prabhupāda was through the lens of my camera, and I thought he looked just like he did in his pictures. I had only seen him in pictures, and now he looked just like the pictures, only moving. All the devotees began to cry and fall to the ground. It was a transcendental, emotional thing. I was looking, watching all the older devotees—how much love they had for Śrīla Prabhupāda. And I was feeling unqualified and sinful.

Urukrama: Prabhupāda appeared powerful, yet at the same time delicate and soft, like a very wonderful flower. As he moved along very slowly, the devotees lined up and made an aisle for him to walk. He walked up to Kīrtanānanda Mahārāja, put a garland around him, and embraced him. Kīrtanānanda Mahārāja was crying tears of ecstasy, and he looked like a little boy next to his father. Then Prabhupāda went to Bhagavān and patted him on the head. Then he embraced Bhagavān, who also began to weep like a little boy who has just seen his father after a very long time.

Viśvakarmā: I arrived late. When I got there, I was afraid to look at Śrīla Prabhupāda, because I felt too fallen to look upon the pure representative of the Lord. So I stayed behind a wall of devotees, afraid to look. Finally, I realized this is ridiculous, as the perfection of the eyes is to behold the form of Kṛṣṇa's pure devotee. I raised my head, and I saw him sitting on his vyāsāsana, drinking a cup of water. Never had I seen anyone drink water like that—without touching the goblet to their mouth. The water poured from the cup like a shining silver stream, straight into Śrīla Prabhupāda's mouth and throat, and he finished the water in a few swallows. He appeared to be a grand sage from the spiritual realm, and as everyone chanted, he looked around at the devotees, smiling with great pleasure. Everyone was overwhelmed with transcendental joy, and I joined with over half the devotees in weeping.

Prabhupāda began speaking.

“This is very satisfactory that so many devotees, boys and girls, are taking part in this great movement, Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement. It is a very important movement, because it is correcting the human civilization. It is a great defect in the modern civilization—people are accepting this body as self. And based on this mistake in the foundation, everything is going wrong.

Accepting this body as the self is the beginning of all problems. The great philosophers, scientists, theologians, and thoughtful men do not know what is the defect.

"Recently I was in Moscow. So I had a nice talk with a professor of Indology, Professor Kotovsky. He was speaking that, 'Swamiji, after this annihilation of this body, everything is finished.' So I was astonished that a learned professor, posing himself in a very responsible post, had no idea about the soul and the body—how they are different, how the soul is migrating from one body to another..."

As Prabhupāda spoke, a voice announced over the public address system that the departure lounge had to be cleared for the next flight. "They are speaking about ourselves?" Prabhupāda asked. "We shall stop? All right. Let us go."

That evening, in the temple room of Detroit's ISKCON center, Śrīla Prabhupāda sat on his vyāsāsana before the deities of Lord Jagannātha, Subhadrā, and Balarāma. While a devotee led the kīrtana, Prabhupāda played his karatālas, looking around the room at his disciples. He was nodding his head, pleased to see them dancing and chanting. After the kīrtana, he lectured.

"Just see how their characters are being formed, how they are becoming purified, how their faces are becoming brighter. It is practical. So our request is, take full advantage of the center—you come here. It is being guided by one of my best disciples, Bhagavān dāsa. So he and others will help you. Please come regularly to this temple and take advantage of it."

After his lecture, Prabhupāda asked for questions. Bahulāśva raised his hand. "Śrīla Prabhupāda, what is the thing that will please you the most?"

"Chant Hare Kṛṣṇa," Prabhupāda replied, and the devotees spontaneously cried out, "Jaya! Jaya!"

Prabhupāda: "That is the simplest thing. You are chanting. I am very much pleased. That's all. I came to your country to chant that you would chant also along with me. You are helping me by chanting, so I am pleased.

"But this tendency is very nice, that you want to please me. That is very good. And to please me is not very difficult. Caitanya Mahāprabhu said that 'Under My order, every one of you go preach and become spiritual master.' And what is that order? The order is, 'Whomever you meet, you talk to him about Kṛṣṇa.'"

Prabhupāda emphasized that if one wanted to preach and represent Kṛṣṇa, then he could not change the message of Kṛṣṇa but must repeat what Kṛṣṇa says. "I have come here for the first time," Prabhupāda continued, "but before me, Bhagavān dāsa, he has organized. And what is his credit? He has presented things as I told him. That's all. This is wonderful. In Los Angeles also a program is going on very nicely. My disciple in charge there is Karandhara. He is present here. He is simply doing what I instruct, and he is doing very nicely—first class. Everyone who comes, they come and are enchanted by the temple, with the activities, with the disciples. So this is the way. This is called paramparā system. Don't concoct."

As Prabhupāda was leaving the temple that evening, the mother of one of his disciples approached him. "You know," she said, "these boys actually worship you!"

"Yes," Prabhupāda said, "that is our system. I am also worshiping my Guru Mahārāja." The devotees around Prabhupāda looked at one another and smiled. Although the woman had tried to make it appear extraordinary that Prabhupāda's disciples worshiped him, Prabhupāda had taken it casually. One must worship the guru. It was the Vaiṣṇava standard and nothing to wonder at.

Śrīla Prabhupāda had so many centers in the U.S. that to visit each one was not practical. During his year in India, many new centers had opened—on the West Coast, in Florida, Texas, the Midwest, the East. Prabhupāda said he had more establishments than a wealthy businessman, and more residences. Were he to stay at each of his "houses," he quipped, he couldn't visit them all in a year. And especially to Indian audiences he would cite the monthly expenditures for his centers.

Though proud of ISKCON's growth, Prabhupāda was never proud on his own account; he never considered using ISKCON for his own enjoyment. Whenever he visited a center, his quarters were usually an apartment arranged at the last minute, often fraught with annoyances like noisy neighbors and incompetent cooks. At seventy-five years, his constant traveling was hardly an arrangement for his health and comfort.

Prabhupāda never felt complacent over the small success his society enjoyed, nor would he claim the credit for that success. Rather, he said, it was due to the mercy of his spiritual master and the previous spiritual masters. ISKCON still had but little influence in the world; people considered it a small, exotic religious sect. But by the blessings of the previous ācāryas, it was growing. Prabhupāda was initiating more and more disciples, and the potential was unlimited.

One of Lord Caitanya's chief followers, Jīva Gosvāmī, had warned that a spiritual master should not accept many disciples; many neophyte disciples would bring suffering to the spiritual master. Yet on Prabhupāda's U.S. tour during the summer of 1971, he initiated more disciples than ever before. As Lord Caitanya's empowered representative, he wanted to increase the number of devotees more and more. He was aware of the risk, but he was also aware of the great need. As he had written in The Nectar of Devotion,

The one point is that without increasing the number of disciples, there is no propagation of the cult of Kṛṣṇa consciousness. Therefore, sometimes even at a risk, a sannyāsī in the line of Lord Caitanya Mahāprabhu may accept even a person who is not thoroughly fit to become a disciple. Later on, by the mercy of such a bona fide spiritual master, the disciple is gradually elevated. However, if one increases the number of disciples simply for some prestige or false honor, he will surely fall down in the matter of executing Kṛṣṇa consciousness.

Śrīla Prabhupāda's test of a prospective disciple's readiness for initiation was standard: the candidate must have followed the four rules and chanted sixteen rounds daily for at least six months and have the recommendation of the temple president and local G.B.C. secretary.

Prabhupāda accepted anyone who fulfilled these conditions, and he expected the disciple to remain sincere and true to the vows of initiation.

Despite Prabhupāda's growing number of disciples, he intimately touched each of their hearts. Although a few disciples enjoyed extended association with him, most of his hundreds of disciples saw him only from afar. Yet each of them was certain that Prabhupāda was his own. Each could say "my spiritual master." Each could say "Prabhupāda" and feel close to their dearest friend and well-wisher, the one who was saving them from death. They knew that Prabhupāda was the direct representative of Kṛṣṇa and the most empowered ācārya of Lord Caitanya's message. Those who were sincere knew without doubt that their connection with Prabhupāda was transcendental, not to be interrupted or limited by physical or geographical considerations. If they surrendered to Prabhupāda's orders, Kṛṣṇa within their hearts would help them advance. If they were sincere, Kṛṣṇa would help them become better disciples of Śrīla Prabhupāda.

The devotees' love for Prabhupāda was not a vague sentiment. He was engaging them in Kṛṣṇa's service, and they were directly experiencing the transcendental results. Only a devotee, however, could understand Śrīla Prabhupāda's personality or the depth of his disciples' attraction for him or the debt they owed him. No wonder onlookers at the Detroit airport had not understood the apparently delirious devotees in their blissful reception of Śrīla Prabhupāda.

After Detroit, Prabhupāda visited Boston and then flew to New York, where another large group of devotees had gathered. The New York Daily News covered his airport arrival with photos and an article: "Swami, How They Love You."

Bhavānanda, the New York temple president, had decorated the temple room of the Brooklyn center with bright colors. Prabhupāda's vyāsāsana was a special creation of plaids, stripes, and checks in fuchsia, lime, black, white, and red. Prabhupāda liked it very much.

Two hundred devotees—many having waited for more than a year to be initiated—converged on the Brooklyn temple, and Prabhupāda held initiations for five consecutive days, initiating around two dozen disciples each day. One after another, the young men and women would approach Prabhupāda on his multicolored vyāsāsana to receive their initiation beads and spiritual names. Those receiving the brāhmaṇa initiation went one by one to see Prabhupāda in his room and receive the Gāyatrī mantra.

Madhumāṅgala: I went to Prabhupāda's room and offered obeisances. "Come here," he said. So I went and sat close to him. He began teaching me the Gāyatrī mantra, and I was looking up at him. The sun was right behind his head. He looked like a mountain, like the Himalayas, and I was like a mole, a stone. He was very big, and I seemed very insignificant.

Rikthānanda: Prabhupāda turned to face me, and his eyes seemed like limitless pools of an entrancing liquid. I knew he was focused always on Kṛṣṇa, and his eyes were a reflection of that happiness. He said something to me, and I said, "No, sir." Saying "sir" to him seemed natural, and he seemed to be happy that I had said it. Then in a very clear, soft, steady voice, he began to teach me the Gāyatrī mantra. Then he took the sacred thread and put it around my neck and across my shoulder, very gracefully and with such precision in his movements. "Now," he said, "you are a brāhmaṇa."

Daivī-śakti: Prabhupāda had the Gāyatrī mantra written on a small piece of paper, and as he was teaching it to me he had his eyes closed. I would repeat it word for word after him. When he got to the third line, however, instead of saying gurudevāya he said the word from the fifth line. I didn't know whether to follow what he had said or just say what was on the paper. So I said what was on the paper, and then Prabhupāda immediately realized what he had done and changed it. But I suddenly realized that the perfect chanting of mantras was not so significant. Prabhupāda was fully absorbed in thinking of Kṛṣṇa, and although there may have been some apparent flaw in his pronunciation, he was perfect, regardless. I saw that the real perfection of devotional service was to follow Prabhupāda.

After I received my Gāyatrī mantra, I asked Prabhupāda if I could ask him some questions, and he said yes. "Śrīla Prabhupāda," I said, "I haven't been able to serve you in rapt attention. What can I do to serve you?" I was praying he would give me a special service to do for him personally. "Chant Hare Kṛṣṇa," was all he said.

"Is there anything more?" I asked. He said, "Are you married?" I said, "Yes." So he said, "Serve your husband."

I said, "My husband and I don't get along." So he said, "Be a pūjārī—there are so many things."

His answer seemed to solve all my difficulty. First and foremost was to chant Hare Kṛṣṇa. And in addition to that, there are so many other services. If you don't do one of them, then go on to the next one—"There are so many things." When he said those words, it relieved all my anxiety.

In New York Prabhupāda lectured gravely and authoritatively from Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, stressing surrender to Kṛṣṇa through surrendering to the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement. Unlike any other Bhāgavatam lecturer, Prabhupāda was able to offer a movement, a society, and a way of life that were fully Kṛṣṇa conscious and that gave any interested person practical entrance into the devotional service of the Lord.

Someone asked how a person who had been very sinful could be relieved of his karma, and Prabhupāda replied simply, "Come and live with us. That's all. Is it very difficult? Our students—they are living with us. You simply come and live with us, and you are free from all karma. Is it difficult? Then do that. We shall give you food, we shall give you shelter, we shall give you nice philosophy. If you want to marry, we shall give you a good wife. What do you want more? So come and live with us. That's all."

Prabhupāda stressed this same point in his lectures: if a person seeking spiritual fulfillment lived and served with the ISKCON devotees, even material fulfillment would come.

"These Kṛṣṇa conscious boys and girls—in sixty centers—they are living in the best houses. They are eating the best food. They are in the best consciousness. They have got the best hope. Everything best. Their feature of body is best. What material happiness do you want more than this? They have got wife, children, happiness, home—everything full. So material happiness is nothing to a Kṛṣṇa conscious person. Material happiness will roll at his feet, saying, 'Please take me, please take me.' There is no need of asking for it. Simply be steady and ask Kṛṣṇa, 'Please engage me in Your service.' Then your satisfaction will automatically come. Don't bother for material happiness."

Nanda-kiśora asked, "What happens to a person out on the street if we just give him one Simply Wonderful* or some prasādam?"

Prabhupāda: "Then it is wonderful—simply wonderful. (The devotees laughed.) He has not tasted such wonderful sweet in his life. Therefore, you give him wonderful, and because he is eating that wonderful sweet, one day he will come to your temple and become wonderful. Therefore it is simply wonderful. So go on distributing this simply wonderful. Your philosophy is simply wonderful, your prasādam is simply wonderful, you are simply wonderful. And your Kṛṣṇa is simply wonderful. The whole process is simply wonderful. Kṛṣṇa acts wonderfully, and it is acting wonderfully. Who can deny it?"

Kīrtanānanda Mahārāja: "Prabhupāda is simply wonderful."

While Prabhupāda continued in New York, poised to leave for London in a few days, his secretary mentioned that many U.S. centers were still vying for his presence. Prabhupāda casually remarked that if any center could arrange a good lecture program and pay his travel expenses plus one thousand dollars, then he would go there before leaving for London.

Hearing this, the devotees in Gainesville, Florida, determined to meet Prabhupāda's transcendental challenge. The temple president, Hṛdayānanda, assigned an uninitiated devotee, David Liberman, to find a sponsor at the University of Florida willing to pay one thousand dollars for Prabhupāda to come and speak. David visited every student organization on campus until he found a donor.

Prabhupāda agreed to come, even though his secretary informed him that the flight would lay over two hours in Atlanta and then continue to Jacksonville, a one-and-a-half-hour car ride from Gainesville.

Atlanta

The ten residents of the recently opened Atlanta temple arranged to receive Prabhupāda during his layover at the Atlanta airport. They prepared a large feast and decorated the Eastern Airlines V.I.P. lounge with fruits, flowers, and garlands.

Bill Ogle: Although Śrīla Prabhupāda was not big physically, he immediately captured the consciousness of the entire Atlanta airport when he entered. Everyone was watching as he walked, with his head held high, his cane moving gracefully with every step. The airport is one of the busiest in the country, but everyone who saw Prabhupāda looked at him in amazement. Airport officials voluntarily began clearing a path for Prabhupāda to walk. But what was even more amazing was that he was so submissive to such insignificant disciples as we.

Prabhupāda entered the V.I.P. lounge with his disciples and about twenty Indian guests. Confronting the portable vyāsāsana atop a marble table, Prabhupāda declined; the seat seemed unsteady. But the devotees assured him that it was sturdy, so Prabhupāda climbed up, sat down, and began leading a kīrtana. After speaking for about fifteen minutes, Prabhupāda concluded his lecture.

"This is not sentimental chanting, but it is based on the soundest philosophy, Vedic literatures. We have got so many books, and you can buy them in our book store. Where is the book store?"

There was a long pause. The devotees had remembered fruits, flowers, the chair, the feast, invitations to the Indians—but they had forgotten Prabhupāda's books. Prabhupāda continued to wait for an answer to his question, until finally the senior disciple, Janamejaya, replied, "Prabhupāda, we usually have a book store."

"Hmm" was all Prabhupāda said. Again a long silence. "So," Prabhupāda said, looking to the audience, "any questions?"

Prabhupāda chatted with the Indians, asking their names and where they were from in India. Most of them were young men with families and treated him respectfully, like a grandfather or a revered swami. One Indian man, about thirty-five, mentioned that he was getting his Ph.D. in biology.

"Oh, biology," Prabhupāda said. "Hmm, poor frogs." Everyone in the lounge—except the biologist—burst into laughter.

"No, no," the biologist protested, embarrassed. "Why 'poor frogs'?"

"Because you are killing," Prabhupāda said.

"But it is for the advancement of knowledge," said the biologist. "So it is worthwhile. It is for the advancement of knowledge."

"All right," said Prabhupāda, "if I ask you now, will you give your body for the advancement of knowledge?" Everyone in the room began to laugh.

"Yes! Yes, I would!" the man replied. But the more he protested, repeating, "Yes, I would!" the more ridiculous he seemed, and the harder everyone laughed.

"How many species of life are there?" Prabhupāda asked.

"Fifty million," the biologist replied.

"Oh?" said Prabhupāda. "You have seen them all?"

"No."

"How many have you seen?"

"Perhaps five thousand."

"And you are wrong," Prabhupāda said. "There are 8,400,000 species of life. We have scientific knowledge from the Vedas."

Bill Ogle: After Prabhupāda took prasāda, we performed a play for him. The play was "The Brāhmaṇa and the Cobbler." I played Viṣṇu. It was terrible. I had to be Viṣṇu, and my wife had to be Lakṣmī. I was lying down as Lord Viṣṇu, and my wife was massaging my feet. Prabhupāda kept looking at me, and I thought he must be thinking, "Who is this rascal playing Viṣṇu?" My feeling was, "This is not very good. I shouldn't be doing this." I was very embarrassed to be in front of Prabhupāda like that.

Jayasena was Nārada Muni, and he offered obeisances about a hundred times throughout the play. Because Prabhupāda was there, Jayasena was constantly offering obeisances to everyone and anything. So although he was playing Nārada Muni, he offered obeisances to the cobbler. But some of the Indians spoke up. They were a little taken aback that Nārada Muni, such a great saint, was offering obeisances to a cobbler, who is ordinarily a very low-class person.

So at this point Prabhupāda interrupted and began to explain. "Actually," he said, "it is all right that Nārada Muni has offered obeisances to the cobbler, because the cobbler is a Vaiṣṇava. Any Vaiṣṇava can receive obeisances, more than a brāhmaṇa." He continued, narrating the play. He told the story, and we continued acting. It was ecstatic.

As Prabhupāda was leaving the lounge to board his flight for Jacksonville, a lady in a wheelchair, the mother of one of the devotees in Atlanta, raised herself up and threw herself at Prabhupāda's feet. With tears in her eyes, she cried out, "I am dying of cancer. Save me! Save me!" Śrīla Prabhupāda bent down and put his hand on her head. "That is all right," he said comfortingly. "That is all right."

As Prabhupāda, garlanded with red roses and magnolias, walked down the corridor toward his plane, the devotees thought that Prabhupāda appeared majestic, like a king. He emanated a golden effulgence, and he seemed powerful, yet humble. The devotees felt spiritual strength and pledged to follow Prabhupāda's teachings. They last glimpsed him walking across the airfield toward the small plane that would take him to Jacksonville. His saffron silk dhotī and kurtā blowing in the breeze, he turned to them and waved.

Śrīla Prabhupāda asked how fast the car was going and how long it would take them to get to Gainesville. Sixty-five miles per hour, the driver said; it would take an hour and a half. Prabhupāda observed the scenery along the highway—pine forests, marshes, exotic birds, an occasional armadillo foraging near the highway. Lotuses and lilies grew wild in the canals along the roadside, and bright sunshine warmed the clear air.

Gainesville was a side trip for Prabhupāda, a special day of preaching. He had left Śyāmasundara, his secretary, in New York and brought with him only Aravinda, his servant. He had come for a day to bring the mercy of Lord Caitanya to yet another city. When the devotees had picked him up at the airport, he had appeared grave. But on catching sight of the devotees he had smiled wonderfully, and then, turning to Hṛdayānanda, he had asked, “Which way?” He was like a transcendental fighter, asking to be pointed toward the battle.

Prabhupāda walked along a flower-sprinkled pathway and into the temple, a rented house near the University of Florida campus. In the temple room he stood a moment, studying a crude but sincerely executed painting of Lord Caitanya and His associates. Hṛdayānanda asked Prabhupāda if he would like to rest, and he nodded. While the devotees performed kīrtana, Prabhupāda retired to his room, returning later to sit on the large blue velvet vyāsāsana in the small temple room. In addition to Prabhupāda's disciples from Gainesville, Miami, Tallahassee, and New Orleans, many university students and other guests were also present.

Prabhupāda lectured about the saving grace of chanting the holy name of the Lord. One of his disciples, he said, had been present when his mother was dying. “Because he had been telling her about Kṛṣṇa and Hare Kṛṣṇa, she said to her son in her last words, “Where is your Kṛṣṇa? Is He here now?” And then she died.” For her uttering the holy name and thinking of Kṛṣṇa, Prabhupāda said, she would go to the spiritual world.

After Prabhupāda finished his talk, a girl reporter from the university newspaper raised her hand. “I see almost all young people here,” she said. “Why is that?”

Prabhupāda replied with a question: “Why are there so many young people in the university?”

The girl reflected a moment, “Well... I guess that's the age for education.”

"Yes," Prabhupāda said, "so this is the age for Kṛṣṇa consciousness. You cannot teach an old dog new tricks."

The engagement for which Prabhupāda had come, and for which the University of Florida was paying a thousand dollars, was to be that afternoon on campus at the Plaza of the Americas. When Prabhupāda arrived, several hundred students were gathered near the temporary stage, sitting casually on the grass, lounging beneath the fragrant magnolia trees. The sky was overcast, and rain threatened.

As more students gathered, the crowd grew to five hundred. Then just as Prabhupāda was about to speak, a light drizzle began to fall, and Hṛdayānanda came onstage to hold an umbrella over Śrīla Prabhupāda.

Prabhupāda, sitting on his vyāsāsana, said softly into the microphone, "Someone is smoking," and the students politely extinguished their cigarettes. No sooner did Prabhupāda begin his lecture, however, than a dog started yapping. Prabhupāda paused. "Who is that dog?" he asked. When the dog persisted, Śrīla Prabhupāda said, "He also wants to talk." Finally the barking stopped, and so did the rain. But Hṛdayānanda continued to hold the umbrella over Prabhupāda's head.

While riding in the car back to the temple, Prabhupāda asked to hear the tape recording of his lecture. When he heard the dog barking at the beginning of his talk, he laughed.

"Prabhupāda," Hṛdayānanda said, "your lecture was wonderful. Everyone liked it. The students liked it, the devotees liked it, the professors liked it."

"All right," Prabhupāda said. "Hare Kṛṣṇa."

Śrīla Prabhupāda's day of preaching was not over yet. Next was an evening television interview.

The interviewer had done some preparatory reading, and he introduced Śrīla Prabhupāda by first describing who Kṛṣṇa was, according to Vedic literature, and how Śrīla Prabhupāda was in the disciplic succession from Lord Caitanya. When the interviewer asked Prabhupāda for an introductory statement, Prabhupāda explained, "The Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement is trying to invoke in all people the original consciousness that we are a part and parcel of Kṛṣṇa."

When the interviewer asked Prabhupāda, "Who is your spiritual master?" Prabhupāda lowered his head humbly and stated the full name of his Guru Mahārāja, "Om Viṣṇupada Paramahansa Parivrajakācārya Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī Gosvāmī Mahārāja Prabhupāda."

The interviewer, however, seemed bent on controversy. "In what way, sir, may I ask, did you think and do you think right now that the teaching of love of God that you are preaching is different and perhaps better than the teachings of love of God that were being conducted in this country and have been conducted in the rest of the world for centuries?"

Śrīla Prabhupāda: "This teaching is the most authorized. That is a fact. We are following in the footsteps of Lord Caitanya. He is accepted by us, according to the authority of Vedic religion, to be personally Kṛṣṇa Himself. For example, you are the expert in this establishment. If someone is doing something under your guidance and if you personally teach him, "Do like this," that is very authorized. So when Lord Caitanya taught God consciousness, God Himself was teaching."

Prabhupāda had answered positively, avoiding the sectarian dispute the interviewer had invited. Yet repeatedly the interviewer tried to involve him in a controversy. He seemed to want Prabhupāda to appear arrogant, sectarian, and anti-American. Prabhupāda, however, insisted he was not opposed to any other religion and that anyone in the world could chant the name of God as it appeared in his religion.

Interviewer: "But there must have been an element of dissatisfaction on your part with the way Godhead was being professed in this part of the world before you came. Otherwise, there would have been no sense in your being here."

Śrīla Prabhupāda: "It is not just this part of the world. Practically every part of the world has very little interest in God. They have more interest in dog."

Prabhupāda's answers were strong and philosophically strong. The interviewer, trying his professional best, again attempted to find some fault.

Interviewer: "It seems to me, sir, as interpreted in your writings, that there is a very high emphasis placed on the relationship between the individual and God."

Śrīla Prabhupāda: "Yes. That is found everywhere."

Interviewer: "Yes, but you place more emphasis on that relationship than on the relationship between one individual and another. Am I right in that?"

Śrīla Prabhupāda: "We have to establish, first of all, our lost relationship with God. Then we can understand what is our relationship between one individual and another. If the central point is missing, then there is practically no relation. You are an American, and another is an American, and both of you feel American nationality because the center is America. So unless you understand God, you cannot understand who I am, nor can I understand who you are."

Interviewer: "I think that in this part of the world, in the Western world, we place a great deal of emphasis on religion in the ways it gets one man to deal with another man—the ethic of religion. Now in the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement..."

Śrīla Prabhupāda: "We are not concerned how one man deals with another man."

Interviewer: "Isn't that part of your Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement?"

Śrīla Prabhupāda: "No, this is not important. Because we know as soon as one knows how to deal with God, he will automatically deal very nicely with others."

Interviewer: "But let's take the Christian religion for an example. You know the ten commandments? There is a heavy emphasis in the ten commandments on the relationships between one human being and another: 'Thou shalt not steal. Thou shalt not kill.' You know, that sort of thing."

Śrīla Prabhupāda: "But I say that Jesus Christ never said and never meant that 'Thou shalt not kill' refers to only human beings. Where is that evidence? Jesus Christ never said that 'Thou shalt not kill' refers only to human beings. Thou shalt not kill any animal."

Interviewer: "Any life?"

Śrīla Prabhupāda: "Any life. That is religion."

Interviewer: "It has never been interpreted that way."

Śrīla Prabhupāda: "You have interpreted it differently, but he said, 'Thou shalt not kill.' He never said, 'Thou shalt not kill amongst human beings.' Why do you interpret it that way?"

Prabhupāda had given the TV interviewer the very thing he was after, controversy, but because it was not desirable controversy the interviewer promptly dropped it. Instead, he asked Prabhupāda how one could recognize a true follower of Kṛṣṇa consciousness by his behavior.

"He'd be a perfect gentleman," Prabhupāda said, "that's all... Therefore, I prohibit my disciples to eat meat."

Interviewer: "To eat meat?"

Śrīla Prabhupāda: "Yes. And therefore I prohibit illicit sex life. Therefore I prohibit intoxication. They do not even smoke, what to speak of other intoxication."

When Prabhupāda said that whoever observed these four rules would become a perfect gentleman, the interviewer asked whether there was a place for women in the religion. Prabhupāda replied that women and men had the same rights and followed the same principles. The interviewer asked whether Prabhupāda was encouraged or discouraged, and Prabhupāda said he was encouraged because so many devotees were joining. The interviewer doubted that many were joining, since out of two hundred million Americans, only two dozen devotees were present in the TV studio. "When you sell diamonds," Prabhupāda replied, "you cannot expect that everyone will purchase."

As a final question, the interviewer asked if Prabhupāda had any major complaints about American society.

Śrīla Prabhupāda: "I have no complaint. These boys and girls are very nice. I am, rather, encouraged that these boys and girls are hankering after something nice. They are frustrated. So now, since they have the best thing, they are coming."

The interviewer asked Śrīla Prabhupāda and his followers to chant Hare Kṛṣṇa, and within half a minute they were off the air. The hot studio lights went out, and the engineers started talking among themselves. The interviewer bid Śrīla Prabhupāda a polite farewell—he had no intention of continuing their talk—but Śrīla Prabhupāda continued preaching. On-camera or off-camera made no difference to him. He saw the interviewer not merely as a television personality but as someone to receive Kṛṣṇa's mercy.

The two had been sitting very closely for the interview, and Prabhupāda now leaned toward the interviewer and said, “Let me ask you one question. If you have some disease and you want to cure this disease, what is the best way to go about it? By asking a friend or by going to a medical doctor and asking how to cure this disease? Would you go to a friend?”

The man replied, “Yes.” Prabhupāda shook his head. “You would go to a friend?” Again the man said, “Yes.”

The interviewer was not concentrating, so Prabhupāda patiently repeated his example. “Try to understand,” he said. “If you have some disease, then would you go to a medical doctor or would you go to a friend?” The man could not grasp the point, so Prabhupāda answered, “No, you would not go to a friend. You would go to a physician—one who knows the answer. That is the spiritual master.” They talked a while longer, and finally Prabhupāda and the devotees left.

It was almost midnight, and Prabhupāda went to his room. When he had first arrived in Gainesville he had agreed to initiate the five eligible candidates and had even taken their japa beads. But now the day had passed, there had been no initiation, and Prabhupāda still had five strands of beads. Joseph and Sam, who had come all the way from New Orleans, and David Liberman and his wife, Adrienne, and a Gainesville boy named Gary were all in anxiety. They had stayed up, talking among themselves, wondering whether Śrīla Prabhupāda would hold an initiation ceremony in the morning, before he left.

Aravinda told them there would be no time for a ceremony in the morning, but that he would ask Śrīla Prabhupāda when they could have their beads back. He went to Prabhupāda's room, leaving the devotees to sit and talk about Śrīla Prabhupāda. Then Aravinda returned, he surprised everyone by announcing, “Prabhupāda is going to give you your beads now. He is going to give you your initiation in his room.” The devotees excitedly hurried to Śrīla Prabhupāda's room.

Prabhupāda sat on his bed. He wore no shirt, only his dhotī, which he had pushed up high on his thighs and tucked under himself, like a loincloth or gamchā. His body was smooth and glowing. The devotees sat on the floor around his bed while he held their beads in his hands and chanted.

Prabhupāda handed Gary his beads. “So your name is now Dharma dāsa. This means “one who is a strict follower of all religious principles.”

Dharma: I was actually very nervous, and I was practically shaking, because I was afraid I would do something wrong in front of Śrīla Prabhupāda. I was so nervous practically I couldn't even hear properly. But I was very happy to have been accepted by Śrīla Prabhupāda. I knew, of course, there was no question of ever leaving the movement now. I never wanted to leave anyway, but now this was official. Even if I had considered it before, now there was no question of it.

Then there was Joseph from New Orleans. "What is his name?" Prabhupāda asked Aravinda. Aravinda read from a sheet, "Bhāgavata dāsa." Prabhupāda smiled and said, "Oh, Bhāgavata dāsa. Very good. There are two things. There is the book bhāgavata—Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam and Bhagavad-gītā—and the person bhāgavata, who follows perfectly those teachings. He is a living manifestation of the book bhāgavata. And you are Bhāgavata dāsa. That means you are the servant of the book bhāgavata and the person bhāgavata.

Bhāgavata: I always wanted a name that meant I was the servant of the guru. So when I heard this, I was very happy. Prabhupāda started to hand me my beads, but then he pulled them back and asked, "And what are the four regulative principles?" So I told him, and he said, "Very good."

Then he went to hand me my beads again, but again he pulled them back. He asked, "How many rounds do you chant?" I was very proud, because I had been chanting twenty rounds a day for about five months, so I sat up real straight and said, "You're supposed to chant sixteen rounds a day, Śrīla Prabhupāda. But I chant twenty."

Śrīla Prabhupāda just turned away from me and said, "That's all right." It was like he was saying, "Don't get puffed up." Then he turned to me and said, "Here are your beads."

Handing Dave his beads, Prabhupāda said, "Your name is Amarendra. This means 'the best of the immortals.'" He named Adrienne "Gāyatrī dāśī" and Sam "Suvrata."

When Suvrata stood and Prabhupāda noticed he was not wearing neck beads, he withheld the chanting beads and said, "You have no neck beads? Where are your neck beads?" Prabhupāda turned to Bhāgavata dāsa. "You also have no neck beads?" Bhāgavata thought that Prabhupāda was going to take his chanting beads back, so he hid them against his stomach. Then Prabhupāda turned to the senior devotees in the room, criticizing. "What is the matter with you?" he said sternly. "You are leaders, and you don't know these things? Don't you know that you must put neck beads in giving initiation?"

The senior devotees were frightened by Prabhupāda's anger. "We are sorry, Prabhupāda," someone said. "Tomorrow for the fire yajña they will have neck beads."

"Yes," Prabhupāda said, "you cannot do the fire yajña without neck beads. They must have neck beads."

Although it was midnight, Prabhupāda asked if the devotees had any questions. Bhāgavata dāsa raised his hand. "How is it that we are on a transcendental platform but sometimes we are affected by the three modes of nature?"

"It is just like you are on a boat," Prabhupāda replied. "If you are on the boat, then I cannot say you are not on the boat. Is it not? So you are on the transcendental boat. Therefore, you are on the transcendental platform. You cannot say that you are not. But the waves are coming, and they are rocking the boat." Prabhupāda gestured with his hands like a boat rocking. "So the waves of the material nature are coming," he continued, "and they are rocking the boat. But when you become an expert boatman, then even in the greatest storm you can stay steady and steer the boat, and it will not rock."

"Well, how does one become an expert boatman?" Bhāgavata asked.

"You become expert," Prabhupāda replied, "by becoming enthusiastic, sincere, confident, determined, and patient." Seeing Bhāgavata's anxious face, Prabhupāda added, "And you must be patient. Everything will come in due course."

Sitting informally on the bed, in his abbreviated dhotī, Prabhupāda had answered Bhāgavata's questions in such a way as to fully satisfy all the devotees. The devotees were already satisfied just to be with Prabhupāda, but by his answers to their questions not only they but all devotees could take encouragement and be satisfied. They would tell the others what he had said, and everyone would cherish these instructions of Śrīla Prabhupāda.

Amarendra also had a question. Amarendra was intense and impassioned, and so was his inquiry. Before becoming a devotee, he had been a leader of campus radicals. Now he wanted to bring that same intensity to bear in spreading Kṛṣṇa consciousness. "Śrīla Prabhupāda," Amarendra asked, "how can we make them take to this Kṛṣṇa consciousness? What can we say when we go to preach to people? What can we say that will make them take it?" His voice was heavy and forceful, demanding action.

"You simply ask them to please chant Hare Kṛṣṇa," Prabhupāda replied. "Whether they take or not, that is their business. That is between them and Kṛṣṇa. But you have done your business. You have done your duty for Kṛṣṇa by simply asking them, 'Please chant Hare Kṛṣṇa.'"

"How do we take our minds away from māyā and bring them to Kṛṣṇa?" Rādhā-vallabha asked.

"You must drag the mind," Prabhupāda said. "You must drag the mind back to the sound vibration of Hare Kṛṣṇa, Hare Kṛṣṇa, Kṛṣṇa Kṛṣṇa, Hare Hare." And again he repeated, "You must drag the mind back to the sound vibration."

"All right." Prabhupāda looked around. "You are satisfied now?"

The devotees responded, "Yes, Śrīla Prabhupāda. Thank you very much." Then they all left. It had been the greatest day and night of their lives, they all agreed, and they would never forget it.

While Prabhupāda rode to the Jacksonville airport in a car with a few disciples, the other devotees followed in their van, bringing the vyāsāsana from the temple for Prabhupāda to use at the airport. Śrīla Prabhupāda closed his eyes and rested as he rode, and the devotees in the back seat of his car ate the remnants of his prasādam.

Hṛdayānanda: It was my idea to bring Prabhupāda's vyāsāsana to the airport. I was thinking, "How can my spiritual master sit in the same seats that karmīs sit on?" It just seemed impossible. How could Prabhupāda put his lotus body, how could he sit, on the same seats as the karmīs? I was very agitated by that. Amarendra had built the vyāsāsana, and he used to build everything like a tank. The vyāsāsana must have weighed several hundred pounds. It took four or five devotees to carry it.

So Prabhupāda arrived first, and the vyāsāsana wasn't there. By the time he got to his boarding gate and the vyāsāsana still wasn't there, I was in anxiety, because I didn't want him to sit in a regular seat. I thought it would be a great offense on my part. Then as I looked down the long, long airport corridor, I saw six brahmācārīs, half of them without their shoes on, lugging Prabhupāda's vyāsāsana down the corridor. It was such an absurd scene. Prabhupāda just stood there looking in disbelief and disgust, and finally several sweating, groaning brahmācārīs came and dropped the vyāsāsana down in front of Prabhupāda. Prabhupāda just looked at it with disdain, walked past it, and sat down in the ordinary seat.

While most of the devotees sat at Prabhupāda's feet, chanting the Gurv-aṣṭaka prayers to the spiritual master, Hṛdayānanda was preaching to the people who were standing and watching the spectacle. He had some of Śrīla Prabhupāda's books, and he was trying to distribute them. Prabhupāda gave more attention to this preaching than to the devotees seated at his feet.

Having visited half a dozen cities in a little more than a month's time, Śrīla Prabhupāda was planning next to visit London. Clearly, his field had become the entire world. And his traveling was the practical enactment of his conviction that Kṛṣṇa consciousness should be given to people everywhere.

By Prabhupāda's wide traveling and bold preaching, the old idea that the Bhagavad-gītā and Kṛṣṇa were only for the Hindus had become an anachronism, a prejudice. Barriers of race, religion, nation, sex, class—all were now down. The Hindu saying that a swami should not cross the ocean had become a superstition, intended perhaps to protect lesser swamis but certainly never to restrict the message of the Absolute Truth from being spread.

Caitanya Mahāprabhu's express desire was that in every town and village of the world His name be heard, and no Vedic injunction could prohibit that. Of course, the Vedic literatures advised a devotee to live in a secluded place and avoid worldly men and women, and they advised a devotee not to disturb the minds of innocent persons or preach to the faithless. According to one Vedic injunction, a devotee should not even see the face of a nonbeliever. Such rules and regulations, however, intended mainly for the protection and purification of the neophytes, were superseded by a stalwart ācārya acting on the higher principle of compassion.

And in support of that higher principle Lord Kṛṣṇa had promised, "My devotee shall never be vanquished." The surrendered preacher, taking up Lord Caitanya's highest order, would be immunized against contamination, despite regular contact with worldly persons. Even at the risk of his own spiritual life, the preacher approached worldly people, and in return Kṛṣṇa protected him.

Prabhupāda was merciful to everyone, everywhere. Therefore he was jagad-guru, the spiritual master for the entire world. To become jagad-guru didn't mean to claim that one was better than everyone else or that he was the best guru in the world. Jagad-guru meant that, like Nārada Muni, a preacher of Kṛṣṇa consciousness went everywhere, preached everywhere, and had disciples everywhere. And Śrīla Prabhupāda did that.

On arriving at one U.S. airport, Śrīla Prabhupāda had mentioned that yogīs had formerly traveled in three different ways: by flying carpet, by pigeons, and by mantra. "Then why have you come today on American Airlines?" the reporter had challenged. "Just to be one with you," Śrīla Prabhupāda had said, smiling.

But that Prabhupāda had come by jet instead of by some extraordinary mystic power was actually no less miraculous. The miracle was that he was always traveling and that wherever he went he spoke the message of Kṛṣṇa consciousness, created faith in the faithless, and transformed the low-grade persons of Kali-yuga into pure Vaiṣṇavas.

Śrīla Prabhupāda, in addition to his selfless, compassionate traveling, was also offering volumes of transcendental literature. His disciples in sixty-five centers around the world were gratefully accepting their role of assisting him, assuring him that they were able to preach to the people in their areas and that he should feel confident to go on opening new frontiers of Kṛṣṇa consciousness and presenting more and more transcendental literature. His disciples especially wanted him to have time for translating Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, because he had told them that that was his desire. Often he said that if he could simply spend time translating Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam he would stop traveling. He could not stop traveling for very long, however. Even if he found enough peace and a suitable place for concentrating on the Bhāgavatam, duty would call; again he would have to travel—to see new people, to introduce saṅkīrtana in a new place, to insure that his movement was progressing smoothly.

Prabhupāda, therefore, had developed a routine of translating Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam anywhere he went, for at least a few hours a day. He had a briefcase with Sanskrit Bhāgavatams and commentaries and a suitcase with a dictating machine. Wherever he was, he would rise in the middle of the night, sit at his desk with his dictating machine and Sanskrit and Bengali volumes, and take up where he had left off, translating the verses into English and composing his Bhaktivedanta purports. Thus his busy traveling and his translating were able to go on simultaneously.

SPL 36: In Every Town and Village

CHAPTER THIRTY-SIX

In Every Town and Village

= London

August 1971

From Florida, "this remote corner of the world," Prabhupāda returned to New York and after three days flew to London. There he became ill. On August 14 he wrote to Tamāla Kṛṣṇa,

I am sick here since the last four days. There is no sunshine. Almost always there is darkness and rain. So it has affected my health, because I am already rheumatic.

Prabhupāda said he wanted to retire from traveling and management: "This body is old, it is giving warning." But he didn't have sufficient confidence that his leading managers could push on—without his pushing them.

Prabhupāda complained to his secretary, Śyāmasundara, criticizing him and the other zonal secretaries for not producing and distributing his books on a large scale. "Why are there no books?" Prabhupāda demanded, and Śyāmasundara cringed, unable to give a satisfactory answer. Śyāmasundara said he would immediately write to his Godbrothers on the Bhaktivedanta Book Trust.

"Why have a book trust?" Prabhupāda argued. "What have they done? There is no stock of big books.* There are no literatures in foreign languages after years of promises and plans. Why hasn't the unabridged Bhagavad-gītā As It Is been printed yet?"

"Well," Śyāmasundara replied, "because they..."

"No! It's your responsibility," Prabhupāda yelled. "Why haven't you done it?" Prabhupāda chastised his G.B.C. secretaries around the world through the one secretary before him. The G.B.C.'s duties were to see that Prabhupāda's books were always in stock, that Back to Godhead magazine was being published regularly, that accounts were being paid regularly, and that the devotional life in the temples was healthy.

"Our business is how to expand," said Prabhupāda, "—how to introduce Kṛṣṇa consciousness into educational circles. Let any philosopher, scientist, or educationist come—we have got enough stock. But this sleeping, this leisurely work will not do. They can learn activity from an old man like me, because my determination is like this: If I die working, it is a great credit. Just like a marshal, if he dies on the battlefield, it is his credit. Arjuna was told, "Even if you die, you are still the gainer."

"This slow process of printing is the most condemned position. Why should I go on translating when you cannot print? You say, "Retire and translate.' But why should I translate? No one will ever see it! I can give you volumes. There is Dai Nippon, who will print in Japan on credit, so why don't you print? Always, "It is to be done. It is to be done.' That's all. And big men complaining, "Either he goes or I go.'

"This restlessness, this diversion has to stop. When the father is providing, it is the duty of the son to serve. I am the father. I am giving you everything. Why don't you serve me by printing these books? If one book only is read and understood, that is sufficient to make him Kṛṣṇa conscious. Don't you see how important it is?

"They are always asking me, "Is such-and-such book bona fide?' They can't even take the time to read one of my books, and still they ask for one of my Godbrothers' books. How will things go on?

First Canto of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam is not even edited or corrected, what to speak of printed. So many books unprinted. So tell them: From the book fund not a farthing should be for eating."

One day Advaita, the manager of ISKCON Press, called from New York with some good news: in a week they would be sending Dai Nippon the negatives for five big books. ISKCON Press had also sent a shipment of the German Īsopaniṣad to Europe. And other foreign-language books were forthcoming. Prabhupāda was pleased, and Śyāmasundara informed his G.B.C. Godbrothers.

Needless to say, this was just the medicine required to treat Prabhupāda's slackening faith in us. Things are looking up, but still Prabhupāda encourages us all to write up these reports and get a clear all-around picture of the total book situation.

Although Prabhupāda's health was still weak, he felt heartened to hear that his books were being printed, and he continued with his translation and commentary of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam.

Raṇacora: One night I was up very late, one o'clock in the morning. As I came in I saw that Prabhupāda's lights were on in his front room, and I could hear his voice speaking into the dictating machine. I came up the stairs, being as quiet as I possibly could so Prabhupāda wouldn't know that I was up so late. But as I passed his door I couldn't resist the temptation to just stop and listen for a while. I tried looking through the keyhole, but I couldn't see anything. So I just listened to Prabhupāda's voice as he was dictating Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam.

Then all of a sudden he stopped. I supposed he was just thinking about what he was going to say next. But then I got the feeling that he knew I was out there, listening through the door. I became frightened and went up the stairs as quietly as I could, although the stairs creaked. Everyone was asleep—not only the temple, but practically the whole city of London—at one o'clock in the morning. But Prabhupāda was awake and translating. He had been speaking quietly, but with a voice of great strength and determination. All during the day he was under pressure to organize things and see people, and yet at night, the one time when he could have some peace and quiet, he was up dictating.

In London Prabhupāda began a book on the Western philosophers, beginning with Socrates. Every morning Śyāmasundara would present a synopsis of a major philosophy to Prabhupāda, and for several hours Prabhupāda would discuss the philosopher's major points from the light of Kṛṣṇa consciousness. Daily Śyāmasundara was busy transcribing the morning discussions and preparing the next philosopher.

On August 14 Śrīla Prabhupāda observed Janmāṣṭamī, the birthday of Lord Kṛṣṇa. On the next day, Prabhupāda's own seventy-fifth birthday, a paperback book of collected homages by his disciples arrived. Many of the Vyāsa-pūjā homages praised Śrīla Prabhupāda for his extensive traveling to deliver fallen souls all over the world and for the vast scope of his merciful preaching.

This year you have been traveling to India personally speaking and managing ISKCON and showing us the meaning of ācārya by example. And now you are traveling and inspiring the devotees and centers in the U.S. and Europe.

At Vyās Pūjā time we, your intimate children, are gathered at your feet to tell you our feelings as best we can. By your blessing, we can go forth from this Vyās Pūjā gathering of 1971 and, all devotees together as one great ISKCON, without faction, truly perform the work with our thoughts, words, and deeds. Let us go and distribute this literature of Śrīla Prabhupāda's—Kṛṣṇa's message—kindly delivered to the Western countries. Let us cooperate without ill feelings among ourselves. Let us very strictly observe all the regulative principles and stay as pure representatives. Let us celebrate pure saṅkīrtana and magazine distribution to please you. All glories to Śrīla Prabhupāda!

All your disciples pray that you will remain in our presence for many years to come, and by our cooperation you will be able to spend time writing volumes of Bhāgavatam while we carry on the program and mission of your Guru Mahārāja.

I was sick for four or five days; now I am a little better but the disease is prolonging in a different way. I cannot sleep at night more than 2 hours and during the day sometimes I am feeling some dizziness. Otherwise everything is all right. I am chanting Hare Krishna as usual and writing my books regularly.

Śyāmasundara: Aravinda and I were sleeping right outside of Prabhupāda's room. I was on a lower bunk bed, and I heard “Śyāmasundara.” It was a really urgent sound, and I woke up so hard that I hit my head on the bunk above. I ran into Prabhupāda's room. As I was opening the door, he collapsed in the doorway. I caught him. He felt so light, like a little doll, and his face was gray. I took him over to his bed and thought, “Oh, my God, what's going on?”

He was shivering. I turned the electric heater way up and put it next to his bed. I covered him with a lot of blankets and waited. He was just still. His eyes were closed.

Finally he said, “Śyāmasundara, go get me some black pepper.” He described how to make a black pepper paste. “Rub it on my forehead,” he said. So I ran down to the kitchen and prepared it and came up and put it on his head. I asked him, “Are you... what's wrong?” I don't believe he made a response. He closed his eyes and appeared to be asleep.

I slept there by him on the floor for a while. At some point in the night, he said, “You may go back to your room. I'll be all right.” He stayed in bed until about eight or nine o'clock the next morning. And then he was just completely well, like nothing had happened. His spirit was so strong that although he had encountered devastating blows to his body, he had come right out of it. I could tell it wasn't a physical event. He had made a full recovery from what must have been something close to death.

One day while meeting with an Indian man, a Mr. R. B. Pandya from Mombassa, East Africa, Prabhupāda mentioned his illness. Mr. Pandya said he owned a house on the ocean at Mombassa, where it was always sunny and warm, with pleasant sea breezes—a perfect place for Prabhupāda to recover his health. Mr. Pandya invited Prabhupāda to go and live there as long as he liked. Taking the offer seriously, Prabhupāda began to think of going to Africa—not only for health, but for preaching. Three months ago he had sent Brahmānanda Swami and Jagannivāsa to East Africa, so a visit there would encourage them as well as enable Prabhupāda to work personally at expanding the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement on the African continent. Prabhupāda sent Bhavānanda and Nara-Nārāyaṇa from London to Mombassa to see if it would really be possible for him to stay there as Mr. Pandya had suggested.

When Bhavānanda and Nara-Nārāyaṇa arrived, Brahmānanda Swami, who had been struggling in East Africa with only one assistant, was delighted to see them and to hear that Prabhupāda was coming soon. Previously, Brahmānanda Swami had been preaching in Florida, and Prabhupāda had written him to go to Pakistan. Immediately he had gone, along with one assistant, Jagannivāsa, flying to Paris and then taking the Orient Express through Eastern Europe. On hearing that war fever was building in Pakistan, Prabhupāda had sent a second letter to Brahmānanda Swami in Florida, advising him not to go to Pakistan. But Brahmānanda Swami had never received the letter. Enroute to Pakistan, while holding public kīrtana in Turkey, Brahmānanda and Jagannivāsa had been arrested and detained for several days on suspicion of being Christian missionaries.

Finally, Brahmānanda and Jagannivāsa had arrived in Pakistan, where students had spit at them, accused them of being spies, threatened them, and called them names. Several times people on the street had rubbed the Vaiṣṇava tilaka off the devotees' foreheads and warned them not to show themselves in public or they would be stabbed. Local Hindus had warned the devotees to leave as soon as possible, and so they had reluctantly decided to go to Bombay to see Prabhupāda.

Meanwhile, in Bombay Prabhupāda had read in an Indian newspaper that Pakistani soldiers in Dacca had killed four Hare Kṛṣṇa missionaries. "I am very much anxious to know about Brahmānanda," Prabhupāda had written. "The day has been full of anxiety with this bad news, and still it is going on."

When Śrīla Prabhupāda had heard that Brahmānanda Swami had actually arrived in Bombay, he had asked to see him at once. Like a father recovering his lost child, Prabhupāda had embraced him. "You risked your life just on my order," Prabhupāda had said. After some days Prabhupāda had told Brahmānanda Swami, "You should go to Africa. If you go, then we will be on all the continents."

Now, after preaching in Africa, Brahmānanda Swami eagerly awaited the visit of his beloved spiritual master.

Nairobi

September 9, 1971

As Śrīla Prabhupāda disembarked in Nairobi from the East African Airlines 747 jet, he wore a wool cādar over his shoulders and carried the same white vinyl attache case he had taken with him all over the world. Flanked by his secretary and servant, he walked with his cane across the airfield toward the terminal building. Inside, he sat on a cloth-covered chair and joined in the kīrtana, while Indians and Africans gathered around to watch.

Kul Bhusana, a journalist and friend of Brahmānanda Swami's, approached Prabhupāda with questions. He asked Prabhupāda what he had come to teach, and Prabhupāda answered, "Modern civilized man has forgotten his relationship with Kṛṣṇa, or God, and is therefore suffering. Whether you are Hindu, Muslim, or Buddhist, that doesn't matter. Unless you reestablish your relationship with God, you cannot be happy."

"Have you come only for Hindus?" asked Mr. Bhusana.

"No," Prabhupāda replied, "for everyone."

Mr. Bhusana: "East Africa, especially Kenya, is one of those countries which enjoys a great amount of racial harmony in brotherhood of man. What is your special message you can bring to Kenya?"

Śrīla Prabhupāda: "That brotherhood of man can be complete when they are in God consciousness. Otherwise, it will again break."

Mr. Bhusana: "So your disciples will be making special efforts to reach the Africans rather than confine themselves to the Hindus? That is very important here in this country."

Śrīla Prabhupāda: "Our method is the same. But the method is so powerful that it appeals to everyone. We do not have to convey a new method for a new place. The method is the same—universal. It will appeal to everyone."

After spending one night in Nairobi, Prabhupāda and his party flew the next day in a small propeller aircraft to Mombassa. Mr. Pandya was away, and his family, although not very enthusiastic, opened their home to Śrīla Prabhupāda. The large house was of contemporary design, with rounded corners, porthole windows, and a spacious living room with a veranda facing the ocean.

Prabhupāda, standing by the window in his room, beheld an aquamarine sea, a cloudless blue sky, and a white sandy beach fringed with palms. Turning back toward Brahmānanda Swami and the others, he said, "Brahmānanda told me that this was one of the most beautiful places in the world. Now I see he is correct."

Prabhupāda had come with a chronic cough, but walking on the beach and relaxing in the Mombassa sunshine, he soon recovered his health. Prabhupāda maintained his program begun in London of daily dialogues with Śyāmasundara concerning the Western philosophers. Chronologically he had proceeded from Socrates to Descartes.

Śyāmasundara: "He is saying, 'I think, therefore I am.' First of all, he has discovered that 'I am.' This was his innate basis for truth. In his time there was no real authority."

Prabhupāda: “But this is not big knowledge. Long, long ago there were many who could understand ‘I am.’ This is called ātmānam manyate jagat: a fool thinks all others are fools. He is not the first man to realize the identification of the self. Kṛṣṇa says aham. Aham evāsam evāgre: ‘I existed in the beginning, and when everything is finished, I shall continue to exist.’ This we also say. ‘I existed before this body was created, and I shall exist when the body is annihilated.’ This conception of I is there in God; it is in me. Then where is the new thing?

As soon as he felt better, he was ready to preach. Mombassa, he said, was a small place, and Nairobi, the capital, would be better for preaching. So he returned to Nairobi.

September 18, 1971

In Nairobi Śrīla Prabhupāda demonstrated how a sannyāsī should preach. For one month he strictly followed Vedic tradition by staying only three days or less in the home of each of his Indian hosts. Then, although his hosts always provided him good food and comfortable accommodations, he would move on to the next place. This was the rule for sannyāsīs, Prabhupāda said; it kept them from becoming attached to bodily comforts and from inconveniencing their hosts.

For Śrīla Prabhupāda to practice these rudimentary lessons of sannyāsa was, of course, unnecessary, for he was a paramahansa, a sannyāsī in the highest order of Kṛṣṇa consciousness. His body, mind, and words being totally engaged in Kṛṣṇa's transcendental service, he was automatically detached from material comforts. Nevertheless, he followed the Vedic system, just to instruct his disciples by his example. He was following the system of madhukarī—named for the bee, which takes only a little pollen from a flower and then goes on to the next. This system of brief visits also enabled Prabhupāda to involve more families in Kṛṣṇa consciousness and to honor the abundance of invitations.

Wherever Prabhupāda went, he was undisputably the guru, the venerable sādhu. Yet he would deal intimately with his hosts, developing friendships and behaving practically like an elder member of the family. His hosts would offer him the best room in their home, usually their own bedroom, and the lady of the house, along with her assistants, would cook elaborate meals. Prabhupāda's natural Kṛṣṇa conscious bearing was commanding, and his behavior was always aristocratic; yet his hosts were charmed by his humility. Quickly he was becoming the friend and Vaiṣṇava guru of many families in Nairobi.

Prabhupāda's behavior in Nairobi was instructive for the few Western disciples who accompanied him. On one occasion a Mr. Devaji Dhamji invited Prabhupāda to bless the temple room in his home. Prabhupāda entered, and Mr. Dhamji offered him a deerskin to sit on. “We do not sit on deerskin,” Prabhupāda said. “It is pure, but our Vaiṣṇavas don't wear them or sit on them. That is for the yogīs.”

Bhavananda: Mr. Dhamji invited Prabhupāda to sit on a sofa, which had been covered by a clean white cloth. Prabhupāda sat down, and they bathed his feet. This was the first time I ever saw anyone bathe Prabhupāda's feet. They bathed his feet with milk and then with water and rose petals. Then they put candana on his feet, then red kuṅkuma powder, rice powder, and jasmine flowers. His toes were red from kuṅkuma, and grains of rice and little white jasmine flowers just stayed on his feet. And then he gave a talk. I had never noticed the guru's feet up until that time. That was the first time I realized that the feet of the guru are special. And they are astoundingly beautiful.

Prabhupāda wasn't satisfied preaching only to the Indians. He wanted to preach to the Africans. Indians and Africans were completely segregated. But since a Kṛṣṇa conscious person does not make distinctions based on the body, Prabhupāda said the Indians had a duty to share their spiritual culture with the Africans.

Prabhupāda impressed on Brahmānanda Swami that his first duty in Africa was to give Kṛṣṇa consciousness to the Africans. Because of bad experience in Turkey and Pakistan, Brahmānanda Swami had been reluctant to hold public kīrtanas in Nairobi. Besides, the Africans spoke mostly Swahili; they were culturally different and usually too poor to buy books, so Brahmānanda Swami didn't know how to preach to them effectively. Going to the Indians had been easy and natural.

But Prabhupāda wanted the Africans. "It is an African country," he said simply. "They are the proprietors. We should be preaching to them."

As with everything else in Kṛṣṇa consciousness, Prabhupāda demonstrated how to do this also. He got the use of a Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa temple in a predominantly African downtown area. The temple had a hall with doors opening onto the busy street, and Prabhupāda instructed the devotees to hold kīrtana in the hall, keeping the doors open. The devotees did as he asked, and in five minutes the hall began filling up with people. It was a shabby area of town, and the people who entered were illiterate and dirty. But they were curious, and they happily joined in the kīrtana, smiling, clapping, and dancing.

Brahmānanda Swami left the hall and went to the nearby house where Prabhupāda was staying. "The place is filled with people," Brahmānanda Swami said, "but it's not necessary for you to come. We can carry on and do the program ourselves."

"No," Prabhupāda said, "I must go."

Brahmānanda Swami tried to discourage him.

"No, I must go," Prabhupāda repeated. "Are you going to take me?"

When Brahmānanda Swami arrived with Śrīla Prabhupāda, the hall was even more crowded than it had been a few minutes before. Prabhupāda, in his silken saffron robes, appeared effulgent as he entered the dingy, poorly lit auditorium. As he walked the crowd parted, leaving an aisle for him to pass among them, and they watched him curiously. Onstage Prabhupāda led a kīrtana and lectured. Although the Swahili-speaking audience was unable to understand Prabhupāda's lecture, the people were respectful. And the kīrtana they loved.

Members of the Indian community had been apprehensive of Prabhupāda's opening their hall to the Africans, and some of them had attended to see what would happen. Observing Prabhupāda's compassionate program, however, the Indians were impressed. Such an apparently simple program had the spiritual potency to erase cultural boundaries.

This should be Brahmānanda Swami's mission in Africa, Prabhupāda insisted—offering Kṛṣṇa consciousness to the Africans. And the program should be simple: distributing prasādam, distributing free books, and chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa with drums and karatālas. Kṛṣṇa consciousness should not be just another Nairobi Hindu religious society. The Hindus should take part by donating money, but Brahmānanda Swami's preaching and recruiting should be among the Africans.

When several black American disciples joined Prabhupāda in Nairobi, Prabhupāda told them, “Four hundred years ago your ancestors were taken away from here as slaves. But ah, just see how you have returned as masters!”

Prabhupāda also organized Nairobi's first outdoor kīrtana performance. The devotees went to Kamakunji Park's largest tree, a historical landmark connected with Kenyan independence. As they stood chanting beneath the tree, a large crowd gathered, and many began chanting. Some even danced in a sort of tribal shuffle. One young man stepped forward and offered to translate Brahmānanda Swami's speech into Swahili. The devotees distributed sweet bundi, and the people in the crowd really enjoyed themselves. The whole affair was a great success.

Rushing back to Prabhupāda, Brahmānanda Swami reported on the wonderful kīrtana in the park. Brahmānanda felt the same emotion as in 1966 when he had reported to Prabhupāda the success of the first kīrtana at Washington Square Park in New York City. Now, as then, Brahmānanda Swami had followed Prabhupāda's instructions, and the results had been successful. Prabhupāda, by his personal example and by his pushing Brahmānanda Swami, had within a few days changed the emphasis of preaching in Africa—from Indians to Africans.

The night of Śrīla Prabhupāda's lecture at the University of Nairobi, two thousand African students filled the auditorium, with hundreds more standing outside to look in through the doors and windows. First Prabhupāda had Bhūta-bhāvana, a black American disciple, deliver a short introduction, using some borrowed Swahili phrases. “Harambay,” he began—which means “Welcome, brothers. Let us work together.” Then Prabhupāda spoke.

“The whole world is simply hankering and lamenting. You African people are now hankering to be like the Europeans and Americans. But the Europeans have lost their empire. They are now lamenting. So one party is hankering, and one party is lamenting...

“We have come to these African countries to invite all intelligent Africans to come and understand this philosophy and distribute it. You are trying to develop yourselves, so develop very soundly. But don't imitate the Americans and Europeans, who are living like cats and dogs. Such civilization will not stand. The atom bomb is already there. As soon as the next war breaks out, all the skyscraper buildings and everything else will be finished. Try to understand from the real standpoint, the real view of human life. That is the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement, and we request you to come and try to understand this philosophy. Thank you very much."

The audience burst into applause, giving Prabhupāda a standing ovation. This response proved once again that Kṛṣṇa's message spoke to the heart; it was for all people, regardless of their political, geographic, or social predicament. When Prabhupāda had first landed at the Nairobi airport, he had assured the reporter that he would be preaching to the Africans. And now he was. He was delivering to the Africans the same message and the same process of devotional service he had delivered to the Americans. What the Americans wanted and what the Africans wanted could be realized only in Kṛṣṇa consciousness. Kṛṣṇa consciousness would work anywhere, if sincere and intelligent persons would only come forward and help distribute it.

Prabhupāda continued with outside speaking engagements. While appearing on the popular TV show Mambo Leo, Prabhupāda displayed a painting of Lord Caitanya dancing and chanting with His devotees. The interviewer asked Prabhupāda why only Caucasians appeared to be in the picture. "Well, there are many colors in India," Prabhupāda replied.

"And who is the central figure here?" the interviewer asked.

"This is Śrī Caitanya Mahāprabhu," Prabhupāda replied. "He is God."

"He cannot be God!" the large, burly interviewer retorted. "What do you mean He is God? This is a human being."

But Prabhupāda became even more aggressive than the interviewer. "Why do you say He cannot come as a human being? Why God cannot come as a human being?"

In another of his many Nairobi lectures, Prabhupāda stressed that peace was possible only on the spiritual platform. Kṛṣṇa consciousness alone would unite the present factions.

"For instance, in Africa the Indians may be satisfied with their own methods, but the Africans are not satisfied. So if one is dissatisfied in material life, then another is satisfied—and there will be disturbance. But if you come to the Kṛṣṇa conscious platform, if you engage yourself in the transcendental loving service of the Supreme Personality of God head, then your mind and soul will be fully satisfied."

Prabhupāda went on to explain his plans for helping Africans.

"We have come to Africa to educate the people—not only Indians or the Hindus, but also the native people, the local population. I am glad that our people are going to sankīrtana party in the streets, as we go everywhere—in London, in New York, and all the big cities of the world. We are trying to lead our sankīrtana parties through the streets, and the local African boys and girls and gentlemen are gathering. They are receiving this movement.

"So there is every possibility of spreading Kṛṣṇa consciousness everywhere. This movement has come here, so I request that those who are present try to cooperate with the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement. And I am sure that the African boys and girls will take part in it, as you have experienced. We have a great many African boys and girls as our students in America, so there is no difficulty.

"It is not that because one is very busy, therefore he cannot serve God. Or that because one is poor, or black, or white, that he cannot serve God. No. Anyone who takes to the process of pure devotional service will never be checked."

Prabhupāda also asked his audience to help the devotees establish a center in Nairobi.

"We must have a place to stay. Unless we stay, how can we prosecute the movement? Therefore, help us immediately. Give us a place and see how things improve. You have already tested this movement and found that it has been successful all over the world. Why not in Africa? We are not a sectarian group. We don't consider whether one is African or American."

In Nairobi Prabhupāda heard of a new law in Tanzania that after ten years all private property would automatically become the property of the state and that the owner would be entitled to only a ten-percent reimbursement. This was a typical Kali-yuga law, Prabhupāda remarked. The state passes a law with no reasoning and no benefit for the people. The state should protect the people, Prabhupāda said. In Vedic history, during the misrule of the demoniac king Vena, the sages and brāhmaṇas had become very disturbed and had punished him; the sādhus' duty was to make sure the kings ruled justly. But today, nowhere in the world were political affairs in order. There was no sane philosophy to guide society.

"We must begin to interfere," Prabhupāda urged his disciples. "Now we are five hundred men, and we each have fifty years. So think of what we can do. But you must become dedicated as I am. Sometimes a Vaiṣṇava is criticized as doing nothing. But Arjuna and Hanuman were Vaiṣṇava warriors. When the high-court judges wear tilaka, then we are successful—my Guru Mahārāja said that. My Godbrothers were for getting temples, some rice, eating a little, chanting. But for us—first we work, then samādhi."

The word samādhi technically refers to a state of trance, in which one is completely absorbed in Kṛṣṇa and forgets the material world and all material desires. Generally, samādhi is thought of in terms of secluded meditation; a highly advanced yogī goes to a solitary, peaceful place and meditates or chants constantly. But Prabhupāda demonstrated by his life's example that the world situation was too urgent for a devotee to retire and meditate. Rather, a devotee should labor hard to increase the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement. This would benefit both the devotee and the masses. Prabhupāda's disciples, therefore, as servants of their spiritual master, should work now; and later, perhaps in old age and spiritual maturity, they could retire to a holy place to constantly chant and hear about Kṛṣṇa.

Prabhupāda emphasized work. Yet what was that work? At least for Śrīla Prabhupāda, propagating Kṛṣṇa consciousness was samādhi itself. Samādhi didn't have to be limited to sitting in a solitary place. The full meaning of samādhi implied complete absorption in the loving service of Kṛṣṇa, with the senses, mind, and intelligence fixed in trance. Thus in samādhi one could be active—traveling, preaching, distributing Back to Godhead magazines, chanting in the streets. If a devotee always thought of Kṛṣṇa and worked on behalf of Kṛṣṇa, then he was the topmost yogī. This had also been Lord Kṛṣṇa's advice to Arjuna: "Remember Me, and at the same time fight." Śrīla Prabhupāda was the emblem of active samādhi—always hearing about, glorifying, and remembering Kṛṣṇa, and always fighting as a soldier on behalf of Lord Caitanya.

Prabhupāda's preaching in Nairobi had been especially active. He had established Kṛṣṇa consciousness in a new city, setting the example for Brahmānanda Swami to emulate, showing the standard for spreading Kṛṣṇa consciousness throughout the continent. And Śyāmasundara was keeping his G.B.C. Godbrothers informed of Prabhupāda's amazing activities.

The pace has been lightning fast, and His Divine Grace is opening up yet another vast theater of operations. The people are thronging with curiosity and serious questions...

Prabhupāda, after finishing one late-night preaching marathon, asked for food and remarked, "You see, I am hungry. Keep me talking—that is my life. Don't let me stop talking..."

But Nairobi was only one city in one country on one continent, and Prabhupāda's desire was to see Kṛṣṇa consciousness in every city, town, and village in the world. How could he do it in one lifetime—traveling to every city in the world, printing and distributing books in every language, constructing fabulous temples? He couldn't. But he wanted to do as much as possible in whatever time Kṛṣṇa allotted to him, to insure that the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement would survive. He criticized the politicians' typical attitude that unless they themselves remained active everything they had worked for would crumble. Such politicians were always reluctant to retire, preferring to remain in office until their last breath. Prabhupāda, however, had no personal ambition, and he knew that results were awarded by Kṛṣṇa. As a true sannyāsī, he had renounced the world and worldly ambition. But he had not become lazy.

He was executing his mission at an advanced age, and Lord Kṛṣṇa was rewarding his attempts. Prabhupāda, therefore, in a mood of reciprocating with Kṛṣṇa, kept working to expand the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement. Knowing that Lord Kṛṣṇa wanted the world flooded with love of God, Śrīla Prabhupāda had earnestly tried to do it, beginning in a storefront in New York City. And Kṛṣṇa had responded, sending him a few men and enough money to pay the rent. Then Śrīla Prabhupāda had attempted to do more, and again Kṛṣṇa had responded. Thus a second ISKCON center and a third and a fourth and more had sprung up, and book printing had begun. Śrīla Prabhupāda, in his mood of loving reciprocation with Kṛṣṇa, just kept attempting more and more.

Now it was no longer simply one person's work; Śrīla Prabhupāda was entrusting the work to his disciples. And those disciples, if they were actually to help, would have to adopt Prabhupāda's selfless dedication.

As they tried to follow him in his expansive plans, however, their minds faltered. For a handful of devotees to maintain even one temple in one city was a big job, yet Prabhupāda was doing this a hundred times over. He wanted the movement he had started to continue for thousands of years, and he was confident that as long as his followers remained pure, working within the guidelines he had given, they would be successful.

Although the present age of Kali was the worst of all ages, in which people had little or no interest in spiritual life, Prabhupāda had faith in the past ācāryas' predictions that Kṛṣṇa consciousness was destined to enter a golden age of worldwide influence. True, it was the worst of times; yet by the influence of the holy name of Kṛṣṇa it would become the best of times. The chanting of the holy name was the religion of the age; the people of Kali-yuga could find deliverance simply in chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa.

Śrīla Prabhupāda's activities show he was empowered by Kṛṣṇa. This is evident from his childhood, when at the age of five he held a Ratha-yātrā festival, and it is certainly evident from these years, 1968 to 1971, when he actively expanded his Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement. Prabhupāda compared ISKCON to the Varāha incarnation of Kṛṣṇa, who at first had been no bigger than a thumb but had quickly expanded to half the size of the universe.

ISKCON's rapid growth was not simply due to rapid communications and modern travel, nor to its founder-ācārya's material organizational abilities. Prabhupāda, judged materially, was not a likely person to conduct a worldwide movement, to travel vigorously, to write volumes of books, and to train thousands of disciples on every continent. He was satisfied with a simple, regulated life, and he disdained all such cultural items as music, fashion, sports, politics, art, food—anything not related to Kṛṣṇa. He worked and traveled out of an intense desire to benefit the world with real culture, to implant spiritual culture in what to him was the desert of a materialistic society.

Therefore, accepting that Prabhupāda was not materialistically ambitious, we can understand his proclivity for worldwide propaganda and dissemination of a spiritual movement as entirely transcendental. He was acting solely to carry out the desires of Lord Kṛṣṇa, the Supreme Personality of Godhead.

Śrīla Prabhupāda saw himself as a servant of his spiritual master, Śrīla Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī, whose message he was carrying. That message, which was also the message of Lord Kṛṣṇa, had come down through disciplic succession: "We are all spiritual souls, eternal servants of the Supreme Personality of Godhead, Kṛṣṇa. We have now fallen into forgetfulness and are suffering birth after birth in this material world. By chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa, we can revive our lost relationship with God."

With Prabhupāda's first success in America, a few of his Godbrothers in India had minimized his work. Bhaktivedānta Swami, they had said, happened to have a temperament suited to mixing with lower-class Western youth. The fact, however, as Prabhupāda's own experience testified, was that the young people among whom he preached were not particularly receptive, nor had he arrived timely and welcomed, simply to discourse on Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam to throngs of submissive disciples. He had been successful because of his great patience, tolerance, and compassion.

It was not, therefore, the advent of the jet plane (although Prabhupāda gladly took advantage of it), nor was it happenstance, nor luck, nor even a social or historical phenomenon that enabled Śrīla Prabhupāda to spread Vedic culture from East to West and back again. No. It was the will of Kṛṣṇa and the sincerity of His servant.

Caitanya-caritāmṛta states that unless one is possessed of kṛṣṇa-śakti, special power from God, one cannot propagate the chanting of the holy name.

kali-kālera dharma—kṛṣṇa-nāma saṅkīrtana

kṛṣṇa-śakti vinā nahe tāra pravartana

“The fundamental religious system in the age of Kali is the chanting of the holy name of Kṛṣṇa. Unless empowered by Kṛṣṇa, one cannot propagate the saṅkīrtana movement.” (Cc. Antya. 7.11) This verse describing Lord Caitanya Mahāprabhu also describes Lord Caitanya's servant, Śrīla Prabhupāda. Had Śrīla Prabhupāda not been empowered by Kṛṣṇa, he could not have inspired so many people to accept the chanting of Hare Kṛṣṇa.

According to Vedic literature, when a person has extraordinary spiritual endowment, kṛṣṇa-śakti, he is known as a śaktyāveśa-avatāra. Although the word avatāra generally refers to incarnations of God Himself, the term śaktyāveśa-avatāra refers to an individual empowered by God to enact the mission of God in this world.

Śaktyāveśa-avatāras and their particular functions are mentioned in the Vedic literature. For example, the emperor Pṛthu possessed the śakti for God conscious administration; the four Kumāras possessed the śakti of transcendental knowledge; and Nārada Muni possessed the śakti of devotional service. Lord Buddha, whose name and activities are described in Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, is also a śaktyāveśa-avatāra, and even other divinely empowered personalities outside the Vedic culture, such as Jesus Christ and Muhammad, are accepted by Vaiṣṇava ācāryas as śaktyāveśa-avatāras.

Śrīla Prabhupāda's activities during the years 1968 through 1971 establish him as a śaktyāveśa-avatāra, and he fulfills the predictions of the scriptures.

pr̥thivīte āche yata nagarādi grāma

sarvatra pracāra haibe mora nāma

“In all the villages and towns all over the world, everywhere, the saṅkīrtana movement of Lord Caitanya will be preached.”

Even from the viewpoint of religious history, Prabhupāda's preaching was a fulfillment of the mission of Lord Caitanya, who had appeared in West Bengal about five hundred years before Kṛṣṇa consciousness came West. The Vedic literature and the Vaiṣṇava ācāryas concur that Lord Caitanya is the original Supreme Personality of Godhead, Kṛṣṇa Himself, appearing in this age as a pure devotee of the Lord. And just as Lord Kṛṣṇa appeared with His plenary expansion Lord Balarāma, Lord Caitanya appeared with Lord Balarāma's incarnation for Kali-yuga, Lord Nityānanda.

Śrīla Prabhupāda can be appreciated not only generally, as the empowered representative of God, but specifically, as the manifestation of Lord Nityānanda. According to Gauḍīya Vaiṣṇava philosophy, Lord Kṛṣṇa manifests Himself to the souls of ordinary men through Lord Nityānanda.

The individual soul requires the help of God to realize God. This help comes by the causeless mercy of Lord Nityānanda, who is therefore known as the original guru. Although Lord Nityānanda is the direct expansion of Lord Caitanya, His pastime is to serve Lord Caitanya by redeeming the fallen souls.

Lord Nityānanda and His representative, the spiritual master, do not alter the scriptures or the teachings of Lord Kṛṣṇa but make them more accessible and understandable. Lord Caitanya commissioned Lord Nityānanda to preach the holy name at everyone's door, and Lord Nityānanda's exemplary mood of vigorous, compassionate preaching was also the mood of Śrīla Prabhupāda. As Śrīla Prabhupāda imparted this mood to his disciples, they in turn went out into the streets of cities around the world to distribute to everyone the mercy of the holy name of God.

Lord Nityānanda is especially renowned for saving two drunkard brothers, Jagāi and Mādhāi, even though they had assaulted Him when He had attempted to bless them with the holy name. In Lord Nityānanda's time, Prabhupāda on several occasions explained, there were only one Jagāi and Mādhāi, but now the whole world is filled with Jagāis and Mādhāis. And Prabhupāda was recruiting his disciples from these Jagāis and Mādhāis. Śrīla Prabhupāda fully displayed Lord Nityānanda's compassion in taking all risks and freely giving the holy name.

Even Lord Nityānanda Himself, during His appearance in India, did not approach as many fallen souls as Śrīla Prabhupāda, nor did He approach souls in such degraded conditions of life or in so many rejected parts of the world. But He has done so now, through His representative Śrīla Prabhupāda. As the recipient of the combined mercy of Gaura-Nitāi (Lord Caitanya and Lord Nityānanda), Śrīla Prabhupāda blessed the world with love of God.

Śrīla Prabhupāda, however, never described himself as a great empowered personality, either in public or among his disciples. But he stressed that he was in disciplic succession, carrying the authorized knowledge. And he encouraged his disciples to take the same position: "We want to create many pure devotees, so that other people will benefit by their association. In this way, the number of pure devotees increases."

Prabhupāda knew well that propagating Kṛṣṇa consciousness was not a professional business. Although in India many professionals spoke or wrote on Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam to earn their livelihood, they could not convert materialistic people to devotional service. Only a pure devotee could change the materialistic heart.

Prabhupāda did not even conclude that he was a pure devotee, only that he was the servant of a pure devotee, Śrīla Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī, his Guru Mahārāja.

Prabhupāda prayed that before he left the world he could create a living family of pure devotees to spread the paramparā teachings of Kṛṣṇa consciousness and protect them from being changed or obscured. He emphasized that all the preachers of the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement could become pure devotees by following the regulative principles, avoiding sinful life, and regularly chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa. Only in this way, he said, could the devotees have an effect on others.

October 18, 1971

Having spent a busy five weeks in Africa, Prabhupāda was ready to travel on to India. His plan was to visit Bombay, Calcutta, and Delhi. He had made a strong beginning for ISKCON in India—with land in Māyāpur and centers in Bombay, Calcutta, and New Delhi, and he had groups of disciples strategically located in other parts of India. Indians were recognizing ISKCON and appreciating its festivals, kīrtanas, and prasādam. Life members were offering service and being benefited, they were receiving and reading ISKCON publications, and they were helping support the ISKCON centers.

And this was only a start. To get a foothold—anywhere, whether in India, Africa, America, or Russia—was certainly a great accomplishment. But a foothold was not enough. Although much had been done to establish the mission of Lord Caitanya, much more remained to be done. Preaching Kṛṣṇa consciousness was not a job that at some point would be completed.

Of course in one sense it was already complete and perfect. Prabhupāda's preaching had always been successful, even when he had struggled alone in India to make his message heard through Back to Godhead magazine, the League of Devotees, and his translations of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam. He had always remained fixed in the transcendental order of his spiritual master and Kṛṣṇa; therefore, he had been successful. The Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement was already complete, and now, by the will of its author, Lord Caitanya Mahāprabhu, this completeness was becoming manifest. But the work, the ecstasy, the samādhi of selflessly and single-pointedly serving that mission was unending and ever unfolding. Now there was a foothold in Africa. Tomorrow he would fly to Bombay, where Kṛṣṇa had already allowed him a foothold. And, as Kṛṣṇa desired, he would continue to travel and to send his devotees and his books and his message until he reached every town and village in the world.

SPL 37: The Land Is Yours

CHAPTER THIRTY-SEVEN

The Land Is Yours

= Calcutta

March 1971

It was midnight. Śrīla Prabhupāda sat on a pillow behind his low desk, his light the only one on in the building. All the other devotees were in bed. On the desk before him rested the dictating machine and a volume of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam with Bengali commentary. A small framed picture of his spiritual master, Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī, sat between two small vases of roses and asters. On the floor beyond the desk was the broad mat covered with white cotton fabric, where a few hours before, devotees and guests had sat.

But now he was alone. Although usually he retired at ten, rising three or four hours later to translate, tonight he had not rested, and his Bhāgavatam lay closed, his dictating machine covered.

He had sent two of his disciples, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa and Bali-mardana, to purchase land in Māyāpur. Six days had passed, however, and still they had neither returned nor sent word. He had told them not to return until they had completed the transaction, but six days was more than enough time. He was anxious, thinking constantly of his two disciples.

A breeze arrived, carrying the fragrance of nīm trees through the open window. The night was becoming cool, and Prabhupāda wore a light cādar around his shoulders. Absorbed in thought, leaning against the white bolster pillow, he paid little attention to the familiar sights in his room. A clay jug with drinking water sat beside him, and a potted tulasī plant sat upon a small wooden pedestal. The electricity, off most of the day and night, was now on, and moths and other insects hovered around the bare bulb overhead. A lizard patrolled the ceiling, occasionally darting forward near the light to capture an insect.

Why were Tamāla Kṛṣṇa and Bali-mardana taking so long? It had been more than just a wait of six days; he had been trying to obtain land in Māyāpur for years. And this time the prospects had been excellent. He had clearly instructed Tamāla Kṛṣṇa and Bali-mardana, and by now they should have returned. The delay could mean a complication, or even danger.

The land they were trying for was a nine-bīgha plot on Bhaktisiddhānta Road, less than a mile from the birthsite of Lord Caitanya Mahāprabhu. The Sek brothers, Muslim farmers who owned the plot, had been asking a high price. Only recently had a Calcutta lawyer familiar with Navadvīpa been able to seriously negotiate a fair price. The Sek brothers had settled for 14,500 rupees, and Prabhupāda had authorized withdrawal of the funds from his bank in Krishnanagar. Thus Tamāla Kṛṣṇa and Bali-mardana had left for Māyāpur, while Prabhupāda had remained in Calcutta, carrying on with his affairs but thinking often of the activities of his disciples in Māyāpur. Their mission was very important to him, and he kept them in his mind, personally blessing them with his concern.

Prabhupāda wanted an ISKCON center in Māyāpur; it was a desire that had increased within him as his movement had increased throughout the years. He could easily visit or live in Māyāpur; that was no problem. But he needed a place for his disciples. His spiritual master had ordered him to preach in the West; and now with the success of his Kṛṣṇa consciousness society, the Western Vaiṣṇavas required a center in Māyāpur where they could reside and worship and receive the immense benefit of the holy dhāma. Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī had stressed the great importance of Māyāpur, and some of his sannyāsī disciples had temples there. Why shouldn't the International Society for Krishna Consciousness also be able to take shelter of Māyāpur?

Since birth, Prabhupāda had been aware of the significance of Lord Caitanya and His dhāma, Śrī Māyāpur. He had grown up in Calcutta, where everyone knew of Lord Caitanya, and because his father, Gour Mohan De, had been a pure devotee of Lord Caitanya, from childhood he had sung the Bengali songs of Gaura-Nitāi and Their pastimes in the land of Gauḍa. He had imbibed deeply the teachings and pastimes of Lord Caitanya, especially after meeting his spiritual master in Calcutta in 1922.

Lord Caitanya had spent His first twenty-four years in Māyāpur and Navadvīpa. Yet since His manifest pastimes there almost five hundred years ago, the places of those pastimes had been obscured, the Lord's birthsite lost, and His teachings confused and misused. Despite the disciplic line of pure devotees from Lord Caitanya, not until the advent of Bhaktivinoda Ṭhākura, the father of Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī, did Lord Caitanya's saṅkīrtana movement and pure teachings begin to emerge. Bhaktivinoda Ṭhākura published many books and preached to reestablish the intellectual, moral, and spiritual integrity of Caitanya Vaiṣṇavism. He researched and explored the land of Navadvīpa, ascertaining the exact birthsite of the Lord. Citing Vedic evidence, he established that many previous incarnations of Viṣṇu had enacted pastimes in Navadvīpa.

Not only did Bhaktivinoda Ṭhākura document Navadvīpa's past glory, but he also foresaw its glorious future, when a religion based on the teachings of Lord Caitanya would emerge and spread throughout the world, and when European and American Vaiṣṇavas would throng to Navadvīpa to join their Bengali brothers in chanting "Jaya Śacīnandana!"* The time would come, Bhaktivinoda Ṭhākura wrote, when in the land of Navadvīpa on the plain of the Ganges a magnificent temple would arise, proclaiming to the world the glories of Lord Caitanya.

Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī, carrying out the desires of his father and preceptor, Bhaktivinoda Ṭhākura, had formed the Gaudiya Math for propagating the teachings of Lord Caitanya and the glories of Navadvīpa-dhāma. He had induced a wealthy disciple to spend his fortune for erecting a temple at Lord Caitanya's birthsite in Māyāpur, and he had constructed a kīrtana hall commemorating the place of Lord Caitanya's kīrtanas. He had also constructed his own residence in Māyāpur. He had built temples throughout India—sixty-four in all—but because he wanted the English-speaking world especially to take to Lord Caitanya's movement, he had emphasized as first priority the publishing and distributing of Kṛṣṇa conscious literature.

Śrīla Prabhupāda, sitting in his room in the Calcutta temple, shared the great vision of Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī and Bhaktivinoda Ṭhākura. Yet to enact this great vision he had to take practical steps, and he was content to take them in the most humble way. A devotee should not simply daydream, expecting Kṛṣṇa to accomplish everything with "miracles."

Prabhupāda, however, was not dreaming idly. Working for years alone in India, he had held his plan of going to the West, and Kṛṣṇa had at last fulfilled that desire. In America, in whatever circumstances and with whatever small facility Kṛṣṇa had provided, he had preached. And slowly, step by step, he had met with success, realizing his vision of a worldwide society of devotees. Always he had kept his greater vision in mind, as every step forward had given him deeper satisfaction and had brought him closer to fulfilling his mission.

Prabhupāda sometimes told the story of a poor potter who dreamed of expanding his business and becoming fabulously rich. As the potter slept one night, he dreamed of how much land and how many houses he would have and of how he would have a beautiful wife. When the potter considered that perhaps the wife would quarrel with him, he became angry and said, "If my wife fights with me, I will kick her!" And kicking, he broke the only two pots in his stock and was reduced to nothing.

Whether chanting or writing or reading or preaching, Prabhupāda had been absorbed in his plans for spreading Kṛṣṇa consciousness and fulfilling the dream of the past ācāryas. Now he was anxious to complete the next step, and for this he was waiting up past midnight, meditating on his two disciples and their important mission.

As Prabhupāda sat, rapt in thought, the only sounds were the usual sounds of the night: mice within the walls, a brahmācārī snoring on the veranda, and in the distance the night watchman making his rounds, his stick striking the street. There were no cars, and only an occasional wooden ricksha clattered along the potholed street.

Prabhupāda wondered if perhaps his boys had been robbed. Before sending them off, he had shown Tamāla Kṛṣṇa how to carry money around his waist in a makeshift cloth money belt. But it had been a great deal of money, and robberies were not uncommon around Navadvīpa. Or perhaps there had been some other delay. Sometimes in land negotiations involving large sums of money, the court would require that a clerk record the denomination and serial number of every note exchanged. Or perhaps the train had broken down.

Suddenly Prabhupāda heard footsteps on the stairs. Someone opened the outer door and now walked along the veranda just outside. A soft knock.

"Yes, who is it?" Prabhupāda asked. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa entered and prostrated himself before Śrīla Prabhupāda.

"So," Prabhupāda asked, "what is your news?"

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa looked up triumphantly. "The land is yours!"

Prabhupāda leaned back with a sigh. "All right," he said. "Now you can take rest."

Prabhupāda had asked the Indian high commissioner for the United Kingdom to petition Prime Minister Indira Gandhi to attend ISKCON's upcoming cornerstone-laying ceremony in Māyāpur. Already Prabhupāda had instructed all his G.B.C. secretaries to attend the ceremony, and he had asked the devotees to invite many prominent citizens of Calcutta. Writing to his disciples in India, he said that if they could not get Indira Gandhi to come, they should at least get the governor of Bengal, Sri S. S. Dhavan.

Meanwhile, Prabhupāda was meeting in London with several of his disciples experienced in architecture and design; he wanted them to draft plans for his Māyāpur project. Nara-Nārāyaṇa had built Ratha-yātrā carts and designed temple interiors, Raṇacora had studied architecture, and Bhavānanda had been a professional designer, but Prabhupāda himself conceived the plans for the Māyāpur buildings. He then told his three-man committee to provide sketches and an architect's model; he would immediately begin raising funds and securing support in India for the project. To the devotees who heard Prabhupāda's plans, this seemed the most ambitious ISKCON project ever.

While taking his morning walks in Russell Square, Prabhupāda would point to various buildings and ask how high they were. Finally he announced one morning that the main temple in Māyāpur should be more than three hundred feet high! Māyāpur's monsoon floods and sandy soil would create unique difficulties, he said, and the building would have to be built on a special foundation, a sort of floating raft. A civil engineer later confirmed this.

The first building, Prabhupāda said, should be a large guesthouse, four stories high, and his design, although not strictly conforming to any one school of architecture, resembled most that of Rajasthan. He wanted a pink-and-rust colored building with many arches and a wide marble veranda on each floor except the ground floor. The building should run east-west, so that the sun would pass lengthwise over it and not shine directly into the building's broad front. Southerly breezes would cool the guesthouse in summer. The building should be equipped with electric fans and lights, modern toilets and showers, and the rooms should be furnished, spacious, and well ventilated.

This guesthouse should be built as soon as possible, Prabhupāda said; then other buildings would follow. He wanted residential buildings for five hundred devotees, a large prasādam hall seating several thousand, a kitchen complex, and a gośālā (a shelter for the cows that would pasture in nearby fields). In time ISKCON would acquire adjoining land and develop parks, with flower gardens, trees and shrubs, fountains, walkways, and arbors.

The main building, the colossal Mayapur Chandrodaya Mandir, was to be no less than three hundred feet high and costing perhaps tens of millions of dollars. Prabhupāda's description astounded the architects as well as the devotees; it sounded grander than the United States Capitol or St. Peter's Cathedral. The temple's central dome would house a three-dimensional model of the universe. The design, however, would be based on the Vedic description and would depict not only the material universe but also the spiritual universe.

Entering the main hall, a person would look up and see the planets situated just as Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam describes, beginning with the hellish planets, then the middle planets, wherein the earth is situated, then the heavenly planets of the demigods, and then Brahmaloka, the highest planet in the material world. Above Brahmaloka, the observer would see the abode of Lord Śiva, and above that the spiritual sky, or brahmajyoti. Within the spiritual effulgence of the brahmajyoti would be the self-illuminating Vaikuṇṭha planets, inhabited by eternally liberated souls. And highest of all would be the supreme planet of Kṛṣṇaloka, where God in His original eternal form enjoys His pastimes with His most confidential devotees.

The temple would also house a miniature palace in which the Deities of Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa would reside, surrounded by silks and pillars of silver, gold, and jewels. The Mayapur Chandrodaya Mandir and the Māyāpur city would be ISKCON's world headquarters.

And why such a fabulous architectural wonder as this in such an obscure part of the world? The answer, Prabhupāda explained, was that Māyāpur was actually not obscure; it seemed so only from the mundane perspective. To mundane vision, that which was central seemed remote. The soul and the next life seemed remote, while the body and immediate sense gratification seemed central. By establishing the Temple of Human Understanding in Māyāpur, Śrīla Prabhupāda would be directing the materialistic world's attention back to the true center.

Any sincere visitor would be charmed by the beauty of ISKCON's Māyāpur project and would perceive that here indeed was the spiritual world. And the devotees living in Māyāpur, by remaining constantly immersed in singing Hare Kṛṣṇa kīrtana and discussing the philosophy of Kṛṣṇa consciousness, would be able to convince any intelligent visitor that the teachings of Lord Caitanya Mahāprabhu were the highest truth. The devotees would explain the philosophy of the Absolute Truth, which would enable visitors to comprehend actual spiritual truth beyond sectarian religious dogma. Furthermore, the continuous Hare Kṛṣṇa kīrtana and the blissful devotees engaged in a wide variety of services to Lord Kṛṣṇa would demonstrate that bhakti-yoga was the simplest, most direct process for meditating on the Supreme Personality of Godhead. While staying in ISKCON's Māyāpur city, a person would quickly become a devotee of the Lord and begin chanting and dancing in ecstasy.

Śrīla Prabhupāda was demonstrating how the world could be spiritualized by linking material things with the Supreme Personality of Godhead, Kṛṣṇa, through bhakti-yoga. And why shouldn't such spiritual feats surpass the achievements of the materialists?

Prabhupāda was sorry to learn through the Indian high commissioner that the prime minister could not attend the cornerstone-laying ceremony in Māyāpur. Yet he took it as Kṛṣṇa's desire. He said he would invite a prominent Vaiṣṇava to officiate, or he might do it himself. "On the whole," he wrote, "it was Lord Caitanya's desire that a Vaiṣṇava shall lay down the cornerstone instead of asking some material man or woman to perform the holy work."

The monsoons came, and the Ganges spilled over her banks, flooding the entire ISKCON Māyāpur property. Acyutānanda Swami had built a straw and bamboo hut where Prabhupāda was soon to stay, but the waters rose until Acyutānanda Swami had to live in the bamboo rafters. He wrote Prabhupāda that had it not been for Bhaktisiddhānta Road* the damage would have been extensive. Prabhupāda replied,

Yes, we were saved by Śrīla Bhaktisiddhānta Road. We shall always expect to be saved by His Divine Grace Śrīla Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī Goswami Maharaj Prabhupāda. Always pray to His Lotus Feet. Whatever success we have had in preaching Lord Chaitanya's mission all over the world is only due to His mercy.

New Delhi

November 10, 1971

The car pulled out from the crowd in front of the airport terminal. Prabhupāda, sitting in the back seat, his bamboo cane against his knee, his hand in his bead bag, talked with his Delhi disciples. As the car moved through the broad avenues of New Delhi Prabhupāda removed two knee-length flower garlands from around his neck and placed them beside him on the seat. It was midday, and the November climate was pleasant. Prabhupāda had arrived from Calcutta just in time for the ten-day ISKCON paṇḍāl festival, beginning the next day.

One of the devotees mentioned how fitting it had been that the mayor of New Delhi, Mr. Hans Raj Gupta, had greeted Prabhupāda at the airport. Prabhupāda smiled.

In his speech before Mayor Gupta and a gathering at the airport, Prabhupāda had explained India's duty of performing welfare work for the rest of the world. He had also described how, at age twenty-five, he had met his Guru Mahārāja and had then received the order to carry Lord Caitanya's message to the English-speaking world. Explaining why he had waited until he was seventy before going West, he had remarked, "I was trying to become a successful tool for preaching Lord Caitanya's message." Hundreds of thousands of preachers were needed now, as the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement was spreading throughout the world. "And the black men are also dancing," Prabhupāda had said. "And they are asking the Indian people, 'Why you and the swamis do not give us this sublime method?' "

Delhi was the third Indian city Prabhupāda had visited since his return from Africa a month ago. His first stop, Bombay, had begun roughly. Śyāmasundara had neglected to carry Śrīla Prabhupāda's inoculation card, so immigration officials had denied Prabhupāda entry into India, quarantining him at the Bombay airport hospital for ten days.

Confined to a suite with an adjoining veranda overlooking a garden, Prabhupāda had resigned himself to a more limited sphere of activity. Still, each morning after breakfast he had conducted a dialogue with Śyāmasundara about certain leading Western philosophers: Śyāmasundara would present a particular philosophy, and Prabhupāda would discuss it in light of the Vedic view. Then, with only one day left before the end of the ten-day quarantine period, the inoculation card had arrived, and Prabhupāda had been released.

Immediately he had left for Calcutta and a series of kīrtana and lecture programs at Desh Priya Park. He had stayed in Calcutta two and a half weeks, appreciating the location of the ISKCON temple at Albert Road in the heart of what had once been the sāhab (European) section. "Now I am bringing the sāhabs back to the sāhab quarter," Prabhupāda had said, "but this time they are all coming as Vaiṣṇavas. You should never give up this place."

Some of the Calcutta devotees had complained to Śrīla Prabhupāda that the temple was being mismanaged and that, due to insufficient income, their diet was inadequate. When Prabhupāda had questioned the temple leaders, one devotee had replied, "Śrīla Prabhupāda, I was simply trying to execute your will."

"Is it my will," Prabhupāda had asked, "that all the devotees should be disturbed?"

He had settled the differences, arranged for an improved diet, and had even recommended a democratic election of temple officers. But he had also explained that because Kṛṣṇa consciousness was such an important mission, the devotees should cooperate, even if there were discrepancies. The material world is like an ocean, he had said, and there would always be waves.

During this visit to Calcutta, Prabhupāda had also spoken of his plans for Māyāpur. Nara-Nārāyaṇa had built a scale model of the building ISKCON would construct on the newly acquired property, and Prabhupāda had shown it to all his guests and had asked them to help. Seeing Prabhupāda's absorption in this project, Girirāja had volunteered to help in any way required. "It seems the two things you want most," Girirāja had said, "are for the books to be distributed and to build a temple at Māyāpur."

"Yes," Prabhupāda had said, smiling. "Yes, thank you."

When Prabhupāda arrived at the home of Mr. Ram Niwas Dandaria in New Delhi, a waiting reporter interviewed him.

"I understand," said the reporter, "that by 'Kṛṣṇa' you mean some eternal principle."

"I do not mean a principle," Prabhupāda replied. "I mean a person like you and me." Prabhupāda was explaining Lord Kṛṣṇa as the Supreme Person when suddenly sirens began sounding.

"Blackout! Blackout!" cried the reporter and others in the house. War between Pakistan and India had been imminent for weeks, and air raid drills and warnings were now commonplace in Delhi.

"Sir"—the reporter spoke tensely in the darkened room—"this is the presence of reality. We are being threatened by this fight with Pakistan. The siren is the ugly reality coming for us."

"We are always in the ugly reality," Prabhupāda said, "—twenty-four hours a day. Suppose there is no blackout? Still, if you go in the street, there is no guarantee that you will get home. In this way, you are always in the ugly reality. Why do you say only this blackout? This is just one of the features of this ugly reality. That's all."

Reporter: "Yes, but at the moment..."

Prabhupāda: "You do not realize that you are in ugly reality twenty-four hours a day? Padam padam yad vipadām. There is danger at every step."

Reporter: "I know, sir, but this is collective, national danger. Have you anything to offer us as a remedy?"

Prabhupāda: "Kṛṣṇa consciousness is our only remedy. Take to this process, and you will be happy."

Reporter: "Sir, I think someone should go to the Yahya Khan [the president of Pakistan]."

Prabhupāda: "What benefit will you derive by going to Yahya Khan?"

Reporter: "Someone is out to kill me."

Prabhupāda: "But suppose Yahya Khan does not kill you? Will you be safe? Then what is the use to go to Yahya Khan? You will die today or tomorrow. If you want to save yourself, then go to Kṛṣṇa. That is our proposition. Even if you go to Yahya Khan, and he does not fight, then you mean to say that you will live forever? What is the use of flattering Yahya Khan? Flatter Kṛṣṇa, so that you may be saved perpetually. Why don't you do that?"

Reporter: "I was only thinking in terms of collective security. I can see your point..."

Prabhupāda: "You should know that you are always in danger."

Reporter: "Yes, sir, we agree. The late Einstein said the same thing..."

Prabhupāda: "That is our position, and Kṛṣṇa says, 'I will save you.' Therefore, let us go to Kṛṣṇa. Why go to Yahya Khan?"

Reporter: "Simply because he is disturbing us, that's all."

Prabhupāda: "Your mind is always disturbing you all the time, because it is always with you. Your body is always with you. Are you not suffering from bodily pains? Why don't you go to Yahya Khan to cure your pains? You are always in danger. Why don't you realize that?"

Reporter: "We realize that this is a national disaster."

Prabhupāda: "These are symptoms. People are trying to give a patchwork cure for the disease. We are giving the supreme cure. This is the difference. No patchwork cure will help you. You need a complete cure.

janma karma ca me divyam

evam yo vetti tattvataḥ

tyaktvā dehaṁ punar janma

naiti mām eti so 'rjuna

The cure is no more repetition of birth and death. That is what we want. That is the benefit of Kṛṣṇa consciousness. Yaṁ prāpya na nivartante/ tad dhāma paramaṁ mama. If you go to Kṛṣṇa, then you don't come back again to this material world."

Reporter: "Sir, mine was a very hypothetical question. Suppose a hundred pure, saintly, Kṛṣṇa conscious people are meditating or discussing together, and someone comes along and drops the bomb—"

Prabhupāda: “Those who are Kṛṣṇa conscious are not afraid of bomb. When they see a bomb coming, they think that Kṛṣṇa desired the bomb to come. A Kṛṣṇa conscious person is never afraid of anything. Bhayaṁ dvitīyābhiniveśataḥ syāt. One who has the conception that something can exist outside of Kṛṣṇa is afraid. On the other hand, one who knows that everything is coming from Kṛṣṇa has no reason to be afraid. The bomb is coming—he says, “Ah, Kṛṣṇa is coming.' That is the vision of the devotee. He thinks, “Kṛṣṇa wants to kill me with a bomb. That is all right. I will be killed.' That is Kṛṣṇa consciousness.”

When the reporter asked if the Vaiṣṇava would die without fighting, Prabhupāda said that the Vaiṣṇava would fight, but only under the direction of Kṛṣṇa, and he cited Arjuna and Hanumān as examples. He continued to explain Kṛṣṇa consciousness as the only solution. The blackout ended.

A few of Prabhupāda's disciples had organized the New Delhi paṇḍāl program like the public festivals Prabhupāda had already introduced in India. Tāmāla Kṛṣṇa, Tejās, and Guru dāsa had enlisted the help of important Delhi men, including the mayor and members of New Delhi's Management and Reception Committee. These persons had granted per mission and issued letters of introduction to others, whom the devotees had then approached for donations.

The devotees found everyone they met sympathetic to Śrīla Prabhupāda. They respected him, especially after meeting him. Some disagreed philosophically, yet all were impressed by Prabhupāda's converting Westerners to Hindu dharma and God consciousness, and they had genuine respect for Prabhupāda's worldwide propagation of the teachings of Bhagavad-gītā.

Prabhupāda had great stature among the Indians as a sādhu. Speaking only on the basis of the scriptures, he exhibited full surrender to Lord Kṛṣṇa. He was above politics and sectarianism; he was fully spiritual and commanded respect. Everyone, regardless of personal philosophies or practices, seemed to accept him as a true representative of Indian culture, a genuine sādhu and guru.

Among the distinguished persons who agreed to appear as guest speakers during the ten-day festival were Sri Hans Raj Gupta, mayor; H. Bachchan, a famous Hindi poet; Sri Syama Caran Gupta, chairman of the Delhi Metropolitan Council; Sri C. B. Agarwal, a famous orator; Sri Vipin Candra Misra, magistrate of the Delhi High Court; Dr. Atma Ram, a renowned scientist; Colonel B. R. Mohan, ex-mayor and industrialist of Lucknow; Sri L. N. Sakalani, a prominent industrialist; Sri Aditya Nath Jha, the lieutenant-governor of Delhi; Sri Jagjivan Ram, Indian defense minister; and His Excellency James George, the Canadian high commissioner. Guru dāsa had also had friendly conversations with the U.S. ambassador to India, Kenneth Keating, who had repeatedly expressed his respect for the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement. Ambassador Keating regretted that he would be out of town during the function.

The devotees had secured an excellent location at the L.I.C. Grounds in Connaught Place, the heart of New Delhi's commercial district. There they had arranged for a large tent and outdoor lighting for the ten-day festival. On opening day the program started at six A.M. with a kīrtana and an āratī before the newly arrived Deities of Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa, white marble Deities from Jaipur enthroned upon a flower-bedecked altar on the large stage. Attendance was sparse at first, but picked up when after a noon kīrtana and āratī devotees began distributing Kṛṣṇa prasādam. The evening program started with a kīrtana, which continued enthusiastically, building to an ecstatic climax as Śrīla Prabhupāda entered.

For the pious people of Delhi, the evening Hare Kṛṣṇa festival was a momentous occasion. Since the location and the hour were ideal and admission was free, the crowd had grown to tens of thousands, many having come specifically to see the young American Vaiṣṇavas.

At Prabhupāda's arrival hundreds of people surged forward to touch his feet and receive his blessings, as a ring of disciples escorted him through the crowd. Prabhupāda, wearing a gray wool cādar, his "swami hat" pushed back casually on his head, moved calmly forward toward the stage with natural, aristocratic poise. He sat on the vyāsāsana, and the audience quieted.

New Delhi's mayor, Sri Hans Raj Gupta, spoke first. He had met Śrīla Prabhupāda in the early 1960s when Prabhupāda had approached him for a donation to publish the first volume of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam. Mayor Gupta, recognizing Prabhupāda as "someone sincere and near to God," had helped, and Prabhupāda had later presented him with complimentary copies of the first two volumes of his Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam. Mr. Gupta was impressed by Prabhupāda's success in spreading Vaiṣṇavism in the West, and as he introduced Śrīla Prabhupāda, he expounded on the Kṛṣṇa consciousness philosophy he had read in Prabhupāda's Bhāgavatams.

He said, speaking in Hindi, that as mayor of Delhi for five years he had many times welcomed important visitors and delivered addresses, but such functions were usually only formalities. This was not, however, the case with Śrīla Prabhupāda, he said, since no one he had ever known could compare with him. He praised Prabhupāda for doing "an immense amount of good work in India and the whole world." Said Mayor Gupta, "He has also given me love and affection, and I am more affected by that than anything else."

Then Prabhupāda spoke. When he began by asking whether the audience preferred him to speak in Hindi or English, many called out for Hindi, a few for English. But Prabhupāda announced, "I am going to speak in English, because my disciples, being Americans and Europeans, have joined me. They are following me, and they must understand. If I speak in Hindi they cannot follow. So I am going to speak in English."

"Ladies and gentlemen," Prabhupāda continued, "I thank you for your kindly participating in this Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement. Just now we will vibrate one transcendental song, Jaya Rādhā-Mādhava Ku... jabihārī. As you know, Kṛṣṇa's eternal consort is Śrīmatī Rādhārāṇī, the pleasure potency of Kṛṣṇa. Kṛṣṇa is the Supreme Personality of Godhead. When He wants to enjoy, He exhibits His pleasure potency, which is known as Rādhārāṇī."

After chanting Jaya Rādhā-Mādhava Prabhupāda expounded the science of Kṛṣṇa for half an hour, quoting Bhagavad-gītā on why Kṛṣṇa comes to the material world, how the jīva souls are transmigrating from one body to another, birth after birth, and how human life is the opportunity for the jīva souls to revive their love of Kṛṣṇa.

"This is religion," Prabhupāda said, "—simply surrender to Kṛṣṇa. Become a Kṛṣṇaite... It doesn't require a church. It doesn't require a mosque. It doesn't require anything. But wherever you sit down, you can chant Hare Kṛṣṇa. This is the easiest method."

Following Śukadeva Gosvāmī, the ancient speaker of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, Prabhupāda condemned a materialistic life spent "working hard like the hogs or dogs," without self-realization. He emphasized that India had a treasure house of knowledge, which Indians should distribute all over the world. Unfortunately, the Indians were forgetting their real duty.

In conclusion Prabhupāda said, "So there are many things to be spoken in this connection of the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement. I am trying to present this to you in the next ten days. This is the beginning. I shall request you to come here. We don't charge any fees. We are depending on Kṛṣṇa. If Kṛṣṇa likes, He will benefit us. We are completely surrendered to Kṛṣṇa. If He likes, He can maintain us. If He likes, He can kill us. We don't mind. We have no business. We have no separate interest. We request you to come and join this movement. It is not sectarian. We have many Hindus, Christians, Jews, Muhammadans, and Sikhs also all over the world who are now in Kṛṣṇa consciousness. We are preaching one word, Kṛṣṇa, one scripture, Bhagavad-gītā, and one mantra, Hare Kṛṣṇa. Chant Hare Kṛṣṇa, Hare Kṛṣṇa, Kṛṣṇa Kṛṣṇa, Hare Hare/ Hare Rāma, Hare Rāma, Rāma Rāma, Hare Hare. Thank you very much."

Prabhupāda attempted to leave the stage, and again the crowd rushed forward to touch his lotus feet. Although Prabhupāda's disciples were already convinced of his greatness, that greatness took on a vivid reality at times like this, when they heard him speaking so powerfully and saw him surrounded by throngs of worshipers.

As Prabhupāda proceeded to his car, he remained calm and humble, but the disciples surrounding him tensed to protect him from being jostled by a frantic crowd. Yet despite the devotees' sincere attempts, individuals in the crowd would manage to break through, diving between the devotees' legs to throw themselves before Prabhupāda.

"Do you know why they are worshiping me?" Prabhupāda said, turning to the disciples near him. "It is because I am free from sex desire."

For ten consecutive nights Śrīla Prabhupāda lectured at the paṇḍāl. In many of his lectures he would speak of dharma (religion) in connection with the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement.

"The Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement is the topmost yoga system. It is very scientific. Don't think it is a sentimental movement. It is authorized, supported by the Vedic literatures. And actually it is becoming effective. Religion is surrender to God. These boys and girls have taken to this real religion. This movement is so important, and we are giving everyone a chance to make this life successful. Therefore our humble request is that you take to Kṛṣṇa consciousness.

On the fifth evening, after Justice Misra had referred to religion in his introduction, Śrīla Prabhupāda defined the word in his lecture. "Religion means constitutional position. In the English dictionary religion is described as faith. But by Vedic definition religion cannot be changed like faith because it is the law given by the Lord. Only surrender unto the lotus feet of Kṛṣṇa is dharma. That is Kṛṣṇa's verdict. One should not have any ulterior motive in approaching God.

"Why not surrender immediately? Be intelligent. Real religion means to surrender immediately. Why should you wait for many, many births? We request all of you to try to understand this process of Kṛṣṇa consciousness very seriously. Take to it, and you will become happy."

Śrīla Prabhupāda saw the Indian people abandoning their dharma for materialism, and he spoke strongly, pointing out their great mistake and urging them to rectify it. "If you actually want to advance your nation, India, then you must take to the culture of Kṛṣṇa consciousness. This will glorify your country. You cannot compete with the Western world in the field of technology. It is impossible. The Western countries are meant for that purpose, for advancing technology. But you are meant for a different purpose. Your special advantage is that you have been born in this land of Bhārata-varṣa after many, many births and after performing many pious activities.

"India is very poverty-stricken, so wherever I go I am told I come from a very poor country. India advertises this image—our ministers beg from other countries. We are accepted as a beggars' culture. At the Berkeley University one Indian student protested the studying of the Hare Kṛṣṇa movement. He was the only student to protest. He said, 'Swamiji, what benefit is made by accepting this Hare Kṛṣṇa movement?' In another place a girl asked me, 'Swamiji, what is God?' So I asked her, 'Are you Indian? You should be ashamed of being called an Indian, because you ask what is God, although you come from India, the land of God.' India is the land where Lord Kṛṣṇa appeared. So although you may be born Indian, if you have no dharma, what is the difference between you and the animals?"

One night while Prabhupāda was speaking, an American hippie in the audience approached the stage. He had long, wild blond hair and wore a vest and high leather boots. A miniature framed picture of Viṣṇu, Brahmā, and Śiva hung on a chain around his neck. When the boy tried to climb up on the stage, some of the devotees pushed him back, but Śrīla Prabhupāda intervened. He had a devotee bring a cushion and place a microphone in front of the boy. Then Śrīla Prabhupāda said, "Yes?"

"Have you realized yourself?" the young man demanded. "Have you realized the soul in the innermost depths of your being?"

"Yes!" Śrīla Prabhupāda replied.

At first the man was taken aback, but then he again challenged, "Now you tell me another thing. When was the Bhagavad-gītā written?"

"Now you answer my question," Śrīla Prabhupāda said. "What is the process of receiving knowledge from the Bhagavad-gītā?"

"No," the young man retorted, "you tell me—when was the Bhagavad-gītā written? In your lecture you said five thousand years ago, but according to other swamis, it was written only fifteen hundred years ago. Answer my question. I asked you first!"

Śrīla Prabhupāda raised his voice angrily. "I am not your servant, I am Kṛṣṇa's servant. You must answer my question!"

A heated argument began, with the hippie yelling at Śrīla Prabhupāda and Śrīla Prabhupāda arguing back. Finally, the devotees removed the boy from the stage.

The incident confused the audience. Many people began to leave. "Why did your Guru Mahārāja become angry?" some of them demanded from the devotees. "He should have answered the man's question." Some of the civic leaders supporting the paṇḍāl program also became upset, fearing Śrīla Prabhupāda had made an unfavorable impression on the public. Those who were devotional, however, remained in their seats to hear further what Prabhupāda had to say.

To the devotees it was inconceivable. Why had Prabhupāda, in the middle of his talk, invited a crazy hippie onto the stage, given him a microphone and a seat, and then argued with him to the point of yelling and shouting? And all before an audience of twenty thousand!

Bhavānanda: One man who had helped organize the paṇḍāl protested, "Oh, Swamiji has gotten angry. This is not good." But Śrīla Prabhupāda seemed to have done it purposefully. He had spoken for a long time that evening on how to understand the Bhagavad-gītā, and then he had this hippie brought on the stage. It was bewildering to us. We couldn't figure it out.

Girirāja: Śrīla Prabhupāda was actually using the entire incident to illustrate the process of understanding Bhagavad-gītā. After the man left, Prabhupāda completed his lecture by stating that one must approach Kṛṣṇa or Kṛṣṇa's representative with a submissive attitude, by serving and inquiring, not simply asking challenging questions. The whole incident had illustrated this point.

Yadubara: Many in the audience misunderstood the incident. It caused a split. But those who understood what Śrīla Prabhupāda had done could see that this hippie was a rascal, and this had been a time for transcendental anger against his nonsensical opinions.

Tejās: After everything was over, Prabhupāda told us, "Just as the gopīs were lusty for Kṛṣṇa, Arjuna would also get angry for Kṛṣṇa. So it is not bad that a devotee becomes angry for Kṛṣṇa." But many people in the crowd could not understand this point—how a devotee is not impersonal. The Indians are used to seeing impersonalist yogīs who express no emotion. The audience was mostly impersonalists.

The last night of the paṇḍāl program, Śrīla Prabhupāda spoke privately with James George, the Canadian high commissioner.

Mr. George: "You have attracted so many Canadians and Americans."

Prabhupāda: "I have not attracted them. Kṛṣṇa has attracted them."

Mr. George: "True."

Prabhupāda: “Kṛṣṇa is all-attractive. I am simply presenting the means of being attracted. That is my business. It is similar to the way a magnet attracts iron. If the iron is rusty, however, then magnetic force cannot attract. Therefore, my business is to remove the dirt. This process is ceto-darpaṇa-mārjanam, cleansing the heart.

“At the present moment every one of us is in a consciousness of thinking, ‘I am this body.’ Because you were born in Canada, you are thinking you are Canadian. Because I was born in India, I am thinking I am Indian. And because he was born in America, he is thinking he is American. None of us are American, Canadian, or Indian. We are living entities.”

Mr. George: “I have no problem following all of that. How, though, is this change of consciousness to be brought about, for example, in the West? This, I take it, is your mission.”

Prabhupāda: “There is no question of East and West. It is philosophy—it is science. In mathematics, for instance, two plus two equals four. This is equally understandable in the West as well as the East. It is not that two plus two in the West is five, and two plus two in the East is three. Two plus two is equal to four everywhere.

“The first knowledge, then, that must be understood by human society is that we are not these bodies. It is very common knowledge. From this point, our spiritual knowledge can advance. If we do not know what spirit is, then what is the question of advancing in spiritual knowledge?”

After their conversation, Mr. George accompanied Prabhupāda to the stage and introduced him to the crowd.

“For several years I've been wanting to meet this swami and see what it was about him that was affecting so many of our young people in Canada and North America. I was very happy this evening to come in response to your kind invitation, and especially to meet Swamiji. I think, as he himself said to me a short time ago, there is something really happening. Whether he is doing it or it is being done through him, as he said, it is beside the point. But there is something happening, and everyone who doubts that should be here tonight to see this. It is happening, not only here in Delhi, but it's happening in Toronto and Cleveland and Los Angeles and New York and all sorts of places. What is it? I don't know how he would answer that question. For me, at a deeper level what is happening is the awakening of a search.”

In his lecture, Śrīla Prabhupāda compared the material body to a machine operated by a driver, the soul. And he spoke of the soul's natural position as servant of Kṛṣṇa. Addressing Mr. George, Prabhupāda concluded his speech.

“Here our honorable high commissioner of Canada is present. I request that since you have come to our country, please try to understand this philosophy. I have traveled in your country, in Canada, also, and as you have already mentioned, we have got five branches, in Montreal, Toronto, Vancouver, Hamilton, and Ottawa. So the boys are struggling. They are distributing culture, these books, and I am getting very encouraging reports. Many young men are also coming. It is a very scientific movement. So I request you to inform your government to give these boys facility to inject this Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement in your country. Thank you very much. Hare Kṛṣṇa.”

After the successful ten-day paṇḍāl festival—seven hundred thousand had attended—Śrīla Prabhupāda took his disciples on a short excursion to Vṛndāvana. His preaching tours had taken him to such places as Amritsar, Surat, Indore, Gorakhpur, Allahabad, and Benares, but never to Vṛndāvana. With so many of his disciples gathered in Delhi for the festival, Prabhupāda considered it an opportune time to travel to nearby Vṛndāvana.

They set out in two vehicles, Śrīla Prabhupāda and four others in Mrs. Kamala Bakshi's Ambassador and forty devotees following in a rented bus. Prabhupāda remained silent during the ride out of the city, past the factories and through the agricultural fields, groves, and villages along the Delhi–Agra Road enroute to Vṛndāvana. When, after a couple of hours, they approached the outskirts of Vṛndāvana, Prabhupāda directed the driver of his car to a village and into the center of the small town to a sweet-water well. Here Prabhupāda and his party drank, took a breakfast of fresh fruit, and then continued on their way. Just before reaching Chhatikara Road, which leads directly into Vṛndāvana, Prabhupāda's car broke down.

Tejās: After Prabhupāda's car broke down, he rode the rest of the way with us on the bus. Our relationship with Prabhupāda was very reverential, although we were in the most intimate situation, staying with him and traveling in a bus with him. Prabhupāda never said anything about it. In those days we were actually very much like a family—Prabhupāda knew everyone, and everyone knew Prabhupāda and would talk to him—but still we were very reverential.

In Vṛndāvana a Mr. G. L. Saraf accommodated Prabhupāda, his secretaries, and the women in the party at his home, Saraf Bhavan. The rest of the devotees stayed in a nearby dharmasālā.

Prabhupāda had come to Vṛndāvana for more than just a pilgrimage; he had come to try and secure land for ISKCON. When in 1967 he had come to Vṛndāvana from America, he had come to recuperate, but on recovering his health he had looked for a place in Vṛndāvana for his disciples. He had tried to establish an “American House,” a center where his disciples could live in Vṛndāvana's ideal atmosphere and receive training in Kṛṣṇa conscious culture and then go out and preach. But after two months of little prospect for establishing his American House, he had left.

This time, however, Prabhupāda was coming to Vṛndāvana as that city's famous ambassador to the world, renowned for propagating the glories of Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa and Vṛndāvana in the West. The success of the Hare Kṛṣṇa movement was being widely publicized in India, as Prabhupāda and his band of foreign disciples traveled from city to city holding kīrtanas, lecturing from Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, and telling of Kṛṣṇa consciousness in the West. So when Prabhupāda arrived in Vṛndāvana with forty disciples, the entire town heralded his presence.

The municipality of Vṛndāvana arranged a formal reception, attended by prominent local citizens and sādhus. A spokesman for the city praised Śrīla Prabhupāda and his accomplishments. “O great soul! Today we, the inhabitants of Vṛndāvana, known as Brijabāsīs, all combinedly offer our humble welcome to Your Holiness in this holy place of Vṛndāvana, and in doing so we feel very proud... For many years you stayed in the Rādhā-Dāmodara temple and worshiped Her Majesty

Śrīmatī Rādhārāṇī in a meditative mood, and thus you now have the transcendental vision to deliver the entire world. As proof of your perfection, we can see these foreign devotees before us, and we feel very proud to see how you have transformed them into such pure devotees.

“O great preacher of Vedic culture, formerly a great many swamis went to foreign countries, but now you have wonderfully preached the saṅkīrtana movement and the sublime philosophy of bhakti cult in the Western countries, and that is the only means for giving peace and prosperity to all people of the world in this age. For preaching religion and culture, your holy name will remain ever dazzling.

“To speak frankly, we feel a very intimate relationship with you, and we feel perfect satisfaction at this time in the privilege to present you this address of welcome. We take it for granted that you are one of us in Vṛndāvana. We are sure that wherever you travel, you must carry with you the impression of Śrī Vṛndāvana-dhāma. The culture, religion, philosophy, and transcendental existence of Śrī Vṛndāvana-dhāma travel with you. Through the great message Your Holiness carries, all the people of the world are now becoming very intimately related with Vṛndāvana-dhāma. We are certainly sure that through your preaching alone the transcendental message of Vṛndāvana will spread all over the world. May you be crowned a success in these noble activities.”

Then Śrīla Prabhupāda spoke, beginning by explaining how the International Society for Krishna Consciousness is trying to establish daiva-varṇāśrama, or a God-conscious social order, with universal application.

“We should not consider that Kṛṣṇa is Hindu or Indian. Kṛṣṇa is for all. These foreigners are taking to Kṛṣṇa consciousness by understanding that Kṛṣṇa is for all. They are not accepting a form of religious principles, like Hindu or Muslim or Christian. These are designated religions. If I am calling myself a Hindu, this is not my religion—this is my designation. Because I happen to take birth in a Hindu family, therefore I call myself a Hindu. Or because I take birth in a particular land, I call myself Indian or American. But our Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement is not for such designated personalities. This Kṛṣṇa consciousness is sarvopādhi-vinirmukta. When one becomes free from all designations, he can take to Kṛṣṇa consciousness. As long as one is Hindu or Muslim or Christian, there is no question of Kṛṣṇa consciousness.

“So these boys and girls, or ladies and gentlemen, who have joined me, they have given up their designations. They are no longer Americans or Canadians or Australians. They are thinking of themselves as eternal servants of Lord Kṛṣṇa. Without this, there is no question of liberation from the material contamination. As long as there is material contamination, we have to devise these social orders and spiritual orders, according to śāstra—as brāhmaṇa, kṣatriya, vaiśya, śūdra, brahmacārī, gr̥hastha, vānaprastha, and sannyāsa. These are all material designations. But this Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement is for becoming transcendental to these material designations, and these boys, these foreigners, they are being taught in that light.

“When I started my propaganda in New York, 26 Second Avenue, that time only half a dozen boys were coming and hearing. That hearing means I was singing, chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa mantra, and reading some verses from Bhagavad-gītā, and they were patiently hearing. Because I know if someone patiently hears the holy name of Kṛṣṇa or about His pastimes, then—śṛṇvatām sva-kathāḥ kṛṣṇaḥ—Kṛṣṇa purifies him from within.

“So, actually it so happened with these boys and girls. I say boys and girls, because in the Western countries there is no distinction. They are given equal liberty. In our country there is still discrimination. I mean to say, grown-up boys and girls are not allowed to mix together, although it is going on now. But in European countries there is no such restriction. So there was no possibility of making any distinction between the boys and the girls. So many of them are attending. I was chanting in Tompkins Square Park, and these boys and girls used to surround me and dance and chant Hare Kṛṣṇa mantra. Some of them became a little advanced and purified and came forward, “Swamiji, please accept me as your disciple.”

“So my condition was that anyone who wants to become my disciple must be free from the four kinds of sinful activities: illicit connection with women, meat-eating, intoxication, gambling. In this way, on this condition, these boys and girls were accepted as my disciples. According to pañcarātrikī viddhi, when they are fairly advanced they are given the sacred thread, upanayana-saṁskāra, following the path and instruction of my Guru Mahārāja, His Divine Grace Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī, Gosvāmī Prabhupāda. According to śāstra, they should not be considered as coming from families of mlecchas and yavanas—they should not be considered like that—because they are now purified. That is also mentioned by Śukadeva Gosvāmī in the Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, and you know of it:

ābhīra-śumbhā yavanāḥ khasādayaḥ

ye 'nye ca pāpā yad-apāśrayāśrayāḥ

śudhyanti tasmai prabhaviṣṇave namaḥ

How to become purified? By taking shelter of a bona fide spiritual master. So they are all purified according to the pañcarātrikī viddhi, and many of them have got this sacred thread."

Prabhupāda continued explaining the holy name's power to elevate anyone, regardless of birth, and he cited Haridāsa Ṭhākura who, despite his Muhammadan birth, was accepted as the ācārya of chanting the holy name. Prabhupāda also discussed the dynamics of the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement, telling how, according to Rūpa Gosvāmī's principle of yukta-vairāgya, the International Society for Krishna Consciousness was using material things in the service of Kṛṣṇa.

“In the Western countries they are very luxuriously situated. My disciples are giving me residential quarters even a governor could not imagine. I remember one night some time back I was a guest in a Lucknow government house. At that time the governor was Biswanath Das, and he was personally known to me. So I remember the kind of luxurious apartment where I had the opportunity to lie down one night. But they, my disciples, are giving me all this. So we cannot reject that, because that is the standard of living in America. You cannot say, “No, I shall not lie down in this nice apartment. I shall lie down in the street. I am a sannyāsī.” Then nobody will respect me. There in America the standard of living is like that. Therefore, Rūpa Gosvāmī says that you should not be attached to that, but for the service of Kṛṣṇa if you have to use such things, you should receive it.

"People are engaged in the service of māyā, but we want to engage everything in the service of the Lord. That is the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement. So we are using airplanes, we are using dictaphones, we are using teletype machine. Even for cleansing our floor, we are using a machine. This is the system. In each and every center we have got new cars. We cannot do without them. In Europe and America practically no gentleman walks in the street. It is the system there. So we have to use it, but we should not be attached to it. Our attachment should be only for Kṛṣṇa, and for Kṛṣṇa's service we can accept anything. That is the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement."

Prabhupāda concluded his address by asking for land. He wanted to establish a temple for his society in Vṛndāvana.

Afterward, a Mr. S., a motor parts salesman and resident of Vṛndāvana, offered Prabhupāda a plot of land his family had been saving for some worthy religious purpose. Prabhupāda smiled. Although he had only just arrived in Vṛndāvana, already Kṛṣṇa was providing an opportunity for establishing his ISKCON center. Prabhupāda thanked Mr. S. for offering this service to Lord Kṛṣṇa. By his donating land, the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement would increase, and the donor, Mr. S., would benefit.

Prabhupāda was aware that behind the formal reception and ceremonial words of Vṛndāvana's prominent citizens dwelt a deeper feeling of reserve and even suspicion, especially among the caste gosvāmīs, the proprietors of Vṛndāvana's major temples. While accepting Śrīla Prabhupāda's foreign disciples as devotees (of a sort), many Vṛndāvana residents nevertheless felt reluctant to accept the foreign Vaiṣṇavas as brāhmaṇas, sannyāsīs, and pūjārīs. This misunderstanding was due to a traditional Hindu concept: only those born in caste brāhmaṇa families could become brāhmaṇas.

Prabhupāda, however, followed exactly in the footsteps of Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī, who had freely accepted anyone, regardless of sex or social position. When in 1932 Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī had led more than one thousand followers in a Vṛndāvana pilgrimage, certain prideful caste brāhmaṇas had denied the pilgrims entry into the temples. The pilgrims had been harassed by rock throwers and boycotted by shopkeepers. Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī had then met with brāhmaṇas of Vṛndāvana and had scripturally proved to them that the soul, being transcendental, was free from designation and that anyone who became a Vaiṣṇava automatically qualified as a brāhmaṇa. The prejudices, however, had remained.

Prabhupāda also followed Śrīla Bhaktisiddhānta in denying that the gosvāmī title could be inherited. Gosvāmī meant one who controlled the senses, and the title could not be adopted simply because one was born in a family of so-called gosvāmīs.

The original gosvāmīs were the six Gosvāmīs of Vṛndāvana: Śrī Sanātana, Śrī Rūpa, Śrī Raghunātha Bhaṭṭa, Śrī Jīva, Śrī Gopāla Bhaṭṭa, and Śrī Raghunātha dāsa Gosvāmīs, all of whom were in the renounced order and were, therefore, without issue. Almost five hundred years ago, these six Gosvāmīs had discovered the places of Kṛṣṇa's Vṛndāvana pastimes and had built the first big temples in Vṛndāvana. They had appointed married disciples to carry on the Deity worship in their temples, and now the descendants of those original priests were claiming exclusive rights as temple gosvāmīs in Vṛndāvana. Prabhupāda had written in The Nectar of Devotion about his spiritual master's struggle in this matter:

...after the disappearance of Lord Caitanya's great associate Lord Nityānanda, a class of priestly persons claimed to be the descendants of Nityānanda, calling themselves the gosvāmī caste. They further claimed that the practice and spreading of devotional service belonged only to their particular class, which was known as Nityānanda-vaṁśa. In this way, they exercised their artificial power for some time, until Śrīla Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī Ṭhākura, the powerful ācārya of the Gaudiya Vaiṣṇava sampradāya, completely smashed their idea. There was a great hard struggle for some time, but it has turned out successfully, and it is now correctly and practically established that devotional service is not restricted to a particular class of men.

Prabhupāda therefore opposed the caste gosvāmīs' ideas of birthright. And the caste gosvāmīs feared Prabhupāda's movement, since it threatened their hereditary social preeminence. Yet on this occasion of Prabhupāda's triumphant return after preaching Vṛndāvana's glories to the Western world, no one protested his attempts to establish a temple. Those who disagreed remained silent or even offered flowery praise.

The land was in Ramaṇa-reti. Prabhupāda noted that the property on the outskirts of Vṛndāvana was located on busy Chhatikara Road, a main thoroughfare into Vṛndāvana and a traffic route to Agra and the Taj Mahal. The land was also adjacent to the Vṛndāvana parikrama path, where millions of pilgrims passed annually, circumambulating Vṛndāvana and visiting its temples and holy places.

Ramaṇa-reti (literally “charming sand”) was mostly forest, with a few āśramas and abandoned fields. Celebrated as a favorite spot of Kṛṣṇa's, where He and His brother Balarāma and Their cowherd boyfriends had played five thousand years ago, Ramaṇa-reti abounded in transcendental love of God, which is the special atmosphere of Vṛndāvana.

Although various city officials had casually mentioned that the city might donate land, Prabhupāda took more seriously Mr. S.'s offer. Mr. S. explained that although other sādhus had been asking for the land, he and his wife had not yet decided; they wanted to give it to a group who would build a Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa temple there as soon as possible. When Prabhupāda assured Mr. S. he would do so, Mr. S. vowed that the land was now Prabhupāda's.

Prabhupāda had heard such promises before, and they had often proved false. But considering this offer serious, he appointed disciples to remain in Vṛndāvana to draw up a deed with Mr. S.

Meanwhile, Prabhupāda took his disciples on a pilgrimage to many of the important holy places of Vṛndāvana: Varṣāṇā (the birthplace of Śrīmatī Rādhārāṇī), Gokula (the place of Kṛṣṇa's earliest pastimes), Rādhā-kuṇḍa, Govardhana, and Vṛndāvana's major temples. At Govardhana Prabhupāda told the devotees not to step on Govardhana Hill or pick up any of the rocks: Govardhana Hill was nondifferent from Kṛṣṇa. Also at Govardhana Prabhupāda took the devotees to a little temple, where he showed them Kṛṣṇa's footprint. The footprint was very large. If Kṛṣṇa's foot had been that big, the devotees marveled, then He must have been eight feet tall. "Yes," Prabhupāda said. "They were much bigger then."

Near Govardhana, at Bindu-sarovara, a lake commemorating the place where Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa first met, the devotees swam while Prabhupāda bathed from buckets of water in the nearby field. Later, while Prabhupāda took prasādam, the devotees tried to chase away a few stray dogs by throwing stones and yelling, but Prabhupāda stopped them. "Leave them alone," he said, and he began throwing the dogs prasādam from his plate.

At Varṣāṇā, the birthplace of Rādhārāṇī, the devotees carried Prabhupāda on a palanquin up the many steep steps to the temple. On the top of the hill, he looked toward a distant hill. "Just over there," he said, pointing, "Kṛṣṇa used to come down that hill. Rādhā would come down this hill, and They would meet in the middle. There was a forest there. So this is a very special place, because it is the meeting place of Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa."

In each holy place Prabhupāda would sit down, hold a kīrtana, and come before the Deity and offer obeisances. Then he would briefly describe the pastimes of Kṛṣṇa related with the particular place.

Dīnadayādri: The Indians at the holy places were always hounding Prabhupāda for money. They assumed that his disciples, being Americans, were rich, so they wanted money. Prabhupāda would give something, but there were so many that as soon as he would give to one, half a dozen others would crowd around him, preventing him from walking by. In some of the temples they wouldn't let us enter.

Prabhupāda then took his group to the place beside the Yamunā where Kṛṣṇa had shown His mother all the universes within His mouth. Touching the water, Prabhupāda said, "It is too cold for an old man like me. But you take a bath. I'll put a few drops on my head." He directed the women to a separate place to swim, where the Indian women bathed, and the men plunged in and began swimming. They sported in the water as Prabhupāda stood on the bank, watching. Suddenly Prabhupāda put on a gamshā, walked to the river's edge, sprinkled some water on his head, and then waded in up to his knees. The devotees were delighted to see him duck beneath the water and begin bathing and splashing with them in the Yamunā.

Śrīla Prabhupāda decided that he would remain in his quarters at Mr. Saraf's home, while his old friend Hitsaran Sharma took the devotees to Vṛndāvana's famous temples. Prabhupāda did, however, make a point of going with his disciples to visit the Rādhā-Dāmodara temple, where he had lived for several years writing Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam and Back to Godhead magazine before going to America in 1965.

At the Rādhā-Dāmodara temple Prabhupāda told the devotees of his plans for an ISKCON temple in Vṛndāvana, and he suggested to the Rādhā-Dāmodara pūjārī that ISKCON use the Rādhā-Dāmodara temple.

"We shall prepare the whole temple nicely," Prabhupāda said, "and we shall make a silver throne for the Deity. Fifty to a hundred men will take prasādam here. It will be unique. If you want to, we can do it. Otherwise we can start our own temple somewhere. We are prepared to spend money. If you give us a chance, we'll spend it here. We want to make this a great festival in Vṛndāvana, because it is Jīva Gosvāmī's place. Rūpa Gosvāmī and Jīva Gosvāmī sat here. We have literature, we have books. Everyone is associating with us all over the world."

Yamunā devī dāśī: His Divine Grace was very frequently giving indication of how much he wanted his rooms at Rādhā-Dāmodara maintained nicely. He was extremely fond of his quarters there. One night during his stay in Saraf Bhavan he agreed that he would stay for one twenty-four-hour period within his rooms at the Rādhā-Dāmodara temple. It was a very exciting event for all of us to look forward to. He selected three or four men to accompany him to spend the night there at the Rādhā-Dāmodara temple.

Saraf Bhavan was some distance from Seva-kuṇja, where the Rādhā-Dāmodara temple is located. During the very early hours of the morning I walked through the streets of Vṛndāvana and arrived at the Rādhā-Dāmodara temple. Inside of Śrīla Prabhupāda's sleeping room I could see the light coming through the latticed red stone windows and the wooden shutters. Back and forth he was walking and chanting.

Suddenly, very much to my surprise, the wooden shutters burst open, and a shaft of light filled a small corner of the courtyard. Prabhupāda stood in his room under one bare light bulb. When he saw me, he asked, "How have you gotten here?" I said that I had walked. "Oh, this is not good," he said. "It is very dangerous in the street. There are so many wild dogs. And there are dacoits. In this quarter a man will kill even for a loṭā [waterpot]."

So there was some chastisement from Prabhupāda on the one hand, but on the other hand he seemed pleased. "So you are chanting japa?" he said. And I said, "Yes, Śrīla Prabhupāda." He said, "That is very nice. So go to the samādhi of Rūpa Gosvāmī and chant there."

Then around four o'clock other pilgrims were starting to filter in to attend the morning āraṭi program. Prabhupāda came out where we were chanting, and he said that this corner at Rādhā-Dāmodara temple was just like the hub of the wheel of the spiritual world—it was the center. He requested that his rooms always be well maintained and that they be cleansed daily.

Rādhānātha: I had only met Śrīla Prabhupāda briefly in Bombay, and then I had gone alone to live in Vṛndāvana. I had lived there about six months with the local people, and it was there that I got real attached to Kṛṣṇa consciousness. I used to just live on the bank of the river with all the bābājīs—a very simple life. I know it was just by that initial contact with Prabhupāda that that seed was planted.

One day a big bus full of American devotees having a kīrtana pulled into Vṛndāvana, and I was thinking, "Oh, here they are again." The first thing I asked was, "Is Prabhupāda coming?" And they said, "Yes, Prabhupāda is here. He will be speaking tomorrow morning."

I was already attracted to a lot of gurus in Vṛndāvana—Prabhupāda's Godbrothers and also devotees from other sampradāyas. But on the morning when I came for the Bhāgavatam class and heard Prabhupāda chanting Jaya Rādhā-Mādhava, I just sat there and listened. I had never seen anyone with such a quality of love for Kṛṣṇa. All the great people I had met in India became insignificant when I saw Prabhupāda chanting Jaya Rādhā-Mādhava. He was so serious and grave, and the quality of his devotion was so intense. I just couldn't believe it.

He kept looking over at me every now and then, kind of nodding, because I guess he remembered me from Bombay. Then he spoke, and he was glorifying Vṛndāvana so nicely. He was talking about how wonderful Vṛndāvana is, how spiritual the atmosphere is, and he was talking about how careful the devotees must be to take advantage of the atmosphere.

From that day I started thinking, "This is my Guru Mahārāja"—just because of the way he spoke. His lecture had been so precise and inclusive that it had encompassed every other philosophy and every other teacher I had ever heard. I could see also that Prabhupāda's example was pure, and I could see his disciples were actually giving up sinful life. I used to go to his darśanas every day, although I was still living on the bank of the Yamunā.

All the people of Vṛndāvana were glorifying Prabhupāda. They were so proud of him, because the people of Vṛndāvana are attached to Vṛndāvana. They love Kṛṣṇa, and they love Vṛndāvana, because Vṛndāvana is the place where Kṛṣṇa lives. That's their mood. They worship the land of Vṛndāvana. But they would tell me they appreciated Prabhupāda. Most of them would call him "Swami Bhaktivedanta." They would say, "He's the greatest saint, because he is bringing Vṛndāvana all over the world. He is making the glories of Vṛndāvana known to the whole world."

Then one day Prabhupāda and his disciples went to an āśrama in Rāmāṇa-reti. I got there late, just as Prabhupāda was leaving. He was walking the last twenty yards or so to his taxi, and many Brijabāsīs were offering their full daṇḍavats in the road. I felt very insignificant, another member of the crowd, and as Prabhupāda walked by me I offered my full obeisances also.

When I lifted my head to get up, however, I saw Prabhupāda's feet were right there in front of me. I thought, "Oh, my God, Prabhupāda is standing right there." I very slowly looked up, and Prabhupāda was just standing there looking right at me. He looked me in the eyes for a couple of seconds and then said, "So how long have you been here in Vṛndāvana?" I said, "About six months, Śrīla Prabhupāda." He just looked at me again, and he was in a very serious mood, very compassionate, gazing into my eyes. He nodded his head and said, "Do you like it here?" I said, "This is the most wonderful place I've ever been in my life."

Then all of a sudden his serious expression just blossomed into the most beautiful smile. His eyes were glistening radiantly, and he looked at me for about five or ten seconds. It seemed like a real long time—I couldn't believe the mercy he was giving me—and then he just replied, "That is very nice. Vṛndāvana is a wonderful place." And then he walked on.

This was very special for me, because most of the devotees were always telling me I was in māyā for staying in Vṛndāvana and because I was kind of attached to my own program in Vṛndāvana. I was feeling that the devotees didn't understand, and I was upset with them, thinking that they didn't appreciate the atmosphere. But Prabhupāda's words alleviated all my anxieties toward the Hare Kṛṣṇa movement. It was the most special personal contact. It wasn't what Prabhupāda was saying. It was his personal, transcendental concern for me. So then I went to his classes every day and all the darśanas, and there was no doubt in my mind. He very much convinced me on every level of Kṛṣṇa consciousness.

When Prabhupāda left, the devotees told me that I should join and go on parikrama with them all around India, and they said that Prabhupāda had personally invited me to come. I was unbelievably appreciative that Prabhupāda was so merciful, but at the same time I was very attached to Vṛndāvana. I told them I just wanted to stay here, and if they ever came back I would serve Prabhupāda here, but that I didn't want to leave Vṛndāvana.

Soon after that, my visa expired. So I had to leave the country. But before I left, the people of Vṛndāvana, especially the bābājīs, were telling me that Swami Bhaktivedanta had established New Vṛndāvana in the West. They said, "If you have to leave Vṛndāvana, you should go to New Vṛndāvana. So whatever you do, don't leave Vṛndāvana. New Vṛndāvana and Old Vṛndāvana are the same, because Swami Bhaktivedanta has created Vṛndāvana in the West." They said it with great pride. So I left for New Vṛndāvana.

Prabhupāda trained his disciples in the etiquette of living in Vṛndāvana-dhāma. "In the holy dhāma," he said, "if one of my disciples drinks from a jug incorrectly and he contaminates that jug, everyone will notice it. Don't be criticized for this uncleanness, or I will be criticized. It is the duty of the disciple to follow these etiquette habits very austere. I am putting so much energy into this party in India because I want to train you how to live here."

Prabhupāda wrote his disciples in the West of his successful tour of Vṛndāvana.

I am currently in Vrindaban with a party of 40 devotees, and we are having daily parikrama of the holy places. We shall return to Delhi tomorrow by coach. The officials and residents of Vrindaban have greeted us very nicely, and they are simply astounded to see our SKP chanting with great jubilation through the city streets. The Mayor has publicly proclaimed that I have done something wonderful, and practically speaking, they realize that before I went to the western countries no one there knew about Vrindaban. Now hundreds of visitors and hippies from your country come here to see Krishna's place. The Vrindaban devotees have understood that Vrindaban is now world-famous due to my preaching work, so they are all very much appreciating their home-town Swamiji.

December 1, 1971

Upon his return to Delhi, Śrīla Prabhupāda, along with the forty disciples who had accompanied him to Vṛndāvana, stayed at the Birla Mandir. The host offered Prabhupāda a small house reserved for special guests in the back of the formal gardens.

Meanwhile, political turmoil continued to trouble the nation's capital, as the threat of an all-out war between India and Pakistan increased. Even peaceful Vṛndāvana had been disturbed, being only ninety miles from Delhi and thirty-four miles from Agra, with its large military installation. One night, while Śrīla Prabhupāda had been staying at Saraf Bhavan, the local authorities had ordered a blackout. Śrīla Prabhupāda and the devotees had been confined to their quarters, the electricity had gone off, and everyone had covered their windows with blankets, so that even the candlelight could not be detected.

Nevertheless, despite political agitation and threats of war, Prabhupāda had now come to Delhi to preach. On his second day in the city he visited the American ambassador to India, Kenneth Keating, at the American Embassy.

Śrīla Prabhupāda explained to Mr. Keating the basic philosophy of Kṛṣṇa consciousness: the distinction between the material body and the self, or soul, living within the body. "You have got this striped coat," he told Mr. Keating, "but I cannot address you 'Mr. Striped Coat.' Yet we are actually being addressed like that. We are identifying with this body." And Prabhupāda explained the soul's transmigration through the 8,400,000 species.

"That is very interesting," Mr. Keating commented. "I believe in the transmigration of the soul."

"It is a fact," Prabhupāda said. "Just like this child is transmigrating from one body to another"—he indicated Sarasvatī. "In the same way, when I give up this body I will transmigrate to another body. This is a science."

"I see the American boys and girls, although coming from very rich and respectable families, are turning to hippies. In spite of your arrangement for very big universities, they are becoming frustrated. They are no longer satisfied to live in material opulence. So the present position of human society is dangerous, because everyone is feeling dissatisfied and confused."

"Do you have many Indian followers as well as foreigners?" Mr. Keating inquired.

"Yes, so far as Indians are concerned, everyone accepts Kṛṣṇa as the Supreme Personality of Godhead."

"Well," Mr. Keating added, "I am very impressed with the sincerity of these young American men."

"Everyone," said Prabhupāda, "as soon as he understands the science of Kṛṣṇa consciousness, will accept it immediately."

"When Swami Rajanandaji was here," said Mr. Keating, "I asked him his definition of God, and he thought a minute and said, 'Well, I would say God is the thread which links one good person to another.' I thought that was a very interesting definition."

"This is stated in Bhagavad-gītā," Prabhupāda said. "Just like you have a pearl necklace, and it is strung on a thread. So all the pearls are resting on that thread. Everyone is resting in God—not that only good men should be resting on that thread. The definition given by the Vedānta-sūtra is perfect: janmādy asya yataḥ. 'God is the origin, or source, of everything.' What do you say?"

"I am very impressed," Mr. Keating replied.

"Another definition of God," Prabhupāda continued, "is that He is all-attractive. Everyone has the attractive features of opulence, strength, fame, beauty, renunciation, and wisdom to some extent. You are an ambassador, a representative of your country. So you are attractive. Sometimes somebody comes to me, 'Let me see the Swamiji.' So this attractiveness everyone possesses. But God means He who has got all attractiveness in full."

After some time Ambassador Keating apologized and excused himself for an appointment he had to keep. "I am an ambassador, and I have to move from the sublime to the mundane. I appreciate very much your coming."

Śrīla Prabhupāda: "Now I am also coming to the mundane point of view. Next time I come back to the U.S.A. I wish to see the president."

"I can write a letter," Mr. Keating offered. "I will be glad to help you."

Prabhupāda smiled. "You are busy helping the whole world so that peace may come and people may be happy. But instead of being happy, the people of your country are becoming hippies—there is some defect. And here is a chance to rectify that defect: Kṛṣṇa consciousness. So let us do something tangible, scientific, so that people will become happy."

That evening Prabhupāda wrote one of his disciples about the meeting.

You may be pleased to know that this morning I met here in Delhi with your American Ambassador to India, Mr. Kenneth Keating. He has got very good respect for our Movement, and he has promised to help me to arrange a meeting with your President when I shall return to your country perhaps in the late Spring. I have requested him to help this Movement and that help will save your country from great danger by turning hippies into happies... let us see what can be done.

The next day, while Prabhupāda was on his morning walk in the streets of Delhi, he asked a devotee to get a paper from a newsboy passing by on a bicycle. Prabhupāda read the headlines: "Emergency declared; three enemy planes downed." He had a devotee read aloud.

Pakistan launched a massive attack on the western front, bombing seven Indian airfields and crossing the cease-fire line in strength in Poonch... The Prime Minister in her broadcast late tonight described it as a full-scale war launched by Pakistan against India... Earlier the President had declared national emergency.

The national emergency had international implications, with America cutting off supplies to India and supporting Pakistan, China threatening India, and Russia supporting India.

"This war will not last long," Śrīla Prabhupāda said immediately. "It will soon be finished. And Pakistan will lose."

Later that night he heard Indira Gandhi's broadcast over the radio.

I speak to you at a moment of great peril to our country and our people... Today a war in Bangla Desh has become a war on India. This imposes on me, my Government and the people of India a great responsibility. We have no other option but to put our country on a war footing.

Prabhupāda was not alarmed. War was not the only “ugly reality”; birth, death, old age, disease, and so many other material sufferings were inevitable—war or no war. Prabhupāda continued to follow the news, however, and some days Śyāmasundara would purchase for him three or four different newspapers.

After a few days at the Birla Mandir, Prabhupāda and his party moved to a dharmaśālā in the Kamala Nagar district of old Delhi. There Prabhupāda delivered what the devotees later referred to as “the blackout lectures.” While black-painted newspapers and blankets covered the windows and combat jets flew overhead, Prabhupāda would speak by candlelight to his disciples.

“The propensity to fight is very strong in this age of Kali,” he said, “and the population is becoming so sinful that they are trying to accumulate atomic weaponry for ultimate destruction of humanity.” Sometimes Prabhupāda would ask a disciple to speak to the group also. No guests were present, since during blackouts no one could walk the streets, and on some nights the police pounded on the door demanding the devotees extinguish even their candles.

“Due to the war in India,” Prabhupāda wrote in a letter, “our programs here have been reduced, and there is every night a blackout.” Not only in Delhi but in other parts of India his disciples were encountering difficulties in their preaching attempts. In Māyāpur the government had ordered the devotees to leave the area because of its close proximity to Bangladesh.

As Prabhupāda had predicted, however, the war did not last long. On December 17 Prabhupāda read the headlines of the Indian Express—“NIAZI SURRENDERS: BANGLA DESH IS FREE. India Decides on Unilateral Cease-Fire in West.” Prabhupāda was joyous. He told the devotees confidentially that the reason the war had ended so quickly was because of their massive saṅkīrtana-yajña at the paṇḍāl a month earlier.

On the very same page that had announced India's victory, however, another headline read, “PM blames USA for war.” Indira Gandhi was blaming President Nixon for the war. The American devotees tensed as they walked the streets, sensing the Indians' mistrust, and daily newspaper propaganda only worsened the condition. “There is great propaganda now against America in India,” Prabhupāda wrote, “due to the country's stand against India and the war with Pakistan.”

Delhi was the seat of much political agitation, and Prabhupāda decided to relocate the devotees who were there with him. Although his disciples were peaceful and far from being politically active, he sent some to Calcutta, while others accompanied him to Bombay. International politics would not stop the oncoming wave of Lord Caitanya's movement.

SPL 38: No One Listens to a Poor Man

CHAPTER THIRTY-EIGHT

No One Listens to a Poor Man

From 1965 until 1970 Śrīla Prabhupāda had concentrated mainly on reestablishing Kṛṣṇa consciousness in America. His plan had been that if the Americans turned to Kṛṣṇa consciousness, the rest of the world would follow. Although his preaching to the English-speaking people had begun in India, some sixty years of singlehanded endeavor there had convinced him that Indians were either too absorbed in politics, too ignorant of their spiritual heritage, or too crippled by poverty to seriously accept Kṛṣṇa consciousness. Therefore he had not been successful.

But in the United States success had come. Clearly, America was the prime field for implanting Kṛṣṇa consciousness. Yet Prabhupāda found the West uncultured and uncivilized. If a trace of civilization remained anywhere, he would often say, it was in India, the heart of the original Vedic culture.

By 1970 he had demonstrated through his extensive traveling and preaching that he intended to establish the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement not only in the U.S. but all over the world—especially in India. Even accepting that preaching in the United States and preaching in India were equally important, still the preaching in the United States was going well without Prabhupāda's constant, direct management; what he had begun, his American disciples could continue.

But in India Prabhupāda could not allow his disciples to manage ISKCON. He saw how often and how easily the Indians were able to cheat his disciples. Half of ISKCON's work in India was being spoiled, he said, due to his disciples' being cheated. If they put on a paṇḍāl program, they might end up paying several times the standard cost. The only way for ISKCON to develop in India would be under Prabhupāda's direct management.

Beginning in 1970 with a small band of American disciples, Prabhupāda had traveled from place to place in India as a model sannyāsī, opening a great new field for ISKCON. Now he wanted to construct big temples in India—three in particular: one in Vṛndāvana, one in Māyāpur, and one in Bombay. As early as 1967 he had attempted to make an “American House” for his disciples in Vṛndāvana. Māyāpur, being the birthplace of Lord Caitanya, was especially important; and Bombay was India's major city, “the gateway to India.” As with most of Prabhupāda's big plans, even his closest disciples couldn't fully comprehend the scope of his vision. But Prabhupāda knew what he wanted, and he knew it all depended on Kṛṣṇa. Gradually he began to unfold his plans.

Temple construction, he said, was secondary to book publication and distribution. But Kṛṣṇa consciousness must run on two parallel lines, just as a train runs on two rails. One rail was bhāgavata-mārga; the other, pañcarātrikī viddhi. Bhāgavata-mārga referred to the philosophy of Kṛṣṇa consciousness, hearing and chanting about Kṛṣṇa and disseminating the message of Kṛṣṇa. The second rail, pañcarātrikī viddhi, referred to the rules and regulations for worshiping the Deity in the temple. Of the two, bhāgavata-mārga was the more important.

Although great liberated souls like Haridāsa Ṭhākura could remain in perfect Kṛṣṇa consciousness simply by chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa constantly, Prabhupāda knew that his disciples, with their restless natures and past sinful habits, needed the special purification of worshiping the Lord in the temple.

Therefore, one of his reasons for wanting to establish temples in India was to purify his disciples by giving them elaborate Deity worship.

Temples, however, were also for preaching. "No one listens to a poor man," Prabhupāda would say. And he therefore wanted to construct palatial buildings, to attract the masses to Kṛṣṇa consciousness. Especially he wanted this in India, where the tradition of temple worship still existed. Building temples and worshipping the Deity was secondary to publishing and distributing books, but it was not to be neglected. Prabhupāda prepared to give temple construction in Māyāpur, Vṛndāvana, and Bombay as much of his attention as necessary.

For a year the devotees had been living at the Akash Ganga address, two apartments on the seventh floor of a building in the heart of Bombay. But Prabhupāda was not satisfied with this. He wanted land in Bombay, to build on and to expand. He was determined. Instead of his usual morning walks, he would take long rides in his car to observe various parts of the city.

Because many of the ISKCON life members lived in aristocratic Malabar Hill, Prabhupāda's disciples thought it a good place for a temple. On several occasions Prabhupāda rode to the top of Malabar Hill and walked around various properties, considering certain large buildings as possible temples. But for one reason or another he judged them all unacceptable.

Then in November, a Mr. N. offered to sell ISKCON five acres in Juhu, practically on the shore of the Arabian Sea. As soon as Śrīla Prabhupāda approached the land, he remembered having seen and considered it years before. In August of 1965, during the weeks just before he had left for America, he had been staying at Scindia Colony. In the evenings he had gone to the home of Scindia Steamship Company owner Mrs. Sumati Morarji in Juhu, where he had read and explained Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam for her and her guests. Several times he had passed this very property and had thought what a good location it would be for an āśrama and a Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa temple. Although his attention had been absorbed in the task of leaving India, he had still considered the Juhu land. Now he was again in Juhu, reconsidering the same land he had noticed years before. He took it as a reminder from Kṛṣṇa.

The land was overgrown with tall grasses and bushes, and many coconut palms stood throughout. In the back of the property were several tenement buildings. The land bordered on Juhu Road, the main traffic artery back to Bombay, eighteen miles to the south. A broad expanse of beach on the Arabian Sea was a brief walk away.

The location was good—peaceful, yet not remote. Several five-star hotels bordered the nearby beach, and developers were beginning work on other hotels and apartment buildings. When Prabhupāda walked along the beach, he liked even more the idea of buying the land. Rich men had weekend homes on the beach, and thousands of Bombayites would be out enjoying the beach on Sundays. Daily, hundreds of Juhu residents used the long, broad seashore for morning walks before going to work. Almost always people were strolling or gathering there, and yet the beach was clean. The mild waves and open skies were inviting. The locale was ideal not only for hotels, but for a Kṛṣṇa conscious center.

Prabhupāda wanted the Juhu land, and although his disciples continued to show him houses in Malabar Hill, he didn't change his mind. His disciples wanted whatever he wanted, yet they had trouble developing enthusiasm for a property so far from the city and with no available housing or temple facility.

Mr. N., the owner of the five-acre plot, had set a reasonable price and seemed friendly and sincere. Yet risks were involved in such transactions, and in this case, Prabhupāda even found reasons for suspicion. Through his lawyer, he learned that Mr. N. had previously entered into an agreement to sell this same land to the C. Company but had later cancelled the agreement. The C. Company had then filed a suit against Mr. N. for breach of contract. If the Bombay High Court decided in the C. Company's favor, the land would be awarded to them. When Prabhupāda's secretary questioned Mr. N. about this entanglement, Mr. N. assured him the C. Company could not win the suit, but that in any case, ISKCON could withhold a certain portion of their payment until the litigation with C. was settled.

Mr. N. was a well-known figure in Bombay. Formerly the sheriff of Bombay (an honorary judicial police position), he was now publisher-editor of one of the largest daily English newspapers in Bombay. He was wealthy, owning several properties in Juhu and Bombay, and influential—not a man one would want to oppose. To purchase the Juhu land under the present circumstances required boldness.

In late December Prabhupāda met with Mr. and Mrs. N. at their home in the Theosophical Colony in Juhu. Mr. N.'s home was on the beach, and thus the visit afforded Prabhupāda another opportunity to appreciate the value and beauty of Juhu Beach, with its border of palms leaning toward the sea. The Theosophical Colony was a private neighborhood of attractive homes with luxuriant lawns and flower gardens and many exotic birds. Ashoka trees grew on either side of Mr. N.'s driveway, and a line of palm trees, standing just inside the massive stone wall, encircled the property. A gardener opened the gate for Prabhupāda and the few disciples with him.

Mr. N. was a short, stocky man with a receding hairline. His hair was clipped short, and his round face was pockmarked. He appeared to be in his fifties. Mrs. N. had a fair complexion and, unusual for an Indian, wore her hair short. Prabhupāda had brought flower garlands and prasādam from the Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa Deities of ISKCON Bombay, and these he offered to Mr. and Mrs. N. Mr. N. invited his guests to sit with him and his wife on the front porch, which faced a picturesque garden.

Śrīla Prabhupāda openly expressed his appreciation of the Juhu land but admitted he had very little money. Mr. N., however, seemed inclined toward Prabhupāda and said he wanted to sell him the property. Quickly they reached a verbal agreement. To Mrs. N., however, the agreement seemed too liberal. But when she objected, her husband overruled her.

Prabhupāda and Mr. N. agreed on a down payment of 200,000 rupees; after making the down payment, ISKCON would immediately receive the conveyance. ISKCON would pay the remaining balance of 1,400,000 rupees later, in regular installments. Prabhupāda negotiated further regarding the down payment, offering to pay 50,000 rupees now and another 50,000 later, at which time ISKCON would be allowed to move onto the land. As soon as they paid the remaining 100,000 rupees, the down payment would be complete, and Mr. N. would give them the deed. Mr. N. agreed.

Śrīla Prabhupāda was always one to think carefully over such business transactions. He had said that if a businessman tells you, "Sir, for you I am making no profit," you should know he is lying. Therefore, even in ISKCON's early days in New York City, when the real estate shark Mr. Price had posed as a well-wisher of the devotees, Prabhupāda had been suspicious. Mr. Price had, in fact, cheated the devotees, despite Prabhupāda's warnings to them. Now, as then, Prabhupāda was suspicious. But he wanted the Juhu land and would take the risk.

Prabhupāda had taken similar chances. At Jhansi in 1953 he had occupied a building, although he had had little legal standing or financial security. And in his first storefront in New York, as well as in his largest building to date, the Watseka Avenue church in Los Angeles, he had moved in without assurance of the monthly payments. Practically the entire success of his movement had come by his taking one risk after another for Kṛṣṇa. When the devotees in Boston had written to Prabhupāda that they had rented a big house for one thousand dollars a month, calculating that they would be able to make the payments by dramatically increasing their Back to Godhead sales, Prabhupāda had approved and had even commended their example to others. So if some risks were involved in Bombay, that was only natural.

Once committed to the land, Prabhupāda began to unfold his vision for a grand project in Bombay. On December 22 he wrote to Yamunā,

Here in Bombay we have got good prospects to purchase a very large land in Juhu for very cheap price, just in the middle of a rich neighborhood. We shall build our camp there and begin constructing a temple immediately, and later on we shall develop a large hotel and school. There is also a chance of getting a nice bungalow in Bombay city also. So in general we shall make our headquarters in Bombay, and also build up Vrindaban and Mayapur.

While devotees around the world delighted to hear Prabhupāda's plan for a Bombay center, devotees in Bombay had mixed feelings. To envision a temple rising from what was little more than a jungle tract was not easy. Nor was it easy to envision the five-star ISKCON hotel Prabhupāda spoke of. The tenement buildings in the rear of the land were fully occupied, and according to Indian law, the tenants could not be removed. If the devotees moved onto the land, they would have to erect temporary housing, maybe even a temporary temple, and the land was mosquito-ridden and teeming with rats. Juhu was a small, almost isolated neighborhood, without wealthy ISKCON supporters. Although Prabhupāda (and land speculators) predicted that Juhu would grow, at present it was only a village of about two thousand. To reside at Juhu would be a drastic contrast to the comfortable Akash Ganga Building in downtown Bombay.

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa explained to Prabhupāda, "We are Westerners. We cannot live like this. We need doorknobs and running water."

"Don't you want to become purified?" Prabhupāda replied.

When the Bombay devotees learned of Śrīla Prabhupāda's response to Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, the words "Don't you want to become purified?" went deep into their hearts. They knew that Prabhupāda was asking them to become more austere, and that it was for their ultimate benefit. They began to regard moving to Juhu as a formidable spiritual challenge rather than a drudgery. Developing the Juhu property was important to their spiritual master, and it was something greater and more wonderful than they at present realized.

Prabhupāda knew he was asking his disciples to make a great sacrifice, but he could not avoid it. To preach Kṛṣṇa consciousness, a devotee had to be prepared to tolerate many difficulties. And whatever difficulties he was asking his disciples to undertake, he was prepared to undertake to a much greater degree himself. On the one hand, he didn't think that living on the undeveloped Juhu property would be too difficult for his disciples, provided they maintained cleanliness and chanted Hare Kṛṣṇa. Yet he knew that because they were Westerners, they would find it hard.

A preacher, nevertheless, had to make sacrifices—not artificially or arbitrarily, but to expand the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement. Sometimes serving Kṛṣṇa was pleasurable, sometimes difficult. In either case, a devotee had but to do the needful, acting as a menial servant of the spiritual master.

Prabhupāda counseled his Bombay disciples, impressing on them his vision for ISKCON Bombay. Although all of them were ready to follow his decision, some of them had been feeling doubtful and weakhearted. Seeing their spiritual master's commitment to the project, however, they vowed to give up their separatist mentalities. Prabhupāda then left for Jaipur, for a week's preaching engagement at the Rādhā-Govinda temple.

Jaipur

January 12, 1972

Jaipur is an ancient city in the state of Rajasthan. Occasionally some of Prabhupāda's disciples would go there to purchase marble Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa Deities for ISKCON temples in India and around the world. The devotees in ISKCON centers in Detroit, Toronto, Dallas, as well as throughout Europe, wanted to install Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa Deities and, with Śrīla Prabhupāda's permission, were ordering mūrtis from Jaipur.

On such an errand two women, Kauśalyā and Śrīmatī, had gone to Jaipur in January of 1972 on behalf of the New York City temple. When a government official had discovered Śrīmatī wasn't carrying her passport, the officials, suspicious of spies due to the war with Pakistan, had insisted the women stay in town until Śrīmatī's passport arrived in the mail. Meanwhile, the girls had daily visited the Govindajī temple and had sometimes held kīrtana in the street in front of the temple. They had had daily talks with P. K. Goswami, who was in charge of the temple, as well as Jaipur businessmen and other respectable citizens (almost everyone in Jaipur regularly visits the beloved Deities of Rādhā-Govinda).

The citizens of Jaipur had been moved by the devotion of Prabhupāda's two disciples, and when one of the men had asked, "What can we do to help your movement?" the girls had replied, "Bring Śrīla Prabhupāda here." Some of Jaipur's prominent citizens had devised a plan to share expenses and responsibilities in arranging a paṇḍāl program, and the two women had sent a letter to Prabhupāda in Bombay, inviting him to come and preach. He had agreed.

At Śrīla Prabhupāda's request, devotees from Delhi and other Indian centers came to Jaipur to join him. Prabhupāda took a small room within the Govindajī temple compound, and his disciples moved into a nearby house.

Prabhupāda liked the location. The only disturbance was the many monkeys—large, charcoal-faced monkeys with long curling tails. Climbing through the trees and across the rooftops, they would scamper down unexpectedly to steal whatever they could. The women cooking for Prabhupāda were exasperated by the monkeys' bold forays to steal vegetables from the kitchen, even capātīs right off the fire, and they complained to Śrīla Prabhupāda.

"Neither be their friends nor their enemies," Prabhupāda advised. "If you make friends with them, they will simply be a nuisance. If you become their enemies, they will become very vindictive. Just maintain a neutral position."

The monkeys, however, continued to raid the kitchen. Again the cooks complained to Prabhupāda. "Yes," Prabhupāda said, "if you want to stop the monkeys, then this is what you must do. Purchase one bow and arrow, and shoot a monkey on the top of a tree with the arrow. And then when he falls down, take the monkey and hang him upside down by the legs to a branch of a tree. Next to him you also hang the bow and arrow. This will teach them."

Prabhupāda knew that shooting monkeys was illegal in Jaipur, and he did not expect his disciples to actually shoot them. But he delivered the advice with a serious expression. Indirectly he was advising them not to be so upset over a few monkeys.

Prabhupāda and his disciples immediately joined in the intense devotional atmosphere of Jaipur. Since the Rādhā-Govinda temple was under the jurisdiction of Jaipur's royal family, to visit the Deity daily was practically required for all citizens. Morning and evening, crowds of enthusiastic worshipers would come and go, worshiping the forms of Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa on the altar.

These were Rūpa Gosvāmī's original Rādhā-Govinda Deities from Vṛndāvana. Almost five hundred years ago, when a Mogul ruler had attacked the Govindajī temple in Vṛndāvana, the king of Jaipur had arranged for the Deities to come to Jaipur. The worshipers at the Rādhā-Govinda Mandira displayed spontaneous excitement in seeing the Deities. They would come forward, crying, "Jayo! Jayo!" "Govinda! Govinda!" And when the curtains were closing, the people would rush forward to catch a last glimpse of the divine forms. Śrīla Prabhupāda avoided the large crowds before the Deity, keeping to his schedule of rising early and translating the Bhāgavatam.

Speaking with Kauśalyā and Śrīmatī, Prabhupāda praised them for having arranged the Jaipur paṇḍāl program. “You girls are carrying on Lord Caitanya's movement so nicely,” he said. “Just see! Even without husbands, you go on preaching.” He said that the Western women were different from Indian women, who simply stayed at home.

Then Prabhupāda discovered that his two women disciples had not actually done a thorough job. Although the paṇḍāl program was to begin in two days, no one had arranged for the large tent to be erected. Prabhupāda said it was not a woman's nature to do such organizational work. The women became morose to hear him. When they showed him the flyer they had printed advertising the festival, Prabhupāda became angry. “It is not standard,” he said. It did not say “International Society for Krishna Consciousness,” but only “A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami and his foreign disciples.”

“What is this!” Prabhupāda shouted.

“What, Śrīla Prabhupāda?” Kauśalyā asked.

“Foreign! Why do you say foreign? It must be ‘American’ and ‘European’. That is what is attractive, that they are American and European. But you are just a woman. What can I expect?” The two women began to cry and left the room.

With Śyāmasundara's help, Kauśalyā and Śrīmatī had new, corrected flyers printed and returned to tell Śrīla Prabhupāda. But now his mood had changed completely. His anger was gone. He was soft; after all, these disciples had tried their best. In a disarming disclosure, he began to explain that to be a spiritual master was difficult.

“I chastise you,” he said, “because it is my duty. Disciple is related to discipline, so it is my duty to my disciples. Otherwise, I am not upset with anyone. I simply do this to discipline you, because you are my disciples.” He consoled them, saying they were sincere and lacked expertise because of poor upbringing. The devotees present felt Śrīla Prabhupāda was wonderfully expressing to them a bit of what he, as spiritual master, felt in training them.

In a great last-minute endeavor, the devotees obtained the paṇḍāl and erected it in time for Prabhupāda to begin his program as advertised. On opening day the devotees held a parade through the streets, with Prabhupāda riding in a palanquin, a large embroidered umbrella sheltering his head. Also in the procession were decorated elephants, brass bands, and devotees—Indian, American, and European—performing kīrtana.

Śrīla Prabhupāda's first program was in the morning after the darśana of Govindajī, so as to catch the huge morning crowd. People would come hurrying into the temple to see Rādhā-Govindajī and then proceed out into the large Hare Kṛṣṇa paṇḍāl beside the temple. On the opening morning Prabhupāda performed an abhiṣekha ceremony, bathing marble Deities of Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa. He named these Deities, soon to be shipped to the ISKCON temple in New York, “Rādhā-Govinda.”

After one of Śrīla Prabhupāda's disciples had performed a fire sacrifice, Prabhupāda lectured to the crowd in Hindi. The schedule for the remaining days would be morning and evening lecture, kīrtana, and prasādam distribution.

While preaching in Jaipur, Śrīla Prabhupāda was simultaneously reflecting on and, through letters to his disciples, acting on matters in many other parts of the world. Although he participated fully, giving two lectures a day, and although he constantly met and interacted with guests, friends, and devotees, he was also absorbed in thoughts of other places and concerns. He was conducting his movement on many fronts. Wherever he happened to be at present was his "camp," just as a general makes camps in various places while conducting many battles in the overall effort of a war. His preaching in Jaipur, therefore, was only a small fraction of the scope of his worldwide mission.

From Jaipur Prabhupāda wrote his disciples in Calcutta, urging them in their development of the Māyāpur land; he wanted a grand opening ceremony by Lord Caitanya's birthday in March. Unfortunately, the government was restricting foreigners from entering Nadia, because of its proximity to Bangladesh. "Please try very hard to get those permits," Prabhupāda urged his men in Calcutta, "as we must be all assembled there for Lord Caitanya's appearance day." Repeatedly Prabhupāda mentioned his concern over the government's restricting his men.

I do not think there will be difficulty if we just go there like the ordinary pilgrims and set up our camp there for kirtan continuously. Anyone will see we are only serious devotees of Lord Chaitanya and not Pakistani spies.

Prabhupāda wrote ahead to his disciples in Nairobi, driving them onward with his blessings. "Continue to work very hard for His pleasure and all of you will go back to home, back to Godhead."

To the San Diego temple president, Śrīla Prabhupāda wrote,

I am very pleased to hear from you that book sales are increasing very fast. I am hearing such good news from all over the Society, and this pleases me more than anything.

And Prabhupāda was often thinking of the land in Bombay. Sometimes he talked about it or mentioned it in a letter to his representatives there. The Bombay land purchase was still not finalized, and Prabhupāda was particularly anxious that his disciples pay the money as agreed and move immediately onto the land.

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa was Śrīla Prabhupāda's Governing Body Commission secretary for India. Some of the devotees said that actually Prabhupāda was the G.B.C. secretary for India. Although he allowed his secretaries in other parts of the world to manage mostly on their own and to make their own decisions, in India he would scrutinize even small matters and make most of the decisions himself. Still, he counted on Tamāla Kṛṣṇa as his trusted assistant in important dealings. He would send Tamāla Kṛṣṇa from one Indian center to another to help the local devotees with governmental, legal, organizational, or preaching problems.

In Bombay, just prior to coming to Jaipur, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa had asked Prabhupāda's permission to take sannyāsa, the renounced order. Śrīla Prabhupāda had awarded sannyāsa to only a few men, and he had specified their duties as "traveling and preaching." Taking sannyāsa, therefore, not only meant giving up wife and family but also renouncing managerial posts. At the same time as Prabhupāda had set up his Governing Body Commission, he had also initiated several sannyāsīs, purposefully not appointing any of them, even though they were some of his most able men, as G.B.C. secretaries. The gr̥hasthas were to manage the temples as presidents and G.B.C. secretaries, and the sannyāsīs were to travel and preach. Śrīla Prabhupāda, therefore, had to carefully consider whether or not to give Tamāla Kṛṣṇa sannyāsa and thus lose his G.B.C. secretary for India.

On principle, Śrīla Prabhupāda liked the idea of giving Tamāla Kṛṣṇa sannyāsa. If a young man was actually qualified to give up family life and to use his intelligence and energy in preaching Kṛṣṇa consciousness, then Prabhupāda was always ready to encourage it. The world was in dire need of Kṛṣṇa consciousness, and even hundreds of sannyāsīs would still not be enough. On these grounds, how could he not appreciate the request of one of his leading disciples to take sannyāsa? But first he would test Tamāla Kṛṣṇa's determination.

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa was insistent. Seeing that Prabhupāda would not make a commitment, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa had adopted the tactic of presenting himself before Prabhupāda early in the morning without saying a word. In Bombay he had entered Prabhupāda's room, led the maṅgala-ārati before the Deities, and then sat silently before Śrīla Prabhupāda.

Knowing the mind of his disciple, Prabhupāda could understand that Tamāla Kṛṣṇa was not only determined but obstinate. After several days of tolerating Tamāla Kṛṣṇa's silent insistent presence every morning, Prabhupāda had finally agreed to consider seriously the request.

Prabhupāda was also concerned with Mādrī-devī dāsī, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa's wife. She was an attractive, intelligent girl who had given her life to Kṛṣṇa consciousness, and Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, by his own choice, had married her only a year ago. Spiritually, Mādrī was Śrīla Prabhupāda's daughter, and Prabhupāda wanted to protect her from undue disturbance. Even as householders, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa and his wife had been renounced, traveling with Prabhupāda throughout India, with little time or facility for private life as husband and wife.

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa had been in Bombay when Śyāmasundara had informed him that Prabhupāda had mentioned in a letter to Brahmānanda Swami in Africa that Tamāla Kṛṣṇa might take sannyāsa. Spurred on, he had left his wife in Bombay and joined Prabhupāda in Jaipur. On leaving, however, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa had asked Mādrī for his personal copies of the first three volumes of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, signed by Śrīla Prabhupāda. Mādrī had become suspicious. She had asked why he wanted them. "I just want to read them," Tamāla Kṛṣṇa had answered. But she had suspected the worst: "No, you're not coming back." But assuring her that he would definitely be returning, he had left for Jaipur.

Once with Śrīla Prabhupāda, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa again resumed his silent insistence. Whenever there would be an open meeting in Prabhupāda's room, the G.B.C. leaders would usually sit in a privileged position near Prabhupāda, so as to best receive direct instruction. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, however, would simply sit outside the door. The first time he did this, Prabhupāda looked up and said, "Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, you are sitting outside? That is very nice," and the other devotees took it that Prabhupāda was praising his disciple's humility.

When on one occasion Prabhupāda addressed Tamāla Kṛṣṇa as "Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Mahārāja," the devotees were startled. The women devotees in Jaipur, being close friends with Mādrī, became angry at what they took to be Tamāla Kṛṣṇa's duplicity.

Although Prabhupāda had not given permission, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa went ahead with his plans, even to the point of preparing his sannyāsa-daṇḍa and dying his clothes. The women were outraged; Mādrī was not even there to represent herself. All together the women went to see Śrīla Prabhupāda, who patiently and sympathetically heard their presentation.

Then Prabhupāda called for Tamāla Kṛṣṇa and said, "Your wife is my daughter, my disciple, and I have to think for her also. So I do not know how I can do this, because she will be in great difficulty." Tamāla Kṛṣṇa argued, but Prabhupāda pacified him and asked him to be patient. The sannyāsa issue had become a topic of controversy among the devotees in Jaipur. The men were rooting for sannyāsa, and the women were opposed. Prabhupāda, however, remained grave.

Throughout the week-long festival large crowds continued to come for Prabhupāda's morning and evening lectures. Prabhupāda would chant prayers from Brahma-saṁhitā and then lecture in Hindi. Not only did the citizens of Jaipur honor Prabhupāda, but they honored his disciples also. Here, more than in most other Indian cities, the devotees were treated not as foreigners or outsiders but as sādhus. "This whole city is made of devotees of Rādhā-Govindajī," Prabhupāda commented. The police chief, who visited often, was cordial and respectful. As Prabhupāda and his disciples went from place to place in Jaipur during the day, policemen would salute them, halting traffic to let them pass. People invited Śrīla Prabhupāda to their homes, and they treated him like a king.

Prabhupāda had also asked several women devotees to carefully observe the Deity worship in Jaipur. They informed him they had observed that every night the Deities were dressed in night clothes and that Their clothes were also changed at two other times, in the morning and in the afternoon. The women told Prabhupāda how a priest offered the Deities scented oils on cotton-tipped sticks, which the priests would later offer, along with flower garlands from the Deities, to the incoming worshipers in exchange for fresh garlands. These devotional practices were standard, Prabhupāda said, and could be introduced throughout ISKCON.

Each evening Prabhupāda spoke at the paṇḍāl, and often a respectable Jaipur citizen would introduce him. When the queen of Jaipur introduced him one evening, she expressed her devotional sentiments for Prabhupāda and his movement.

After lecturing each evening, Prabhupāda would stay for a slide show of ISKCON's activities around the world. One night during the slide show, Śrīla Prabhupāda called Tamāla Kṛṣṇa over beside his vyāsāsana. "Taking sannyāsa will be difficult now," he said softly. "Your wife will suffer too much."

He sat back a moment while Tamāla Kṛṣṇa took in what he had said. Then Tamāla Kṛṣṇa leaned forward and said with determination, "One way or another, Śrīla Prabhupāda, she's going to suffer. Either she'll suffer now when I take sannyāsa, or if I take sannyāsa later on, she will be just as unhappy. There will never be a time when she'll want me to. So since the feeling is going to be the same, it might as well come now. Free me. She'll get over it."

Prabhupāda said no more, but he remained thoughtful. Later that night after the paṇḍāl program, he called for his sannyāsī disciples, Subala, Madhudviṣa, Gargamuni, and Devānanda, and for his personal secretary, Śyāmasundara. Gathering them together along with Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, he said, "Tamāla Kṛṣṇa wants to take sannyāsa. So what is your opinion? Should he take or not?"

Everyone agreed he should. Finally, Prabhupāda consented. "You will have to prepare things," he said.

"Things are prepared already," Tamāla Kṛṣṇa said.

"Then," said Prabhupāda, "tomorrow morning we must have the ceremony."

The next morning Prabhupāda performed a special ceremony in the paṇḍāl, lighting the sacrificial fire and offering Tamāla Kṛṣṇa the sannyāsa-daṇḍa. The women were angry with Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, but it was too late.

After the ceremony Prabhupāda called Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Mahārāja to his room. "You have given up a very good wife and a high position. Therefore I am giving you the title Gosvāmī. Now you have to be in the same mood as the Gosvāmīs, being able to preach all over the world and accept disciples." Suddenly Prabhupāda began to laugh. "I have been testing you," he said, "to see whether or not you were determined. So what will you do?"

"I thought I would go with my daṇḍa," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Gosvāmī, "and, without anybody else, simply wander from city to city in India and preach about Kṛṣṇa, without any vehicle or anything, just like Lord Caitanya did."

"Very good," Prabhupāda said. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Mahārāja offered obeisances and walked out.

Scarcely an hour later, however, Prabhupāda called him back. "This is not a very good proposal," he said. "If you want to do something, you should have some assistants and facilities at your disposal." Prabhupāda then assigned a couple of brahmacārīs to go with Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Mahārāja for preaching. He also gave his new sannyāsī his first assignment. Immediately after Jaipur, Prabhupāda was planning to go to a festival in Nairobi, Africa, yet in Ahmedabad another program awaited him. "You go on my behalf to Ahmedabad," said Prabhupāda.

At Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Gosvāmī's sannyāsa initiation, Śrīla Prabhupāda had given him the sannyāsa-mantra, a verse that describes the surrendered, devotional attitude of the Vaiṣṇava sannyāsī. Vaiṣṇava sannyāsa emphasizes engaging one's body, mind, and words in ecstatic service to Kṛṣṇa, as distinguished from the sannyāsa of the impersonalists, who speculate on Brahman or sit alone in silent meditation. The Vaiṣṇava sannyāsī, by taking shelter of the lotus feet of Kṛṣṇa, crosses the ocean of nescience and brings others across with him.

As Śrīla Prabhupāda was demonstrating, a Vaiṣṇava sannyāsī should travel all over the world, working with all his might to reclaim the fallen souls on behalf of Lord Kṛṣṇa. Vaiṣṇava sannyāsa meant coming to places like Jaipur and preaching. It meant worshiping Govindajī in the temple, and it meant sending Rādhā-Govinda to be worshiped by the devotees in New York City. It meant allowing women an equal opportunity to become pure devotees in Kṛṣṇa consciousness. And it meant separating a man from his wife for the higher purpose of sannyāsa.

Śrīla Prabhupāda, although beyond the varṇāśrama designation of sannyāsa, was nevertheless the best sannyāsī and the creator of many other sannyāsīs, whom he instructed to follow in his footsteps. He said his sannyāsīs should do even more than he—make more followers, publish more books, and establish more ISKCON centers.

On returning to Bombay, Prabhupāda was disappointed to find that the devotees had neither paid Mr. N. nor moved to Juhu. Madhudviṣa Swami, whom Prabhupāda had put in charge, frankly admitted his inability to accept the responsibility for such a difficult project. The disciple Prabhupāda had originally deputed to handle such affairs was Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Mahārāja. But now that he had taken sannyāsa, he had renounced his G.B.C. duties for traveling and preaching, and Prabhupāda was without a manager for Bombay. Already Prabhupāda was doing most of the managing, but he couldn't do everything—he couldn't stay constantly in Bombay.

Searching for a veteran disciple to manage Juhu, Prabhupāda thought of Brahmānanda Swami, who was still preaching in Nairobi. Prabhupāda decided to fly to Africa and invite Brahmānanda Swami to come and manage Bombay. He wanted to act swiftly, so that ISKCON could take possession of the land. Even if Mr. N. changed his mind later, once the devotees were living on the land, getting them to leave would be very difficult for him.

Śrīla Prabhupāda planned to fly to Nairobi immediately, and he wanted to carry large Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa Deities with him. The Deities he had previously sent to Nairobi had been broken in shipping, so this time Prabhupāda brought with him strong-bodied Madhudviṣa Swami to carry the thirty-six-inch marble Deities. With special permission from the airlines, Prabhupāda boarded, followed by Madhudviṣa Swami, who held in his arms the one-hundred-pound Deity of Kṛṣṇa. After setting Kṛṣṇa in place beside Prabhupāda's seat, Madhudviṣa Swami left the plane and came back carrying Rādhārāṇī.

Prabhupāda passed most of the flight debating with Madhudviṣa Swami, who took the position of the impersonalist. Prabhupāda would always defeat him. "This is how you become a preacher," Prabhupāda said. "You must be able to take both sides of the argument and defeat your adversary. This is what Lord Caitanya would do."

Since Prabhupāda's first visit to Nairobi four months ago, Brahmānanda Swami and a few American devotees had rented a house near the city. They had recruited some African devotees but had not yet developed the temple and āśrama. Barely able to maintain their own simple program, they were unprepared to receive Śrīla Prabhupāda properly.

Typical of Prabhupāda's stay in Nairobi was his arrival: no one was at the airport to meet him. The devotees were not even sure if Prabhupāda was coming. Prabhupāda's secretary had phoned Brahmānanda Swami that Prabhupāda was willing to come to Kenya but that Brahmānanda Swami should try to arrange a meeting with the president and schedule a big paṇḍāl festival. Brahmānanda Swami, however, had never received a clear message of when Prabhupāda was coming.

At the airport Prabhupāda and Madhudviṣa Swami carefully put the Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa Deities into a taxicab and rode with Them to the address of the ISKCON center. Prabhupāda rang the doorbell, and when Brahmānanda Swami opened the door and saw his spiritual master, he cried out, "Prabhupāda!" and bowed down.

"What happened?" Prabhupāda asked, standing beside Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa. "Why no one came to pick us up at the airport?" Brahmānanda Swami was unable to reply.

No sooner did Prabhupāda arrive than his assistant, Madhudviṣa Swami, became bedridden with hepatitis. Prabhupāda had left his regular secretary, Śyāmasundara, in India to work on a legal case concerning the Māyāpur land, so he was now without a personal assistant.

In Nairobi Prabhupāda followed his usual schedule of bathing in the afternoon and then putting on fresh clothes, but one day after his bath he found that no clothes were ready. When he asked for them, Brahmānanda Swami explained that the African servant had washed them and put them on the line to dry. But when Brahmānanda Swami had gone to get them, they hadn't been there; apparently someone had stolen them from the clothesline. Prabhupāda tolerated the inconvenience without any display of emotion.

That evening, when the devotees of ISKCON Nairobi gathered in the temple to hear Prabhupāda speak from Bhagavad-gītā, Prabhupāda saw the different items of stolen clothing on the African boys; one boy wore the kurtā, another the top piece, and another the dhotī. Prabhupāda pointed this out to Brahmānanda Swami, who immediately took the boys out and retrieved the clothing from them. When Brahmānanda Swami returned the clothes, Prabhupāda didn't seem to take the offense seriously, but only laughed.

Prabhupāda did not laugh, however, at the Nairobi devotees' bad cooking. When they served him white maize mush, he called it pig food, and the hard, white chickpeas, he said, were suitable only for horses. Then Harikṛpā, a black devotee from America, went to the kitchen, boiled some vegetables, and served them to Prabhupāda without any spicing. Prabhupāda called it dog food. "You are still an uneducated African," he told Harikṛpā. And he went into the kitchen to cook for himself. Almost a dozen devotees joined him, watching him cook a complete meal of dāl, rice, capātīs, and sabjī. He cooked enough for all the devotees, and everyone was satisfied. Bad cooking and stolen clothing, however, continued to be problems during Prabhupāda's week-long stay in Nairobi.

Brahmānanda Swami found that Prabhupāda was mostly absorbed in his Bombay project. "The only reason I've come," Śrīla Prabhupāda told Brahmānanda Swami, "is to get you for this." Once he asked Brahmānanda Swami, "Which is the most important city in India?"

"Calcutta?" Brahmānanda replied.

"Calcutta?" Prabhupāda looked at him oddly. "Don't you know Bombay is number one? Delhi is number two, and Calcutta is number three."

Prabhupāda encouraged Brahmānanda Swami to return with him and take charge of the Bombay project. This Bombay project, he said, would be unique within ISKCON, incorporating the religious with the cultural in a gorgeous temple, international hotel, theater, and diorama exhibition. Seeing Prabhupāda's strong desire, Brahmānanda Mahārāja agreed to somehow relinquish his Nairobi responsibilities to others and help in Bombay.

In yet another way Prabhupāda's visit to Nairobi connected with his Bombay project. When Brahmānanda Swami and Cyavana showed Prabhupāda the Nairobi Hilton, a modern building with twin round towers, Prabhupāda liked the design and wanted to give it to his architect for the Bombay hotel and temple.

Prabhupāda, Brahmānanda Swami, Bhāgavata, and an African devotee were walking in Nairobi's public gardens. On being introduced to Prabhupāda, the African had inquired, "If I want to, can I get married?"

"Oh, yes," said Prabhupāda.

"But Prabhupāda," the boy continued, "if you want to get married in our community, the boy has to pay money to the father of the bride."

This was exactly opposite the Vedic system, Prabhupāda replied, wherein the father of the bride presents a dowry to his son-in-law. Hearing this, Prabhupāda's new disciple looked worried. He asked, "Then, will you give me money when I want to get my wife? Because I'm not working now, I'm just working for you. When I want to get my wife, will you give me money?"

Prabhupāda shook his head. "You don't worry about all of this," he said "—whether you'll get a wife, or whether you will get money, or this or that. Later on, when it is time for you to get married, I will bring one American girl, and you will marry her."

Wherever Prabhupāda turned in his fledgling Nairobi temple, he found neophyte disciples and discrepancies. Walking into the brahmacārī āśrama, he found books, boards, and paint cans scattered about the room. When he said things should be kept more neatly and orderly, the temple commander, Harikṛpā, replied, "Prabhupāda, I try to tell them, but these boys don't listen to me."

Prabhupāda bent down and picked up some pieces of wood. "If they don't do it," he said, "then you should do it! Put these over here." And Prabhupāda began engaging all the men present. Within five minutes the room was neat.

The World Hare Kṛṣṇa Movement Festival at Nairobi's City Stadium was a combination success and failure. Although Brahmānanda Swami had managed to see many highly posted government officials and diplomats, many of whom had promised to attend the festival, none of them actually appeared—except for Mr. Y. Komora, Kenya's director of education. But an audience of several hundred attended kīrtana, heard Prabhupāda's speech, and took prasādam.

Although the devotees had invited the leading Kenyan citizens to enhance the glorification of Kṛṣṇa, their honored guest, Mr. Komora, used the opportunity to speak in praise of Kenya. Nevertheless, he spoke highly of Prabhupāda and the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement. Regarding Bhagavad-gītā, he said, "Your learned founder has made this great book available in the English tradition with an erudite commentary."

Śrīla Prabhupāda also attended other engagements in and around Nairobi. He told his Nairobi disciples that in preaching to the Africans they should stress the chanting of Hare Kṛṣṇa by holding public kīrtanas. Lord Caitanya, he said, spoke philosophy only with learned scholars like Sanātana and Rūpa Gosvāmī, never with ordinary men. "Just chant Hare Kṛṣṇa," he said. "This should be appreciated."

Śrīla Prabhupāda installed the Deities of Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa and named the Nairobi temple Kirāta-śuddhi, "a place for purifying the aborigines." One day shortly after the Deity installation, however, Prabhupāda walked into the temple room and was shocked to find the Deities out of Their proper place in the center of the altar. Kṛṣṇa was standing to the far left beside the bottom step leading up to the altar, and Rādhārāṇī stood to the far right.

"Who has done this?" Prabhupāda called out loudly. Bhāgavata came running into the temple room. He also was astonished.

"Who has put Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa ten miles apart?" Prabhupāda demanded. "Don't you know these things? How many times do I have to teach you?"

Bhūta-bhāvana suddenly appeared, admitting that he was the culprit. "Why are They so far apart?" Prabhupāda asked.

"I don't know, Śrīla Prabhupāda," said Bhūta-bhāvana. "I guess I just forgot. I was being rushed to go to the festival."

"So," Prabhupāda demanded, "does that mean They should be put out in the street?" Bhūta-bhāvana froze, unable to reply. Prabhupāda relented. "Take Them and put Them together," he said. "They should not be moved more than three inches apart. Now do it nicely."

After a week Prabhupāda left Nairobi and returned to Bombay. He had gone there to get Brahmānanda Swami. And he had accomplished his mission. "Unless you agreed to take charge," Prabhupāda said, "I could not go ahead and pay so much money. Now it is decided." He felt new hope.

Prabhupāda envisioned his Bombay project as extraordinary within ISKCON and even among all the temples of India. Many of the details of the project already existed within his mind, but he needed competent disciples to carry them out. He was still the lone leader of ISKCON, forging ahead to bring into reality new phases of the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement. His disciples were behind him, but it was always he who led. Even when he wanted his disciples as leaders of various ISKCON projects, they sometimes could not handle the responsibility. Therefore Śrīla Prabhupāda had gone to Nairobi in the mood of the Bengali aphorism he sometimes quoted: "If you want to accomplish a thing, do it by your own hand." So by his own hand he had brought Brahmānanda Swami from Nairobi to Bombay. And simultaneously he had benefited the devotees and the general populace of Nairobi.

February 8, 1972

Prabhupāda met with Mr. N. and reiterated that he wanted to move onto the land as soon as Mr. N. received the second fifty thousand rupees. Mr. N. stood firm on their agreement, and Prabhupāda put the matter into the hands of his lawyer, Mr. D., for legal processing.

Although Prabhupāda was making all the managerial decisions, he wanted the G.B.C. secretaries to take on the responsibility for these practical affairs. He thought it better to use his energy in writing and translating books. "If you G.B.C. do everything nicely," he told his secretary Śyāmasundara, "then my brain will not be taxed and I can utilize my time completely to produce further books. I can give you Vedas, Upaniṣads, Purāṇas, Mahābhārata, Rāmāyaṇa—so many. There are so many devotional works in our line by the Gosvāmīs. This administrative work is taking too much time. I could be discussing philosophy. My brain is being taxed day and night. Because of this I'm neglecting my real work."

Aside from directly managing the Indian projects, Prabhupāda was answering as many as a dozen letters daily from devotees around the world. "Why do they keep writing, asking so many questions?" he asked his secretary.

"The devotees prefer to ask you personally," Śyāmasundara said, "because their G.B.C. men don't always know the right answer."

"They know everything by now," Prabhupāda replied. "I have given you everything. If they don't know the answer, they can find it in my books. Now I am an old man. Let me settle down to philosophy. All day reading letters, doing business, all night signing letters—this is not right. I want to be free from these things. The G.B.C. can do everything now."

But it wasn't possible. As soon as Prabhupāda would sense that one of his devotees was being cheated, he would immediately become actively involved. And his disciples continued to write him regarding important business and managerial decisions. Nor would he discourage them. His desire for retirement and exclusive literary work remained, but it seemed to be only a wishful thought, a dream. If ISKCON were to develop, then there seemed little scope for his retirement.

After the meeting with Mr. N., Prabhupāda prepared to leave for South India for a five-day paṇḍāl program in Madras; also on his itinerary were visits to Calcutta, Māyāpur, and Vṛndāvana. As he prepared to leave Bombay he felt happy that ISKCON would soon occupy the new Juhu property, and he frequently spoke of his plans.

ISKCON would erect a fabulous temple and form a cooperative housing society of devotees of Kṛṣṇa—the first ISKCON city. Respectable men would purchase flats in ISKCON's highrise condominium. Devotees would have to become expert to develop and operate such a complex, and as they became successful, they would introduce the same pattern in other cities. Businessmen and professional workers could live as devotees in a co-op society, housing their families and sending their children to an ISKCON school.

Prabhupāda repeatedly talked of constructing an international hotel, somewhat like a Holiday Inn, suitable for foreigners and traveling businessmen, yet reserving a floor for ISKCON life members, who would receive free accommodations. The restaurant would be managed by expert brāhmaṇa cooks, who would prepare dozens of different prepa rations of sumptuous prasādam. The Deities Rādhā-Rāsavihārī would receive fifty-two offerings daily, and the prasādam would be distributed to residents and guests.

To start things in the right direction, Prabhupāda ordered the devotees to immediately arrange for a ten-day public festival on the new land. First Brahmānanda Swami should pay the agreed balance and move onto the land along with all the devotees and the Deities, Rādhā-Rāsavihārī. Then they should prepare a big paṇḍāl tent and arrange a full program as they had previously in Bombay, in Calcutta, and in Delhi. Prabhupāda wanted everything ready for his return in two weeks.

Although, as Prabhupāda would sometimes mention, in South India the original Vedic culture was most intact, he had not been there in several years. Most of the great ācāryas, Śaṅkara, Rāmānuja, and Madhva, had come from South India, and Lord Caitanya Mahāprabhu, during His own touring, had found South India especially favorable.

Just after the Hare Kṛṣṇa paṇḍāl festival in Delhi, on the eve of Prabhupāda's first tour of Vṛndāvana with his disciples, back in November of 1971, Acyutānanda Swami, Brahmānanda Swami, and Girirāja had volunteered to go to Madras to arrange a preaching program for Śrīla Prabhupāda. When Acyutānanda Swami had informed Prabhupāda of the plan, Prabhupāda had asked, "Oh, you are not going to Vṛndāvana with us?"

"ISKCON is Vṛndāvana," Acyutananda Swami had replied.

"Yes," Prabhupāda had said, "my Guru Mahārāja used to think like that."

"But which do you want us to do?" Girirāja had asked. "What is the better service?"

"I want to put on a paṇḍāl in Madras," Prabhupāda had replied. "That would be more pleasing."

Madras

February 11, 1972

Prabhupāda, accompanied by twenty disciples, arrived in Madras and immediately took part in a parade through the streets. The parade, led by a decorated elephant and a marching band, followed by the devotees' kīrtana, featured Prabhupāda riding in an old, flower-covered American limousine.

Prabhupāda stayed as the guest of Mr. Balu, a Madras businessman. For three nights in the large hall packed with five thousand people, Prabhupāda lectured in English. One evening he told a story from the Caitanya-caritāmṛta of an illiterate South Indian brāhmaṇa whom Lord Caitanya Mahāprabhu recognized for his staunch devotion to his spiritual master and to the Bhagavad-gītā. The next morning and each subsequent morning The Hindu, one of Madras's two leading newspapers, printed a full summary of Prabhupāda's lecture. The other principal newspaper gave a more general account of A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami's arrival and the parade with his Western followers.

The large three-day program was followed by a more select gathering, sponsored by Mr. K. Vira Swami, the chief justice of Madras. Attending the function were judges, lawyers, and other leading citizens of the city. Several thousand people gathered beneath the open pavilion as Prabhupāda spoke about Rūpa Gosvāmī and Sanātana Gosvāmī of Vṛndāvana, who had given up their important government positions to join the movement of Caitanya Mahāprabhu. Indirectly, Prabhupāda was requesting all the attending leaders of Madras to join the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement.

Prabhupāda was aware that his audience, although respectful, was steeped in impersonalism—deep-seated conviction that impersonal Brahman was supreme and that all Hindu gods were equal manifestations of the One. And Prabhupāda ended his talk by imploring his audience to accept Kṛṣṇa as the Supreme Personality of Godhead. "Just repeat," he said, " 'Kṛṣṇa is the Supreme Personality of Godhead.' " His appeal was so urgent and humble that some members of the audience actually repeated aloud, "Kṛṣṇa is the Supreme Personality of Godhead." The Hindu's editor and publisher, Mr. Kasturi, was in attendance, and he printed a detailed summary of Prabhupāda's speech in the next day's paper.

In addition to the usual news coverage, Śrīla Prabhupāda held a press conference at a Madras hotel. Already happy with the press coverage, he appealed further to the roomful of reporters.

Girirāja: Prabhupāda wasn't speaking to them as if they were newspaper reporters. Usually a newspaper reporter has a stereotyped idea of who he is, and you giving an interview, so you have your stereotyped idea of who you are. And you answer his questions, thinking of how it will be published. But I could see that Prabhupāda was speaking to these reporters as spirit souls, as individual persons who are meant to be devotees of Kṛṣṇa. Even though they were addressing him as newspaper reporters, he was answering them in a completely different way. He was encouraging them and saying, "This reporting that you have done is very nice. Kṛṣṇa will bless you. Please help spread this movement." They were asking questions, thinking of his answers in terms of something to publish in the newspapers. But Prabhupāda took it that they were spirit souls reaching out toward Kṛṣṇa consciousness, and he answered in that way.

Within a few days of Prabhupāda's arrival, the whole city was feeling the presence of the Hare Kṛṣṇa movement. Prabhupāda scarcely slept, using the early-morning hours for translating, even after his late-night speaking engagements. He would go from place to place all day with great vitality, outdoing his young followers.

Prabhupāda's host, Mr. Balu, although a prominent businessman, was also well known as a religious man. He received Prabhupāda warmly and respectfully, according to proper Vedic etiquette. Prabhupāda noted that Mr. Balu had his own temple with beautiful Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa Deities and a large tulasī plant. When the devotees accompanying Śrīla Prabhupāda asked Mr. Balu why the Deities were often dressed in black, he replied that They were so effulgent that if he didn't dress Them in black he wouldn't be able to look on Them. He did not make prostrated obeisances to his Deity because he and his wife were Kṛṣṇa's father and mother, he said, and how can the father pay obeisances to his son?

Prabhupāda and his host related to each other graciously. But one night Mr. Balu and his wife came to Śrīla Prabhupāda and asked him to please speak about the rāsa-līlā* of Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa. Prabhupāda replied that the rāsa-līlā, being the most exalted spiritual topic, was meant only for liberated souls. Only one completely free of material desires, Prabhupāda explained, was fit to hear the rāsa-līlā.

"No, Swamiji," Mr. Balu insisted. "My wife and I are very keen. You must recite rāsa-līlā."

Again Prabhupāda described the exalted position of the rāsa dance, repeating that only when one is completely free of all material attachments to wife, family, home, and money could he become fit to hear of Kṛṣṇa's rāsa dance. Mr. Balu then folded his hands and politely repeated, "Swamiji, my wife and I plead with you. Please recite rāsa-līlā."

Then Prabhupāda replied, "Well, you may be fit to hear rāsa-līlā, but I do not feel that I am qualified to speak it. So kindly ask someone else."

Prabhupāda met privately with various important citizens of Madras. If the leaders of society became Kṛṣṇa conscious, he would explain, then they, by their example, would create Kṛṣṇa consciousness in the general populace. Never compromising, never flattering his important visitors, he tried to impart Kṛṣṇa consciousness to whomever he met.

He met with the governor of Madras, K. K. Shah, a staunch Māyāvādī and follower of Śaṅkarācārya. Patiently Prabhupāda tried to teach him Kṛṣṇa consciousness, but the governor would interrupt with his own philosophy. When Prabhupāda asked him to somehow help the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement, the man replied that as governor there was nothing he could do, since everything was in the hands of the chief minister.

Residing in Madras was an elderly scholar and former leading politician who had written several books and translations of Vedic philosophy from the impersonalist point of view. Prabhupāda visited him, but the man was paralyzed and could only sit, trembling, without speaking. Prabhupāda spoke for some time about personalism in the Gītā. The old scholar sometimes responded with a glimmer in his eye, but he could only make incoherent sounds. Previously Prabhupāda had criticized this man's translation of the Gītā, which declares that although Kṛṣṇa says surrender unto Him, we don't actually have to surrender unto the person Kṛṣṇa but to the impersonal, eternal principle within Kṛṣṇa. The meeting seemed to have a strong effect on Śrīla Prabhupāda, and for days afterward he would sometimes soberly mention how the old Māyāvādī scholar was living almost like a vegetable.

Śrīla Prabhupāda also met with V. Raj Gopala Acarya (Rajaji), who had been India's first chief executive after independence. A friend of Mahatma Gandhi, Rajaji was high in the public sentiment as a religious politician. Although in his nineties, he was alert and very sympathetic to Prabhupāda's movement. Rajaji expressed only one doubt: Prabhupāda had created such a huge institution that now his disciples might identify with the institution rather than with Kṛṣṇa. If that were to happen, then by identifying with the institution they would again fall into the same type of materialism or false identification as before. Prabhupāda replied that because Kṛṣṇa is absolute, Kṛṣṇa and Kṛṣṇa's institution are nondifferent. To identify with Kṛṣṇa's institution was to identify with Kṛṣṇa directly. Rajaji was satisfied by Prabhupāda's answer, and after a pleasant conversation the two friends parted.

Prabhupāda received an invitation to Chief Justice Vira Swami's home. The two became friends, and the chief justice requested to join the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement as soon as possible. He liked Prabhupāda's followers, especially three-year-old Sarasvatī, and gave her a six-inch silver mūrti of Kṛṣṇa playing the flute.

Another evening, Mr. Vira Swami came to see Prabhupāda, and Prabhupāda mentioned that he thought Sarasvatī too young to have such a valuable silver mūrti and that he had taken it from her and was going to give her another one. But while they were talking, Sarasvatī burst into the room and ran to her mother, crying, "Kṛṣṇa is gone!"

Śrīla Prabhupāda then called her forward and asked, "Sarasvatī, where is Kṛṣṇa?"

In anxiety, Sarasvatī replied, "I don't know. Someone took Him."

Prabhupāda repeated, "But where is Kṛṣṇa?"

Sarasvatī replied, "I don't know."

"Is He under the cushion?" Prabhupāda suggested. And Sarasvatī ran over to the cushion Prabhupāda pointed to. She picked it up, but Kṛṣṇa was not there.

"Is He on the shelf?" Prabhupāda asked. Sarasvatī ran to the shelf. Her eyes darted in all directions.

"Where is Kṛṣṇa?" Sarasvatī began appealing to the faces of the devotees, glancing at their hands, looking behind their backs, searching everywhere.

Prabhupāda, intently watching Sarasvatī, began reciting a verse about the six Gosvāmīs: he rādhe vraja-devike ca lalite he nanda-suno kutaḥ. "This is the mood of the Gosvāmīs," he said. "They never said, 'Now I have seen God. Now I am satisfied.' No, rather they were saying, 'Where is Rādhā? Where is Kṛṣṇa? Where are You all now? Are You on Govardhana, or are You under the trees on the bank of the Yamunā? Where are You?' In this way they expressed their moods of Kṛṣṇa consciousness."

Sarasvatī's anxiety had become heightened to the point of tears. One of the devotees then hinted, "Sarasvatī, where is Kṛṣṇa? Who has Kṛṣṇa?" Sarasvatī's eyes widened. She exclaimed, "Prabhupāda has Kṛṣṇa!" and she rushed up to Prabhupāda, convinced that he was holding Kṛṣṇa. And Prabhupāda reached behind his seat and pulled out a small Kṛṣṇa mūrti similar to the silver Kṛṣṇa he had taken from her.

"Here is Kṛṣṇa, Sarasvatī" Prabhupāda said. Sarasvatī was in ecstasy. All the devotees were struck by Prabhupāda's exchange of devotional feelings with even a small child; by his expertise he had created within her a mood of separation from Kṛṣṇa. Prabhupāda continued explaining to the chief justice about the mood of separation from Kṛṣṇa.

For centuries certain religious and social controversies had divided Madras, and Prabhupāda often addressed these issues. One conflict was between the brāhmaṇas and the non-brāhmaṇas. Because those born in brāhmaṇa families had traditionally monopolized the important governmental, social, and religious posts, the non-brāhmaṇas had developed a powerful political opposition, passing laws banning such things as religious pictures. In their mundane political conception of the sacred Rāmāyaṇa, they had even committed offenses to the Deities of Lord Rāma.

In talking with his disciples, Śrīla Prabhupāda said, "The chief justice is brāhmaṇa? I don't think so. He may be a kṣatriya. But you can tell him that we can solve the whole problem between the brāhmaṇas and the non-brāhmaṇas. We will give facility that anyone can become a brāhmaṇa. He simply has to follow our principles, and we will make him a brāhmaṇa." Prabhupāda said the śāstra states that in Kali-yuga the demons will take birth as brāhmaṇas, thus this deep controversy. The so-called brāhmaṇas, the leaders, were not satisfying the people. Prabhupāda said that anyone who followed the four regulative principles, chanted Hare Kṛṣṇa, and took Vaiṣṇava initiation could become a brāhmaṇa, and that would solve the whole problem.

They should begin, Prabhupāda said, by making Chief Justice Vira Swami a brāhmaṇa. Mr. Vira Swami admitted that he was already eager to take initiation from Śrīla Prabhupāda; his only difficulty was giving up tea-drinking. When Prabhupāda heard this, he said that even if the justice did drink a little tea, he would accept him—as an exceptional case.

Some of Madras's caste-conscious brāhmaṇas criticized Śrīla Prabhupāda's creating brāhmaṇas from low-born Westerners. During a gathering at the home of a Madrasi brāhmaṇa, one of the guests commented to Prabhupāda, "Swamiji, your disciples don't pronounce the Sanskrit very nicely. Even the Hare Kṛṣṇa mantra they sometimes do not say correctly."

"Yes," Prabhupāda replied, "that is why we have come here—to get your association so you can teach us."

Śrīla Prabhupāda encountered another long-standing South Indian feud—between the Śaivites (followers of Lord Śiva) and the Vaiṣṇavas (followers of Lord Viṣṇu). The Śaivites generally espoused an impersonalistic philosophy, declaring God to be the Impersonal One appearing in many forms, such as Śiva and Kṛṣṇa. But since all the forms were one ultimately, fighting as to which god was best was petty and childish. Prabhupāda's disciples found this philosophy difficult to deal with, and when Girirāja had argued with a wealthy Śaivite, Mr. Ramakrishna, they had separated with hurt feelings. But in meetings with other persons in Madras, Girirāja was often reminded, "Have you met Mr. Ramakrishna? He is a very good man and a leader in religious functions." Girirāja became embarrassed and decided to make another attempt to win Mr. Ramakrishna's friendship.

They talked again, but remained unsatisfied. Girirāja then informed Prabhupāda and asked if he would meet Mr. Ramakrishna himself. Prabhupāda agreed.

When they met, Mr. Ramakrishna began by saying, "Swamiji, we have been having some discussion about devotion to Lord Kṛṣṇa and devotion to Lord Śiva. What do you say? Who is greater? Kṛṣṇa or Śiva?"

Prabhupāda replied that actually the word bhakti, or "devotion," could not properly be applied to the worship of Lord Śiva. Bhakti, he said, meant service without any material desire, whereas pūjā included service with the desire for some return. Bhakti, therefore, could only be applied to Kṛṣṇa.

"But isn't it possible," asked Mr. Ramakrishna, "for someone to be a bhakta of Lord Śiva and to worship Lord Śiva simply out of devotion, without desiring any material benefit?"

"It may be possible," Prabhupāda replied, "but generally not. Just like when a person enters a liquor shop, generally it's taken that he is going for drinking, although there may be some exception."

Prabhupāda gave the example of the gopīs' worship of the goddess Kātyāyanī; their worship had not been for material benefit but for devotion to Kṛṣṇa. Similarly, if one worshiped Lord Śiva with the aim of serving Lord Kṛṣṇa, that would be bhakti. But people generally approach Śiva for material benefit. Although Mr. Ramakrishna was usually prone to argue these points, Prabhupāda's answer satisfied him.

Śrīla Prabhupāda's most acute controversy in Madras was not with smārta-brāhmaṇas, Māyāvādīs, or Śaivites, but with some of his own Godbrothers. Although some of them acknowledged Śrīla Prabhupāda's incomparable preaching in the West on behalf of their spiritual master, Śrīla Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī, others were envious. One envious Godbrother wrote to Śrīla Prabhupāda in Madras.

Reverend Swamiji,

I listened to your discourse on Bhakti at Rajiswari Kalayana Mandapam on the 12th instant. I am filled with doubts on the following:

Your disciples dance with Hare Krishna mantram, (I) are they really God-intoxicated as Lord Chaitanya (II) Have you Swamiji really got free of your ego? If so, why you said, "I challenge," and why are words like "I" and "my" always on your lips? (III) Why do you use a cushion unlike a real yogi—Did Lord Chaitanya use cushions? (IV) Why do you wear ring and a wrist gold watch? Are you not free from material attachment? (V) Did you visit Lord Chaitanya Krishna Temple at Gaudiya Math? If not, why not—The purest Vaishnava cult is indwelling there with pious Swamijis with Lord Krishna dwelling therein. Melodious sound from your throat is absent but a jarceing [sic] undivine comes out. Is there any divinity in your person? I doubt. One disgusted on hearing your speech.

Although Śrīla Prabhupāda was surprised and hurt by the extreme virulence of such a letter, he was accustomed to his Godbrothers' slights and insults. He forbade his disciples, however, to get involved in fights with his Godbrothers. Rather, they should simply avoid them. He said that persons who criticize the spreading of the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement were useless and that he would push on: "The dogs may bark, but the caravan will pass."

In contrast to the venomous letter came a letter from Tridaṇḍī Svāmī B.V. Purī Mahārāja, another of Śrīla Prabhupāda's Godbrothers. Purī Mahārāja, as Prabhupāda called him, had a small āśrama in Visakhapatnam, on the Bay of Bengal between Madras and Calcutta. Hearing that Prabhupāda was going next to Calcutta, Purī Mahārāja invited him to visit.

With innumerable Satsanga Dandabats at Thy lotus feet, I beg to acknowledge the kind letter... The citizens of Visakhapatnam are very anxious to have the darshan of your holiness... We are exceedingly glad and eager to hear Sankirtana and the divine message from your holy lips. I hope the Sankirtana movement at Madras is attracting thousands of citizens. Again, with dandabats to all the Vaishnavas, I remain dasanu B.V. Purī.

Visakhapatnam

February 17, 1972

A broad beach of white sparkling sands and the Bay of Bengal's warm, clear waters were special features of Śrīla Prabhupāda's visit to Visakhapatnam. Purī Mahārāja's small āśrama, where Śrīla Prabhupāda stayed, was only five minutes from the ocean, and every morning Prabhupāda and his entourage of about fifteen devotees would take long walks along the seashore.

Yamunā: I don't think Prabhupāda ever excluded any of us from going with him to the beach. All the devotees knew at which time Śrīla Prabhupāda would be taking his walk, and we would come out from our different quarters and follow him to the seashore. The walks were brisk and refreshing and full of talk about Kṛṣṇa. Somehow or other, we were all able to hear Śrīla Prabhupāda speak.

Guru dāsa: I always went on every morning walk. But one time I was sitting in the temple, when suddenly I saw Prabhupāda and the devotees going toward the beach. I immediately ran out of the temple to join them, without even taking time to get my shoes. But there were barnacles and rocks leading down to the beach. When Prabhupāda saw me coming, lifting my feet up high, painfully hobbling down the rough road, he looked over and said, "Oh, your feet are hurting? Why aren't you wearing shoes?" And I said, "Prabhupāda, when I'm with you, I don't feel any pain." Prabhupāda stopped and said, "Then why don't you cut your throat?" Everyone laughed, and I laughed also. He said, "There is enough tapasya. Why create your own?"

Gurukṛpā: Prabhupāda would talk philosophy on and on. There were many things I couldn't understand. I would just listen anyway, although I couldn't remember anything. I would just hear and hear, but it hadn't registered yet. I used to walk behind him on the beach, and I figured that, "If I can't follow his teachings or example yet, at least let me step in his footsteps in the sand."

Viśakhā: Sometimes a dog would try to follow us or would bark at us. We were all surprised to see how Prabhupāda would flick his cane and the dog would run away. Once when we passed a cow on the road, Prabhupāda gave her ample room to pass, and he told us the story of how he had been gored by a cow shortly after he had taken sannyāsa.

Tejās: Once on a morning walk Prabhupāda was speaking about the dog. He gave a reference to a śloka by Cāṇakya Paṇḍita about the five good qualities of a dog—that he is very faithful and satisfied with anything. And soon Prabhupāda said we should be Kṛṣṇa's dog. He was also speaking about how our pūjārīs should never be paid. The teacher and the pūjārī should never receive a salary. They must work in pure devotion. The kṣatriya also. He said that was the mistake in government today, that the kṣatriyas are being paid. He discussed so many things, one after another.

Nanda-kumāra: Śrīla Prabhupāda would tell us to go bathe in the ocean. "Go to the beach," he would say. So one day I asked him, "Śrīla Prabhupāda, whenever I go down to the beach, the sun is warm on my body, the water feels so good, the sand—it seems like such a comfortable material situation. How should I understand your reason for asking us to go to the beach? I know the spiritual master never gives the disciple anything that will cause him to become materially attached but always gives him whatever he needs to remember Kṛṣṇa. But when I go to the beach, it seems I just enjoy my senses. How can I relate that to Kṛṣṇa? How can I understand that this instruction is for my spiritual benefit?"

Prabhupāda said, "The sun is there—Kṛṣṇa is the light of the sun. The ocean is there—Kṛṣṇa is the taste of water. You are surrounded by Kṛṣṇa. How can you forget Kṛṣṇa? He is all around you."

Pāñcajanya: I was a new devotee, and I asked Prabhupāda, "What about swimming, Śrīla Prabhupāda? Is that not mātā?" Prabhupāda said, "Lord Caitanya used to go swimming all the time. He used to play ball. So you can go and swim. Just make sure you remember Kṛṣṇa."

Purī Mahārāja's āśrama was a simple single-story building of about eight rooms. When he offered Prabhupāda a room next to his own, Prabhupāda was pleased, accepting it as an expression of friendship. Prabhupāda relaxed with his Godbrothers, Purī Mahārāja and Ānanda Brahmācārī, speaking with them in Bengali. Purī Mahārāja said he appreciated Prabhupāda's work and his Western disciples.

Prabhupāda's disciples had already seen formal exchanges of obeisances between Prabhupāda and his Godbrothers, as when in Bombay they had seen Prabhupāda get off his vyāsāsana and offer daṇḍavats to his Godbrothers. But in Visakhapatnam they saw more intimate dealings. They saw for the first time Śrīla Prabhupāda living comfortably, at ease, in the same quarters as his Godbrothers. And they didn't feel themselves being treated condescendingly or superficially, or being regarded as oddities. Through Prabhupāda's guidance they began to learn more of the essential friendly and humble exchanges between Vaiṣṇavas.

Prabhupāda's Godbrother Ānanda was eager to cook and serve not only Śrīla Prabhupāda but all his disciples. Ānanda was elderly, and yet he took the position of always offering menial service. Although he spoke very little English, Prabhupāda's disciples could perceive the affection of Ānanda and Śrīla Prabhupāda for each other. Ānanda's communication with Prabhupāda's disciples was particularly through his cooking and serving of prasādam.

Each morning everyone would gather on the veranda outside Prabhupāda's quarters, the men sitting on one side, the ladies on the other. Down the center aisle Ānanda would walk briskly, distributing prasādam, while Prabhupāda sat at one end in a wooden chair, fingering his japa beads and observing the devotees take prasādam. Prabhupāda had supplied money to the āśrama, and Ānanda was regularly cooking sumptuous feasts: deep-fried chunks of potatoes in powdered spices, rice, yogurt, dāl, three different types of sabjīs, french fries, chutney, malpurā, rājkeḷi, sandeśa, kṣīra—and everything cooked to a nectarean standard of excellence.

Prabhupāda would sit at the head of the two rows of devotees and encourage them to take prasādam: "Give him more!" Prabhupāda would praise Ānanda's cooking, smiling with pleasure to see his disciples accept prasādam. The devotees would finish, having been induced to eat as much as they possibly could, and Śrīla Prabhupāda would say aloud the prema-dhvani. Then all the devotees would shout in response, "Jaya!"

After one such feast, Prabhupāda called the devotees into his room and remarked, "See how he is cooking. He cooks everything, he serves it, and then he doesn't eat until everyone is fully satisfied. This is Vaiṣṇava, how he should act. He is more satisfied to serve than to enjoy himself." The feasts continued twice a day, and in the evening many guests arrived to take prasādam, chant in the kīrtanas, and hear Śrīla Prabhupāda lecture.

One day Śrīla Prabhupāda took his disciples to see a famous temple of Lord Nṛsiṃha, Śrī Siṃhācalam, on top of a hill about five miles north of Visakhapatnam. Thousands of stone steps led up the hill to the temple, which was situated in a natural amphitheater on the side of the hill. Prabhupāda said the temple, which was now run by followers of the Rāmānuja sect, was particularly important because Lord Caitanya had visited there on His tour of South India.

Śrīla Prabhupāda chose to approach the temple by car, riding up the winding road past orchards of mango, jackfruits, and cashew, and fields of pineapple. On arriving at the temple, Śrīla Prabhupāda and his disciples met one of the temple brāhmaṇas, who showed them around the grounds. The temple buildings were of black granite, and carved into the rock were the forms and pastimes of Viṣṇu, especially in His incarnation of Lord Nṛsiṃha. As Prabhupāda moved from place to place, building to building, he sometimes rode up steep stairs on a palanquin carried by four men.

When Prabhupāda came upon an immense banyan tree at the lower end of the temple grounds, he said that the tree must be thousands of years old. As he stood beneath the tree, his servant, Nandakumāra, handed him a small campaka flower. Extending his thumb and forefinger from his bead bag, Prabhupāda held the campaka flower and looked fondly at it. "This flower," he said, "is the color of Lord Caitanya. And this flower is the most loved all over India. This flower is beautiful to look at and beautiful to smell." He carried the small saffron-gold flower between his fingers throughout the rest of the morning.

When Prabhupāda and his group entered the inner sanctum, where the Deity of Lord Nṛsiṃha resided, their guide explained that the mūrti dated back to the time of Prahāda Mahārāja. An ancient king named Purūravā and his consort Urvaśī had once visited this hill, and at the request of Urvaśī, the mūrti, who appeared to her in a dream, had been excavated. The Lord had ordained that He should be worshiped in this place but that He would give darśana only one day a year, during the month of Vaiśākha. The rest of the year He would be entirely covered with ground sandalwood pulp mixed with camphor and other scents. Therefore, the Deity now appeared to be only a lump covered with a layer of sandalwood. Prabhupāda commented that the sandalwood was to keep the Deity "cool-headed."

Mādhavānanda: When Prabhupāda was at the Nṛsiṃha temple in Visakhapatnam, it was the same as when he was in Vṛndāvana. When he got out of the car, he was very grave. We went into the temple, and there was a chamber. Then we went down. The walls were four feet thick, and it seemed like hundreds of feet of tunnels before we got into the inner sanctum. There was the Deity with just a mound of sandalwood paste on Him. As soon as we entered, Prabhupāda said, "Begin chanting the Nṛsiṃha mantra." So we started singing tava kara-kamala-vare nakham adbhuta-śṛṅgam. And we circumambulated the Deity. Then we stood before the Deity, and Prabhupāda offered obeisances.

Gurukrpā: When we came into the Deity room, Prabhupāda had us sing the Nṛsiṃha prayers. He always manifested such devotion. That was what separated him from us—not only his learning or his knowledge, but his devotion. In these places we would see him become very silent, very grave, and when he would speak, such peace would fill us from within. When he would speak, you could feel it. He was constantly convincing us of Kṛṣṇa consciousness. Not purposely, but he was just being himself. In these places it would come out.

When Prabhupāda stood with us before the Deity, we couldn't even see. There was just a mound of sandalwood. There was one brāhmaṇa with big earlobes, and he had a ring in his ear. We offered some money. But it was a very devotional time. Prabhupāda didn't say much, and the main reason was that these places are appreciated according to one's spiritual advancement. The details and facts and the history are not really that important. There is nothing really to say. Prabhupāda would just make sure we had the proper respect and didn't commit any offense.

Prabhupāda would lecture in the evening, speaking sometimes at schools and social clubs in Visakhapatnam. During the program at the Ramakrishna Hall, where more than a thousand people attended, Śrīla Prabhupāda's dancing induced the entire audience to dance. The devotees danced in a ring around Śrīla Prabhupāda, and the kīrtana continued for an hour.

At another program a bearded American anthropologist rode up on a motorcycle to attend Prabhupāda's lecture and kīrtana. Afterward, the anthropologist told Śrīla Prabhupāda that he had come to India to study the primitive tribes. Prabhupāda told him it was simply a waste of time. "Why do you want to study the primitive people?" he asked. "Why don't you study the exalted people?" And Prabhupāda narrated a story:

One time a poor man roasted a cob of corn and then began picking off the kernels one at a time and eating them. In this way it took him many hours to finish. He did this, Prabhupāda said, because he had nothing else to do, just to pass the time of day. In the same way, the study of anthropology was simply a waste of time. Prabhupāda asked, "Why don't you study some person or group of persons from whom you can learn something?"

During the day Prabhupāda would sit outside his room and enjoy the atmosphere. He wore no shirt, and his healthy body shone with a golden luster as he sat drinking freshly pressed sugarcane juice. "This is just how it is in Vaiṣṇava," he said. "There is always a very cool, pleasant breeze." He often walked about, chanting, talking about Kṛṣṇa, listening to the devotees' kīrtanas, and observing the activities of the temple.

Repeatedly Prabhupāda invited Purī Mahārāja to come and preach in the West. He requested him to at least come to Māyāpur for ISKCON's international gathering of devotees. Prabhupāda felt that Purī Mahārāja, on seeing all the Western disciples, might feel moved to join him and preach. Purī Mahārāja agreed to accompany Prabhupāda to Calcutta and Māyāpur, and the pleasant week in Visakhapatnam came to an end with Prabhupāda, his disciples, and Purī Mahārāja looking forward to traveling together to Calcutta.

Gurukṛpā: Although we arrived at the train station early, the train was already at the platform. It was very hot, and five or six of us were having kīrtana. Then Śyāmasundara climbed up a coconut tree and got this fantastic coconut. He opened it and gave it to Prabhupāda, who proceeded to drink a lot. Then Prabhupāda gave it to Śyāmasundara, and Śyāma sundara drank. Then Prabhupāda said, "Give it to the kīrtana members." Each man in the kīrtana group was so thirsty that he wasn't even thinking of leaving any for the next man but would just pass this coconut around. And the thing wouldn't empty. I tilted it up, and the coconut water was coming out, pouring on my shirt, and I was drinking and drinking. But still it wouldn't empty. We were amazed. Prabhupāda was smiling, and we were chanting. We all became cool and satisfied.

Śyāmasundara: Prabhupāda and I were in a first-class railway coach, a private compartment for two persons, clackity-clacking through the warm Indian night, somewhere between Visakhapatnam and Calcutta. Prabhupāda was talking and joking and playing tapes until around ten-thirty P.M., when he lay down to take rest. For a while I switched off the lights. At about midnight Prabhupāda sat upright and called my name. “Śyāmasundara, take dictation,” he said. Then followed a train of thoughts so lucid and coherent that I could only conclude that while we think Śrīla Prabhupāda is sleeping he is usually not sleeping but is thinking, reflecting on ways to serve Kṛṣṇa more and more.

SPL 39: I Will Build a Wonderful Temple for You

CHAPTER THIRTY-NINE

I Will Build

a Wonderful Temple for You

Prabhupāda had postponed the Māyāpur cornerstone-laying ceremony until Gaura-pūrṇimā (the appearance day of Lord Caitanya), February 29, 1972. He had requested a big festival, with a paṇḍāl and free feasting for guests. His disciples from all over the world would attend.

I want very much to hold this function this year with all of my students... It is a very important day and it will be a great service to Śrīla Bhaktivinode Thakur and to His son Śrīla Bhaktisiddhanta Saraswati Thakur. So please arrange for this program.

In December, when the war had broken out between India and Pakistan over Bangladesh, near Māyāpur, the Indian government had forbidden foreigners to stay in the northern area of West Bengal. The devotees had vacated, returning a few weeks later when the war had ended. They had continued arranging for the festival, and a few days before Gaura-pūrṇimā Prabhupāda arrived to stay with them.

When Prabhupāda saw a banner on bamboo poles—“Welcome Śrīla Prabhupāda!”—he remarked, “I don't know if my Godbrothers will like this.” He had already heard that some of his Godbrothers objected to his taking the same title as their spiritual master, Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī Prabhupāda. He had not actually taken the name, but his disciples had given him the name a few years ago in America. In May 1968 while in Boston, Prabhupāda had been dictating a letter and had mentioned to his secretary that Swamiji was a third-class title for the spiritual master. “Then why do we call you Swamiji?” his secretary had asked.

“May we call you Prabhupāda?” his secretary had asked.

Prabhupāda had replied, "Yes," and his disciples had switched from "Swamiji" to "Prabhupāda." One of the devotees had inquired further from Prabhupāda about the meaning of the word and had published a statement in Back to Godhead magazine.

Prabhupāda

The word Prabhupāda is a term of the utmost reverence in Vedic religious circles, and it signifies a great saint even among saints. The word actually has two meanings: first, one at whose feet (pada) there are many Prabhus (a term meaning "master," which the disciples of a Guru use in addressing each other). The second meaning is one who is always found at the Lotus Feet of Krishna (the Supreme Master).

In the line of disciplic succession through which Krishna Consciousness is conveyed to mankind, there have been a number of figures of such spiritual importance as to be called Prabhupāda.

Śrīla Rupa Goswami Prabhupāda executed the will of his Master, Sri Chaitanya Mahaprabhu, and therefore he and his associate Goswamis are called Prabhupāda. Śrīla Bhakti Siddhanta Saraswati Goswami Thakur executed the will of Śrīla Bhaktivinode Thakur, and therefore he is also addressed as Prabhupāda. Our Spiritual Master, Om Vishnupad 108 Sri Śrīmad Bhaktivedanta Swami Maharaj has, in the same way, executed the will of Śrīla Bhakti Siddhanta Saraswati Goswami Prabhupāda in carrying the message of love of Krishna to the Western world, and therefore we American and European humble servants of His Divine Grace, from all the different centers of the Sankirtan Movement have followed in the footsteps of Śrīla Rupa Goswami Prabhupāda, and prefer to address His Grace our Spiritual Master as Prabhupāda, and he has kindly said "Yes."

Everyone concerned had been happy about the title Prabhupāda, and no one had foreseen the envy the name would uncover. How could Prabhupāda compete for the honor due his own spiritual master? He was fixed as the humble servant of his spiritual master.

The members of ISKCON saw no harm in calling their spiritual master Prabhupāda. And there could be no stopping them—he was their Prabhupāda. They had even printed A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami Prabhupāda on their invitations for the Gaura-pūrṇimā festival. But Prabhupāda knew it would raise the eyebrows of certain of his more critical Godbrothers.

When inspecting the living accommodations for the devotees, Prabhupāda found spacious white canvas tents—one for the men and one for the women—with fluorescent lighting inside. A large paṇḍāl tent stood in the center of the other tents, and a small tent in the rear served as a kitchen. Immediately surrounding the small compound were rice fields. The ground, therefore, was slightly moist, and the wet fields bred large mosquitoes, which emerged at sunset. Conditions were primitive, but many of these devotees were the same disciples who had traveled with Prabhupāda for a year and a half in India, sometimes living in dirty dharmaśālās with bare rooms and sometimes living in cold tents in Allahabad. The devotees had not come to Māyāpur to be comfortable but to serve Prabhupāda. In future years, by the result of their efforts, many, many devotees would be able to gather comfortably in Māyāpur in the spacious buildings Prabhupāda was planning.

Well aware that Westerners were unaccustomed to the austerities of living in India, Prabhupāda wanted to provide facilities so his disciples could feel comfortable and be able to focus their stay in India on spiritual life, without distracting inconveniences. Therefore he was pushing them to help in various ways to establish a Māyāpur building with running water, electricity, and other conveniences.

Prabhupāda's dwelling was a simple thatched Bengali hut about twelve feet square, with a dirt floor. A thin partition divided the main room from the servants' quarters. In front was a small veranda, and in back a garden, where Prabhupāda could sit and take massage. Also in back were a hand pump for bathing and an outhouse. When the devotees apologized for offering Prabhupāda such a humble residence, he replied that he liked the natural simplicity. "Even if you build me the biggest palace," he said, "still I would prefer to live here."

While living so simply in Māyāpur, Prabhupāda spoke of his vision of a grand project yet to come. Although the Deities of Rādhā-Mādhava—whom he had worshiped at the 1971 Ardha-kumbhamelā in Allahabad—were installed in a tent, he spoke of a marble palace. He also spoke of first-class accommodations for guests and devotees, although as yet he had little to offer. Living simply and happily in his thatched hut, he gathered his disciples together and told them of his plans. At his request, devotees had built a small model of the proposed first major building, and there were also drawings of the proposed Temple of Human Understanding. He wanted to build a Māyāpur city, he said, with quarters for each of the four social classes of the varṇāśrama institution.

Tatpara: When Prabhupāda would go to the Western countries, he would be interviewed by many great persons, but when he came to Māyāpur, he was talking so friendly, sometimes taking juice or giving instructions, and he lived simple, like a villager. The Western devotees think sometimes of Prabhupāda in one līlā only, like a great king. But when he comes to India, he is like another person. He was laughing and talking like a friend.

Bhavananda: In his straw house Prabhupāda sat on a bamboo platform. There was a bed and some mats on the floor. That was all. He was happier there than anywhere. We put a fan in there too, and Prabhupāda liked it. He liked it because it was so simple. There was an outhouse, but he didn't mind it at all. He was relishing everything. At that time he made Jayapataka and me codirectors of Māyāpur. He made four signers on the checking account for the building construction. In India, just to open up an account is very difficult. We were seeing that part of Prabhupāda, where he was very strict because he knows the difficulties you can run into. If you don't fill out the proper forms, the bank can even keep your money. Or you may want to close your account and they won't let you. Our mood was splayed out—we were babies. So Prabhupāda was training us in keeping accounts and management.

Jananivāsa: The first time Prabhupāda came to see the Deities, he said, "Who is dressing the Deities?" Someone said, "Jananivāsa." The Deities were just standing on a tile platform with no decoration. They were just standing there, but Prabhupāda looked on Them so lovingly. He used to come and take darśana every day. One time he came to the Deity room and I wasn't there. There were some Indian people taking darśana, and I had gone to get them a Back to Godhead magazine from a room about ten feet away. When I came back, Prabhupāda was there. He was also taking darśana, but he said, "You should always be standing here. People are coming, but no one is here."

I said, “Śrīla Prabhupāda, I just went to get a Back to Godhead. It is only ten feet away.” But he looked at me as if to say, “You are defending yourself again, making excuses.” Then he told Bhavānanda, “This boy, Jananivāsa, should have some help. He can't do everything. He is an ordinary person.”

The five-day Gaura-pūrṇimā festival featured twenty-four-hour kīr tana, with groups of devotees chanting in two-hour shifts. Each morning the main body of devotees would form a kīrtana procession and go out visiting Navadvīpa's holy sights: the nīm tree under which Lord Caitanya was born, the house of Śrīnivāsa Ācārya, where Lord Caitanya and His associates had performed nocturnal kīrtana, the spot where the Kazi had tried to stop Lord Caitanya's saṅkīrtana, the residence of Bhaktivinoda Ṭhākura. (Often Bhaktivinoda Ṭhākura had stood in front of this house, Prabhupāda told the devotees, and looked out across the Jalāngī toward where Śrīla Prabhupāda now had his land.)

Throughout the day and especially in the evenings, the devotees would gather on the stage of the orange-striped paṇḍāl, while Rādhā-Mādhava stood at stage center within a traditional Bengali simhāsana of carved banana stalks covered with colored foil and flower garlands. Prabhupāda would have his disciples do most of the public speaking, with Acyutānanda Swami, lecturing in Bengali, as the main speaker.

Hundreds of people came and went in a steady stream, and the devotees distributed Bengali, English, and Hindi Back to Godhead magazines. In the evenings they would present a slide show or a film. Prabhupāda was especially pleased to watch the prasādam distribution from his window, hundreds of villagers squatting in long rows, eating kicharī from round leaf plates. “Continue this forever,” Prabhupāda told his disciples. “Always distribute prasādam.”

Even without a building, Prabhupāda's preaching in Māyāpur was significant. While other nearby maṭhas were also observing Gaura-pūrṇimā—mostly by hosting Calcutta widows who paid a fee to live a few days in a temple and visit the holy places of Navadvīpa—Prabhupāda's paṇḍāl program was the most vigorous celebration and drew the most visitors. The birthplace of Lord Caitanya Mahāprabhu, Prabhupāda said, had no meaning without preaching. Except for this time of the year, very few people visited Māyāpur.

“Which is more important,” Prabhupāda asked, “Lord Caitanya's birthplace or His activities? It is His activities, His karma. His activities are more important than His janma, or place of birth.” The activities of Lord Caitanya were chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa and distributing love of God to all people, and this should be the activity of devotees in Māyāpur.

On Gaura-pūrṇimā day, ten of Prabhupāda's sannyāsī Godbrothers visited to participate along with Prabhupāda's disciples and hundreds of visitors in the dedication and cornerstone-laying ceremony. Prabhupāda was gracious and friendly toward his Godbrothers, and he was gratified that they could all sit together to dedicate the world headquarters of the International Society for Krishna Consciousness.

Sitting on a cushion next to the sacrificial arena, chanting on japa beads, Prabhupāda initiated six Bengali devotees and awarded the sannyāsa order to a young American disciple. Then Prabhupāda's Godbrothers spoke, each expressing appreciation of Prabhupāda's work in the West.

Finally they all gathered around the pit, five feet square and fifteen feet deep. Certain articles had been collected to be placed inside the pit in accordance with the scriptures: five kinds of flowers, five kinds of grains, five kinds of leaves, five kinds of metal, five kinds of nectar, five kinds of colors, five kinds of fruits, and five kinds of jewels. Prabhupāda's Godbrother Purī Mahārāja descended a ladder into the pit to put coconuts and banana leaves in a pot and to place this, along with flowers, onto the altar of bricks.

Next Prabhupāda entered the pit, carrying a box with a gold, ruby-eyed mūrti of Ānanta Śeṣa. Earlier that morning in his hut Prabhupāda had confidentially shown a few disciples the mūrti. "This is Lord Ānanta," he had said, "the serpent bed on which Lord Viṣṇu rests. He will hold the temple on His head." Prabhupāda now placed Ānanta Śeṣa on the altar of bricks and climbed back up the ladder. Then on Prabhupāda's blissful invitation, everyone began to toss in offerings of flowers and money, followed by handfuls of earth.

Although Prabhupāda's Godbrothers had praised his work on Gaura-pūrṇimā day, several of them returned a few days later to complain about his use of the title Prabhupāda. Prabhupāda asked his disciples to leave the room. When they were alone, one of the sannyāsī Godbrothers began challenging Prabhupāda in Bengali: "Why are you using Prabhupāda? You have no right. This is our Prabhupāda's title. You cannot take it."

"I did not take it," Prabhupāda replied. "They are calling me Prabhupāda. What can I do?" Although the sannyāsī Godbrother then began to criticize Prabhupāda for not joining their preaching and for awarding the sacred thread and sannyāsa order to Westerners, mainly the Godbrothers wanted an explanation for his use of the title Prabhupāda.

"Brahmānanda Mahārāja!" Prabhupāda called. "Bring me a copy of my letterhead." When Brahmānanda Swami returned with the stationery, Prabhupāda showed it to his Godbrothers. The letterhead read, "Tridandi Goswami A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami." No "Prabhupāda." This proved that he himself did not use the title. This simple demonstration pacified his Godbrothers, and he then invited them to take prasādam with him, while his disciples served.

Later in his hut Prabhupāda talked with his disciples about envy. A devotee could judge his own advancement by how free he was from envy, he said. In the spiritual world envy was conspicuous by its absence. Although all the liberated associates of Kṛṣṇa were trying their best to serve Kṛṣṇa—in a kind of competition—everyone was pleased with one another. If Rādhārāṇī or a favorite gopī pleased Kṛṣṇa, the other gopīs did not think ill of her but thought, "Oh, how nicely she has served Kṛṣṇa. Let me try to offer some nice service to Kṛṣṇa so He will be even more pleased!" To be envious was materialistic.

Prabhupāda wished his Godbrothers had taken a different point of view. He wished they had not minded his being called Prabhupāda by his disciples. He was also sorry that some of his Godbrothers couldn't sincerely praise his work. If Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī was working successfully through him, why should they be disturbed? Why not accept his work and be happy that the mission of Lord Caitanya Mahāprabhu was being spread effectively? They should see it as Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī's work, the work of their own spiritual master. It was also their work, their responsibility, and they should recognize that through Bhaktivedānta Swami Mahārāja it was being wonderfully done. At the ceremony they had praised his work. So if they didn't mind praising him, then why not admit that for hundreds of Westerners whom he had saved from hell, he was Prabhupāda, that singular pure devotee whom they always thought of as seated at the lotus feet of Kṛṣṇa.

In terms of authorized books produced and distributed, numbers of devotees initiated and engaged in devotional service, and numbers of temples opened, no one could compare. Of course, in one sense all of Prabhupāda's Godbrothers were equally praiseworthy, as long as they followed the basic instructions of Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī, chanted Hare Kṛṣṇa, and avoided sinful life. But if analysis or criticism was to be made with such scrutiny, then let the preaching records be scrutinized. Who, above all, was extending the mercy of Lord Nityānanda and making such tremendous gains on behalf of Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī—gains that had previously seemed impossible? According to Caitanya-caritāmṛta, if a preacher could spread the chanting of Hare Kṛṣṇa, then he must be accepted as empowered by God.

Prabhupāda was certainly empowered, yet he conducted himself very humbly, with no assistance from others. He had repeatedly invited his Godbrothers to join him in the West and take their places beside him as preachers in the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement. Why had they not come forward to assist him in their spiritual master's mission, instead of complaining about him, the one Godbrother who was carrying out Śrīla Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī's mission?

It was not the place of Prabhupāda's disciples to criticize, however, and he had sternly warned them that they had no position to do so. They should treat his Godbrothers as disciples of Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī and therefore as on the level of their own spiritual master. Nevertheless, Prabhupāda's disciples became sorry to see this lack of respect for their spiritual master. They could be humble and not protest, but how could they be affectionate toward persons who criticized their spiritual master and his Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement?

After the five-day festival, Prabhupāda left Māyāpur for Vṛndāvana, where he planned to hold another ground-breaking ceremony. The Māyāpur land was still completely undeveloped, and Prabhupāda urged his disciples in India to continue collecting the necessary funds.

We are making a very gorgeous plan at Māyāpur, and if you all together can give shape to this plan it will be unique in the whole world. It will be a world center for teaching spiritual life. Students from all over the world will come and we shall revolutionize the atheistic and communistic tendencies of rascal philosophers. So we must be responsible for this great task. Not for a single moment shall we be without ISKCON thoughts. That is my request to you all.

During Prabhupāda's absence from Vṛndāvana the devotees had been unable to persuade Mr. S. to grant legal permission for ISKCON to use the land. Prabhupāda had insistently directed one of his Indian-born disciples, Kṣīrodakaśāyī, to acquire from Mr. S. an actual deed. Kṣīrodakaśāyī had pleaded with Mr. S., and seeing Mr. S.'s indecision, he had spoken with Mrs. S. and then with the two of them together.

Mr. and Mrs. S. had agreed that since they could not decide, they would put the matter before Śrīmatī Rādhārāṇī Herself. Mrs. S. had asked Kṣīrodakaśāyī to take two slips of paper and to write yes on one and no on the other. These she had folded and placed before the family Deity of Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa. She had then asked Kṣīrodakaśāyī to pick one of the papers. Kṣīrodakaśāyī had done so, and in the presence of Mr. and Mrs. S. and Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa, he had opened the piece of paper on which was written the word yes.

When Prabhupāda had heard the news, he had been joyous.

I am especially pleased upon you that you have secured the S. land for Kṛṣṇa. Now let us cooperate to build up a wonderful center there in Vṛndavana.

In March 1972 Prabhupāda returned to Vṛndāvana to sign the deed with Mr. S. and to perform the ground-breaking ceremony. With permission from the gosvāmīs at the Rādhā-Dāmodara temple, he arranged for quarters for his disciples so they would have a place to reside while the temple at Ramaṇa-reti was under construction.

Yamunā: It just so happened that on the morning that the gosvāmīs were to sign an agreement with Prabhupāda for use of the rooms at Rādhā-Dāmodara, the electricity went out. Prabhupāda's secretary had only an electric typewriter, so I reminded Prabhupāda that I was trained in writing calligraphy. I had my writing pens with me, so immediately Prabhupāda drafted the writing that he wanted, and I took it into another room, sat down, and hand-lettered a contract with gold embossing on all the capitals. Within fifteen minutes we presented it to Śrīla Prabhupāda.

Before the gosvāmīs, Prabhupāda held up the document with pleasure and said, "Just see, my disciples are expert in everything." Now the devotees would be allowed to reside above his rooms at Rādhā-Dāmodara temple, and they would also have access to his rooms for cleaning. Prabhupāda felt it was a grand occasion that there was something in writing for the preservation of his rooms in the Rādhā-Dāmodara temple.

To close the transaction for the land in Ramaṇa-reti, Prabhupāda and Mr. S. met at the Magistrate's Court in Mathurā. In the presence of lawyers they completed the formalities. Prabhupāda saw it as Kṛṣṇa's grace that he had acquired a good plot of land in Vṛndāvana, and writing to his G.B.C. secretaries in America, he asked them to send as many men as possible to help in the new project. He described his intentions "for raising up a very excellent center, to revive the spiritual life for Vṛndavana on behalf of Rupa and Jiva Goswamis."

Prabhupāda told Kṣīrodakaśāyī, "I want on this occasion huge prasādam should be prepared, and every man in Vṛndāvana should be invited and take prasādam." Two days later, with a hundred people attending, Prabhupāda held the cornerstone-laying ceremony at Ramaṇa-reti. Again he descended into the ceremonial pit and placed the Deity of Ānanta, on whose head the temple would rest.

But late that night the land was attacked. An elderly Indian widow, with local fame as a sādhu, became angry that Mr. S. had not given her the land, which she had several times requested. During the night she sent guṇḍās to dismantle the brick foundation of the ceremonial cornerstone and to desecrate the pit, which had just that day been filled with flowers and religious objects. The guṇḍās dug open the hole, threw garbage into it, and stole the "Posted" sign announcing the land's new ownership.

Prabhupāda was in his room at the Rādhā-Dāmodara temple when he heard what had happened. He became angry and told his disciples to show the deed to the police. That night several policemen guarded the land, and when the hired guṇḍās came again, the police accosted them and warned that if they caused any more trouble they would be arrested. And that was the end of that.

Prabhupāda had several times said that by becoming a devotee, one gains many enemies. The incident also served to confirm Prabhupāda's conviction that ISKCON's taking possession of the land should be followed as quickly as possible by construction of a temple. They should at least encircle the land with a fence, build small huts, and live on the land while preparing for temple construction.

Tejās: "This will be the Kṛṣṇa-Balarāma temple," Prabhupāda said. We didn't really know what was going on. We all thought it was so far away. It was really the boondocks, Ramaṇa-reti. Nobody was out there. It was such an isolated place, and there were lots of dacoits living out there. We thought, "If we're going to have a temple out here, no one will ever come." But Prabhupāda said, "Wherever there is Kṛṣṇa, everyone will come."

Prabhupāda's secretary, Śyāmasundara, wrote to a Godbrother about the newly acquired Vṛndāvana property.

Earlier in the day, before breakfast, Prabhupāda sewed up the 4,800 sq. yd. gift plot in Raman Reti where Krishna used to sport with Friends in the forest, about 10 minutes walk from Radha-Damodara. Prabhupāda surveyed the land (with the rope from his mosquito-net), bargained-for, drew plans for, drew up the deed for, went to Mathura magistrate's court for and signed, sealed, and delivered in an instant. Prabhupāda has asked me to request you that AT LEAST FIFTY (50) MEN FROM THE U.S. MUST COME TO INDIA IMMEDIATELY!!! At last we have got a solid programme in India: Huge projects at Mayapur, Vrindaban and Bombay. All the lands are acquired, arrangements made, and everything by Prabhupāda. But only a few of us men are here to struggle with an immense task—the biggest by far within the Society, of developing these three places, and believe me these three projects are more dear to Prabhupāda than any yet contemplated.

In the month while Prabhupāda was away from Bombay (he had left on February 10) the payment of fifty thousand rupees was duly made. Slowly at first, a few devotees moved to the Juhu land, living in a tent. At night the rats and mosquitoes would disturb the devotees' sleep. While attempting to clear the overgrown weeds, they came upon empty liquor bottles and overflowing sewage. Without Prabhupāda present, their resolution grew weak.

But then Brahmānanda Swami returned from Calcutta, where he had been with Śrīla Prabhupāda. Brahmānanda Swami was inspired, and he gave the Bombay devotees new impetus. They would have to clear the land and raise a paṇḍāl right away. Brahmānanda Swami had never put on a paṇḍāl program before, but he hired a contractor to build several chātāi (palm frond) houses for the devotees and a festival tent. Even before the construction could begin, however, the devotees would have to thoroughly clear the land.

Mr. Sethi, a neighbor and life member, hired a work crew to cut down the weeds and vegetation, and several life members and friends in Bombay also came forward to assist. Mr. N. offered to help by sending one of his assistants, Mr. Matar, to organize the hired laborers in clearing the fields. The devotees also worked in preparation for Prabhupāda's return.

Śrī Śrī Rādhā-Rāsavihārī arrived at Hare Krishna Land in a taxi, riding across the laps of several devotees. They had moved before, and this time Their residence was a tent. They had first come to be with the devotees of Bombay during the paṇḍāl program at Cross Maidan in downtown Bombay. On that occasion there had been a procession to Chowpatti Beach, and when the devotees had arrived, Rādhā-Rāsavihārī, beautifully dressed and decorated and installed in an ornate palanquin, had been awaiting them. Kṛṣṇa was white marble and held a silver flute; Rādhārāṇī's right hand, palm forward, extended a benediction. They were beautiful.

After Their first appearance at Chowpatti, Rādhā-Rāsavihārī had moved to the Akash Ganga Building, where gradually the devotees had established a decent standard of Deity worship. When Prabhupāda had left orders that Rādhā-Rāsavihārī should move to Juhu as soon as the down payment was made, some of the devotees had questioned him: Why should the Deity move before the facilities were proper? Shouldn't they wait until the temple was built?

"Once the Deity is installed on a piece of property," Prabhupāda had replied, "no one will remove Them."

More than anyone else, Prabhupāda was aware of the proper worship to be offered to Rādhā-Rāsavihārī, but his emphasis now was on securing the land. How else, he reasoned, could he eventually give Rādhā-Rāsavihārī a royal throne and temple unless They Themselves first established Their right of proprietorship by taking up residence at Hare Kṛṣṇa Land? The arrival of Rādhā-Rāsavihārī at Juhu also meant increased difficulties for the devotees, who now had to struggle to maintain the morning pūjā and cook six daily offerings in the meager kitchen. Even Rādhā-Rāsavihārī's tent was insubstantial and swayed in the wind.

Śrīla Prabhupāda, however, saw the move as a necessary, transcendental tactic. He felt certain that everyone involved—himself, the owners of the land, the Bombay municipality—would accept that the land belonged to Kṛṣṇa, since Kṛṣṇa was already residing there. And because he was asking

Lord Kṛṣṇa Himself to accept these inconveniences, he prayed to the Deity, "My dear Sir, please remain here, and I shall build a beautiful temple for You."

By the time Prabhupāda returned to Bombay, Rādhā-Rāsavihārī were installed on the stage of the festival paṇḍāl. Attendance at the festival was not as great as it would have been in downtown Bombay—no more than five hundred people came a night—but Prabhupāda was satisfied. This festival was on their own property, and this was only the beginning.

Every evening Prabhupāda lectured at the paṇḍāl and attended the kīrtana and āratī before Rādhā-Rāsavihārī. Pañcadraviḍa Swami had collected donations of five tons of dāl, rice, and flour, and the devotees were regularly cooking enough kicharī to serve 125 people free prasādam daily. In the evening Prabhupāda himself would give out hālavā from the Deities' plate, and the crowd, including well-to-do businessmen and their wives, would press forward to receive the prasādam. Prabhupāda liked the festival so much that he told the devotees to arrange to keep the tent for a perpetual festival.

Prabhupāda lived on the land in a tent, just like the other devotees, until a Mr. Acharya, one of the more favorable tenants living in the back of the property, invited him to stay at his home.

Within a few days of his arrival at Juhu, Prabhupāda was ready to hold the ground-breaking and cornerstone-laying ceremony—another tactic for securing possession of the land. But it was more than a tactic, as he wanted a temple constructed as soon as possible. Rādhā-Rāsavihārī should not remain standing in a tent but should be protected by a silver and teakwood simhāsana on a marble altar. They should be surrounded by deities of the two gopīs Lalitā and Viśākhā, and Their temple should have marble domes more than a hundred feet high. Thousands should come daily for darśana and prasādam.

One morning, in the midst of the festival activities, the devotees of Hare Krishna Land joined Prabhupāda in a simple cornerstone-laying ceremony. They had dug a deep ceremonial pit and surrounded it with bricks. Prabhupāda descended and placed the Deity of Śeṣa. Then, sitting on a simple platform, Prabhupāda accompanied the kīrtana by playing a brass gong, while one by one the devotees came before him and threw dirt into the pit, filling it, while smoke rose from the sacrificial fire.

Prabhupāda was outraged that Brahmānanda Swami had agreed to pay the contractors forty thousand rupees for the paṇḍāl construction. It was the same old thing—the foolish Western disciples getting cheated. Prabhupāda refused to pay; four thousand rupees should be more than enough. When the contractors came to see him, he told them that he had little money and that they would have to be satisfied with four thousand rupees. They protested, but Prabhupāda became angry and insisted, "Accept it. You are making five hundred percent profit!"

"As soon as they see us," Prabhupāda said later, "they say, 'These Americans, they have got money!' Our work is going on in India, but as soon as money is being spent, fifty percent is being spoiled because you Americans are inexperienced. What can be done? The Indians want your money, and they cheat like anything."

During the paṇḍāl festival the tenement neighbors had become disturbed by kīrtanas over the loudspeaker. They were already disturbed that their landlord, Mr. N., was slow to repair the buildings and would sometimes let them go a full week without water before fixing the plumbing. Being suddenly forced to live with more than twenty American devotees only exacerbated their dissatisfaction. Some of the neighbors were converted Christians and unsympathetic to Vaiṣṇavism; they even feared their children might again be converted to Hinduism. Some tenants claimed the devotees were infringing on their privacy, some criticized the devotees for arguing among themselves, and others criticized that the unmarried men and women were living in close proximity—even though in separate quarters.

A few of the neighbors, however, could see that the Western Vaiṣṇavas were struggling to sincerely worship Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa. None of the tenants criticized Prabhupāda, however, so when he was present, he was able to pacify them and resolve any disagreements. But Prabhupāda knew that after he left, the situation could easily become volatile.

Prabhupāda was planning an extensive world tour, traveling eastward to Australia, Japan, Hawaii, the U.S., and perhaps Mexico and Europe. It might be as long as half a year before he would return to India, and he wanted things to progress smoothly in Bombay without him.

A few days before Prabhupāda's departure, Madhudviṣa Swami complained, "I'm not feeling very enthusiastic here. I think I need a change." Prabhupāda asked him where he wanted to go, and Madhudviṣa replied that he was thinking of Australia. Prabhupāda said, "Yes, I am going there. You also come." Brahmānanda Swami told Prabhupāda that the preaching was deteriorating in Nairobi in his absence, and Prabhupāda agreed that he should return to his duties there.

Again, Prabhupāda had to choose a new Bombay manager, and this time he chose Girirāja, a young brahmachārī and leading preacher in making ISKCON life members. Prabhupāda reasoned that since the essence of management was to collect donations and make life members, and since Girirāja was expert at that, then even though he was young and otherwise inexperienced, he had the most important qualifications. Prabhupāda had already found Girirāja to be simple and submissively dedicated to helping him develop Hare Krishna Land.

Girirāja: Śrīla Prabhupāda said, "You will do, Girirāja?" So I said, "Yes, Śrīla Prabhupāda, whatever you say." I wasn't actually very happy about it, but I understood that one should be surrendered to the spiritual master, and whatever he said, one should do. So I accepted. Prabhupāda said that good management meant that whatever needs doing, you do it—that's all. Later I went in to see Śrīla Prabhupāda, and he was sitting behind his desk. He said, "Now the full responsibility is on you." I winced when he said that, because I wasn't used to taking responsibility.

During Prabhupāda's stay in Bombay, Hans Kielman, a young architect from Holland, had come to hear the lectures and had become interested in Kṛṣṇa consciousness. Prabhupāda convinced Hans to become a devotee and to help build the Hare Kṛṣṇa city in Bombay. Under Prabhupāda's direction, Hans at once began to make architectural drawings for the buildings.

Hans: Prabhupāda said, "Now you listen carefully. Lord Kṛṣṇa has sent you here. You must design these temples for Him. You must do these very sincerely and not be afraid." I was completely surrendered. That moment was really ecstasy for me. He had a pile of photographs on his desk, and he gave them to me and said, "Look at this." I looked at the pictures, and they were photographs of the new Govindajī temple in Vṛndāvana. He said, "I want you to make a design like this." So I asked him, "How big, Śrīla Prabhupāda?" He gave me a piece of typing paper and said I should draw on this paper. Then he gave me the photographs and a pencil and a ruler. He took me to the next room and told me to sit down at the table. Pradyumna was there with all his Sanskrit books, Śyāmasundara was there typing the letters, and suddenly I was in between, making the drawings.

Prabhupāda said Girirāja and the others would have to collect sixty-four lakhs of rupees for the construction. The devotees had no idea how they would raise even a fraction of that amount, but Prabhupāda gave them some ideas. He talked to them about enlisting the support of influential men by using the bheṇṭ-nāma system, whereby a person purchases the use of a guest room for life. And there were other ways.

But the immediate step was to get the land. They had possession of the land, but before building they should have the deed. Since Mr. N. was already overdue in delivering the deed, Prabhupāda told Girirāja to press him to comply with the written agreement and deliver the deed at once.

In Prabhupāda's last lecture in Bombay, he spoke about the six Gosvāmīs of Vṛndāvana and the bittersweet ecstasy of their hankering to be with Kṛṣṇa. Some of Prabhupāda's disciples took it that Prabhupāda was speaking about this because he was himself going to be leaving for a long time.

At the airport the next day there was a joyful farewell, as Prabhupāda waited for his flight to Australia. Sitting in the VIP lounge surrounded by devotees, Prabhupāda watched Madhudviṣa Swami lead an ecstatic kīrtana. "If you go on having kīrtanas like this," Prabhupāda told the devotees, "our Bombay project will be successful." When Prabhupāda saw Mrs. N. had come, he exclaimed, "Oh, Mrs. N., you are also here! You are becoming one of us."

Prabhupāda had the extraordinary ability to bring a spiritual vision into physical reality, to change a part of the material world into spiritual energy so that even a common man could perceive the spiritual reality. This was Prabhupāda's constant effort. Often a transcendentalist hesitates to deal with the material world, fearing he may become spiritually weakened. The Vedic injunctions, therefore, warn the transcendentalist to avoid associating with money and materialistic persons. But Prabhupāda, following the principles taught by Śrīla Rūpa Gosvāmī, saw that everything material had the potential of being used in the service of Kṛṣṇa and thus of regaining its spiritual nature. Following this principle, an expert devotee, although apparently acting within the material sphere, could remain always in touch with the spiritual energy. For such a devotee, nothing was material.

In the Vedic scriptures the great devotee Nārada Muni, because of his ability to convert materialistic men into devotees, is referred to as cintāmaṇi, touchstone. Just as cintāmaṇi is said to convert iron into gold, so Nārada could transform a beastlike hunter into a pure Vaiṣṇava. And as Nārada is glorified in the Vedas for accomplishing such feats in bygone ages, so Śrīla Prabhupāda is a similarly potent touchstone in the present age. Again and again he showed by his straightforward application of Kṛṣṇa consciousness that he could change a materialist into a completely renounced, active devotee of the Lord. And now, after recruiting a number of devotees from māyā's camp, he wanted to engage them in transforming as much as possible of the material world into living spirit. By his transcendental, visionary words, he was attempting to convert stone and human energy into glorious, spiritual temples.

While ambitious materialists sometimes criticize transcendentalists as unproductive, Prabhupāda, because of his constant activity, could never be so accused. Rather, people would criticize him as being a capitalist in the dress of a sannyāsī. But such criticism never deterred Prabhupāda; he was carrying out the desires of the previous ācāryas. He had written this conclusion in his Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam even before coming to America in 1965.

Therefore, all the sages and devotees of the Lord have recommended that the subject matter of art, science, philosophy, physics, chemistry, psychology and all other branches of knowledge should be wholly and solely applied in the service of the Lord.

Prabhupāda wanted to convert significant portions of the material world into the spiritual world. In attempting to construct a spiritual city in Juhu, he realized he was launching a major attack against māyā. Within a few months so many complications and headaches had already disturbed his plans, and more would come; the battle was just beginning.

Sometimes Prabhupāda's disciples found the work to be draining and stressful; they would become bewildered. They had come to spiritual life for bliss, not for anxiety. Prabhupāda's presence and his constant encouragement helped them remain steadfast. He knew that once they tasted the nectar of selfless dedication to Kṛṣṇa, they would never accept anything lesser. He would encourage them, reminding them of the words of spiritual predecessors like Bhaktivinoda Ṭhākura, who had said, "Difficulties undertaken in the course of Your devotional service I will consider the greatest happiness."

SPL 40: Around the World but Absorbed in Bombay

CHAPTER FORTY

Around the World

but Absorbed in Bombay

Prabhupāda traveled with three disciples: Śyāmasundara as his secretary, Pradyumna as his servant and Sanskrit editor, and Nanda-kumāra as his cook. The first stop was Singapore, where, without explanation, immigration authorities refused Prabhupāda entry into the country. Sympathetic Indians in Singapore had arranged for Prabhupāda to lecture and had even mailed hundreds of invitations, but Śrīla Prabhupāda, disappointed and feeling ill, had to continue the twelve-hour flight to Sydney.

April 1, 1972

Prabhupāda planned to stay a few days in Sydney before going on to Melbourne. Although the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement was young in Australia, Prabhupāda saw positive signs: devotees to initiate, TV and radio appearances, and an interested crowd at his morning lectures in the temple.

This was only his second visit to Australia. On his first visit, almost a year ago, he had installed the Deities Rādhā-Gopīnātha and had prayed to Them, “Now I am leaving You in the hands of the mlecchas. I cannot take the responsibility. You please guide these boys and girls and give them the intelligence to worship You very nicely.” Now, on returning and seeing the Deities beautifully dressed and well cared for, he felt happy. After five busy days of preaching he flew on to Melbourne.

Upananda: In Melbourne Prabhupāda spoke at the Town Hall, and all the Melbourne hippies came. There was a man there called the Wizard. He used to be a professor at the university, but he resigned his post so he could carry out his shenanigans. He was very intellectual. He was dressed in a black cape and leotard, and he got up as soon as Śrīla Prabhupāda asked for questions. He had a group of his own followers. First he spoke very respectfully. “Excuse me, Your Divine Grace. I've been listening to your lecture, but I have one thing I would like to say in this regard. I believe that I am God. I am the center of the universe. And I will prove sometime next year that I am the center of the universe.”

Prabhupāda said, “That's all right. Everybody is thinking like that. What makes you different?” Actually, the Wizard's whole game was that he wanted to be different—his dress, everything. So Prabhupāda exposed this, exposed him as just another materialistic fool. Everybody started laughing and clapping.

Auckland

April 14, 1972

The devotees had just opened a temple in New Zealand a few weeks before Prabhupāda's arrival. Prabhupāda stayed a couple of days and installed Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa Deities.

Bhūrijana: Prabhupāda installed large marble Deities, but there was only one girl to take care of Them. Prabhupāda was insisting that the Deities should be installed anyway and that They should be taken care of properly. He demanded that They should have many sets of clothes immediately. So some devotees built a temporary wooden altar and put up a curtain for the Deities. The curtains fell down. Everything was going wrong. It was confusing, and everyone was upset.

So Śrīla Prabhupāda just took over. He said, “Put this here. Put that back up there. Do this. Do that.” He completely took command of the whole situation. The devotees put the curtains back, and Prabhupāda said, “Get rid of this vyāsāsana.” And they took the vyāsāsana out, because it was so big and the room was so small that there was no room for the people. Prabhupāda just put a mat on the floor and sat down on that.

Prabhupāda visited for one night in Hong Kong, where he lectured at a program arranged by Bhūrijana and his wife, Jagattārīnī.

Bhūrijana: We had taught the Indian children to sing the prayers to the spiritual master. So we had them sing for Prabhupāda. He looked at me, and he was really pleased. Then he said, "Your wife said there are no interested people, but you have so many students here." I said, "You have so many students, Prabhupāda."

At the end of the lecture Prabhupāda asked if there were any questions, and a little Indian boy raised his hand and asked, "Who started the forest fire?" The boy was thinking of a forest fire mentioned in the Kṛṣṇa book in Kṛṣṇa's pastime, but all he said was, "Who started the forest fire?" But Prabhupāda took the question in a different way—that this material world is like a blazing forest fire, just like the prayers to the spiritual master had described. So Prabhupāda said, "No one started the forest fire. It starts automatically—just like in the forest, by the rubbing of two bamboos a fire may start. But by chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa we can get out of this forest fire of material life."

In Japan the devotees lived in an old farmhouse in the hill country outside Tokyo. Śrīla Prabhupāda stayed in a nearby hotel, installed Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa Deities in the temple, and awarded sannyāsa to ISKCON Tokyo's leader, Sudāmā.

Prabhupāda said he knew "the pulse of his disciples." Thus he had recently sensed a tendency in his leading managers to be too absorbed in management and not enough in preaching. He had been telling his secretary that G.B.C. men should not simply sit behind their desks and try to centralize power but should become detached, take sannyāsa, and travel and preach. With this in mind he had awarded the sannyāsa order to two of his G.B.C. secretaries, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa and Sudāmā. Now he advised that they not give up their managerial burden but follow his example of preaching and managing their G.B.C. zones in a renounced spirit.

Śyāmasundara: Prabhupāda's hotel room had rice paper walls and was very cold. It was like coming back into the northern climate, but without central heating. One day I came to Prabhupāda's room for maṅgala-ārati and I had a blanket wrapped around me. I said, "Are you cold, Prabhupāda?" I could see he didn't like the cold, but he wasn't going to let that stop him from serving Kṛṣṇa.

Nanda-kumāra: At the Sunday feast there were about thirty Japanese people, mostly young, and every single one brought Prabhupāda a flower, put it at his feet, and paid full daṇḍavats. They were so respectful. Prabhupāda said that it was a good sign that "these boys and girls are able to honor a saintly person."

Bhūrijana: We had arranged a program in Kobe. Many Indians and Sindhis lived there. It was a long journey out of Tokyo. They put Prabhupāda on the third floor of the house, and there was no elevator. Prabhupāda just put his chin out and walked right up, even though it was a tremendous effort for him.

The engagement was arranged in such a poor way that on the same speaking program with Prabhupāda was a Māyāvādī sannyāsī. Prabhupāda wanted to speak first, so he spoke in English. There were quite a few Indians there—about a hundred. Prabhupāda explained very clearly and strongly that Kṛṣṇa is God.

Then the other sannyāsī began speaking in Hindi. Prabhupāda was just sitting there with his eyes closed, chanting japa. Suddenly he looked at us and said, "Start kīrtana immediately." So we got up in the middle of the sannyāsī's speaking and started kīrtana. Prabhupāda left quickly after the kīrtana.

When we got back to the room with Prabhupāda, he explained what had happened. He said, "First he was preaching nicely. And then he started explaining pañcopāsana, about the five different features of the Absolute. And then when he said that the Supreme is ultimately impersonal, I could not tolerate it." Prabhupāda said, "I am like a lion when I am out and a lamb when I am home."

Prabhupāda had business in Tokyo with his printer, Dai Nippon. He was greatly pleased with the faith Dai Nippon Printing Company placed in him, giving him hundreds of thousands of dollars credit just on his word. One of the Dai Nippon executives even approached him submissively, inquiring about whether his son who had died a year and a half ago had gone to the Buddha.

A young Japanese executive, who translated the older man's questions and Prabhupāda's answers, explained to Prabhupāda, "Since then he has been very religious."

"He was the eldest son?" Prabhupāda asked.

"Twenty years. Youngest son."

The two executives spoke briefly.

"He is asking how he can be relieved from such sadness when his son has died."

"Oh, yes," Prabhupāda said. "The point is that the success of everything depends on how Kṛṣṇa is satisfied. That I have explained." He related the example of Sāṅdīpani Muni, the spiritual master of Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma. Sāṅdīpani Muni's son had died, and he requested his two students, "My dear boys, I lost my child very young. If You kindly bring him, then I will be very much pleased." So Kṛṣṇa went to the planet of Yamarāja and brought his son back.

"So you try to satisfy Kṛṣṇa, and you will be blessed. Your son will be blessed. You pray to Kṛṣṇa—wherever your son may be, he will be happy. You believe in reincarnation, next birth?"

The young man spoke to the elder executive in Japanese. The older man nodded.

Prabhupāda continued, "Yes. So your son, he must have taken a body somewhere. So if you pray to Kṛṣṇa, your son will be happy. He will benefit."

When Prabhupāda's G.B.C. secretary for the western United States, Karandhara, arrived in Tokyo to assist in dealing with the Dai Nippon Printing Company, Prabhupāda talked with him about his new project in Bombay. He also wrote two letters to Girirāja, urging him to begin constructing the Bombay buildings as soon as possible. He wanted Girirāja to model the temple after Jaipur's famous Govindajī temple and erect beside it a modern high-rise hotel. "And then you shall have the perfect Juhu plan." Prabhupāda said Hans (now Surabhi) should finish the drawings and get the city council's approval by June so that they could begin the foundation before the monsoon. "I do not think that it is possible," Prabhupāda wrote, "but if you can try for it that will be nice."

Hawaii

May 6, 1972

During Prabhupāda's week-long stay in Honolulu, he installed the five Deities of the Pañca-tattva: Lord Caitanya, Lord Nityānanda, Śrī Advaita, Śrī Gadādhara, and Śrī Śrīvāsa. He also lectured on yoga at a local yoga-meditation center. During his morning walks on the beach, he spoke about the fallacies of Darwinism. Waikiki Beach, he commented, was not as beautiful as Juhu.

Nanda-kumāra: At that time all the devotees in Hawaii were wearing sleeveless T-shirts and bright colors, and they had really big śikhās hanging down very long. Prabhupāda said, "Gaudiya Vaiṣṇava śikha is an inch and a half across—no bigger. Bigger śikhās means another sampradāya. And they have to be knotted." So I told everyone that, and they came back all bright and shiny with saffron shirts and proper śikhās.

Govinda dāsī: Prabhupāda stayed at a big house on the Makapu side of Oahu, right on the ocean—a very pleasant place. In the morning Prabhupāda would walk on the beach, and when he would return from his walk, he would sit down on a wooden bench on a little rock patio. We would all sit around, and he would give a little morning lecture. Later he would walk around and around in his room, chanting.

One evening I went in while he was chanting, and he said, "Sixteen rounds finished today?" and I said, "Yes, Śrīla Prabhupāda, I am on my sixteenth round now." He said, "That is good."

Prabhupāda was also thinking a lot about his Bombay center, and he asked me to do an architectural rendering of his idea for the Bombay buildings. Fortunately, an architect friend drew it up very nicely, and Prabhupāda was pleased with it.

Prabhupāda had received a letter from a French disciple, Mandakinī devī dāsī, who was going to join a Russian boy in the Soviet Union. She was going there to marry him and assist him in propagating Kṛṣṇa consciousness. When Prabhupāda read this letter, he smiled in ecstasy. The thought of the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement increasing in Russia gave him great joy.

Then he turned to Govinda dāsī and said, "Preach while you are young. When you are old, retire to Vṛndāvana and chant Hare Kṛṣṇa. Therefore, these centers in India are being built. But you cannot retire unless you have preached sufficiently. The mind will agitate. If you have preached, you can retire and chant Hare Kṛṣṇa—so preach as much as possible."

Although sometimes Prabhupāda could spend only a day or even only a moment with an individual devotee, that brief association would leave a permanent inspiration. The devotees would realize that although Prabhupāda had touched them and given them guidance in a way that made these the most important moments in their lives, Prabhupāda was also beyond the moment and the place that he shared with them and was contemplating deeper issues and praying to Kṛṣṇa with an intensity that they could not yet understand.

Prabhupāda received a letter in Hawaii from Girirāja that made him doubt his Bombay manager's abilities to deal with the clever Mr. N. Girirāja had reported matter-of-factly that he had just paid 7,500 rupees to Mr. N., and Prabhupāda wrote back, "On what account is that paid?" Girirāja had intended it to be an installment toward the agreed two lakhs per year that they were supposed to pay Mr. N.—after they had received the deed. But why should they be unnecessarily paying Mr. N., since they still had no deed? Prabhupāda began to worry about his Hare Krishna Land.

Time and time again his thinking turned to Bombay, Vṛndāvana, and Māyāpur, but he did not talk much about the problems. Rather, the devotees and nondevotees in each place he visited got the full blessings of his attention. While lecturing on Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, he was in full concentration, and when he spoke privately, cultivating a guest or guiding an individual disciple, he fully gave himself. That he took responsibility for many persons and worldwide matters and did it all so graciously, always appearing before his devotees each morning on a walk or in the temple as fresh as a morning-blooming lotus flower, was the expert nature of his devotional service to Kṛṣṇa. He was open and simple, with a motive so pure that anyone could see it, and yet he was also grave beyond anyone's vision. He served Kṛṣṇa simply in each time and place, whether riding the hotel elevator with his two disciples in Hong Kong, or curiously noting the details of Japanese culture, or walking on the beach beneath a Hawaiian sky.

Word had spread that Śrīla Prabhupāda wanted G.B.C. secretaries to get out from behind their desks and preach, and four American G.B.C. men, eager to become sannyāsīs, were waiting when Śrīla Prabhupāda arrived in Los Angeles.

Satsvarūpa: Prabhupāda said that because we were taking sannyāsa in the prime of youth, we had ample opportunity to do much more than he. He said he had taken sannyāsa at the fag end of life but that "a little is better than nothing." Everyone laughed at the thought that we could do more than Prabhupāda. One by one we went to the vyāsāsana, and Prabhupāda gave us our tridaṇḍas and said, "Now preach, preach, preach."

Immediately afterward, Prabhupāda had us up in his room. We asked him if there were any special instructions. He said there were two restrictions in sannyāsa life. One was that when meeting a rich man and seeing his opulent wealth we must not think, "Oh, I have given up everything, but I wish I could enjoy these things." And the other restriction was that when we see a beautiful woman we must not think, "I had a beautiful wife, and now this beautiful woman is here. I could enjoy her." In other words, do not have any regrets about having taken sannyāsa.

Jagadīśa: Prabhupāda had all the G.B.C. men come to Los Angeles, where some of them took sannyāsa, and we discussed reapportioning preaching zones. We had one special meeting with Prabhupāda. All the G.B.C. men were sitting there in the room, and Prabhupāda looked us all over. He said, "Are you all convinced?" We just sat there. Nobody said anything for about two minutes. It was one of the heaviest moments of my life—Prabhupāda challenging us: "Are you convinced? Are you sincere?"

As Prabhupāda spoke, his G.B.C. disciples listened intently. "As far as I am concerned," he said, "I am convinced. Therefore I am pushing on. It is a fact. I am pushing on because it is fact, not fiction. That much I am personally convinced. Whenever someone says, 'You believe,' I say, 'No, I do not believe. It is fact.' So you must spread your conviction by your literature, arguments, preaching, facing opposing elements. But are you convinced? If you are not convinced, then it is not good for me. The first thing is enthusiasm. Don't be dead. You have to work more than me. Anyone who has life, he can preach.

"So the local president and treasurer of the temple will manage. The G.B.C. can supervise that things are going on. But the first management is that each and every member is chanting sixteen rounds and following the regulations. Otherwise, that is our spiritual strength.

"Now it is in your hands. That was my plan—to give it to the Americans. But you have to be spiritually strong. If superficially you want to be managers, it won't be good. And simply touring is not required. By traveling you have to do something substantial to increase the society. At the time of Lenin, he had just a few men, and he took over the entire country. It is up to you to spread God consciousness. Don't be stagnant. Go and preach. Your duty is to inform them, 'My dear American brothers, you have so much wealth and pleasure. Use it for Kṛṣṇa. If not, it will be degradation.' "

Śrīla Prabhupāda met with many U.S. ISKCON leaders in Los Angeles and saw the wide array of Kṛṣṇa conscious activities in his Western world headquarters. He heard a new recording of Kṛṣṇa bhajanas, performed with guitars and other Western instruments, produced at the devotees' own Golden Avatar studio, and he approved it, saying, "This is better than George Harrison." He visited the art studio, where the devotees were painting illustrations for his books, and he made suggestions.

Anaṅga-mañjarī: Prabhupāda was going around looking at all the different temple offices. In one office Karandhara was showing Prabhupāda a new computer. "Prabhupāda," he said, "all we have to do is type the words Rūpa Gosvāmī, and then it will automatically write everything you have ever said or written about Rūpa Gosvāmī." Prabhupāda had been looking at the computer without showing much interest. But when Karandhara said the name Rūpa Gosvāmī, Prabhupāda raised his eyebrows and said, "Oh? Yes, everything can be used in Kṛṣṇa's service."

Then we walked out of that office and went to the telex machine. Prabhupāda sat before it in the chair, and everyone stood around him while Karandhara explained what the machine did. "It can write a message all the way to New York, and they can send a message back immediately, Śrīla Prabhupāda." So Karandhara typed on the telex machine, "Hare Kṛṣṇa. All glories to Śrīla Prabhupāda. Please respond."

There was no answer, so he typed it out again, and again there was no answer. So he typed it out again, and this time he typed out, "All glories to Śrīla Prabhupāda. Śrīla Prabhupāda is sitting right next to the telex machine. Please respond."

All of a sudden the machine started typing out a reply, and Prabhupāda was sitting there watching it. The type read, "Dear Śrīla Prabhupāda, please accept our most humble obeisances at your lotus feet. We will be very eager to see Your Divine Grace in three days in New York." Śrīla Prabhupāda spoke out, "Jaya! Haribol!" The message from New York was signed by many devotees, and Prabhupāda just smiled and said, "This is very nice."

At this time, distribution of Prabhupāda's books by his disciples was taking on a new dimension in America, and Prabhupāda heard the latest reports. From the beginning of his preaching in the West he had stressed printing and distributing his books as the most important method of preaching Kṛṣṇa consciousness. He said his spiritual master had told him to print and distribute books and that he was following "blindly." Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī had been pleased if a disciple distributed even only a few copies of his magazine.

In the beginning years of ISKCON Śrīla Prabhupāda had also been pleased when his disciples had distributed a few hundred copies of Back to Godhead each month. Gradually his will for increasing the distribution of transcendental literature had manifested through certain devotees. In Los Angeles in 1968, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa had daily taken a large kīrtana party downtown. The party, in addition to chanting and dancing, had circulated among the crowd and distributed Back to Godhead magazines, as many as a hundred in a single day. When Prabhupāda had heard these reports, he had felt encouraged and had asked for the devotees to increase.

Prabhupāda saw book distribution not only as the best method of preaching but also as a fair means of income. In India the brahmacārīs in the traditional gurukula system would beg from door to door, but in the West such a practice would not be respected. "But every gentleman will give a quarter for Back to Godhead," Prabhupāda had said.

Even as Prabhupāda turned more toward India and his projects there, he continued to encourage his disciples, especially in the West, to distribute his books: "Please increase your program of distribution to the public as well as trying to place our books and magazines in the libraries. I am simply interested in the book distribution."

To the devotees in New York he had written in 1971,

I'm especially pleased to hear that your distribution of books and magazines has increased. Go on in this way, increasing more and more. Each time someone reads some solid information about Krishna his life becomes changed in some way. These literatures are the solid ground upon which our preaching stands, so I want that they should be available to everyone, as many as possible. So please try for this.

To the devotees in Australia he wrote,

The best news is that you are increasing nicely the distribution of my books and literature. This is the best activity, to distribute solid information about Krishna. Our preaching stands solid on these books. No other movement has such vast background of authority.

And to the devotees of Africa Prabhupāda wrote,

Distribution of books and magazines is our most important activity. Without books, our preaching has no solid basis. Especially the Africans want our books.

Śrīla Prabhupāda said that if there were ample books, then everything else in ISKCON would succeed.

Practically, our Society is built on books. One book is not very impressive. Still, a blind uncle is better than no uncle at all, so it is very nice that one book has appeared, and that BTG is appearing at least several issues in other languages. But now try to produce at least four or five new books per year in several languages, plus regularly BTG every month... apply yourself fully to this very great responsibility of producing numerous books in foreign languages.

Back in 1968, when ten thousand copies of Teachings of Lord Caitanya had arrived at the temple in New York, Brahmānanda Swami had wondered how they would ever distribute so many hardbound books on the lofty philosophy of Lord Caitanya. But in 1970, with the publication of another book, Kṛṣṇa, the Supreme Personality of Godhead, some of the devotees in San Francisco had begun to go door to door, person to person, and sell the books. And not only one or two books, but twenty, thirty, even forty a day. The enthusiasm had spread as devotees in other temples had begun to sell increasing numbers of Śrīla Prabhupāda's books. Next, the young men had begun traveling in vans, going out all day, day after day, to discover the greatest ecstasy of distributing Prabhupāda's books.

Then a competition had started. Keśava's boasts that the devotees in San Francisco were the best had drawn challenges from the devotees in Los Angeles, New York, Denver, and Dallas. A "saṅkīrtana fever" had begun. And at the center was Śrīla Prabhupāda, assuring that unquestionably book distribution had the topmost priority of all his missionary activities.

Prabhupāda also stressed that all the devotees should regularly study his books. The books were not only for the public; the devotees must read them and know them. Or else how could they preach? In the Los Angeles temple room Prabhupāda would have the devotees take part in pronouncing and chanting responsively the daily Sanskrit verse from Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam. Then individual devotees would take turns chanting the verse alone, while the other devotees would again respond collectively.

Hṛdayānanda Goswami: When Prabhupāda came to Los Angeles in 1972, he started the Bhāgavatam class where everyone chanted the Sanskrit. One effect was that devotees became more grave, a little more civilized. Just at that time things were a little wild in America. The saṅkīrtana parties were doing so many wild things, staying out all hours of the night, sleeping anywhere, eating anything. Previously the temples had been a little sedate, and actually, even a little dry, because the devotees weren't giving out many books. And then, when the saṅkīrtana got a little heavy, it was almost like a rodeo consciousness, this wild saṅkīrtana—like bronco busting. But Prabhupāda came and introduced the chanting of Sanskrit mantras word for word, and the devotees submitted to a more grave and formal program.

On the first of June Śrīla Prabhupāda left Los Angeles for Mexico City. He said he would return in a few weeks.

Prabhupāda conducted an intensive three-day lecture campaign in Mexico City, speaking at the National University of Mexico, the Masonic Lodge, and the Theosophical Society, and appearing on a television show with some thirty million viewers. He also held initiations at the temple on two consecutive days. Mexico was similar to India, he said, with pious people and a tropical climate. Even when he walked early in the morning in Chapultepec Park, many people followed him back to the temple. They recognized him as a saint and wanted his benediction.

Cit-sukhānanda: On Sunday afternoon there were more than five hundred people in the temple room. After the lecture Śrīla Prabhupāda went back to his room alone, and there was a big kīrtana with five to six hundred people chanting, "Jaya Prabhupāda! Jaya Prabhupāda! Jaya Prabhu pāda! Prabhupāda! Prabhupāda! Prabhupāda!" They became very, very ecstatic, and it seemed like the temple walls were going to come down. I was in Śrīla Prabhupāda's room, and he said, "What is this? Kīrtana? They are making so much noise."

I said, "They are chanting your name." And I went down to see what was going on. And all the people were waiting to come into Prabhupāda's room. It was like they wanted to charge up to Prabhupāda's room to be able to see him. They kept yelling his name, "Prabhupāda! Prabhupāda!" So I came up to Śrīla Prabhupāda. "Prabhupāda, they want to see you."

And Śrīla Prabhupāda said, "Well, let them come."

So I immediately arranged that people could come in. He had two doors in his room, and they were coming in through one door on the left side and leaving through the door on the right. One by one, in a line, they just filtered through like a great parade, coming and offering different words to Śrīla Prabhupāda. Most of the people were saying in Spanish, "Your Divine Grace, Your Holiness, please bless me. Give me your benediction." Everyone was praying for his benediction. And as the people would come in, they would bow down. Everyone was extremely submissive, and there were many people with tears in their eyes to see the great saint Śrīla Prabhupāda. And they said to Śrīla Prabhupāda, "Please give me your blessings."

Prabhupāda asked me, "What are they saying?" And I said, "Give me one blessing, one benediction."

So he had his hand in his bead bag, and with his finger outside his bead bag he would point to them and say, "Hare Kṛṣṇa." And they were all very happy.

Prabhupāda also traveled to Cuernavaca, where he lectured out-of-doors at the city plaza before a crowd of thousands. The audience sat patiently and heard his words translated into Spanish.

Cit-sukhānanda: Just then we had turned out our first book, La Conciencia de Kṛṣṇa Es el Sistema Mas Elevado de Yoga [Kṛṣṇa Consciousness, the Topmost Yoga System], and Śrīla Prabhupāda, during his lecture at the plaza at Cuernavaca, saw Haihaya dāsa arrive with newly printed copies of this red book, La Conciencia de Kṛṣṇa Es el Sistema Mas Elevado de Yoga. Śrīla Prabhupāda looked at him and was very happy to see his book printed. He stopped his lecture and said, "Now you can all take one of these books and read them." And the people actually came up to Śrīla Prabhupāda to get the books. We only brought about fifty copies, but all fifty copies Śrīla Prabhupāda sold personally. The people took the liberty to ask Śrīla Prabhupāda for an autographed book, and he autographed almost all fifty copies.

After the plaza lecture there was a hotel lecture, and then Śrīla Prabhupāda was supposed to go to a devotee's home in Cuernavaca to take prasādam and rest. But Śrīla Prabhupāda decided he wanted to return to the temple in Mexico City. He got back around eight P.M., so from eight in the morning until eight that night he had not taken a bite of food, only a little water. We offered him fruit and things, but he didn't want anything.

When he returned to his room, his eyes were shining and his smile was broad, and he said, "This is the way to be happy. Work all day for Kṛṣṇa." All he wanted was a cup of hot milk with purīs and a cup of sugar. He pressed the purīs into the sugar, and he drank the milk with great joy and happiness. He said, "This is our life, to serve Kṛṣṇa. Work all day for Kṛṣṇa and take a little prasādam at night."

On returning to Los Angeles, Prabhupāda was again the center of the burgeoning Kṛṣṇa conscious activities there. But again his thoughts turned to Bombay, and he telegraphed Girirāja, instructing him to settle the conveyance immediately.

Girirāja, after receiving Prabhupāda's cable, went to Mr. N., only to learn of a further complication. After Prabhupāda had signed the sales agreement, the Indian government had passed a law obliging Mr. N. to pay a five-lakh gains tax upon executing the conveyance. Mr. N. didn't have five lakhs at present and told Girirāja that ISKCON should pay it, and he would apply it toward the mortgage. But Bombay ISKCON didn't have five lakhs either, so Mr. N. suggested Girirāja take a bank loan or secure funds from ISKCON temples in the U.S. He promised that in the meantime he would not sell the land to anyone else.

Girirāja tried to get a loan from the bank, but he had no security or credit. He turned to some of the life members for help, to see if they could act as guarantors for a loan. But although sympathetic, they could not help him raise the money.

Girirāja also began to doubt Mr. N.'s word. Although naive about legal matters, Girirāja was becoming suspicious of Mr. N.'s character and of his dealings. Talking with life members, Girirāja learned that actually Mr. N. was notorious for illegal business tactics. When previously Mr. N. had signed an agreement with C. Company for the very same land he was now selling to Prabhupāda, the sales agreement had eventually been canceled because C. Company had not gotten permission from the municipality for subdividing plots of land—and one of the conditions of Mr. N.'s sale of the land had been that C. Company get government permission to use the land. According to some of the businessmen with whom Girirāja spoke, Mr. N., through his political connections, had influenced the government against the C. Company.

Mr. N. had seemed very helpful, giving the devotees a good price for the land, and even providing workers for clearing it. And Mrs. N. had often attended Prabhupāda's classes. But there also seemed to be many contradictions in Mr. N.'s behavior.

Hearing of these problems by mail, Prabhupāda considered them manageable. If a government tax had been imposed, then the devotees should deal with that and also continue trying for a loan. Certainly Mr. N. was tricky, but Prabhupāda felt ISKCON's position was strong. Girirāja should persist, without becoming confused by Mr. N. Prabhupāda advised Girirāja to approach Mrs. Sumati Morarji and other supporters for financial help.

It is a unique temple in the world and if you show your wonderful abilities as American and European boys and girls to manage everything superbly, she will not hesitate to entrust you in every way. Therefore, there must always be good will and cooperation amongst yourselves for this huge task ahead. I always think of our Juhu place, and I want that it shall be the model for all the world to emulate and respect as the perfect example of a Krishna Conscious community.

Portland, Oregon

June 8, 1972

From Los Angeles Prabhupāda went briefly to Portland, where fifty of his disciples from San Francisco, Seattle, and Vancouver, as well as Portland, had congregated to meet him. From Portland he rode by car to Eugene, where he lectured at a large hall before an audience of mostly hippies.

Every temple in the U.S. wanted Śrīla Prabhupāda, and although Prabhupāda could not visit them all, he remained open to brief visits and public lectures in faraway places. He would sometimes confide to his traveling secretary that his disciples should do this preaching; but then another lecture opportunity would arise, promoted by an enthusiastic group of devotees, and Prabhupāda would surprise everyone by agreeing to go.

After returning to Los Angeles for four days, Prabhupāda then flew to New York for a week and then on to London for two weeks. In London George Harrison and Ravi Shankar visited him several times at the Bury Place temple. When George asked if he should shave his head and try to live like the other devotees, Prabhupāda replied that he should continue to be a singer. "If you tell people to chant Hare Kṛṣṇa," Prabhupāda reminded George, "they will do it."

From England Prabhupāda went to Paris, where he lectured and performed an outdoor initiation ceremony at the Luxembourg Gardens. Hundreds of people, most of them student radicals from the nearby university, gathered to watch. Śrīla Prabhupāda began his talk, saying, "You French people have a history of being revolutionary, because you are looking for a better way of life." When the words were translated into French, the students cheered and applauded. Śrīla Prabhupāda continued, "Therefore, you should inquire into this Kṛṣṇa consciousness. It is a revolutionary movement for reviving our original God consciousness." About thirty devotees from Germany had come to Paris, and most of them, along with many devotees from England, Amsterdam, and Paris, received initiation that day at Luxembourg Gardens. In Paris Prabhupāda also attended a successful four-day indoor festival, where he was pleased to lecture and lead kīrtanas each night.

In Amsterdam Prabhupāda installed deities of Lord Jagannātha, Lord Balarāma, and Subhadrā and lectured at Vondelpark before thousands of hippies. One day at Vondelpark a devotee was addressing the crowd when Prabhupāda suddenly told his disciples to stop. "These people are useless," he said. "Just hold kīrtana."

Later he wrote to a disciple in the West,

We are observing here in Europe many, many hippies have become so disgusted with material life, but they are also now so much degraded that they will not hear our philosophy, simply mocking. So our devotees may become very much learned to remove their doubts and become very much fixed up in Krishna consciousness. But so far preaching to the general public, especially the hippie class, it is better not to preach very much philosophy, just somehow or other get them to chant Hare Krishna mantra, and if some of them are curious to learn something, they may purchase one of our books. Only if they chant with us, that will help them.

At Edinburgh Prabhupāda was greeted by almost a dozen reporters from various newspapers in Scotland.

Kiśora: Edinburgh is a stuffy, puffed-up, tradition-steeped place, but Prabhupāda was very cordial and humble with the reporters. He was giving them so much credit about how nice the country was and how nice Edinburgh was—what nice buildings we have here—and he was saying, "You have two colleges here?" "Yes, yes, we have two." Very proud they were. "So you have many students here?" "Yes, yes." "It's a very affluent city, Edinburgh?" "Yes, oh, yes, very rich and opulent." And then Prabhupāda said, "So you have so many students, and you have so many nice big, big buildings. You have so much facility for enjoyment." And they were agreeing: "Yes, yes, we have all this." And Prabhupāda just looked at them straight and said, "Then why are your universities producing hippies?"

They looked at one another, and no one could answer. And Prabhupāda began to explain how society cannot bring happiness or contentment simply with buildings. "Stones and windows," he said. "Where is the happiness there?"

In Glasgow Prabhupāda lectured at Woodside Hall before an audience of almost one thousand.

Kiśora: Prabhupāda was sitting onstage on his vyāsāsana. The crowd was very large, and even the balcony was overflowing. When Prabhupāda arrived, the students greeted him like a pop star. They were cheering and whistling. Prabhupāda immediately began lecturing very heavily on the basic science of Bhagavad-gītā—how Arjuna became a successful devotee by killing all his friends and relatives. At the end of the lecture, I was a little apprehensive as to whether the people would accept that heavy lecture or not. But they cheered and applauded.

When it came to question-and-answer time, one man came all the way down the aisle from the back of the hall and stood at the foot of the stage and looked up at Prabhupāda. For several moments he spoke, on and on and on, talking very proudly—"I am this. I am that"—and then concluding, "I am God." That was the conclusion of his little monologue. The whole crowd was hushed, and I thought, "What's going to happen now?" Prabhupāda simply looked down and let the silence continue for a few moments more. Then Prabhupāda spoke. "So, you are God—you have nothing more to say? You are not God—you are dog." And immediately the crowd stood up and applauded and cheered. The man just looked at Prabhupāda, and a smile came on his face. With just those few words he had been defeated. He simply walked all the way back again to the back of the hall and was finished. It was ecstatic, because the crowd was participating in the whole thing. They all realized that God is not cheap.

Then we had kīrtana, and everyone in the audience was dancing. At that time they had gotten a bit lax at the door, and the local street urchins from this low-class area of Glasgow came into the hall, and they all began dancing and singing. Some of them tried to get up on the stage. Prabhupāda was also chanting, and so these kids were all trying to get around him and get on the stage to chant. The devotees started to push these dirty little children off the stage, but Śrīla Prabhupāda said, "Don't do that. These children are all devotees. Let them chant."

When Prabhupāda finally got up to leave again, he reminded me of some big celebrity. He was smiling and waving and walking off the stage, and the audience were all shouting, "No, no, no!" They began chanting, "More, more, more, more!"

When Prabhupāda returned to London and heard that Sumati Morarji was arriving there, he went with a group of his disciples to meet her at the airport. He talked with her about his plans for Hare Krishna Land at Juhu and of his desire to form a board of trustees consisting of ISKCON's Bombay life members. Sumati Morarji agreed to be president of the board, which would meet regularly and give advice for managing ISKCON's Bombay project. Each trustee would also contribute a large sum of money toward developing a particular area of the project. Prabhupāda asked Mrs. Morarji to donate for the temple. He would request Mr. Khandelwal to donate for the library and Mr. N. for the two other wings.

That Mr. N. had not yet produced the deed, however, continued to weigh heavily on Prabhupāda's mind, and he questioned Mr. N.'s intentions and Girirāja's competence. If the only obstacle was the five-lakh tax, then Prabhupāda had already instructed Girirāja to approach ISKCON's wealthy friends and secure a loan. What was the difficulty? But Girirāja's communications sounded as if such a solution was "impossible." On August 27 Prabhupāda telegraphed Girirāja: "HAS CONVEYANCE DEED BEEN SIGNED IF NOT FINISH IMMEDIATELY AND WIRE DETAILS."

Again Girirāja went to Mr. N., although anticipating Mr. N.'s reply. This time, however, Mr. N. added yet another complication, reminding Girirāja that ISKCON had not yet obtained permission from the charity commissioner. ISKCON was a public charitable trust and so required permission from the charity commissioner before acquiring property. Mr. N. put the burden back onto ISKCON.

At the charity commissioner's office, Girirāja learned that he should have applied for permission six months prior to signing the agreement for the land. To Girirāja and the other devotees in Bombay, the affair had become a huge Gordian knot.

New Vrindaban, West Virginia

August 30, 1972

Only two days remained until the Janmāṣṭamī celebration, and more than three hundred disciples had gathered to be with Śrīla Prabhupāda. Janmāṣṭamī, Kṛṣṇa's appearance day, is always followed immediately by Śrīla Prabhupāda's appearance day, and this year, with so many devotees gathered in a holy place with Prabhupāda, the occasion promised to be especially auspicious.

Prabhupāda had agreed to lecture every evening in an outdoor pavilion, constructed for the occasion atop one of New Vrindaban's many hills. The lecture series was titled "Bhāgavata Dharma Discourses," and through these meetings Prabhupāda set an example for his disciples that they hold similar festivals in other parts of the country. Through bhāgavata-dharma discourses and book distribution, the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement would increase its purifying influence throughout the world.

Prabhupāda lived during these days in a small wood-frame house in the New Vrindaban woods. He regularly received visitors and lectured in the evening. Each evening, before his lecture at the pavilion, the devotees would hold a kīrtana and carry Prabhupāda up the long, steep hill on a palanquin; and afterward, as they carried him back down, he would be surrounded by chanting disciples bearing lanterns and torches.

Sureśvara: The path from the pavilion wound down and around on its way to the temple. I got there at dusk and beheld Śrīla Prabhupāda floating jubilantly in his palanquin atop a sea of devotees. There were hundreds of devotees, with tumultuous kīrtana and roaring, plus dust was being kicked up everywhere from all the people. It looked spectacular, like a panoramic scene from one of those epic movies, The Ten Commandments or Exodus, only much more, because it was transcendental. I just fell down in the dust as Prabhupāda's palanquin came gliding past. It was very wild, but devotional.

Baṭu Gopāla: It was a small palanquin carried by four men. There were some ropes for Prabhupāda to hold on to, and it wasn't a very comfortable ride for him. But it was an amazing scene. Devotees with torches—electric torches and fire torches and lanterns—and Prabhupāda coming down in his palanquin, down the trail. Hundreds of devotees were surrounding him. Kīrtana was roaring. I kept trying to get up close to Prabhupāda and get a glance.

Jāhnavā-devī dāśī: We were running down the steep hill in the dark amid the loud chanting of a river of devotees. And our feet seemed to never touch the ground. About halfway down, I caught up to the palanquin. But then I realized that being close to Śrīla Prabhupāda meant far more than physical proximity and that I needed to become much more serious about Kṛṣṇa consciousness in order to feel less distant from him.

On Janmāṣṭamī night Prabhupāda went to the temple and listened to readings from Kṛṣṇa, the Supreme Personality of Godhead about Lord Kṛṣṇa's birth. Around two A.M. he noticed many devotees were nodding. "You are getting tired," he said, smiling, and he ended the program.

Even in the midst of such a large festival, Prabhupāda was again plunged into the struggle over the Bombay land. A letter arrived from Girirāja explaining his failure to secure the five-lakhs loan owed the government and the government's refusal to grant permission. He also mentioned his suspicion that Mr. N. was influencing the charity commissioner's decision.

Prabhupāda had a copy of the purchase agreement with him, and he studied it carefully. Again he concluded that his position was strong, since he was occupying the land according to the terms of the agreement. He had paid two lakhs as promised, but Mr. N. had not turned over the deed. Now more money was being demanded, and Prabhupāda had said Girirāja should pay this money and get the deed. As for the permission from the government charity commissioner, there was no mention of it in the agreement. Although Mr. N.'s tactics were apparently bewildering Girirāja, Prabhupāda saw them as only empty bluffs. He telegraphed Girirāja, "TAKE BANK MORTGAGE PAY OFF N." Before receiving any reply from Girirāja, Prabhupāda sent another telegram: "WHY DO YOU SAY CONVEYANCE IMPOSSIBLE EVERYTHING CLEAR IN AGREEMENT OF PURCHASE CONVEYANCE TO BE EXECUTED IMMEDIATELY ACCORDING TO TERMS OF AGREEMENT OF PURCHASE."

On Śrīla Prabhupāda's appearance-day morning, he went up the hill to the pavilion to speak. It was a beautiful late summer's day, and he sat on the stage on a red vyāsāsana beside the Deities of Rādhā-Dāmodara and Lord Jagannātha. In addition to hundreds of his disciples, hundreds of guests were also present, the entire audience numbering about one thousand. The festival was a newsworthy turnout of the Hare Kṛṣṇa movement, and reporters from The New York Times and other newspapers were on hand, along with television film crews.

Prabhupāda spoke, explaining how, although an observer might misunderstand the devotees' worship of their spiritual master, no one should think that the spiritual master was presenting himself as God. Prabhupāda compared the spiritual master to a tax collector. As the tax collector collects money only on behalf of the king, so the spiritual master receives honor, but on behalf of Lord Kṛṣṇa. Everyone should serve and bow down to the Supreme Lord, and the spiritual master comes and “collects” obeisances and worship on behalf of God, who accepts any sincere worship of the spiritual master as an offering to Himself.

Prabhupāda ended his lecture, and a great feast climaxed the day and a half of fasting. Prabhupāda then returned to the back yard of his little house, where he talked with some of the devotees.

Hṛdayānanda Goswami: Prabhupāda was taking his massage, sitting on a straw mat outside his cabin. Suddenly, two little kittens appeared by his mat. And they were rolling around, tumbling. They were wrestling, tumbling, rolling around and around. Immediately I thought, “Oh! They are contaminated. I have to get them away.” The cats actually tumbled right onto Prabhupāda's mat. They rolled in a little furry ball right over to Prabhupāda's feet. Prabhupāda began tickling them under their chins. He was laughing, rubbing under their chins. Then he turned to me, sort of in a very jolly mood, and said, “Just see, even here there is love.”

Śrutakīrti: I was in charge of the kitchen, so I was too busy to see Prabhupāda at all. He was there for a week, and practically the whole time I didn't get to see him. I was so upset. I was doing all this service, and I had no opportunity to see Prabhupāda—always cooking until midnight. I felt so bad.

So the day before Prabhupāda left, Kīrtanānanda Mahārāja came up to me and said, “So you are going to be Prabhupāda's servant.” I said, “Oh, no! This is wonderful! No, this is terrible!” I was so worried. Then he said, “You'll be leaving tomorrow morning to go to Pittsburgh.” I thought, “Wow, that was quick! I didn't know anything about it.”

The following morning Kīrtanānanda Mahārāja brought me over to the farmhouse Prabhupāda was staying at. He took me into Prabhupāda's room and said, “This is Śrutakīrti. He is going to be your servant.” Prabhupāda looked, and I paid my obeisances. Kīrtanānanda Mahārāja said, “He cooks very well, Prabhupāda.” And Prabhupāda said, “That's very good.” “But he hasn't massaged,” Mahārāja said. I had never done it before in my life. And then Prabhupāda said, “That's all right. Anybody can massage. It is very easy.”

Satya-nārāyaṇa: I was with a group of devotees. We would travel around the country in an old bus, preaching. On the bus we had Deities, a kitchen, and a shower. Prabhupāda was outside of his cabin when we drove up in the bus. When he came on, we received him just as in a regular temple, and we gave him caraṇāmṛta. He looked at everything and said that there should be hundreds of buses like this. It wasn't such a big event for him, but he really liked it.

Satsvarūpa dāsa Goswami: I saw different leading devotees go down to that house to see Śrīla Prabhupāda on important business. I had no important business that hadn't been answered by him in letters, but I began to feel anxious that I was not going to him while others were. Finally, one day my anxiety grew so great that I decided I would go and see His Divine Grace.

When I arrived at the door of the house, Prabhupāda's servant gladly let me in, and in a moment I was seated before Śrīla Prabhupāda. He was seated to take his massage. I expressed to Śrīla Prabhupāda that I had no very urgent questions to ask him in particular, but that I had become anxious to see him, and so I had come. Prabhupāda replied that I should know better than to come to him out of such anxiety. He said he had already answered everything in his books. Actually, this was very inspiring. On the one hand, he was telling me that as an older devotee I should be assured that by studying his books everything was there. Not that out of anxiety I should feel a lacking and on an impulse have to personally see my guru.

But now, since I was in his presence, Śrīla Prabhupāda asked me, "What are you doing?" When Śrīla Prabhupāda said that, I got the strong impression that he was regarding me in the proper place, as a tiny fool. Here I had just been initiated sannyāsa, and I was coming before Prabhupāda with my assistant and asking for his attention. Now that I had asked for his attention, he gave me a surveillance-glance, and by his question he seemed to imply that I was doing nothing or very, very little to spread Kṛṣṇa consciousness. That was how I interpreted his question, "What are you doing?"

I replied that I was, according to the instruction that I had received from him in a letter, going from temple to temple in my zone and implementing his desire that the students there study the Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam in the morning class. I had previously felt very confident that I was exactly following direct orders I had been given in a letter from him. But to my surprise, in that room in New Vrindaban, he began to tell me that visiting temples was not the most important thing. He said that he was pleased with the program of Viṣṇujana Mahārāja, who was traveling on a bus. He said I should do like that.

I immediately replied, "Then your instruction that I should go to the different temples is not very important? I should take a bus?" And Śrīla Prabhupāda became annoyed and said, "It is not that because one thing is more important the other thing is less important. Everything is important. Not that just because I say this is important, to travel in a bus, now you say traveling to the temples is not important. Kṛṣṇa's head is important, and Kṛṣṇa's foot is important. Everything about Him is important."

While Prabhupāda participated fully, both formally and informally, at New Vrindaban, he still carried a special burden of concern for Bombay. Although he had appointed G.B.C. secretaries to oversee the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement in various parts of the world, he was the real G.B.C. secretary of India. Wherever he traveled, therefore, he remained partial to those projects.

He was setting the perfect example of a G.B.C. secretary. While conscientiously tending to practical affairs, he remained always transcendental—fully dependent on Kṛṣṇa and always preaching. After drafting a telegram to Girirāja or hearing of difficulties in Bombay, he would immediately return to his peaceful routine and active preaching. He would take his late-morning massage, bathe, put on tilaka methodically and delicately, say his Gāyatrī mantra with silent composure, take his prasādam, rest for an hour, and in the evening, after a full day's activities, go into the temple room of whatever temple he happened to be in, sit on the vyāsāsana and chant Jaya Rādhā-Mādhava, and speak pure Kṛṣṇa consciousness.

After New Vrindaban Prabhupāda went to Pittsburgh, where he attended a successful engagement at a large hall, the Syria Mosque. He also met with a Catholic bishop, whom he asked, "Why do the Christians kill cows in slaughterhouses and thus break the commandment 'Thou shalt not kill'?"

Prabhupāda had often asked this question of Christian priests and was always unsatisfied with the answer. This was no exception.

In an informal gathering in his room, Prabhupāda stressed outgoing preaching programs, and he advised his newly initiated sannyāsīs present to follow the example of their Godbrother Viṣṇujana Swami: to travel in a bus from town to town and hold festivals and distribute books and magazines.

The devotees in Dallas had purchased a large church facility and were forming the first ISKCON children's school, known as Gurukula. Prabhupāda, while traveling in India during 1971 and 1972, had sent a series of letters to the Dallas teachers, explaining the basic direction he wanted them to take for beginning a Kṛṣṇa conscious primary school.

We will teach the basic requirements of reading and writing but also give them real spiritual knowledge how to live perfectly. What other school of learning offers such a wonderful educational opportunity?... Last night the topic of my lecture at our Delhi pandal was the necessity for teaching Krishna Consciousness in all our schools and colleges. This is a revolutionary thought. But we have seen that the practical outcome of so much godless education in technology and science is that they are producing only hippies, one after another. What is the use of their skyscraper buildings if their sons will not maintain them? The old system of gurukula should be revived as the perfect example of a system designed to produce great men, sober and responsible leaders, who know what is the real welfare of the citizens. Just as in former days, all big, big personalities were trained in this way. Now you have got the responsibility to inject this idea in your country. Please do it with a cool head, and very soon we shall see the practical benefit for your countrymen.

These letters had assured the Dallas devotees that they were doing the most important work for the pleasure of Śrīla Prabhupāda. The school had gained support from other ISKCON members, and many parents had sent their children. By the time of Śrīla Prabhupāda's visit, about fifty students were enrolled.

Prabhupāda said Dallas's weather reminded him of Calcutta, even though he felt uncomfortably hot. Disdaining the use of air conditioning, he shed his kurtā and sat on the lawn with his inexperienced but eager group of teachers. The best system of education, he said, was as he had known as a child: one teacher in a room with up to fifty students of various ages and aptitudes. One at a time the students would come to the teacher's desk, receive guidance and a further assignment, and then return to work.

The gurukula teachers were particularly concerned and puzzled about how to discipline children without being punitive, and Prabhupāda unhesitatingly solved all their puzzles. He said the students should both fear and love their teachers. The teacher, by stern countenance, may threaten an unruly child and make him submit, but the teacher should not hit the child.

The next day Śrīla Prabhupāda went into a classroom and sat on a cushion before the class. Holding a blackboard pointer in each hand, he joked that one stick could be used for hitting the students' heads and the other for hitting their hands. The children and teachers became delighted to see Prabhupāda's playful mood. And when he asked if anyone wanted to get hit, both teachers and students moved forward, holding their hands out for a merciful slap from Śrīla Prabhupāda.

To demonstrate how to teach, Prabhupāda called for a volunteer. Dvārakādhīśa came forward. Prabhupāda, placing his venerable hand over the boy's, guided him repeatedly in forming the first letter of the Sanskrit alphabet.

News of Bombay followed Prabhupāda to Dallas. A devotee who had recently come to the West from Bombay informed Prabhupāda of Girirāja's recent talk of resigning as president of the center. Depressed by his ineffectiveness in dealing with Mr. N., the lawyers, and the government, and harassed by bickering and uncooperative devotees, he was considering himself unworthy to keep the charge.

Now Girirāja's anxiety became Prabhupāda's as again he concerned himself with all the affairs of his Juhu project. There seemed to be no one he could discuss this with, since the devotees in America knew almost nothing of matters in Bombay.

The night was too hot for sleeping, and Prabhupāda could not concentrate on translating Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam. So he stayed up late, talking with his secretary about Bombay. Surmising the mind and mood of Mr. N. and expressing his concern for his Hare Krishna Land and his wonder at the devotees' hesitation and disheartenment, he turned the argument this way and that, considering it in different lights, until in the early morning he finally put it aside. Afterward, he composed another telegram: "SETTLE LAND IMMEDIATELY AT BEST PRICE POSSIBLE N. PROMISED TO PAY IT IF HE WONT WE CAN PAY SUGGEST 15000 DON'T CHANGE PRESIDENCY UNTIL I COME."

Large marble Deities of Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa arrived in Dallas by trailer from New York. Prabhupāda had specifically selected these Deities for Dallas Gurukula while in India and ordered Them to be shipped to the United States. The Kṛṣṇa Deity was magnificent. He was tall, bigger than most ISKCON Deities, and His limbs and head were strikingly large. According to one story, the Deity was several hundred years old and therefore carved according to an ancient tradition. Even though the devotees in Dallas were unprepared to install Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa Deities, Prabhupāda told them to get ready in two days for the installation, which he would personally perform.

Jāhnava-devī dāsī, however, unauthorizedly removed the original paint from the Deities and began to repaint Them. When Prabhupāda heard this, he became furious. He called the Dallas president, Satsvarūpa dāsa Goswami, to his room and demanded an explanation. Satsvarūpa said that he was a fool but that Jāhnava had also acted without his permission.

Prabhupāda then called for Jāhnava and yelled at her furiously. She began to cry. "Why have you done this?" Śrīla Prabhupāda demanded.

"Nonsense," was her choked reply.

"Nonsense," Śrīla Prabhupāda affirmed, "suicidal nonsense! You are a nonsense, and you will always remain a nonsense. So, what are you going to do about this?"

"Well, Śrīla Prabhupāda," Jāhnava replied weakly, "I called up Baradrāja in Los Angeles, and he said if I use a certain kind of paint..."

"Baradrāja!" Prabhupāda yelled. "Who is this Baradrāja! I am your spiritual master, and I am sitting before you. Why do you not ask me?" Disgusted, he then turned to the others in the room. "So, what is to be done about this?" One of the ladies said that with a quick-drying paint, they could repaint the Deities just as before in time for the installation. "Yes," Śrīla Prabhupāda said. "Do it immediately."

Jāhnava stayed up all night, carefully repainting the Deities as before. Early the next morning, which was to be the morning of the Deity in stallation, Kṛṣṇa looked very beautiful, although His body was tacky in spots from the fresh paint.

During that morning's walk around White Rock Lake, while talking philosophically about various topics, Prabhupāda turned casually to Satsvarūpa Mahārāja and asked about the preparations for the installation. When Satsvarūpa said he was uncertain whether Kṛṣṇa's paint would be dry enough, Prabhupāda suddenly stopped. If the Deities weren't ready, he said, there was no use in his staying any longer in Dallas. Turning to his secretary, he told him to change their flight reservations as soon as possible. Satsvarūpa begged forgiveness and said that maybe everything could still be done on schedule. Prabhupāda's angry mood changed, and he continued walking, talking about other matters.

Later in his room, Prabhupāda talked alone to Satsvarūpa, continuing on the point of his morning lecture about materialistic life. In a casual way, as most people would talk about ordinary things, Prabhupāda spoke of the foolishness of the conditioned souls. "They think that just by having a big family and being absorbed in mundane activities they do not have to concern themselves with death or with the next life." As Prabhupāda spoke, he shook his head in disbelief, considering the incredulous position of the materialist.

All of Prabhupāda's disciples noted the same amazing thing about him: wherever he went, his consciousness was always in transcendence. Whether staying up late worrying and talking about Bombay, or criticizing devotees for repainting the Deity, his mind was ever moving from one Kṛṣṇa conscious consideration to another. The devotees with him would sometimes observe his awesome Kṛṣṇa consciousness from a respectful distance. At other times they might, in the name of service, speak up and become more personally involved. Or they might find themselves thrust under the direct scrutiny of his demanding attention. No one could presume or accurately predict in what way Prabhupāda would act in his constant, grave service to his spiritual master.

While sitting with Satsvarūpa Mahārāja, Prabhupāda began humming and singing a Sanskrit phrase from the morning's Bhāgavatam class, gṛheṣu gṛha-medhinām... Then he asked, "So, how is the Deity?" Satsvarūpa said he thought He was dry.

Prabhupāda stood and walked into the room where Jāhnava was examining the repainted Deity. Calmly he stood before Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa, singing to himself. "Yes," he said, "now it's all right."

Later that morning in the temple room, Prabhupāda sat on his vyāsāsana and installed Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa, reciting the prayers from the Brahma-saṁhitā. He then offered the first āraṭi to the Deities, who had been hastily dressed and placed on an almost bare altar. Prabhupāda seemed pleased, however, and later went up to his room and wrote on a piece of paper, "Radha Kalachandji, the Deity of Dallas, September 12, 1972—A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami." Kālacandajī, he said, meant "black moon."

Prabhupāda was preparing to return soon to India via a western route, and he paid another visit to his Western world headquarters in Los Angeles. On the very day he arrived, however, he wrote more directions to the devotees in Bombay, reassuring them the Juhu land was not just a trouble spot but a special place where a great plan would be carried out. It was worth fighting for.

... now I am anxious to hear if the conveyance deed has been signed and what are the contents. Kindly send me the copy duly signed as quickly as possible. This will give me great relief. As soon as the conveyance has been signed you may begin the building work immediately. I am coming to India soon, at least by October, and I want to see that the building projects in Bombay, Mayapur and Vṛndavana are going on nicely. This Bombay project is one of our most important projects in the whole world and I am looking to you and the others there in Bombay to see that it is done very magnificently.

Prabhupāda's secretary had recently shown him a new advertisement booklet printed by Air India in which the art theme was exclusively dedicated to Kṛṣṇa in Vṛndāvana. Prabhupāda was encouraged to see that Air India was enticing tourists to come to India to experience Kṛṣṇa culture. This confirmed his idea that in the future Hare Krishna Land and his other Indian projects would be important showpieces for tourists wanting to experience real Vedic culture.

Mail from Bombay always received first priority, and every morning Prabhupāda would ask for news from Bombay, giving any letter from Girirāja immediate attention. Early in October he received a long letter from Girirāja.

We just cannot control the material nature, and although everything is going on slow, Mrs. Morarjee, Mr. Munim, the bank, and Mr. N. all feel that they are proceeding as quickly as possible. And they do not respond very favorably to being overreminded by me of the urgency of the matter and of Your anxiety that it be finished.

Nothing new had developed; the deed still had not been signed.

Although Girirāja said he now had no intentions of resigning his post, Prabhupāda, after studying the letter, concluded that other senior devotees in India should also help. He therefore wrote to Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami and Bhavānanda, both in Vṛndāvana, asking them to go immediately to Bombay and try to expedite the conveyance.

Prabhupāda was asking Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami to revive his active status as a manager in India.

... Girirāja is finding difficulty, from his letter I can understand. So I think you have to revive your position as G.B.C. again and look after all the business of India affairs nicely.

Prabhupāda also wrote Girirāja, informing him that other devotees were coming to help and reminding him to also work with the board of trustees.

I cannot tax my brain so much from such distant places as to what to do if there is any difficulty, therefore I am relying completely on you, my trusted senior disciples, to finish up these things nicely.

Prabhupāda repeatedly instructed the managers in Bombay not to deviate from the terms of the purchase agreement. He was willing, as a matter of concession, to pay the five lakhs, to be deducted from the total price. But no more changes. The devotees should press Mr. N. to the original agreement.

Prabhupāda was worried that he had not heard from his lawyer, Mr. D. Two weeks before, he had telegraphed both Mr. N. and Mr. D., asking for reports on the delays, but he had received no replies from either of them. He had since written to another lawyer, a friend in Bombay, asking about the delay, and in Los Angeles he received the reply: Mr. D. was no longer his attorney. A couple of days after receiving this shocking news, Prabhupāda received a formal letter from the office of Mr. D, informing him of the same.

Of all the recent news from Bombay, this was the most disturbing. Prabhupāda began to see how Mr. N. had been devising a devious plot from the beginning. It was not just a matter of slowness or bureaucratic delay; Mr. D. had been in league with Mr. N. They were cheaters. So now it was going to be a real fight. ISKCON would have to go to court and file criminal charges against Mr. N. There was no avoiding the fight, but Prabhupāda still felt that his position was legally very strong.

Before leaving Los Angeles, Prabhupāda thought of a further tactic. He wrote to Girirāja that he should put a notice in the newspapers advising the public that ISKCON had signed an agreement for purchasing Mr. N.'s land at Juhu. He then traveled to Berkeley.

During his brief visit to Berkeley, Prabhupāda met with a group of professors from the University of California and also installed Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa Deities in the Berkeley temple. But still he was meditating on Bombay. He wrote to Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami,

The Bombay dealing has been muddled by the tactics of Mr. N. and Mr. D. Girirāja is in trouble. He is a child in these worldly dealings, so immediately go to help him... But you must be careful to pay the money in the court (registrar's office) and not in the hand of Mr. N. or his solicitor... Settle up the things properly, otherwise let us go to the court for specific action, either civic or criminal against the tactics of Mr. N.

Prabhupāda decided to send Karandhara, whom he considered expert, to help in Bombay. He also wanted to send Śyāmasundara, but Śyāma sundara had gone to London regarding a large country estate George Harrison was donating. Prabhupāda notified Śyāmasundara, however, that once the London transaction was completed, he should go to Bombay. Prabhupāda was ready for the fight. He would not be cheated.

During his return trip to India, Prabhupāda again visited Hawaii. Then on October 11 he went for the first time to Manila, where a small number of disciples had arranged preaching programs for him, both in the temple and at the Hotel Intercontinental.

In Manila Prabhupāda carefully considered his position regarding the Juhu property and concluded that he would come out victorious. He listed the points of his argument in a letter to Girirāja.

1. We have fulfilled all the conditions as purchaser.
2. Mr. N. has purposefully delayed with a motive to cheat us as he had done with some others in this connection.
3. But this time he cannot cheat us because we are in possession of the land and our deity Radha-Krishna is installed there.
4. Therefore we must immediately go to the court for enforcing him to execute the conveyance immediately.
5. Even if the court case goes on for a long time, still our business there cannot be stopped.
6. Without going to the court, we cannot make any compromise with him.
7. But I think we can arrange the full amount of 14 lacs to get out this rascal out of the scene.
8. But we cannot do it without going to the court otherwise we shall become a party for breaking the purchase agreement. Therefore we have to go to the court before making any compromise.

SPL 41: The Battle for Bombay

CHAPTER FORTY-ONE

The Battle for Bombay

= Vṛndāvana

October 17, 1972

Prabhupāda had come to Vṛndāvana to observe the Kārttika season (from October 16 to November 14). He planned to lecture daily at the samādhi of Rūpa Gosvāmī in the courtyard of the Rādhā-

Dāmodara temple, speaking from The Nectar of Devotion, his own translation of Rūpa Gosvāmī's book, Bhakti-rasāmṛta-sindhu. On his Western tour he had invited devotees to join him for Kārttika in Vṛndāvana, and now a few dozen devotees from America, Europe, India, and other parts of the world had gathered to be with him.

He was concerned with developing his Vṛndāvana project, so rather than immediately rushing to Bombay, he had come here first, sending some of his leading disciples to tackle the problems in Bombay. Now, like a general engaged on a different front, he awaited word from his lieutenants in Bombay. He moved into his two small rooms at the Rādhā-Dāmodara temple, while his disciples stayed nearby in the former palace of the Mahārāja of Bharatpur, an old building near the Yamunā.

Although Prabhupāda was introducing his disciples to Vṛndāvana, he was also introducing the residents of Vṛndāvana to his disciples. Already his group was encountering some of the same attitudes Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī and his party of pilgrims had met in 1932: the people's refusal to accept lowborn persons as Vaiṣṇavas. Prabhupāda trusted, however, that if his disciples could construct a wonderful temple for Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma, the hearts of the Vṛndāvana residents would change, and they would accept his disciples. He tolerated the roughness and slowness of his disciples, and when Vṛndāvana residents came to see him, he humbly requested they also overlook his disciples' faults and recognize them as genuine devotees of Kṛṣṇa; after all, they had given up sinful life and were regularly chanting the holy names of God.

Prabhupāda lectured both morning and evening. Sitting on a simple āsana about two feet high, a bare bulb suspended over his head, Prabhupāda would address his disciples and the few interested guests who sat before him.

Some of the devotees had speculated that since they were now in Vṛndāvana, Prabhupāda would probably talk on highly elevated spiritual topics, such as Kṛṣṇa's rasa with the gopīs. But it was not so. Rather, one of his disciples would read from The Nectar of Devotion, and Prabhupāda would interject extensive philosophical comments on attaining pure love of Kṛṣṇa through the successive stages of bhakti-yoga.

While Prabhupāda's talks were especially for his disciples, he also stressed that the brāhmaṇas of India accept the Western Vaiṣṇavas. And he cited dozens of scriptural references to prove his point that birth status, being a material designation, did not apply in spiritual life. Stressing preaching as the essence of Kṛṣṇa consciousness, he urged the disciples present to continue propagating the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement.

Prabhupāda's disciples were thrilled by these talks and by Prabhupāda's personal dealings with them in the intimate atmosphere of his rooms at the Rādhā-Dāmodara temple, which he referred to as his "eternal residence," the place where he had actually begun his plans for the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement. His disciples could hear him rise early and begin translating Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam and dictating his purports. At āraṭi time, he would open the shutters of his room and behold the Deities. At other times the devotees might see him walking on the terrace chanting japa. And they found him always available to answer their questions and help them with their personal problems.

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami, Śyāmasundara, and Karandhara arrived in Bombay. Things had worsened, Girirāja informed them. When Mr. N. had seen the notice in the newspaper publicly advising that ISKCON had entered into an agreement for the Juhu property, he had become furious. Girirāja had gone to him with folded hands and bowed down before him, but Mr. N. would not be appeased. He had gone back on all his promises and had canceled the sales agreement, on the plea that the devotees had not obtained the deed within a six-month period. The two-lakh down payment, he had claimed, was now his, and the devotees should vacate the land immediately.

Mr. N. had shut off the water supply to Hare Krishna Land. Several days later, a hoodlum had shown up at the entrance to the property, brandishing a machete whenever devotees passed by. A friend of Mr. N. had printed a handbill ascribing scandalous behavior to the American Hare Kṛṣṇa devotees and was having it distributed at the nearby Vile Parle train station. Although a few devotees had left and others wanted to, about thirty devotees still remained in Bombay.

The first thing to do, Karandhara said, was to find a new lawyer, and he went to Bombay's most prominent solicitors and hired a specialist in land transactions and conveyances. Next, the leading devotees and their solicitor met with Mr. N. in his office. Mr. N. was stubborn and uncooperative, and the ISKCON lawyer was threatening. A court battle seemed inevitable.

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami, Karandhara, Bhavānanda, and Śyāmasundara talked together, and the more they talked, the more they began to see the entire Juhu scheme as impossible. Even without Mr. N.'s treachery, just to live on the land was very difficult. The devotees and the Deities had such poor living facilities that the roof leaked and the cement floor was crumbling. Rats, flies, cockroaches, village dogs, and mosquitoes infested the place—with even an occasional poisonous snake. Devotees were always contracting tropical diseases, especially malaria and hepatitis.

So although ISKCON's new lawyer was prepared to take the case to court, the devotees were hesitant. Mr. N. had said that they—not he—were criminals, because they had not gotten permission from the charity commissioner; they were on his land illegally. He said he would sue for damages. He even seemed to be on the verge of some violent action. Considering all angles, the leaders whom Prabhupāda had entrusted to solve the Juhu entanglement decided that ISKCON should relinquish the land. Drafting a joint letter to Śrīla Prabhupāda, they had Śyāmasundara hand-deliver it to him in Vṛndāvana.

Sitting in his room at the Rādhā-Dāmodara temple, Śrīla Prabhupāda read the letter from Bombay and then set it aside. He walked out into the open courtyard. In the last light of day many birds were chirping, and the devotees sat on the ground on a dhurrie, waiting. Prabhupāda sat on the simple raised seat and began singing Jaya Rādhā-Mādhava.

He had Pradyumna read, stopping him to explain a point whenever he felt inclined. He spoke of the special benefits of residing in Vṛndāvana, but warned that one should not come to the dhāma to do business or to commit any offenses. If, however, a Vṛndāvana resident did commit an offense, he could still receive the special benefits—provided he remained “sticking to the dust of Vṛndāvana.”

Night fell, and in the dark courtyard Prabhupāda continued lecturing beneath the dim electric bulbs. Visiting pilgrims came and went, watching “the Swamiji” lecturing in English to his Western disciples.

After the question-and-answer period, Prabhupāda walked back to his room, exchanging words along the way with Gaurachand Goswami, the temple proprietor. Some devotees lingered in Prabhupāda's room, and many Indians peered through the barred windows, although they had never cared to look years ago, before the room's permanent resident, Bhaktivedanta Swami, had gone to America.

When Prabhupāda was finally alone, he began to think of Bombay. Although hundreds of miles away, the occurrences there were beating on his heart here in Vṛndāvana. He took out his copy of the agreement he had signed with Mr. N. Then he called his secretary and began dictating a letter to his leaders in Bombay.

He began his letter like a lawyer, answering logically, point by point. One reason his disciples had given for wanting to give up the land was that the charity commissioner had refused them permission. In that case, Prabhupāda reasoned, they should try to get back the money and give up the land. But it appeared that the charity commissioner's permission was delayed, not denied—a small matter. Although Mr. N. had mentioned a six-month time limit for obtaining the charity commissioner's approval, Prabhupāda pointed out that the original agreement mentioned no such time limit.

Another reason Prabhupāda's men had given for wanting to relinquish the land was that, according to Mr. N., they had failed to obtain the conveyance within six months, as per the original sales agreement. Prabhupāda replied that, according to the clause in question, “it is our option to rescind the contract within six months, not the vendor's.” But the real point was that Mr. N. had accepted checks worth one lakh rupees as down payment within the six-month period, and therefore the sales agreement was completed.

... we consider that he has completed the conveyance and we do not want to rescind but we shall close the deal immediately, finished, that's all. He's trying to avoid this issue by tricks, and he has dominated you and you are little afraid of him, and he has fooled you to think he is in superior legal position so that you will give him some money. But this is cheating. We shall not give him any more money. Don't pay him any more. First of all bring a criminal case against him... So why you should be disappointed and afraid of him? Our position is very, very strong.

If Mr. N. was threatening violence, that also was not grounds for quitting the land. The devotees were on the land legally and should seek police protection.

Therefore I say that you boys cannot deal very well in these matters, because you are too timid. Now whatever you like you may do. Immediately criminal case should be taken, that you are not doing because he is bluffing you. He says big words and makes threats and you believe him foolishly and do like he says. That I shall not do.

Prabhupāda's conclusive advice was that the devotees go to the magistrate and tell him, "We gave Mr. N. money, and now he is threatening violence to drive us away." They should not be afraid.

Prabhupāda had not come to Vṛndāvana only to lecture; he wanted to begin construction on his new property. And the news from Bombay didn't distract him from his purpose. Every day he would have the devotees hold a saṅkīrtana procession from the Rādhā-Dāmodara temple to the property at Ramaṇa-reti. He would also go out occasionally to see the site, still nothing more than grass huts, a wire fence, and a small stock of building materials. Subala, the disciple in charge of construction, was slow and reluctant, and Prabhupāda sent for Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami to come from Bombay and take charge.

Early one morning Subala left the land at Ramaṇa-reti, where he had been staying, and approached Śrīla Prabhupāda on the roof of the Rādhā-Dāmodara temple. "Prabhupāda," he said, "I am having so much difficulty. I don't have time to read, I can't chant my rounds properly, I can't think of Kṛṣṇa. I'm always thinking of how this contractor is cheating us, or I'm thinking of signing checks for labor and materials. It's just too much. All these things on my mind are stopping me from thinking of Kṛṣṇa."

"Do you think Arjuna was simply meditating on Kṛṣṇa on the battlefield of Kurukṣetra?" Prabhupāda replied. "Do you think Arjuna was sitting in yogic trance, while on the battlefield Kṛṣṇa worked? No, he was fighting. He was killing for Kṛṣṇa. He was thinking of all the soldiers he had to kill for Kṛṣṇa."

"Thinking of the checkbook, thinking of the men, thinking of the contractors—this is also like Arjuna's thinking. This is Kṛṣṇa's service. You should not worry about thinking of Kṛṣṇa directly. Arjuna wasn't sitting before Kṛṣṇa in a trance, meditating on His form. He was engaged in Kṛṣṇa's service. Similarly this is Kṛṣṇa's service, and you should engage. Your life is full of Kṛṣṇa's service, and that is very good."

Subala was still unsatisfied. He complained to Prabhupāda that the other devotees wouldn't cooperate with him. He wanted to go into seclusion in Vṛndāvana for the rest of his life and chant, instead of becoming a full-time preacher in ISKCON.

Śrīla Prabhupāda asked, "What do you mean, no one will listen to you? You think that means they are defective? No, you are defective." Prabhupāda raised his voice. "If you are preaching and no one will listen, don't think you should go away in disgust and save yourself by chanting. No, that is not our line. We must qualify ourselves so they will listen. Do you know the story of Mr. Beecham?"

Subala shook his head.

"No one would buy his medicine," Prabhupāda continued, "so he became anxious. Still he tried, and one day a man approached him in his shop and asked if he had any Beecham's Powder, and in excitement that someone had asked for his medicine, he died. Similarly, better we spend our whole life and die just to make one person Kṛṣṇa conscious. That is our line, to become so absorbed in preaching Kṛṣṇa, whether in Vṛndāvana or anywhere. We must save all these asuras from destroying the world."

In stressing active service and practical results, Śrīla Prabhupāda was exactly following the teaching and example of his spiritual master. According to Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī, to chant in a secluded place and not preach was “a cheating process.” Devotional service meant practical work for Kṛṣṇa. The simple, positive way to control the senses was to engage them fully in the service of Kṛṣṇa. Active service was the topmost yoga, Prabhupāda told Subala, a fact that he had repeatedly explained in his books. In the recently published Second Canto of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, he had written,

Here it is clearly mentioned that the inhabitants of Vṛndāvana were extensively busy in the hard labor of their day's work, and due to the day's hard labor they were engaged in sound sleep at night. So practically they had very little time to devote to meditation or to the other paraphernalia of spiritual activities. But factually they were engaged in the highest spiritual activities only. Everything done by them was spiritualized because everything was dovetailed in their relationship with Lord Śrī Kṛṣṇa. The central point of activities was Kṛṣṇa, and as such the so-called activities in the material world were saturated with spiritual potency. That is the advantage of the way of bhakti-yoga. One should discharge one's duty on Lord Kṛṣṇa's behalf, and all one's actions will be saturated with Kṛṣṇa thought, the highest pattern of trance in spiritual realization.

As far as possible, Prabhupāda engaged each disciple in a certain service according to the particular disciple's psychophysical nature. But everyone had to take up some kind of work for Kṛṣṇa. Since Prabhupāda desired to build a temple in Vṛndāvana, then whoever would help him do it, whether they were trained or not, or whether it was their tendency or not—whoever offered him assistance—would become very dear to him and to Lord Kṛṣṇa.

When a householder couple, Guru dāsa and Yamunā, agreed to remain in Vṛndāvana to help Prabhupāda build the temple, Prabhupāda welcomed it and shared with them the intention of his plan.

If you can construct a nice temple in Vrndavana for me in this way, I shall be eternally grateful. Because we are a worldwide movement of Krishna, and if we do not have a nice place at Vrndavana, then what will be the use? Vrndavana is Krishna's land, and in the future many of our disciples will go there just to see, along with many tourists and other friends, so therefore we must have sufficient place for them... I know that you are not trained up for being construction manager, neither that job must be very tasteful to you, but because you are sincere devotee of Krishna, He is giving you all strength and intelligence how to do it. That is what we want; that is advancement in Krishna consciousness.

By the time Prabhupāda and most of his disciples left Vṛndāvana at the end of Kārttika, relations between his disciples and the residents of Vṛndāvana had improved. The people of Vṛndāvana were impressed by the devotees' daily sankīrtana procession to Ramaṇa-reti, and they were impressed by Prabhupāda. Although Prabhupāda felt that much time had been wasted—it had been a year since Mr. S. had offered them the land—he was now hopeful.

ISKCON projects were developing all over the world, and all were struggling. The devotees' only means of income was from the sale of books and, to some degree, from their Spiritual Sky incense business. As yet Prabhupāda had no architectural plan for his Vṛndāvana project, but he determined to gather from his Book Fund and from devotees enough money for materials and labor. One day he went to the building site and asked a devotee to mix a little cement, and with his own hand, he laid down the first concrete for the foundation.

Hyderabad

Prabhupāda had come to Hyderabad for a paṇḍāl program. Big crowds attended his lectures, and wherever he went, even while getting into and out of his car, people surrounded him to touch his lotus feet. Although Hyderabad had been suffering from drought, a few days after Prabhupāda's arrival rains came. One newspaper suggested that the harināma-kīrtana Śrīla Prabhupāda and his devotees performed so enthusiastically must have ended the drought. Prabhupāda agreed.

Śrīla Prabhupāda met with Mr. N., who was visiting Hyderabad from Bombay. Śyāmasundara still had a cordial relationship with Mr. N., because Mr. N. had been fond of his three-year-old daughter, Sarasvatī. So he went to Mr. N. and convinced him to speak to Prabhupāda. Mr. N. agreed, but being suspicious that Prabhupāda might try to use mystic power to persuade him to do something against his will, he brought a guru with him, thinking the guru would counteract Prabhupāda's spiritual power.

Mr. N., his guru, and Śyāmasundara all came to the home of Panilal Prithi, where Prabhupāda was staying. Prabhupāda met informally with his guests, conversing with them over prasādam, until he yawned, and Mr. N.'s guru said, "Oh, Swami, you must be very tired. We should not disturb you now. You should rest, and we may talk later."

"Oh, yes," Prabhupāda replied, "I am very tired."

So Mr. N. and his guru excused themselves and retired to the adjoining room.

After a few minutes Prabhupāda called Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami into his room. "When someone asks you if you are tired," Prabhupāda said, "it means he is tired. If you go into the other room, you will see that they are sleeping." He instructed Tamāla Kṛṣṇa to carefully awaken Mr. N. without disturbing his guru and bring him in.

Tiptoeing into the room, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa found both Mr. N. and his guru asleep on the beds. He went over to Mr. N., touched his arm, and said quietly, "Mr. N., Mr. N., wake up. Prabhupāda would like to speak with you. Come quickly." Mr. N., being roused from his slumber, obediently walked into Prabhupāda's room, forgetting his guru friend.

For two hours Prabhupāda talked with Mr. N., and by the end of the discussion they had worked out a new sales agreement. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa and Śyāmasundara, working in a separate room, drafted and typed the documents, while Prabhupāda and Mr. N. settled the final legal points. Then Mr. N. signed the agreement, while his guru friend continued sleeping soundly.

Later that day Tamāla Kṛṣṇa confided to Śrīla Prabhupāda, "I am so disturbed by these dealings that I can't chant my rounds properly."

"That is natural," Prabhupāda replied. "Sometimes when I am disturbed, I also."

"But I can see that I am making spiritual advancement, even so," Tamāla Kṛṣṇa admitted.

Prabhupāda nodded.

"I used to think how to avoid difficult situations," Tamāla Kṛṣṇa said. "But now I think I should not run away from them."

"Yes," said Prabhupāda, "we should welcome these. They give us an opportunity to advance more."

Śyāmasundara and Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami flew back to Bombay with Mr. N. that afternoon. According to the new terms, ISKCON would pay Mr. N. the five lakhs of rupees for the government tax, and in return Mr. N. would execute the deed. But there was also a new time limit—three weeks—and the devotees would have to work fast. Prabhupāda himself would soon come to Bombay to settle the matter once and for all.

Although Prabhupāda had come to Bombay with hopes of finishing the land transaction, Mr. N. was still delaying, despite the new agreement. Obviously his stalling was simply part of his plan to cheat ISKCON. Śrīla Prabhupāda waited many days in Bombay, finally departing for a paṇḍāl program in Ahmedabad. He left behind instructions for his disciples to get the deed on the new terms or else to take back the original two lakhs of rupees paid as the down payment.

While Śrīla Prabhupāda was away, however, Śyāmasundara, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami, and the others began talking about how even if they could one day get the deed to the Juhu property, to develop Hare Krishna Land the way Prabhupāda had envisioned would be practically impossible. Śyāmasundara argued that even if they got the land, how could they really expect to build a big temple and hotel out here in the jungle? It just wouldn't work. Meanwhile, from Ahmedabad Prabhupāda continued to wage his Bombay campaign, and he requested Mr. N. and Mr. D. to come to Ahmedabad to try and make a settlement. They declined.

In Bombay the devotees learned that if they wanted to get back their down payment as well as the money they had deposited toward the fivelakh gains tax, then they would have to cancel the new agreement. They were confused, and their time was running out.

One morning one of Prabhupāda's disciples, Viśakhā-devī dāsī, arrived in Ahmedabad from Bombay. Prabhupāda called for her and told her to return to Bombay immediately with a message. Out of concern that his leaders in Bombay not make a wrong decision and decide to relinquish the land, he told her to tell them that they should not under any circumstances cancel the agreement with Mr. N. "Actually," he said, "this is not a woman's job, but everyone else here is either engaged in the paṇḍāl or has not been with us long enough to do this task."

Viśakhā took the next train out of Ahmedabad and arrived in Bombay the following morning. But what Prabhupāda had foreseen had already happened: the devotees had canceled the sales agreement. They were convinced that to get the land would be a mistake, and their lawyers had agreed, pointing out that if the devotees wanted to retrieve their money, they should cancel the agreement immediately. When the devotees heard Prabhupāda's message from Ahmedabad, confusion reigned. They now had no legal standing, no claim to the land. And they had failed to carry out Prabhupāda's desire! Girirāja phoned Prabhupāda in Ahmedabad to tell him what had happened.

"Bhaktivedanta Swami here," Prabhupāda said as he took the telephone. Girirāja was saying that a devotee had come from Ahmedabad with a message. "Yes, yes," Prabhupāda said, "what is the point?" Finally Girirāja blurted out that they had canceled the sales agreement. Prabhupāda was silent. Then in a voice that expressed both anger and resignation, he said, "Then everything is finished."

"I shall be the last man to give up the Hare Krishna Land to the rogue Mr. N.," Prabhupāda wrote to a life member just before leaving Ahmedabad for Bombay. Prabhupāda was now immediately planning how to rectify his disciples' mistake. No money had yet been transferred, so perhaps it was not too late.

Mr. N. could not possibly understand why Prabhupāda was so determined in his fight to keep the Juhu land. Not that Prabhupāda had kept his motives hidden, but only a devotee can understand the mind or actions of another devotee. Mr. N. was dealing with Prabhupāda just as he had dealt with C. Company. He had cheated them, and now he would cheat ISKCON. He could only surmise that Prabhupāda and his disciples were driven by the same motive as he himself, the only motive he could understand: material possessiveness.

Actually, even Prabhupāda's disciples were having difficulty understanding Prabhupāda's unbreakable determination. Prabhupāda's main motive was to preach Kṛṣṇa consciousness in Bombay. Śrīla Prabhupāda said, "My Guru Mahārāja ordered me to preach Kṛṣṇa consciousness in the West, and I have done that. Now I want to preach in India." Bombay was the most important city in India—the gateway. And within Bombay, Kṛṣṇa had somehow led Prabhupāda to this land, where he had begun preaching and had brought the Deities of Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa. In Prabhupāda's eyes, the land was suitable for the large, gorgeous temple and international hotel he had planned.

Bombay was an important city and required grand temple worship, large festivals, mass prasādam distribution, and a variety of Vedic cultural programs. The Juhu land seemed ideal for a school, a theater, a library, apartments—a Hare Kṛṣṇa city. So how could Prabhupāda retreat from this rogue who was trying to cheat him? There would always be persons opposed to Kṛṣṇa consciousness, Prabhupāda said, but that did not mean the devotees should give in. A preacher had to be tolerant, and sometimes, when all else failed and Kṛṣṇa's interest was at stake, he had to fight.

Another reason Prabhupāda refused to give up this particular plot of land was that he had promised the Deities, Rādhā-Rāsavihārī. He had invited Kṛṣṇa here and prayed, "Dear Sir, please stay here, and I will build You a beautiful temple." When Prabhupāda had been touring and a devotee from Bombay had written him that the Deities were being neglected, Prabhupāda had written back insisting that these "abominable activities" be rectified. The Deity of Kṛṣṇa was not a stone statue but was actually Kṛṣṇa, eager to reciprocate with His sincere devotee.

So if using the land for missionary work was the obvious or external reason for Prabhupāda's determination to keep his Hare Krishna Land, then the internal reason was his personal commitment to Their Lordships Śrī Śrī Rādhā-Rāsavihārī. Certainly Mr. N. and his associates could never understand this. Even Prabhupāda's own disciples could not realize it fully. Prabhupāda had brought Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa into very poor conditions, but with the promise of something wonderful to come. At his request Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa had come, and They were standing patiently, giving eternal benediction to Their worshipers, while Prabhupāda struggled to fulfill his promise.

Five hundred years ago each of the six Gosvāmīs of Vṛndāvana had had his own Deity, for whom he had built a beautiful temple. But Prabhupāda was empowered to install and maintain many Deities. In his Western world headquarters were the opulent Rukmiṇī-Dvārakādhīśa, in New York Rādhā-Govinda, in Dallas big Rādhā-Kālacandajī, on a traveling bus in America with Kīrtanānanda Swami and Viṣṇujana Swami were Rādhā-Dāmodara, in London Rādhā-Londonīśvara, in Māyāpur Rādhā-Mādhava, and in Australia Rādhā-Gopīnātha. All were Prabhupāda's worshipable Deities, arcā-vigraha incarnations of Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa appearing at the request of Their pure devotee for the benefit of neophyte devotees in various places around the world.

To establish many Deities was one of Śrīla Prabhupāda's prime contributions as a world preacher. And when he would visit each temple, he would always stand reverently before the Deities, taking Their blessings, and then he would offer prostrated obeisances. "Be humble," he would instruct the devotees. "Always remember you are dealing with Kṛṣṇa." And sometimes he would be unable to suppress his ecstatic symptoms of love for the Deities. Through his representatives, his many disciples, he worshiped all these Deities, but in the case of Rādhā-Rāsavihārī his involvement was more direct. Having taken India as his own managerial duty, he considered caring for this Deity his specific responsibility.

Prabhupāda's fighting spirit to keep the land was so keen that he sometimes appeared to be fighting for fighting's sake. He sometimes even compared Mr. N. to the demon Kāṁsa in Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, who had repeatedly tried to kill Kṛṣṇa. Just as Kāṁsa had employed many minor demons in his attempts to kill Kṛṣṇa, so Mr. N. had employed demoniac agents like lawyers, friends, and hoodlums. Kṛṣṇa's killing of demons like Kāṁsa was His pastime, or līlā—He enjoyed it. And Prabhupāda, as the servant of Kṛṣṇa, was fully absorbed in this fighting. He was vigilant, militant. When Mr. N. bluffed or frightened the devotees, causing them to back down, Prabhupāda held his ground. He took naturally to the fight; Kṛṣṇa and Kṛṣṇa's mission were being challenged.

Never before had Prabhupāda been so threatened or met such active enemies. In New Delhi, when he had been selling his Back to Godhead magazines, he had often met with brusque words, and in America people had ignored him and occasionally heckled him. But no one had seriously attempted to stop his preaching. Here, however, was a demon working actively to cheat him, to destroy his preaching, to disperse his disciples, and to displace his deity. He was forced to fight, and his disciples, if they were to understand his mood, would also have to fight.

Prabhupāda was acting as the protector and the parent of the Deities and of ISKCON Bombay. As he had described in The Nectar of Devotion, many great devotees have an eternal relationship with Kṛṣṇa as His protector. When as a child Kṛṣṇa had fought the serpent Kāliya, Kṛṣṇa's mother and father had been plunged into transcendental anxiety. They had seen their child entangled in the coils of the serpent and, fearing for Kṛṣṇa's life, had wanted to protect Him. The eternal mother and father of Kṛṣṇa always worry that Kṛṣṇa may meet with harm, and when danger appears to come, their natural anxiety increases many times. In this way they show the most intense love for Kṛṣṇa. Śrīla Prabhupāda's mood was to protect Rādhā-Rāsavihārī and also his Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement. Although he knew that Kṛṣṇa was the supreme protector and that nobody could oppose His will, out of a protective desire to spread Kṛṣṇa's glories he feared that the demon Mr. N. might harm Kṛṣṇa.

Prabhupāda's feelings of anxiety and protectiveness extended to his disciples also. Although out of duty he often criticized and corrected them privately, before others he usually defended and praised them. When Dr. Patel, a Bombay physician, had criticized the way the devotees were living, not protecting themselves from mosquitoes, Prabhupāda had said that because his devotees were liberated and did not identify with their bodies, such things did not trouble them.

Prabhupāda saw his disciples as children, with little worldly experience; they did not know how to deal with rogues and could be easily tricked. But if the son was gullible, the father would have to be shrewd and strong to protect his family. As protector of the devotees and of Kṛṣṇa's mission, Prabhupāda wanted to establish good housing so that his disciples could serve Kṛṣṇa in comfort—even elegance. Prabhupāda's spiritual master, Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī, had taught the same thing when he said that preachers of Kṛṣṇa consciousness should have the best of everything, because they were doing the best service to Kṛṣṇa. Prabhupāda was therefore determined to establish his Hare Kṛṣṇa city in Bombay. He did not take the attitude of a naked mendicant, who cares for nothing of this material world. He felt responsible for his thousands of disciples, and therefore he took on so many anxieties.

Mr. N. could not know what motives were driving Śrīla Prabhupāda. Nor could he imagine the full ramifications of opposing Kṛṣṇa and Kṛṣṇa's pure devotee, even though the danger of such a position had been explained in India's most famous classics, Bhagavad-gītā, Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, and Rāmāyaṇa. Prabhupāda was fighting on the side of Kṛṣṇa; therefore, Mr. N. was opposing the Supreme Personality of Godhead.

By Prabhupāda's disciples' cancellation of the agreement, ISKCON's legal position had been weakened. But Prabhupāda had faith that if the devotees just maintained possession of the land, their position would remain strong. At the same time, he urged the devotees to preach more. They should not think that without a temple they could not preach, so he arranged for another big Bombay paṇḍāl festival downtown, which proved to be a great success, with twenty thousand attending nightly.

Important guests like Mr. R. K. Ganatra, the mayor of Bombay, made introductory speeches, and the devotees also took an active part, organizing, advertising, cooking and distributing prasādam, distributing Śrīla Prabhupāda's books, and preaching at a question-and-answer booth. The paṇḍāl festival served to lift the devotees out of the doldrums of their protracted legal fight and the austerity of their living at Juhu.

During the last week of January 1973, Prabhupāda met with Mr. N. at the residence of Mr. Mahadevia. Although Prabhupāda's lawyers had filed a criminal case against Mr. N., Prabhupāda wanted to attempt an out-of-court settlement. He had always been gracious and charming with Mr. N., and Mr. N. had always appeared responsive and polite. But this time was different. Gone were the smiles and friendly words. The two were remaining barely civil to each other. After a few minutes, Prabhupāda asked his disciples to leave the room.

Speaking in Hindi, Mr. N. began accusing Prabhupāda and the devotees of being connected with the CIA. "I will come on Monday," said Mr. N. tersely, "with a check for two lakhs to pay back your down payment."

"All right," Prabhupāda replied. "If you don't want to part with your land, then we will leave. But think before you do this."

Mr. N. continued his accusations. "You people are calling yourselves the owners of the land, but you are just a big disturbance to the whole area, getting up at four and all this..."

"We do not claim to be the owner," Prabhupāda replied. "Kṛṣṇa is the real owner. I am not the real owner. Kṛṣṇa is already there on His land. Why are you bothering us so much? Simply take the money and give us the land. Or, if you want us to vacate, then prepare the check." Prabhupāda had been speaking with restraint, but now his tone became angry. "Bring out your check, and we will vacate tomorrow morning. No, we will vacate tonight! Give us our money back. Have you the money?"

Mr. N. shouted, "I will remove the Deities myself! I will break the temple and remove the Deities!" Mr. N. then stormed out of the room.

That week Mr. N. was hospitalized after a severe heart attack. Two weeks later he died. When Prabhupāda heard of Mr. N.'s death, he was at first silent. Then he quoted a verse Prahāda Mahārāja had spoken following the death of his demoniac father, Hiranyakaśipu: modeta sādhuḥ api vṛścika-sarpa-hatyā. "Even a saint is pleased when a snake or scorpion is killed."

Mrs. N., although not as legally astute as her late husband, carried on the fight, and her lawyers, eager to collect their fees, pursued even more intently than she the litigation to drive out ISKCON. In April 1973, at ISKCON's instigation, ISKCON's case came before the High Court. There were tactical delays, however, and month after month passed with no decision.

Prabhupāda did not commit himself to construction on the land, because he had no deed and no assurance of one. He toured the West, returned to India, but still nothing had happened to resolve the matter. Life in ISKCON Bombay was peaceful, but progress remained stunted, the outcome uncertain.

Then one day, without warning, Mrs. N. launched a violent attack. On the morning of June 1, while the devotees were attending their routine duties, a truck drove onto the Juhu property. A demolition squad had come to dismantle the temple. Somehow Mrs. N. had convinced an official in the city government to authorize demolition of the temple, a modest structure of brick and steel-reinforced concrete. When Girirāja attempted to show the officer in charge a letter establishing ISKCON's rights, the man ignored the letter and signaled for the demolition to begin. Soon more trucks arrived, until nearly one hundred demolitionists, working with blowtorches and sledgehammers, swarmed over the property.

The demolitionists mounted ladders and began breaking the roof of the temple hall with sledgehammers. Others used torches to cut through the steel supports. The plan of the demolition squad was to knock out the steel supports of the kīrtana hall and proceed methodically toward the Deity house, wherein Rādhā-Rāsavihārī stood. The devotees tried to stop the demolition, but policemen soon appeared on the scene and, working in pairs, would grab the dissenters by the legs and arms and carry them away. Police dragged the women away by the hair, while tenants on the land looked on. Some were glad to see the demolition, although others were sympathetic. Out of fear of the police, however, no one moved to help the devotees.

One devotee, Maniṣvi, ran to a telephone and called Mr. Mahadevia, who, along with his friend Mr. Vinoda Gupta, rushed to Hare Krishna Land, to find the police dragging off the last protesting devotee by the hair. She had been trying to close the doors to the altar to protect the Deities when three policemen had wrestled her away. Mr. Mahadevia rushed to the house of a sympathetic tenant, Mr. Acarya, and phoned his brother Chandra Mahadevia, a wealthy businessman and friend of Bal Ṭhākura, the leader of one of the most influential political parties in Bombay.

Mr. Chandra Mahadevia informed Bal Ṭhākura of the emergency: at the instigation of a Hindu and under the order of a Hindu municipal officer, a Hindu temple of Lord Viṣṇu was being demolished. Mr. Ṭhākura in turn informed the municipal commissioner, who denied knowing of any order to demolish the temple and who in turn phoned the local ward office that had sent out the demolition squad. The ward office sent a man to stop the demolition. The officer arrived around two P.M., just as the demolition squad had cut through the last pillars and were dismantling the roof above the Deities. The order to stop the demolition was given to the ward officer in charge, who then stopped the demolition squad.

Prabhupāda was in Calcutta at the time of the attack, and when the devotees reached him by phone, he told them to organize the local ISKCON sympathizers and life members and protest the attack by mass publicity. They should also expose the persons responsible. This would be very effective against Mrs. N. and her party.

Prabhupāda mentioned various life members he thought would help. Mr. Sada Jiwatlal, the head of the Hindu Viswa Parishad, should help with publicity, since his organization was a defender of Hindu dharma and was meant for handling such cases as this. Mr. Sethi should help in preventing further violence. This episode, Prabhupāda said, had been part of Kṛṣṇa's plan; the devotees should not be afraid.

The next morning a photo of the demolished temple appeared on the front page of the Free Press Journal with the headline, "UNAUTHORIZED TEMPLE DEMOLISHED BY MUNICIPAL AUTHORITIES."

Devotees began counteracting the bad publicity. Mr. Sada Jiwatlal turned his downtown office into an ISKCON office, and he and the devotees began the campaign. Despite the unfavorable propaganda, many Indians were shocked at the violence, and the municipal corporation unanimously condemned those officials responsible for the attack on a Hindu temple. Devotees, working from six A.M. to nine P.M. at Sada Jiwatlal's office, phoned the newspapers, wrote letters and circulars, and contacted possible sympathizers.

Mr. Vinoda Gupta, a member of the Jan-Sangh political party, which favored maintaining India's Hindu culture, joined with Kartikeya Mahadevia and others to form a "Save the Temple" committee. Mr. Gupta published his own leaflet declaring ISKCON to be a bona fide Hindu organization. As Girirāja met with and elicited the support of government officials, many of Bombay's leading citizens, appreciating the authenticity of the Hare Kṛṣṇa movement, began to show sympathy and offer assistance.

Thus the plan of Mrs. N. and her lawyers backfired. Although they had been thinking they were dealing with only a mere handful of young foreigners, they soon found themselves facing many of Bombay's most influential citizens.

Śrīla Prabhupāda predicted that the results would be positive. A few days after the incident he wrote,

The demolition of our temple by the municipality has strengthened our position. The municipality standing committee has condemned the hasty action of the municipality, and has agreed to reconstruct the shed at their cost. Not only that, the temporary construction shall continue to stay until the court decision is there as to who is the proprietor of the land. Under the circumstances we should immediately reconstruct the Deity shed. Barbed wire fencing should be immediately done to cover the naked land. And if possible, immediately in front of the Deity shed, a temporary pandal should be constructed, with our materials. If it is so done, then I can go to Bombay and begin Bhagawat Parayana, to continue until the court decision is there. This is my desire.

Prabhupāda also asked Girirāja to give full coverage of the temple demolition in his Hare Krishna Monthly journal to life members. Prabhupāda himself wrote an article for the Monthly describing his movement and the events leading to the attack on the temple. He condemned the Bombay municipality for having the "audacity to smash our temple, against the law and principle of religious faith." A clique in Bombay, he said, had conspired to drive the devotees from their land without returning their money, and he asked for sympathizers and life members of the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement to come forward and help him at this difficult hour.

Only about a dozen ISKCON life members responded to Śrīla Prabhupāda's call. There were hundreds of life members in Bombay, each of whom had donated 1,111 rupees and were receiving Prabhupāda's books. But when it came to a personal commitment in a time of controversy, only a few were willing to help. Those who did help, however, were able to assist in ways that the innocent, naive, and uninfluential disciples of Prabhupāda could not.

The devotees began to see the entire course of events as Kṛṣṇa's mercy, since many life members were now rendering valuable service to Prabhupāda and Lord Kṛṣṇa. In the past Prabhupāda had stayed in the homes of many life members, preaching to them and their families, convincing them of his sincerity and of the noble aims of his movement. These friends and members—like Bhagubai Patel, Beharilal Khandelwala, Brijratan Mohatta, Dr. C. Bali, and others—were acting not simply out of Hindu sentiment but out of deep respect and affection for Prabhupāda.

Girirāja, working with Sada Jiwatlal, tried to convince the municipal council to authorize the rebuilding of the temple structure. While doing so, however, he discovered that Mrs. N. had that very day (a Friday) filed for a court injunction preventing ISKCON from rebuilding. Justice Nain told Girirāja that he did not want to grant Mrs. N.'s request and that he would hear the devotee's case on the following Monday. This meant that the devotees had from Saturday morning to Monday morning, two days, to rebuild the temple.

The devotees reasoned that, although they had no actual permission to rebuild the temple, there was as yet no law to stop them. If Justice Nain ruled against them, then to rebuild would be very difficult. They decided, therefore, to use the weekend to rebuild. Mr. Lal, a former contractor, helped arrange materials: bricks, mortar, asbestos sheets. Mr. Sethi offered a crew of laborers. At eight P.M. on Friday the masons began their work, continuing throughout the night despite the rain. And on Monday morning, when the judge learned of the new temple, he declared, "What is built is built. No one can destroy the temple."

When Prabhupāda heard the news, he considered it a complete victory. The temple had been rebuilt, and public opinion was swinging strongly in ISKCON's favor.

SPL 42: Developing Māyāpur

CHAPTER FORTY-TWO

Developing Māyāpur

= Māyāpur

Although the Māyāpur building was not yet completed, Prabhupāda had come there to reside. He took two adjoining rooms, one as his study and one as his bedroom, on the second floor. Meanwhile, construction work continued in the temple room and in other parts of the building. On Prabhupāda's first day there, a storm struck, with massive black clouds and high winds. The storm was brief, however, and damage was minimal.

I have just now come to Mayapur and am very hopeful to regain my strength and health on account of being in this transcendental atmosphere. Every moment we are passing here in great delight.

In the evening the temple pūjārī, Jananivāsa, would come to Prabhupāda's room with a clay pot of red coals and frankincense and fan the frankincense until the room was filled with smoke. This was to drive out insects, but Prabhupāda also considered it purifying.

Although he was sometimes disturbed by the workers' hammering, he found the atmosphere otherwise peaceful. Only a few devotees were staying there, and Prabhupāda gave his attention to translating or to speaking with guests and to the devotees in charge of developing his Māyāpur center. He would express his desires especially to Bhavānanda Mahārāja and Jayapatāka Mahārāja and worked his will through them.

The devotees living in the building with Prabhupāda considered themselves menial servants in Prabhupāda's personal house. Of course, all the buildings in ISKCON belonged to Prabhupāda, yet in Māyāpur that sense was intensified. Generally the devotees in each particular center would raise money to support their center, but Prabhupāda personally took charge of getting funds for Māyāpur. He had begun a Māyāpur-Vṛndāvana Trust Fund of donations from his disciples and interest from bonds and security deposits. If money was misspent, energy misused, or the building damaged in any way, Prabhupāda would become very concerned. Now that he was personally on the scene, he often walked about, giving detailed instructions and demanding that discrepancies be corrected. The pink and reddish building was like a huge transcendental ship, and Śrīla Prabhupāda, as captain, would walk the wide verandas, giving strict orders to all mates for keeping everything shipshape.

One day Prabhupāda was walking on the veranda near his room. The other rooms were locked, and as Prabhupāda walked alone, he would open the window shutters and look in. Suddenly he turned to Śatadhanya, who waited on call nearby. "The fan is going on inside, and this room is empty and locked," Prabhupāda said. "Who has done this?" Śatadhanya didn't know. "Whoever has done this," Prabhupāda said, "is a rascal! He should know he is a rascal!" For two days after, Prabhupāda continued to refer to the incident with disgust.

One day, after a huge wind and rain storm, water covered the twelve-foot-wide marble veranda outside Prabhupāda's room. Bhavānanda Goswami, taking a large squeegee a devotee had made, began cleaning the marble floor, and Śrīla Prabhupāda came to his door to watch. "This is the way to clean marble," Prabhupāda said. "Don't polish it with wax, but just keep plenty of fresh water and every day in the morning wipe it off. In this way the marble will become naturally polished and will shine like glass."

Prabhupāda felt affection and deep gratitude for those devotees dedicating their lives to the Māyāpur project. One night he called Bhavānanda to his room and began asking him about the devotees. Suddenly Prabhupāda began crying. "I know it is difficult for all you Western boys and girls," he said. "You are so dedicated, serving here in my mission. I know you cannot even get prasādam. When I think that you cannot even get milk and that you have given up your opulent life to come here and you do not complain, I am very much indebted to all of you."

Bhavānanda: The marble workers lived in some chāṭāi houses right near the construction site. There was a hand pump just outside the building, and that's where we took our bath and where the workers got the water for the cement. Some distance off were two toilets—one for the men, one for the women. It was just two holes in the ground, and each hole surrounded by a chāṭāi wall. The storms and the rain would come, and we would have to sludge through the mud in the fields to go to the toilets. There were snakes all over the place. It was wild! It was a construction site. No one lives on a construction site, but we did. Śrīla Prabhupāda made us move in there. It was good for us. No bathrooms, nothing—just open floors with concrete.

Although the devotees endured the austerities of living at the Māyāpur center construction site, they sometimes felt it was too difficult. But Śrīla Prabhupāda never considered it difficult, and he would encourage the devotees: "Māyāpur is so wonderful. You can live on the air and water alone."

Bhavānanda: We were able to face up to so many difficulties because we just took it as our order from Śrīla Prabhupāda. There was no conception of ever leaving. What else would I do? This was my order: "Take Māyāpur. I am giving you Māyāpur. Take it, develop it, and enjoy it." There was no question in our minds of going somewhere else.

The surrounding grounds were rice fields, and to get to the temple building from the entrance of the property—a distance of more than two hundred yards—devotees would have to walk on paths made by ridges of earth that separated one rice field from another. The kitchen, which was made of tarpaulin and bamboo, was located near the entrance to the property.

The devotees had to live without electricity much of the time, since the power supply was often cut off. They would use kerosene lamps at night, and Prabhupāda said the lamps should be taken apart every day, the wicks trimmed, and the glass washed. "In the future," he said, "you should grow castor plants and crush the seeds and take the oil for burning."

Prabhupāda told the devotees how to build simple dwellings. He also wanted them to build a wall with a gate along the front of the property. They should build small rooms—hutments, he called them—against the wall. Devotees could stay in these simple cottages. They should plant coconut and banana trees.

Raising the money, buying the land, arranging for workers and materials—it had been an arduous struggle, replete with bureaucratic delays, forms, fees, supply shortages, and the like. Prabhupāda would not tolerate any carelessness or waste. The building, which was turning out to be so artistic, substantial, and useful, was actually a gift from Lord Kṛṣṇa. So to live here in Kṛṣṇa's building was to reciprocate lovingly with the Lord. The devotees should think of serving Kṛṣṇa, not of becoming comfortable and forgetting the purpose of both the building and of life. The slamming of doors, although seemingly a minor fault, greatly disturbed Śrīla Prabhupāda. It symptomized carelessness and misuse, and Prabhupāda said the sound cracked his heart. One time Prabhupāda came out of his room and called out, "Who is that slamming the doors? No one knows from where this building has come. You take it for granted, that it is here. But no one cares."

More often, however, Śrīla Prabhupāda displayed a roselike softness, an intimate, informal, and affectionate nature. The holy dhāma of Māyāpur was the spiritual world, Goloka Vṛndāvana; so the devotees there were living with Prabhupāda in the spiritual world. More than most any other place in the world, the devotees living in Māyāpur knew they could walk into Prabhupāda's room and see him. He sometimes even walked into their rooms. While they were working, reading, or talking, he might suddenly walk in and speak with them, asking how they felt and how they were adjusting to living in India. "It is difficult living here?" he would ask. "I think India is too hot. What do you think?"

Even with the building incomplete, many guests were coming, especially to talk with Prabhupāda, who patiently spent many hours each day speaking about Kṛṣṇa consciousness with guests who came to inquire about his movement or who came only to talk about themselves and their own philosophy. Sometimes he would remark that an individual had wasted his time, but he never stopped anyone from seeing him. One wealthy Hindu man, Mr. Brijratan Mohatta, and his wife, a daughter of multimillionaire R. D. Birla, visited Prabhupāda from Calcutta. Śrīla Prabhupāda took care in properly hosting his guests, and he personally reviewed the menu and briefed his disciples on serving Mr. Mohatta and his wife. Offering prasādam was an important part of the Vaiṣṇava's etiquette, and Śrīla Prabhupāda always stressed that the devotees immediately offer prasādam to visitors.

"You should always be able to offer water, hot purīs and eggplant bhājī (fried eggplant), and sweets," Prabhupāda said. Even when guests appeared shy, Prabhupāda would insist they take a full meal. Mrs. Mohatta, even though a member of one of the wealthiest families in India, was satisfied with the simple hospitality Śrīla Prabhupāda and his disciples offered. The room she and her husband stayed in was unfinished—the slate floors hadn't been polished, and construction work was going on all around—and the devotees could only offer them a mattress on the floor with a pillow; yet they appeared to be quite satisfied and appreciative.

Bhavananda: Śrīla Prabhupāda introduced us to many of the details of Indian culture at Māyāpur. He had us put down mattresses covered with sheets in his room. In 1970, in Los Angeles, he had asked me to sew sheets together to make a covering for the rug in his room. And then he had gotten down on his hands and knees right next to me, and we had smoothed out the wrinkles in the sheet.

So he had us do that same thing in Māyāpur, where we put mattresses from one end of the room to the other with bolster pillows against the wall. "Now you have white sheet covers," he said, "and you change these every day." When Bengali gentlemen visited Śrīla Prabhupāda in his room, they would sit on these mattresses around the edge of the room, their backs against the bolster pillows.

It was very aristocratic. The whole mood was that he was the mahant, the master of the house, the ācārya, but also the aristocratic Bengali gentlemen saw that he was reestablishing the old aristocratic mood from the early 1900's or 1920's. It was from Prabhupāda's old days with the Mullik family and it was rapidly dwindling. At that time you couldn't find a semblance of the old culture anywhere, because all those families had become degraded, and their wealth gone.

When the evening's multitude of varieties of insects gathered around Prabhupāda's light, he would sometimes comment on how they were such wonderful creations of God. "This little insect," he said one evening, "is both pilot and flying machine in one. Here there are hundreds of insects flying together, and yet there are no collisions. That is God's arrangement. They never crash, because the Supersoul is present—one in every heart. Let the material scientists manufacture such a wonderful machine with a built-in pilot that will not crash. When one man flies and then there are two planes, they have to be very careful."

While a few devotees sat on the sheet-covered mattresses in his room, Prabhupāda sat on his slightly raised āsana, leaning back against a white bolster pillow. Both spiritual master and disciple enjoyed bliss in speaking and hearing Kṛṣṇa consciousness. The devotees wanted to hear Prabhupāda's words and follow his will, and he wanted to instruct them.

"But these insects," Prabhupāda continued, "are not perfect. They are flying to the light. That also means they are attracted to death. So they are just like the materialists. The materialists are building skyscrapers, yet they don't know what will happen at death. Henry Ford and other big capitalists had to die. But so many others are trying to become just like them. They do not know it means their death also. They are like these small insects. In the morning we simply find heaps of them, all dead."

Often while Prabhupāda was talking in his room the lights would suddenly go out, and devotees would bring in kerosene lamps. And each night, while Prabhupāda was speaking, the pūjārī would come, filling the room with frankincense smoke. Ghee lamps faintly illuminated the large teakwood bas-relief carving of Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa on the wall opposite Prabhupāda's desk.

During this summer visit, Prabhupāda further revealed his vision for ISKCON's Māyāpur development. The devotees were already aware that the plan was vast and would cost millions of dollars. They now had one building, but this was only the beginning. In the total plan, this building was almost insignificant. Prabhupāda spoke about a colossal temple, its great dome rising above a transcendental city. This Mayapur Chandrodaya Mandir would house the greatest planetarium in the world, depicting the universe as it is described in the Vedic literature.

To execute such a project, Prabhupāda wanted to train his disciples in the Vedic arts, now dying in Bengal. Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī had been greatly interested in using dioramas to depict the līlā of Kṛṣṇa and Lord Caitanya, and now Prabhupāda wanted his own disciples to learn the art by studying under local Māyāpur artists.

In June Baradrāja, Ādideva, Mūrti, and Īśāna arrived to begin learning the art of doll-making. Prabhupāda also wanted a disciple to learn to make mṛdaṅgas, and a potter began coming every day to teach Īśāna how to mold and fire the clay shells. The devotees converted Prabhupāda's original straw cottage into a workshop, and Prabhupāda began inviting other disciples to come to Māyāpur.

Mayapur is already wonderful, being the transcendental birthplace of Lord Krishna. By utilizing Western talents to develop this place, certainly it will become unique in the world.

The Māyāpur city, Prabhupāda said, would be the fulfillment of the desires of the previous ācāryas. The city would grow to a population of fifty thousand and would become the spiritual capital of the world. With its gigantic temple in the center and separate quarters for brāhmaṇas, kṣatriyas, vaiśyas, and śūdras, the city would be a model for all other cities. The day would come when the world's cities would be ruined, and humanity would take refuge in cities modeled after Māyāpur. The development of Māyāpur would mark the beginning of a Kṛṣṇa conscious world. Thus the influence of Śrī Caitanya Mahāprabhu would increase, and His prediction would manifest: "In every town and village My name will be chanted."

Prabhupāda said that Māyāpur should eventually become more easily accessible—by bridge from Navadvīpa, by motor launch up the Ganges from Calcutta, and from all parts by air. In Bengal millions were by birth followers of Lord Caitanya, and they would recognize and take up Kṛṣṇa consciousness as the pure form of their own culture. There is a saying: What Bengal does, the rest of India follows. So if Bengal be came reformed and purified by the Kṛṣṇa conscious example of American Vaiṣṇavas, then all India would follow. And when all India became Kṛṣṇa conscious, the whole world would follow. "I have given you the kingdom of God," Prabhupāda said to his Māyāpur managers. "Now take it, develop it, and enjoy it."

Throughout the month of June Prabhupāda continued to live happily and peacefully in the not-yet-completed building of the Mayapur Chandrodaya Mandir. Although he had been ill with a cough since Los Angeles—a cough he had been unable to cure while traveling in the West—on coming to Māyāpur his health had recovered.

In Mayapur I am much improved from how I was in Los Angeles. The great advantage here is that there is always open air and a good breeze which is naturally very good for any breathing difficulties... Certainly Mayapur is by far a better place than Los Angeles because you can enjoy the free air here. The climate is not too hot, but a little moist with humidity but on the whole it is very pleasing. Our building is most superexcellently situated, and it is the experience of many respectable outsiders that while the outer atmosphere is unbearably hot, in our building it is pleasing.

Prabhupāda praised the constant pleasurable breezes that passed through the building—he called them "Vaikuṇṭha breezes." Sometimes, however, a violent storm would suddenly appear. Although severe, these storms were also beautiful, with continuous lightning like neon lights filling the sky. One day a storm arose, and the winds began to howl through the building. Noticing that Prabhupāda's doors and windows were open, Śatadhanya rushed into the room and began frantically closing them. But Prabhupāda, seated at his desk, said, "Stop, leave all the windows open."

"Prabhupāda," Śatadhanya protested, "the storm is here."

"Just leave them open," Prabhupāda said, as the wind rushed through his room at more than fifty miles an hour. Prabhupāda smiled. "There is no place in the world like this!" he said, his saffron robes billowing.

Prabhupāda stood on the roof of his Māyāpur building, looking over to the birthplace of Caitanya Mahāprabhu less than a mile away. "Actually," he said to Bhavānanda Mahārāja, "their claim to the birthplace of Caitanya Mahāprabhu is not very important. Is Kṛṣṇa famous for having been born in Mathurā? No. He is famous for His activities. Similarly, Caitanya Mahāprabhu is not famous for having been born in Māyāpur. He is famous for His activities, for His saṅkīrtana preaching. This Mayapur Chandrodaya Mandir is the preaching of Caitanya Mahāprabhu. Therefore I want a place that is so attractive because of the activities of Caitanya Mahāprabhu that everyone will come here!"

While in Calcutta, before coming to Māyāpur, Prabhupāda had called several senior disciples into his room. "I have had many requests," he had said to them, "to translate Caitanya-bhāgavata. But I am going to translate the entire Caitanya-caritāmṛta. Is that all right?"

"Oh, yes, Prabhupāda," Bhavānanda Goswami had replied, "that's wonderful."

Decades ago Prabhupāda had written essays based on the Caitanya-caritāmṛta, and over the years he had translated some of the verses and written purports to them. Then in America in 1968 he had completed Teachings of Lord Caitanya, a summary study based on certain important passages of Caitanya-caritāmṛta. During his stay in Māyāpur, however, he began anew a translation and commentary of Kṛṣṇadāsa Kavirāja's Caitanya-caritāmṛta, beginning with the Seventh Chapter. As he progressed, he found a wonderful momentum and said he would publish a volume, starting with Chapter Seven, for Lord Caitanya's appearance day in March. Deciding to complete the entire Caitanya-caritāmṛta, he suspended his work on Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam.

In one of the first verses of the Seventh Chapter, Kṛṣṇadāsa Kavirāja states, "Let me offer my obeisances to Lord Śrī Kṛṣṇa, who has manifested Himself in five, as a devotee, expansion of a devotee, incarnation of a devotee, pure devotee, and devotional energy." Prabhupāda wrote that the only way for people to be elevated in love of Kṛṣṇa in the age of Kali is by the mercy of the Pañca-tattva, or Lord Caitanya in His form of five personalities. One should offer obeisances to Śrī Caitanya Mahāprabhu by chanting the Pañca-tattva mantra, śrī-kṛṣṇa-caitanya prabhu-nityānanda śrī-advaita gadādhara śrīvāsādi-gaura-bhakta-vṛnda. This mantra should be recited before one chants the mahā-mantra, Hare Kṛṣṇa, Hare Kṛṣṇa, Kṛṣṇa Kṛṣṇa, Hare Hare/ Hare Rāma, Hare Rāma, Rāma Rāma, Hare Hare. "There are ten offenses in the chanting of the Hare Kṛṣṇa mahā-mantra," Prabhupāda wrote, "but these are not considered in the chanting of the Pañca-tattva mahā-mantra... One must first take shelter of Śrī Caitanya Mahāprabhu, learn the Pañca-tattva mahā-mantra, and then chant the Hare Kṛṣṇa mahā-mantra."

Verse after verse of the Seventh Chapter confirmed the essential principles of Śrīla Prabhupāda's mission and attested that he was teaching exactly after the method advised by Lord Caitanya Mahāprabhu.

The characteristics of Kṛṣṇa are understood to be a storehouse of transcendental love. Although that storehouse of love certainly came with Kṛṣṇa when He was present, it was sealed. But when Śrī Caitanya Mahāprabhu came with His other associates, the Pañca-tattva, they broke the seal and plundered the storehouse to taste transcendental love of Kṛṣṇa. The more they tasted it, the more their thirst for it grew.

Śrī Pañca-tattva themselves danced again and again and thus made it easier to drink nectarean love of Godhead. They danced, cried, laughed and chanted like madmen, and in this way they distributed love of Godhead.

In commenting on these verses Prabhupāda wrote,

The present Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement follows the same principle, and therefore simply by chanting and dancing we have received good responses all over the world. It is to be understood, however, that this chanting and dancing do not belong to this material world. They are actually transcendental activities, for the more one engages in chanting and dancing, the more he can taste the nectar of transcendental love of Godhead.

By the phrase "Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement," Prabhupāda spoke not only of his own disciples and his Kṛṣṇa consciousness society but also of the movement inaugurated by Lord Caitanya. Just as the original Personality of Godhead and the Deity of Kṛṣṇa in the temple were the same, so the movement of Lord Caitanya Mahāprabhu and Prabhupāda's Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement were identical.

In distributing love of Godhead, Caitanya Mahāprabhu and His associates did not consider who was a fit candidate and who was not, nor where such distribution should or should not take place. They made no conditions. Wherever they got the opportunity the members of the Pañca-tattva distributed love of Godhead.

For Śrīla Prabhupāda, this verse directly confirmed the instruction he had received from his spiritual master, Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī, that people of all births could become Vaiṣṇavas, brāhmaṇas, and sannyāsīs. Here was direct evidence from the scripture, yet Prabhupāda, like his own spiritual master, had often received criticism from the caste-conscious brāhmaṇas of India. With the proof in hand, Prabhupāda now challenged his envious critics.

There are some rascals who dare to speak against the mission of Lord Caitanya by criticizing the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement for accepting Europeans and Americans as brāhmaṇas and offering them sannyāsa. But here is an authoritative statement that in distributing love of Godhead one should not consider whether the recipients are Europeans, Americans, Hindus, Muslims, etc. The Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement should be spread wherever possible, and one should accept those who thus become Vaiṣṇavas as being greater than brāhmaṇas, Hindus or Indians. And Caitanya Mahāprabhu desired that His name be spread in each and every town and village on the surface of the globe. Therefore, when the cult of Caitanya Mahāprabhu is spread all over the world, should those who embrace it not be accepted as Vaiṣṇavas, brāhmaṇas and sannyāsīs? These foolish arguments are sometimes raised by envious rascals, but Kṛṣṇa conscious devotees do not care about them. We strictly follow the principles set down by the Pañca-tattva.

Another criticism Śrīla Prabhupāda encountered was that his emphasis on proselytizing was actually alien to Indian spirituality. Even Prabhupāda's Godbrothers had occasionally made such remarks. More often, however, this sentiment came from the impersonalists, who argued that people should be left to conceive of religion in their own ways; religion, being an internal, spiritual affair, should not be propagated by zealous evangelism. Preaching and conversion, they said, were for the Christians, not for followers of Indian religion. In the Seventh Chapter of Caitanya-caritāmṛta's Ādi-līlā, however, Śrī Kṛṣṇa Caitanya, the Supreme Personality of Godhead, reveals His heart and emotion as the ideal preacher.

Although the members of the Pañca-tattva plundered the storehouse of love of Godhead and ate and distributed the contents, there was no scarcity, for this wonderful storehouse is so complete that as the love is distributed, the supply increases hundreds of times.

The flood of love of Godhead swelled in all directions, and thus young men, old men, women and children were all immersed in that inundation.

The Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement will inundate the entire world and drown everyone, whether one be a gentleman, a rogue or even lame, invalid or blind.

When the first five members of the Pañca-tattva saw the entire world drowned in love of Godhead and the seed of material enjoyment in the living entities completely destroyed, they all became exceedingly happy.

The more the five members of the Pañca-tattva caused the rains of love of Godhead to fall, the more the inundation increased and spread all over the world.

This was Śrīla Prabhupāda's spirit in training young men and women in the International Society for Krishna Consciousness, and he was offering these words of Lord Caitanya to strengthen all the Lord's devotees. The members of the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement should be confident that by preaching purely they would meet with success. Prabhupāda was confident. Here were the words of śāstra, words spoken by the Supreme Personality of Godhead. And Prabhupāda's personal experience confirmed the same. Thus he could write,

Our Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement was started singlehandedly, and no one provided for our livelihood, but at present we are spending hundreds and thousands of dollars all over the world and the movement is increasing more and more. Although jealous persons may be envious, if we stick to our principles and follow the footsteps of the Pañca-tattva, this movement will go on unchecked by imitation swamis, sannyāsīs, religionists, philosophers or scientists, for it is transcendental to all material considerations. Therefore, those who propagate the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement should not be afraid of such rascals and fools.

The verses of the Seventh Chapter described a worldwide inundation of Kṛṣṇa consciousness. Thus the objections that Europeans and Americans could not become brāhmaṇas or sannyāsīs would be swept away as Lord Caitanya's mercy flooded the entire world. Nothing could check it.

The words of Kṛṣṇadāsa Kavirāja intensified Prabhupāda's desire to base his worldwide movement in the land where Lord Caitanya appeared and began His saṅkīrtana movement. The Pañca-tattva had begun in Navadvīpa, and from here the waves of love of Godhead were swelling outward.

In Śrīdhāma Māyāpur, there is sometimes a great flood after the rainy season. This is an indication that from the birthplace of Lord Caitanya the inundation of love of Godhead should spread all over the world, for this will help everyone, including old men, young men, women and children. The Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement of Śrī Caitanya Mahāprabhu is so powerful that it can inundate the entire world and interest all classes of men in the subject of love of Godhead.

In this Seventh Chapter of the Ādi-līlā, Prabhupāda found many other evidences authorizing ISKCON under the principles of Lord Caitanya's teachings and activities. Kṛṣṇadāsa Kavirāja says that Lord Caitanya's taking sannyāsa was a trick for delivering certain classes of society who would otherwise not have shown Him respect. Prabhupāda, in his commentary, explained that he also had devised schemes for offering the benefits of Kṛṣṇa consciousness to as wide a spectrum of society as possible, and he cited his acceptance of women into the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement. "Therefore it is a principle," he wrote, "that a preacher must strictly follow the rules and regulations laid down in the śāstra, yet at the same time devise a means by which the preaching work to reclaim the fallen may go on with full force."

From Māyāpur Śrīla Prabhupāda went to Calcutta. He wrote to Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami,

...There is a suggestion by Shyamsundar that I may go to London for meeting very important men there in the new house given us by George... But I want to make some definite settlement of Bombay affairs before I return to Europe or America. If there is a suitable place for me to stay for a few days in Bombay I can go there immediately and from there I may go to London.

While considering his itinerary, Prabhupāda passed some days in the Calcutta temple on Albert Road. He was very free about allowing people to see him, and his room was often filled with local Bengalis as well as his own disciples, seated on the white sheet before him. In the evenings he would go, even when it meant riding for miles through congested parts of the city, to spend an hour in someone's home, preaching Kṛṣṇa consciousness.

Śrīla Prabhupāda's sister, Bhavatāriṇī (known as Piśimā to Prabhupāda's disciples), would also visit the Calcutta temple to see her beloved brother and, as usual, to cook for him. One day, however, a few hours after eating her kachaurīs, Prabhupāda felt sharp pains in his stomach. He closed his doors and went to bed. His followers became very concerned. When his servant, Śrutakīrti, came into the room, he found him tossing.

"Śrīla Prabhupāda, what's wrong?"

"My stomach," Prabhupāda replied. "That coconut kachaurī—it was not cooked."

The seizure continued all night, and several devotees continually massaged Prabhupāda's body, especially his stomach. But with every breath he would moan. Piśimā was standing by, but Prabhupāda's disciples feared her presence, thinking she might want to cook something else for him, even in his illness.

Prabhupāda asked that the picture of Lord Nṛsiṃha be taken from the altar and put beside his bed. Some devotees feared that Prabhupāda might be about to pass away. The next morning, when the illness continued, the devotees called for the local kaviṛāja (Ayur-vedic doctor).

The old kaviṛāja came and diagnosed Prabhupāda's illness as severe blood dysentery. He left medicine, but it was ineffectual. Later, when Prabhupāda called Bhavānanda to his room and requested fried purīs with a little paṭala [an Indian vegetable similar to a small squash] and salt, Bhavānanda protested; such fried foods would be the worst thing for him. Prabhupāda said that this was the blood dysentery cure his mother had given during his childhood. He then called for his sister, and speaking to her in Bengali, told her to prepare purīs and paṭala. A few hours after taking the food, Prabhupāda again called Bhavānanda; he was feeling better. "My mother was right," he remarked.

A lengthy telegram arrived from Śyāmasundara, glorifying the preaching opportunities that awaited Prabhupāda in London, where he would be picked up at the airport in a helicopter and flown to the main event—the greatest Ratha-yātrā ever held. The parade would proceed down Picadilly Lane, climaxing under a large pavilion at Trafalgar Square. The telegram went on to say that millions of Englishmen—including certain very, very important people—were eager to see Śrīla Prabhupāda and that arrangements were underway for Prabhupāda to instruct the Queen's eldest son, Prince Charles, in Kṛṣṇa consciousness.

Some of the promises were exaggerated, Śrīla Prabhupāda knew, but his desire to preach again in England was strong. George Harrison had given the devotees a large estate forty-five minutes outside of London, and Prabhupāda spoke of going there and installing Deities of Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa on Janmāṣṭamī day. Yet even now, over a month before Janmāṣṭamī, he was feeling deeply affected by Śyāmasundara's invitation. Although still exhausted from dysentery, he considered flying immediately to London.

Calling in those G.B.C. secretaries and sannyāsīs with him in Calcutta, sitting up in bed while they sat before him on the floor, Prabhupāda asked their advice. They concluded that he should go to a healthier climate—Los Angeles or Hawaii—to rest and recuperate. Prabhupāda mildly agreed as his advisors decided Hawaii would be the best place, a place where the climate was ideal and where he would have few interruptions. Suddenly, however, he sat up straighter. He would return to the West, he said, but to London, not to Hawaii. And not to recuperate, but to preach!

"Let me strike while the iron is hot," he said. "I think that is an English maxim. If you do that, then you can keep the iron in shape. In the West, people are fed up. So we want to give them spiritual enlightenment."

Prabhupāda had immediately convinced his disciples with his forceful statements. "There are two misleading theories in the West," he continued. "One is that life comes from matter, and the other is that there is no life after death—you can just enjoy this life. They say everything is matter. So as this Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement grows, the Communists will be curbed down. People say they are trying for unity, but they have no brains to see how this will achieve unity. They have formed a big complicated League of Nations and now United Nations, but they all fail. But this simple method of Ratha-yātrā—all over the world it is spreading. Jagannātha means "Lord of the universe." So Lord Jagannātha is now international God, through our ISKCON. Therefore, I want to go to the West and give them these things."

Although Prabhupāda appeared physically unfit to immediately fly to London to the active preaching that awaited him, his disciples submitted, accepting this as another miracle by Kṛṣṇa.

July 7, 1973

Paravidha: It was Ratha-yātrā day. I saw Prabhupāda coming into the temple, and he didn't look very strong. I was really amazed, but I could understand that his strength was something spiritual.

Dhruvanātha: At the parade site we were waiting to receive Śrīla Prabhupāda at Marble Arch, where the procession starts. The vyāsāsana was nicely decorated, and everybody was expecting Prabhupāda simply to sit on his vyāsāsana on the cart and just ride through the streets, just as he had done in the other Ratha-yātrās. So it was to our great amazement and joy that when Prabhupāda came, he refused to sit on the vyāsāsana. He indicated that he would dance and lead the procession!

Yogeśvara: They brought stairs up so Prabhupāda could mount the ratha cart and sit down on the vyāsāsana. But he waved them off and just started walking with the chariots, leading the dancing.

Dhīraśānta: I twisted my ankle and couldn't walk, so I rode on the cart. Therefore I could see Prabhupāda very clearly. Revatīnandana Mahārāja was chanting into the microphone from the cart, but after about fifteen minutes of the procession Prabhupāda told the devotees to tell Revatīnandana Mahārāja and the others to come down and lead the kīrtana in the street with him.

Revatīnandana: When Prabhupāda saw his vyāsāsana on the cart, he said, "No, I am just a devotee. I will go in the procession." We had a big, great kīrtana. Hamsadūta led, I led, Śyāmasundara led—different devotees traded off, leading this fantastic kīrtana. And Prabhupāda was right in the middle of the kīrtana with his karatālas the whole time. He was dancing back and forth and jumping up and down and dancing.

Rohiṇī-nandana: The cart was going quite slowly. Prabhupāda walked about twenty or thirty yards ahead of the cart, leading the procession. Meanwhile the kīrtana was coming from the ratha cart through microphones. Prabhupāda called them all down, and he got them all around himself, and they were chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa. Ever so often he would turn around and raise both his arms very majestically in the air and say, "Jaya Jagannātha!" Sometimes we would get a little further ahead, so then he would turn around and wait for the cart to come on. Sometimes he was dancing, and sometimes he would stand, raising his hands in the air.

Śārādīyā dāsī: Prabhupāda would dance, and then after a few feet he would turn around and look up at the deities with his arms raised. Then he would dance for a few moments, meditating on the deities, and then he would turn around and go on. In this way he danced the entire way. The devotees held hands in a circle around him to protect him from the crowd. It was a wonderful, transcendental affair. Prabhupāda was looking up at the deities, and all the devotees were behind him.

Sudurjaya: Prabhupāda surprised us. We didn't know if he was sick or not, feeling weak and dizzy or not. Sometimes he looked very ill, and sometimes he looked like an eighteen-year-old boy. He surprised us. He had his cane in his hand but raised it in the air as he danced. After a while, Śyāmasundara came up to me and said, "Listen, he's not going to make it. Prabhupāda is very ill. I want you to follow in a car. Be within thirty seconds ' reach so we can put Prabhupāda in the car immediately." Prabhupāda was going down Park Lane, and from time to time he would turn back and raise his hands. He was going so fast that they couldn't pull the cart fast enough to keep up with him. He would have to wait for the cart to catch up. He would turn back, raise his hands, and say, "Haribol!" Several times he did this. He was going so fast that he had to wait. The devotees were dancing, the weather was beautiful, and the crowd was wonderful.

Dhruvanātha: The passersby were rooted to the spot, looking at Prabhupāda. A man of that age simply dancing and jumping in the air like a young boy was the most amazing sight! And then every five minutes or so Prabhupāda would turn around and look toward Jagannātha. The devotees would clear the way so no one blocked his sight, and he had a perfect view of Jagannātha, Balarāma, and Subhadrā. But after a while the police came and motioned that we couldn't keep stopping like this. We had to keep the whole thing going, because the traffic jams were becoming critical. Devotees were crying and chanting and dancing, and there was much commotion.

Śrutakīrti: When Prabhupāda was dancing, the bobbies kept on coming up and looking for someone official. Finally they came to me and said, "You'll have to tell your leader to sit down. He's causing too much of a disturbance. Everyone is becoming wild, and we can't control the crowd, you know." So I said, "All right." But I didn't say anything to Prabhupāda.

So then they came again and said, "You must tell him he'll have to sit down." So I said, "All right," and I tapped Prabhupāda. The whole time he had been in ecstasy, dancing before the cart and encouraging everyone else to dance. He would motion with his hands and encourage the devotees to keep dancing. He kept the momentum of the festival. So I said, "Prabhupāda, the policemen want you to sit down. They say you are creating havoc in the parade." Prabhupāda looked at me, turned, and kept on. He completely ignored it and kept on dancing. And they couldn't do anything. Prabhupāda wouldn't stop, and the police wouldn't say anything to him.

Paravidha: I was distributing Back to Godhead magazines along the whole parade route. I was exhausted, and I was having a lot of trouble keeping up with the procession. But Prabhupāda was just there, and he was dancing like a young boy. I was amazed at his spiritual energy.

Dhruvanātha: When we came to Picadilly Circus, Prabhupāda suddenly stopped the whole procession. Picadilly Circus, of course, was just packed with people. For about three minutes Prabhupāda stopped the procession and just danced and danced with the devotees all around him.

Rohiṇī-nandana: When we got to Picadilly Circus, Prabhupāda really started to dance. He was leaping off the ground. The cart was stopped. It was very similar, actually, to the description in the Caitanya-caritāmṛta of how Lord Caitanya would lead the Ratha-yātrā procession. So the cart was stopped, and then Prabhupāda would wait for it to catch up.

Yogeśvara: When we finally arrived at Trafalgar Square and Prabhupāda saw the big tent and the other arrangements the devotees had made, he held up his hands again. He had been dancing and walking the entire route of the parade. It must have been at least an hour that he had been walking and dancing—all the way from Hyde Park to Trafalgar Square.

Rohiṇī-nandana: When Prabhupāda got to Trafalgar Square, he immediately sat down on the plinth of Nelson's Column on a little vyāsāsana and delivered a lecture about the holy name of Kṛṣṇa. This was directly after his marathon of chanting and dancing.

The next day's papers carried favorable news coverage of the festival, and Prabhupāda wrote of it to a disciple in Los Angeles.

You will be glad to know the Rathayatra in London was very successful. The Daily Guardian had a picture on the front page of our cart and stated that we were competition to the monument in memory of Lord Nelson in Trafalgar Square. My health is good and I am taking daily walk and speaking at the class in the morning.

In another letter Prabhupāda wrote,

Our festival here was very well received and I was so much encouraged by the whole thing that I was able to walk and dance the entire way from Hyde Park to Trafalgar Square.

Śrīla Prabhupāda settled into a regular routine at Bhaktivedanta Manor. "Here at Bhaktivedanta Manor," he wrote, "the place is the nicest possible. It is calm and quiet, and the village is neat and clean." Prabhupāda's room on the second floor was spacious enough to seat fifty guests comfortably, and its large windows overlooked the expansive grounds.

Prabhupāda said that if the devotees would clean out the lake and keep up the grounds, then he would stay always at Bhaktivedanta Manor and translate here in peace. They should get some cows, he said, and use some of the extra acreage for farming.

Although the devotees had not long been living in the Manor and had done little to improve the buildings and grounds, Prabhupāda pointed out a place where they could one day build a thirty-story temple, the grandest building in all of London. He proposed that he stay for at least two months and install Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa Deities on Janmāṣṭamī day; he would also oversee the construction of the temple room and altar.

Every morning at about six Prabhupāda would leave the Manor for an hour's walk. There was no restriction as to who could join him, and sometimes as many as twenty devotees would trail behind, trying to hear anything he might say. Looking off toward the horizon, he commented that Letchmore Heath reminded him of Vṛndāvana.

Prabhupāda would walk down the lane to a place called Round Bush, stroll past a wheat field, and finally return to Letchmore Heath and the Manor. A local policeman had become friends with the devotees and would regularly exchange greetings with Prabhupāda. Particularly Prabhupāda liked the cleanliness of the little village, and he would often point out even the smallest pieces of trash on the Manor grounds. The village, he said, was much neater than American towns.

Śyāmasundara had promised Śrīla Prabhupāda many interested visitors, and Śrīla Prabhupāda reciprocated, promising that as long as the interested people kept coming, he would remain in England. Each night one or two guests—including scholars, priests, and occasional celebrities—would come and visit with Prabhupāda for a couple of hours. Prabhupāda seemed especially eager to present the philosophy of Kṛṣṇa consciousness to intelligent persons. As the world's foremost Vaiṣṇava paramparā philosopher of the Gītā and the Bhāgavatam, he had thoroughly realized the conclusions of the Vedic literature. He was experienced in countering all challenges and atheistic philosophies and knew what to expect from Christian, Māyāvādī, atheist—anyone. If a guest mentioned the name of a philosopher or school of thought unfamiliar to Prabhupāda, then Prabhupāda would simply ask, “What is his philosophy?” Inevitably he would recognize the “new” philosophy for what it was: an old, familiar mundane philosophy—with a new twist perhaps—easily defeated or brought to its perfection with Kṛṣṇa consciousness.

Prabhupāda was always eager to glorify Kṛṣṇa and repeat Kṛṣṇa's message, and with complete, enthusiastic freshness he would present again the same points he had presented many, many times before. He said he was like a cow that gives milk in any field. Put him in India or America or England—he would always give the same nectarean milk of Bhagavad-gītā.

Prabhupāda's entire day—his early-morning dictation of Caitanya-caritāmṛta, morning walk, Bhagavad-gītā lecture, talks with guests—revolved around philosophy. In Scotland, when a man had challenged that God needn't be presented through philosophy, Prabhupāda had replied, “What do you expect me to talk, some fairy tales?” Philosophy was necessary, especially for the so-called intelligent persons, whose minds raised so many intellectual doubts. And besides, to always be telling others about Kṛṣṇa, Prabhupāda said, was a symptom of love.

Moved by compassion for others' suffering, Prabhupāda always spoke the message of Kṛṣṇa and never tired of repeating it. He was genuinely angered by the atheistic speculators who mislead the people, because materialistic and impersonalistic philosophies ruined a person's chances of finding the solution to life's suffering. Whenever Prabhupāda heard anyone arguing the Māyāvāda doctrine, he would become like fire. He could not tolerate it. He had to correct it. When, after one of Prabhupāda's lectures at the Manor, a boy had said he had heard someone call the chanting of Hare Kṛṣṇa “a little bit of a bluff,” Prabhupāda had replied, “Who says bluff? Who is that fool? Who is that rascal?” He had been ready to fight the atheist to glorify Kṛṣṇa.

These were Prabhupāda's natural drives; therefore he could go on and on, without stopping. He wanted to give people Kṛṣṇa consciousness. He had no other life. Even while relaxing in the privacy of his room he always spoke of Kṛṣṇa consciousness.

The devotees had invited many prominent British citizens to meet Śrīla Prabhupāda, and the responses were good. Economist Ernst Schumacher promised to visit, as did philosopher Sir Alfred J. Ayer. When Śyāmasundara informed Prabhupāda that Mr. Ayer was well known, Prabhupāda replied, "What is his philosophy?"

"Well," Śyāmasundara replied, "he doesn't believe in the existence of God."

"I will give him evidence," Prabhupāda replied. "I will ask him what he means by 'the existence of God.' I will ask him to make a list of the deficiencies of God's existence." Prabhupāda liked to meet with philosophical men and "corner them and defeat them."

Historian Arnold Doyenne was old and invalid; therefore, Prabhupāda agreed to visit him at his residence. Interested in discussing life after death, Dr. Doyenne asked Prabhupāda about karma. Most people, he said, were afraid of death. Prabhupāda agreed and added that according to a certain astrologer, one of India's recent leaders had taken birth as a dog. "So they are afraid they will go down," he said. When Doyenne asked if karma could be changed, Prabhupāda replied yes, but only by bhakti, devotion to God.

Arnold Doyenne: "Not many people in the West are thinking of this."

Prabhupāda: "They are less intelligent. It is not good. If they take to Kṛṣṇa consciousness, they can continue to work and live in the city, but they can change their consciousness. Then automatically everything will come."

Śrīla Prabhupāda asked Dr. Toynbee about the book he was writing, and the professor replied that it concerned ancient Greece's influence on the Greece of today. "The Greeks came from India," Prabhupāda said. "Vedic culture was once all over the world. Gradually, a new type of culture—just like this recent partition of India and Pakistan—took place."

Prabhupāda explained how in the future the governments would fall to rascals and thieves, whose only business would be to exploit the citizens. Food would be scarce. And the governments would levy so many taxes that the people would be harassed and go to the forests for shelter. Only the God conscious people would be free. The future would be an ocean of faults, with but one saving factor: simply by chanting Kṛṣṇa's names one could be freed. Even now, Prabhupāda said, the hippies were going to the forest, and the men were separated from their wives and money and were going to the hills and forests in disappointment. "You can predict the future in this way," Prabhupāda said.

Arnold Toynbee: "In India did the politicians keep the Vedas?"

Prabhupāda: "No, they threw them away. Present Indian politicians are not very satisfied with the Vedas. They threw them in the water. I have started, among the Indians and Americans; and for the next ten thousand years Kṛṣṇa consciousness will increase. Then there will be a gloomy picture of Kali-yuga. Ten thousand years is not a short time. It is our duty on behalf of Kṛṣṇa."

Arnold Toynbee: "Do you travel much?"

Prabhupāda: "All over the world."

A bearded young priest active in social service visited Prabhupāda and, upon Prabhupāda's prodding, debated with him about meat-eating and the Bible. During the discussion, Hamsadūta and Pradyumna were citing passages from the Bible against meat-eating. Later, after the priest had left, Prabhupāda called Hamsadūta back into his room and said, "It was not very good for us to speak on the basis of the Bible. Better we stick to the Gītā. Why bother to approach them for compromise or cooperation? They will never be convinced. What is the point of meeting with the Pope?" Those inclined to meat-eating, Prabhupāda said, could always find some quote in the Bible, such as the covenant with Noah after the flood. "We do not even know what ghastly things are occurring in the slaughterhouse," he said. "No one sees these things."

The next morning on his walk Prabhupāda continued discussing his talk with the priest. "In the name of religion," Prabhupāda said, "they are killing. The Bhāgavatam says this cheating religion is kicked out and simply worship of God is instated."

Devotee: "The priest last night said that Jesus ate meat."

Prabhupāda: "Then Jesus contradicted himself. He also said, 'Thou shalt not kill.' One shouldn't imitate the īśvaras. A hippie-type mendicant in India takes gañjā and claims to be a devotee of Śiva. No, we should not imitate the powerful controllers. That priest said also that the Bible does not say, 'Thou shalt not kill,' but 'Thou shalt not murder.' So I told him that if the word is actually 'Thou shalt not murder' in the original Hebrew, then Jesus must have been preaching to the fourth-class, tenth-class men—murderers. And the proof is that they murdered him. So such people, what can they understand about God? When I told him, the priest was silent. He could not answer."

Another priest came to see Prabhupāda, and again the question came up. Prabhupāda asked him, "Then you are in favor of killing?"

The priest replied, "Well, it is a fallen world."

"It is a fallen world," said Prabhupāda, "but we do not have to be among the fallen." The priest cited the covenant with Noah.

Prabhupāda replied, "Maybe Noah allowed it at that time, the time of devastation, but that doesn't mean you always have to do it. To live in such a time, one can eat anything to stay alive, but now so many things are in abundance to keep healthy without maintaining a slaughterhouse. In the Bhagavad-gītā Kṛṣṇa says, 'Protect the cows; it is the duty of the vaiśyas.' "

Although Prabhupāda willingly discussed with Christians, he admitted privately that to argue with them was a waste of time. "They will never agree," he said, "even if they are defeated." The best way to preach to people in general was through the chanting of Hare Kṛṣṇa, as at the Ratha-yātrā festival. Chant, dance, take prasādam, and invite everyone to join. "Anyway," he said, "they don't even follow their teachings. One boy came to me and said he wanted to talk. He said, 'I am a Christian,' but I told him, 'You are not a Christian. Thou shalt not kill.'"

A man from Calcutta came to see Prabhupāda. But as soon as the man began to say something about Kṛṣṇa, Prabhupāda interrupted: "Kṛṣṇa is something very difficult to understand. We are just trying to understand that there is a next life."

"But the Christians say there is no future life," the man said. "At the end of this one you either go to heaven or hell."

"But if they talk about going to heaven," said Prabhupāda, "then that is the next life. But knowledge of Kṛṣṇa is only for the most perfect out of thousands among men."

A Mr. Kumar, who sometimes lived in the London temple, visited Prabhupāda with many questions. He wanted to work for ISKCON, he said, but required money to send his mother in India. "No," Prabhupāda told him, "our men work twenty-four hours a day without a farthing." Mr. Kumar suggested ways to improve ISKCON. The devotees needed to study more, he said, especially Sanskrit, and become scholars.

Prabhupāda disagreed. "All we need is dedication," he said. "I am not a great Sanskrit scholar, but I am pulling on. And even the scholars say it is good. My Guru Mahārāja's Guru Mahārāja [Gaurakiśora dāsa Bābājī Mahārāja] was illiterate. Still, his disciple, Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī Prabhupāda, was the greatest scholar of the day. But when Gaurakiśora spoke, it was exactly from the śāstra. Our principle is not to take time to learn something and become expert and then preach. But whatever you know, preach. Class in the morning, class in the evening, and if they read my books, that is sufficient."

One day the devotees brought Prabhupāda a newspaper clipping in which an Oxford professor, Dr. D. Zaehner, had said at a religion conference that Lord Kṛṣṇa and His Bhagavad-gītā teachings were "immoral." Dr. Zaehner had said that a famous murderer was perhaps influenced by the Bhagavad-gītā, because Kṛṣṇa says that the soul is immortal, so one can therefore kill. Śrīla Prabhupāda was disgusted at the professor's ignorance. On his morning walk he dictated to his secretary arguments to use in writing to Dr. Zaehner.

George Harrison approached Prabhupāda in a submissive mood similar to that of Prabhupāda's disciples. Prabhupāda and George took prasādam together, a special lunch of samosās, hālavā, vegetables, sour cream, and purīs. While they were enjoying the prasādam, Prabhupāda mentioned that certain Vṛndāvana paṇḍās (professional guides at a holy place) eat too much. Once one ate so much that he was practically dying, but he assured his son, "At least I am dying from eating, and not from starving. To die of starvation is unglorious." Prabhupāda smiled as he talked with George, gratefully acknowledging his donation of the Manor. "Have you seen my room?" Prabhupāda asked. "It is actually your house, but my room."

"No," George protested, preferring the mood of a humble disciple, "it is Kṛṣṇa's house and your room."

When George confided to Prabhupāda that by taking to Kṛṣṇa consciousness he was losing friends, Prabhupāda told him not to worry. He read to George from the Gītā, where Kṛṣṇa explains that He can be known only by devotional service.

"In the future," said George, "ISKCON will be so large it will require executive management."

Prabhupāda: "I have divided the world into twelve zones with twelve representatives. As long as they keep to the spiritual principles, Kṛṣṇa will help them."

Before leaving, George assured Prabhupāda that he would help him increase his temples. Later Prabhupāda commented, "George is getting inward hope from Kṛṣṇa."

One day an old acquaintance dropped by—Allen Ginsberg, wearing denims, suspenders, and a faded shirt and carrying a little Indian-made harmonium. "You are still chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa?" Prabhupāda asked.

"Yes," Allen replied, "I still chant Hare Kṛṣṇa, but I also chant other things."

Allen asked if Prabhupāda would like to hear his chanting and playing. Prabhupāda nodded. Allen began playing his harmonium and chanting om̐. With each recitation of the word om̐, his voice went deeper—"Ooom."

When the chant was over, Prabhupāda began to laugh. "You can chant whatever you want to chant," he said. "But just keep chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa. As long as you are chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa, then everything else is all right." Prabhupāda then allowed many devotees to join them for a big, blissful kīrtana.

Through George Harrison, another famous pop singer and musician, Donovan, was drawn to come and see the renowned leader of the Hare Kṛṣṇa movement. Donovan, accompanied by a musician friend and their two girl friends in miniskirts, sat in awkward silence before Prabhupāda. Prabhupāda spoke: "There is a verse in the Vedas that says music is the highest form of education." And he began to explain how a musician could serve Kṛṣṇa. "You should do like your friend George," Prabhupāda said. "We will give you the themes, and you can write the songs." Prabhupāda said that anything, even money, could be used in the service of Kṛṣṇa.

"But money is material," Donovan's girl friend interrupted.

"What do you know what is material and spiritual?" Prabhupāda said. He turned to Donovan, "Do you understand?" Donovan humbly replied that he was thickheaded but trying. Donovan's girl friend then leaned over and whispered something into his ear, whereupon Donovan stood up and said, "Well, we have to go now." Prabhupāda insisted that at least they first take some prasādam.

As soon as the guests left, Prabhupāda and his disciples began to laugh. Prabhupāda said, "She was thinking..." and he encouraged his disciples to finish the sentence.

"Yes," said Yogeśvara, "she was thinking that if Kṛṣṇa gets him, then she will lose him."

Prabhupāda so much liked preaching to important guests that he wanted to continue doing so wherever he traveled. "Wherever I shall go now," Prabhupāda wrote in a letter to a disciple, "this policy of important men being invited to talk with me about our Krishna Consciousness movement should be implemented."

A month passed at the Manor, and still several weeks remained before Janmāṣṭamī and the Deity installation. So when Bhagavān requested Prabhupāda to come for a visit to Paris and install Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa Deities, Prabhupāda agreed.

The devotees had arranged an official City Hall reception for Śrīla Prabhupāda. In the presence of the mayor of Paris and his government entourage, Śrīla Prabhupāda said that if the government leaders do not teach the citizens genuine God consciousness, then they are not responsible leaders. Reporting this talk in the next day's paper, a news writer stated that the swami even criticized Napoleon Bonaparte.

Bhagavān: We had just moved into our new temple at 4 Rue le Sueur, Paris, and we had received forty-eight-inch Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa Deities. Prabhupāda had Pradyumna chanting the mantras and pouring the substances on the Deities while Prabhupāda himself looked on from his vyāsāsana, giving directions. I was assisting, and at one point I turned around and saw Śrīla Prabhupāda standing right next to me, taking the substances in his own hands and smearing them over the lotuslike face of Śrīmatī Rādhārāṇī. After the Deities were installed on the altar, Śrīla Prabhupāda came up and offered the āratī and I assisted him by handing him the articles.

After the installation we went up to Śrīla Prabhupāda's room and very anxiously requested him to please give a name for the Deities. He sat back in his chair and said that the Deities will be known as Rādhā-Paris-īśvara. He then went on to say that in India people look to England for education and to Paris for sense gratification. He began to laugh and said that Kṛṣṇa has come to Paris in order to get some gopīs, some French girls, because the faces of the women in Paris are considered the most beautiful. "Rādhārāṇī is so beautiful," Prabhupāda said, "just like a Paris girl. And Kṛṣṇa has come here to find out this most beautiful of all the gopīs. So He is Paris-īśvara."

Prabhupāda returned to London and the latest mail from India. A legal complication had arisen regarding the deed for ISKCON's land in Hyderabad. Prabhupāda wrote his disciple Mahāmsa, cautioning him to avoid becoming entangled in another Bombay affair. When Prabhupāda also received word that the temple construction was progressing in Vṛndāvana, he replied,

I am pleased to hear how you are completely absorbed in the project of our Vrindaban temple and taxing your brain how it can be carried out. I am also always praying to Krishna that He may give you intelligence to carry it out rightly.

In a letter to a disciple in Hawaii, Prabhupāda apologized for not replying to a letter.

I was very busy in Bombay for the Juhu land of Mr. N. Now he is dead and gone, but he had created so many obstacles... Still there is discrepancy. But I hope this will be squared up without delay.

Writing to Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami in Bombay, Prabhupāda was as attentive as ever to the ongoing troubles there. Although the devotees remained in possession of the land and had rebuilt their temporary temple, no purchase settlement was in sight.

If Mrs. N. is not going to sell us the land then what next step we have to adopt?... We fixed a criminal case against her for attempting to dispossess us from the land, and what happened to that case? The idea is that if she is not going to sell the land to us, and at the same time does not return our money with damages and interest, and occasionally tries to dispossess us from the land, then what steps we have to take? She has given us so much trouble and botheration...

And Prabhupāda wrote to his disciples in Māyāpur,

Yes, Mayapur construction must be completely finished before I return. The next time I come there must be no more workers or carpenters with their "tack-tack" sound. I would have continued to stay in Mayapur but the hammering sounds drove me away. When you are completely finished I will go there, otherwise not.

Prabhupāda also answered dozens of letters from America, where the devotees were becoming more and more keen to distribute his books. Their letters contained very crucial questions that only Prabhupāda could solve: How important was book distribution? Could the devotees abandon their robes and wear regular Western clothes to better distribute books in public? Was chanting on the streets more important than book distribution? What about taking buses and vans around the country? Could they travel with Deities in the vans? The devotees generally mentioned their own viewpoint in their letters to Prabhupāda, and yet they respectfully awaited his definitive reply.

The Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement was now big, with potential for growing much bigger. And within ISKCON, Prabhupāda's will was so powerful that a single letter from him would establish a policy for years to come. Prabhupāda appeared to be sitting quietly in his room at the Manor, following his daily routine of bathing, eating, and meeting evening guests, yet at the same time he was directing thousands of young men and women all over the world and sending them into action in the war against māyā.

There is no objection to going in western clothes in order to distribute my books. It is not necessary that we always wear the robes, but we should always keep sikha and tilaka. However, a wig or a hat may be worn as you describe. We have to take whatever is the favorable position for executing Krishna consciousness. Do not forget our principles, but sometimes we may adopt such means in order to distribute books. Somehow or other distribute books and if you can impress people a little to chant then it does not matter about your dress.

The devotees continued to request clarification as to how far the ends justified the means in fulfilling Prabhupāda's order to distribute books profusely. Śrīla Prabhupāda, being free of any material motivation, could clearly see the Kṛṣṇa conscious thing to do.

Regarding the question you have raised about traveling sankirtana parties and selling of books, yes, we want money. So that is the real preaching, selling books. Who can speak better than the books? At least whoever buys, he will look over. The real preaching is selling books. You should know the tactic how to sell without irritating. What your lecture will do for three minutes, but if he reads one page his life may be turned. We don't want to irritate anyone, however. If he goes away by your aggressive tactics, then you are nonsense and it is your failure. Neither you could sell a book, neither he would remain. But if he buys a book, that is the real successful preaching. That is the certificate of my Guru Maharaja, if someone, brahmacari, would sell a one paise magazine, if one of our brahmacaris would go and sell a few copies, he would be very very glad and say, "Oh, you are so nice." So distribution of literature is our real preaching. Now if you cannot handle the matter nicely, that is your fault. But the success of your preaching will be substantiated by how many books are sold. Anything you want to sell, you have to canvass a little, so he gives some money for the service of Kṛṣṇa. That is his good luck and he gets the chance to read some transcendental knowledge. But if you only irritate and he goes away, that is your less intelligence.

Prabhupāda's instructions were so important to his disciples that a letter from him was as effective as a personal visit. By such letters he maintained the lives and affairs of his disciples all over the world. Each day in the late morning he would have his secretary read aloud each incoming letter, and usually he would dictate the answer without delay. He had often said that the vāṇī, or order, of the guru was more important than the vapuḥ, or personal presence. Thus by his letters he established and illuminated the path of Kṛṣṇa consciousness for his sincere followers.

In America now Prabhupāda's preaching was primarily through the distribution of his books, whereas in India it was through establishing temples. Yet both methods were one and the same to him. And although his vision encompassed the whole world, he felt and described himself as only the humble servant of his spiritual master. Whether sitting peacefully on the lawn of the Manor and teasing one of the little children or directing one of his lieutenants to "drop thousands and millions of books into the laps of the conditioned souls," whether meditating with great energy on the next phrase in his Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam purports or worrying about what Mrs. N. was conspiring in Bombay—he always tried to serve his Guru Mahārāja.

Śrīla Prabhupāda received an emergency phone call from Bombay. Girirāja wanted him to come and personally settle with Mrs. N. the purchase of the Juhu land. Girirāja had consulted a new lawyer, Mr. Bakhil, who felt that Prabhupāda must be present for there to be a settlement. Another ISKCON lawyer, Mr. Chandawal, also advised that Śrīla Prabhupāda come immediately to Bombay.

Girirāja, therefore, had telephoned Prabhupāda, begging him to please come and settle the matter with Mrs. N. once and for all. Prabhupāda agreed. He would remain in London one more week, until Janmāṣṭamī. Then he would return to Bombay.

M. Rasgotra, the Indian ambassador to England, attended the Janmāṣṭamī day celebration and introduced Śrīla Prabhupāda, expressing his appreciation of Prabhupāda's great work. Prabhupāda spoke, describing the advent of Kṛṣṇa as the key to peace for the troubled material world. "Especially in India," he said, "we have got so much asset for understanding God. Everything is there, ready-made. But we won't accept. So what is the remedy for such disease? We are searching after peace, but we won't accept anything which is actually giving us peace. This is our disease. So the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement is trying to awaken the dormant Kṛṣṇa consciousness in everyone's heart. Otherwise, how could these Europeans and Americans and other countrymen who had never even heard of Kṛṣṇa four or five years ago be taking to Kṛṣṇa consciousness so seriously? Therefore Kṛṣṇa consciousness is there in everyone's heart."

Prabhupāda recited prayers from Brahma-saṁhitā describing the sublime, eternal existence of Kṛṣṇa on His eternal planet, Kṛṣṇaloka. "But Kṛṣṇa is also everywhere," he explained, "and if you are a devotee, then you can catch Him. If you want to catch Him, He comes forward ten times more than your desire. Therefore we simply have to receive Him. This Deity worship in the temple means worshipping Kṛṣṇa, the Supreme Personality of Godhead. He has very kindly accepted to assume a form which you can handle. Therefore do not think that we have installed a marble statue. The rascals will say, 'They are heathens.' No, we are worshipping Kṛṣṇa personally. Kṛṣṇa has kindly assumed this form because we cannot see the gigantic Kṛṣṇa or how Kṛṣṇa is everywhere. Remain twenty-four hours a day in Kṛṣṇa's service. This is the purpose of installing the Deity."

September 15, 1973

The day after his arrival, Śrīla Prabhupāda met with Mrs. N.'s solicitors and heard their offers. The situation had begun to look hopeful, and yet the conclusion eluded them. Mrs. N. had become changed by the public reaction to her attempt to demolish the temple. If Prabhupāda would pay the full balance of twelve lakhs of rupees for the land in one payment, she told her lawyer, she would agree. Prabhupāda was agreeable but did not want to arrange to collect his money until he was certain that Mrs. N. was actually serious.

Mr. Asnani, a Bombay lawyer and ISKCON life member, regularly met with Mrs. N., persuading her to cooperate with Prabhupāda. Her lawyers concurred. Yet after Prabhupāda had been in Bombay for several weeks, no meeting with Mrs. N. had taken place. Once Mr. Asnani went to bring Mrs. N. to meet with Prabhupāda, but she was not feeling well. Day after day Mr. Asnani would tell Prabhupāda, "Mrs. N. will come tomorrow." Prabhupāda became disappointed at the procrastination, and seeing this, his secretaries told Mr. Asnani that although they knew he meant well, they were inclined to have their other lawyers handle the case. Mr. Asnani asked for another forty-eight hours to close the deal and execute the conveyance.

Mrs. N. was at her other home, where she had just recovered from her illness, when Mr. Asnani visited. "Mātāji," he begged, "my Guru Mahārāja is leaving tomorrow. If you don't come tonight, the problem with the land will go on another year." Mrs. N. agreed, and around nine P.M. she and Mr. Asnani arrived at the home of Mr. Bogilal Patel, where Śrīla Prabhupāda was holding a program of kīrtana and Bhāgavata discourses. Prabhupāda was on the roof preparing to lecture, but hearing that Mrs. N. had arrived, he interrupted the meeting and came down to his room to talk with her. They talked briefly, and Prabhupāda excused himself and returned to the roof to lecture.

Around midnight, he returned to his room again. Mrs. N. was still waiting. She burst into tears and bowed at Prabhupāda's feet. "I am sorry for everything I've done," she sobbed. "Please forgive me." She promised to do whatever Prabhupāda wanted.

Prabhupāda looked at her compassionately and understood her heart. "You are just like my daughter," he said. "Don't worry. I will take care of you. I will see to all of your needs for the rest of your life." And Prabhupāda said he still accepted the very terms she had proposed: that he pay the remaining balance of twelve lakhs plus fifty thousand rupees compensation for the delay.

Prabhupāda and Mrs. N. had set November 1 as the tentative deadline for the final signing of the conveyance. Shortly after their meeting, Prabhupāda moved from Bogilal Patel's to the home of Mr. Sethi, where working intensely he tackled the remaining problems—such as getting C. Company to withdraw their claim.

Next he moved to the home of Mr. C. M. Khatau, just two blocks from Hare Krishna Land, where he lived in a summer cottage, a simple structure with a bamboo frame and chāṭāi walls. Usually, conveyances had to be signed in the presence of the city registrar at his office downtown, but Mr. Asnani had arranged for the registrar to come to Prabhupāda's place.

At six-thirty in the evening Śrīla Prabhupāda was seated at his low desk between two windows, his back against the wall. Mrs. N. and her lawyers, the registrar, Mr. Asnani, Mr. and Mrs. Sethi, and about eight devotees were present, and the full room grew warm and stuffy. Mrs. N. sat at Prabhupāda's right as the registrar prepared the papers for signing. Śrīla Prabhupāda sat gravely. The room was silent except for the sound of papers rustling and a pen's scratching. Preparing and signing the conveyance papers took more than twenty minutes. Prabhupāda paid Mrs. N., who then signed the conveyance. The land was legally ISKCON's.

Girirāja: The room was hushed during the signing, and everyone felt as if a momentous event was taking place—just as if two great world powers were signing a treaty. After Mrs. N. signed the document, everyone silently watched the papers being passed. She started to cry. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami quietly asked her why she was crying, and Mrs. N. replied that just that day Mr. Matar had come and told her he had found a buyer for the land for many more lakhs than we were paying. Actually, as we were watching Mrs. N., we were thinking that she must be remembering all the events that had taken place, the wrongs that she had done, the death of her husband. It was very intense, like a combination of months of struggling. So for Prabhupāda, the devotees, and Prabhupāda's well-wishers, their dreams and desires and efforts over the past many years were being fulfilled.

Śrīla Prabhupāda asked that the devotees inform the newspapers, and he invited everyone into the hall outside his room for a feast. Mats were rolled out in two lines, and devotees brought leaf plates and placed them in front of everyone. The devotees began serving the various dishes to the two rows of seated guests.

Prabhupāda was standing. "Now let us start," he said, as he supervised the serving. The devotees had prepared several courses: rice, dāl, many varieties of pakorās (such as potato, cauliflower, and eggplant), po tato sabjī, wet cauliflower sabjī, papars, barfī, laḍḍus, camcam (a milk sweet), vermicelli khīr, hālavā, and a lime drink. It was a festive and happy occasion.

Mrs. Warriar (a tenant on Hare Krishna Land): The devotees were all saying "Jaya" after the signing, and all of them were very happy. Then Prabhupāda gave a lecture about the Bombay project. He gave an idea to all the people of how it would be all marble. There wouldn't be a single thing that wasn't built from marble. Some were asking how it would be possible for everything to be marble, and Prabhupāda explained that it was possible and could be done. He was visualizing the project, and everyone was thrilled to hear the way he was describing it. It would be like one of the seven wonders of the world. People would be attracted from all over to come and see it. It would be a landmark in Bombay. Prabhupāda explained the whole project as if he saw it in his mind's eye, and he said that after it was constructed it will be more than what we could visualize. It would be fantastic!

After the late feast, when everyone had departed, Prabhupāda returned to his room. Leaning back at his desk, he exclaimed, "It was a good fight!"

Later Prabhupāda would cite the story of the fight for the Bombay land as evidence that a person in Kṛṣṇa consciousness has no problems. "Now we have spent in Bombay eighteen to twenty lakhs of rupees," he said months later while on tour in Europe. "The property is actually worth fifty lakhs. People are surprised, and some of them are envious. But if you come, you will find that it is a very, very fine place. It is just like a paradise garden, twenty thousand square yards, and we have got six buildings. So actually, when we come to Kṛṣṇa consciousness there are no problems."

Surely the land was full of potential, but how could he say there had been no problems? "No problems" meant that Śrīla Prabhupāda saw how Kṛṣṇa personally arranged things for His devotees. When he had needed money, it had come, in an amount that ordinarily would have been impossible to collect. And the formidable opposition Kṛṣṇa had removed. Prabhupāda had no organized means of income and little political influence to fight persons like Mr. and Mrs. N., but because he was surrendered to Kṛṣṇa there was no problem. All the problems of the world were created by the nondevotees, who defied the injunctions of the Supreme. "Anyone who is in bhakti-yoga," Prabhupāda said, "he can understand that all problems are solved. We can practically see."

And yet he had had to tolerate the problems created by the nondevotees. For almost two years he had struggled to secure the land for Kṛṣṇa's service. Whether in Bombay or elsewhere, he had had to worry over how to help his inexperienced disciples, who were ill-equipped to handle the ploys of the opposing party. It had been an ordeal, a test of patience, a challenge of courage. But because he had not been bewildered by māyā, illusion, there had been “no problem.”

Prabhupāda showed by his example that if one strictly follows bhakti-yoga, one is not touched by the modes of nature, by māyā. The same transcendental science he constantly taught in his lectures and informal discussions, he also personally demonstrated. He was faithful in Kṛṣṇa consciousness, and all his problems had been adjusted. Kṛṣṇa says in the Bhagavad-gītā that if one surrenders to Him, one easily overcomes all problems. The devotee understands that the problems of māyā can be overcome by surrendering to Kṛṣṇa, by surrendering to the orders of Kṛṣṇa's representative, the spiritual master.

Now that the land was ISKCON's, Prabhupāda could proceed to enact his vision. In attempting to construct buildings and propagate Kṛṣṇa consciousness, he would meet more māyā-created problems, no doubt, but the greatest struggle had been won. The gorgeous temple of Śrī Śrī Rādhā-Rāsavihārī would manifest. In the future, devotees and guests could come to India's gateway and stay in a first-class hotel at Hare Krishna Land and conveniently imbibe the spiritual atmosphere of the temple. And the devotees, as long as they did not forget Prabhupāda's example and instruction, could successfully utilize the facility in the spirit of service to Kṛṣṇa. The price Prabhupāda had paid in tolerance and dependence on Kṛṣṇa would never go in vain.

What Śrīla Prabhupāda produced by his tolerance was not only the facilities and the ongoing mission at Hare Krishna Land but a monumental living example of the behavior of a sādhū. In the Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, Lord Kapiladeva describes the sādhū:

titikṣavaḥ kārūṇikāḥ

suhṛdaḥ sarva-dehinām

ajāta-śatravaḥ śāntā

sādhavaḥ sādhu-bhūṣaṇāḥ

“The symptoms of a sādhū are that he is tolerant, merciful, and friendly to all living entities. He has no enemies, he is peaceful, he abides by the scriptures, and all his characteristics are sublime.”

Because the sādhū is tolerant (titikṣavaḥ), he is undisturbed by the difficulties imposed by material nature. In Prabhupāda's attempts to secure the Juhu property, he had met with enemies and difficulties, and he had been tolerant. Prabhupāda had sometimes said, “You have to tolerate.”

And a sādhū is not only tolerant but merciful (kārūṇikāḥ). When ISKCON's provisional temple had been attacked by the police, Prabhupāda could have considered it a signal to leave the place and give up trying to help such ingrates by bringing them Kṛṣṇa consciousness— “Why go to such botheration? What's the use of trying?” He had already nearly a hundred temples outside of India. If the people of Bombay didn't like Kṛṣṇa consciousness, then why not go away and leave them to their fate?

But no. As a genuine sādhu, Prabhupāda was merciful. Because he had come to deliver the compassionate message of Kṛṣṇa consciousness, he had to tolerantly give that message to everyone. People were misguided and were living like animals, only for sense gratification, and by the laws of karma they would suffer in their next life. Seeing this unhappy predicament, Prabhupāda had felt moved to help these fallen souls, even if they were unappreciative.

Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam also describes a sādhu as suhṛdaḥ sarva-dehinām: the only desire in his heart is the welfare of all others. Being unbounded by nationalism, he thinks of himself not as Indian or American or even as human being, but as eternal spiritual soul, meant to benefit all living entities.

A sādhu, Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam describes, is ajāta-śatru, because he never creates enemies. Although envious persons may declare themselves a sādhu's enemy, a sādhu behaves as the best friend of everyone, trying to bring everyone to Kṛṣṇa. Because Prabhupāda was trying to spread Kṛṣṇa consciousness, envious persons would continue to oppose him. But as he sublimely showed in Bombay, "What can be done? We have to tolerate." Thus, even before any foundations were laid for buildings, Prabhupāda had already fully demonstrated all the ornaments of the sādhu. Remaining peaceful (śānta) and dependent on Kṛṣṇa, he had become victorious. And for whoever serves such a great personality, Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam states, the door to liberation is open.

SPL 43: Beginning the Temple of Kṛṣṇa-Balarāma

CHAPTER FORTY-THREE

Beginning the Temple

Srīla Prabhupāda was meditating on constructing his Krishna-Balaram Mandir. In April of 1972 he asked his disciple Surabhi, who had drawn the plans for the Bombay center, to execute drawings, basing the design on Indian renaissance architecture. Prabhupāda liked the Govindajī temple, located near the original Govindajī temple constructed by Rūpa Gosvāmī. He liked its open courtyard surrounded by many arches and its front steps leading up to the Deity darśana area. He suggested that some features of the temple be incorporated into his temple. Surabhi, with the assistance of a Vṛndāvana architect, executed the plans, and Prabhupāda approved.

This will be the grandest temple in Vṛndavana. Many high-class gentlemen in Delhi who are also devotees will relish the chance to live with us on weekends and it will be for them just like Vaikuntha. You must construct something wonderful. Otherwise it will be a discredit to you American boys. That will absolve the position of America and India. And this Vṛndāvana project is one of the most important of ours in ISKCON.

Although Guru dāsa had been careful to keep in touch with Prabhupāda by mail, he had neglected certain important matters in Vṛndavana, such as digging a well and getting city approval—things Prabhupāda had repeatedly asked for. In the summer of 1972 Prabhupāda wrote,

From the beginning I said I simply wanted a temple built in Vr̥ndavana just like Govindaji's temple. And there have been so many letters, but that has not been done. Never mind, now I like that plan of Surabhi's.

Two weeks later Prabhupāda again wrote Guru dāsa on the same point.

I wanted a temple like Govindaji. Is it so difficult that for the last six months you have consulted so many engineers? Any ordinary engineer could draw up the papers and get it passed. There has been so much unnecessary correspondence.

To build a temple in Vr̥ndāvana should not be so difficult, Prabhupāda thought, and he became impatient with the delays. Concerned that the devotees and architects not make the building too costly, he said that they should go ahead with the plans he had approved, even if the building were to be a little cheaper than in the original plan. He was concerned that a competent disciple oversee the work so that ISKCON didn't get cheated.

As early as April of 1972, Prabhupāda had asked that the Deities in Vr̥ndāvana be Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma. "Kṛṣṇa may be black, Balarāma of white, and the pose in the back of the Back to Godhead magazine is very nice." He asked that a sign be put out front announcing, "Shri Krishna Balaram Mandir."

One reason Prabhupāda chose Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma as the presiding Deities was that most of the Vr̥ndāvana temples were of Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa; ISKCON's temple would be unique in Vr̥ndāvana. Another reason was that the ISKCON land was located in Ramaṇa-reti, an area of forest and soft sands where Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma had enjoyed Their childhood pastimes five thousand years ago. To celebrate and worship the youthful sports of Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma in Ramaṇa-reti was fitting.

Although thousands of years had passed since Kṛṣṇa's advent in Vr̥ndāvana, the same atmosphere and many of the same sights and sounds still prevailed. Peacocks ran across the sands or sat on rooftops or in trees. The cooing and chirping of pigeons and cuckoos and the sweep of the parrots' green wings were eternal sounds and sights of the Vr̥ndāvana forest. In Kṛṣṇa, the Supreme Personality of Godhead Prabhupāda had described how Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma and Their cowherd friends played in Ramaṇa-reti and similar places.

"My dear friends, just see how this river bank is extremely beautiful because of its pleasing atmosphere. And just see how the blooming lotuses are attracting bees and birds by their aroma. The humming and chirping of the bees in the forest is echoing throughout the beautiful trees in the forest. Also, here the sands are clean and soft. Therefore, this must be considered the best place for our sporting and pastimes."

According to Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, the playing of the cowherd boys with Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma as friends in Vr̥ndāvana is the highest spiritual realization, far beyond the ordinary religionist's understanding of God. The Supreme Truth, whom some meditated upon as impersonal Brahman, others worshiped as the Supreme Almighty, and still others considered an ordinary living entity, was the eternal, loving friend of the cowherd boys of Vr̥ndāvana. Only after many, many lifetimes of pious activities had they become eligible to join in the loving pastimes of Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma in Ramaṇa-reti.

In establishing a temple of Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma, Prabhupāda wanted to offer the peaceful, transcendental atmosphere of Ramaṇa-reti to all people, including visitors from abroad, commuters from Delhi, and his own disciples. Already he had received a letter from a major international travel agency requesting that he provide accommodations for tourists so that the ISKCON guesthouse could be included in official tours of spiritual India. People were always coming to India to tour the holy places; unfortunately most of the places were unauthorized or overrun by cheaters. ISKCON's center, therefore, would be very important. Prabhupāda wrote,

Have a European preaching center, and try to enlist all the tourists and hippies who come to Vṛndavana. Give them nice prasadam and engage them in chanting, cleaning the temple, and reading our books, give them all facility for becoming devotees.

There was another particular significance in Prabhupāda's choosing Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma as the central object of worship in his Vṛndāvana temple. Lord Balarāma is the first expansion from Lord Kṛṣṇa, and in His incarnation of Saṅkarṣaṇa, He upholds all the universes. The Vaiṣṇavas, therefore, worship Balarāma for spiritual strength. "You can pray to Lord Balarāma," Prabhupāda said, "to help you in your deficiency." As the source of spiritual strength, Lord Balarāma is also known as the original spiritual master.

As in Prabhupāda's other large ISKCON temples, there would be three altars, and beside Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma would stand the Deities of Lord Caitanya and Lord Nityānanda. Lord Caitanya is Kṛṣṇa Himself, and Lord Nityānanda is Lord Balarāma, a fact the Krishna-Balarām Mandir would proclaim to the world. Lord Nityānanda is especially referred to as the kṛpā-avatāra, the form of God most merciful to the fallen conditioned souls. Thus the worship of Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma as Lord Caitanya and Lord Nityānanda would emphasize distributing Kṛṣṇa consciousness to others. Prabhupāda also wanted to install Deities of Rādhā-Śyāmasundara along with Their two attendant gopīs, Lalitā and Viśākhā.

Śrīla Prabhupāda could not possibly stay full-time in Vṛndāvana, and yet whenever he was away, progress slowed. Guru dāsa, the temple president, had little money and little expertise in managing finances. Prabhupāda called him "Damn Cheap Bābu," a name given by Indians to Westerners who think they have won a "damn cheap" bargain, although they are actually being cheated.

Since Prabhupāda did not trust his devotees' spending habits, he arranged for a complicated system whereby he would have to approve all ISKCON Vṛndāvana checks, even while traveling. When Guru dāsa wanted to spend, Tejās, the Delhi temple president, would come to Vṛndāvana and approve the expenses. Then a check would be made out and mailed to Śrīla Prabhupāda for his signature. When the check returned to Delhi, Tejās would add his own signature and give the check to Guru dāsa.

Although Prabhupāda generally preferred not to burden himself with managing his temples, he insisted on supervising all spending in Vṛndāvana, down to the last rupee. But even with such controls, Guru dāsa would misspend money, taking funds earmarked for construction and using them for other temple purposes—usually getting cheated by the merchants.

After Prabhupāda's 1972 visit during Kārttika, he was away from Vṛndāvana for an entire year, directing things through correspondence. With the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement growing quickly on all continents, he had many places to visit. Still, his three main projects—Bombay, Vṛndāvana, and Māyāpur—were his major subjects of correspondence and his greatest financial investments.

One reason he did not come more often to Vṛndāvana was that Guru dāsa's letters had been very optimistic, promising a temple opening by Janmāṣṭamī 1973. Surabhi was in charge of the construction and knew well that the work was going too slowly, yet Guru dāsa would write to Prabhupāda, painting a picture of imminent completion of the construction and opening of the mandira. Prabhupāda was enlivened to hear the good news, and he held Guru dāsa to his promise, though with reservations.

If you can finish the work by Janmastami next, that would be a very great credit for you, and I shall come from any part of the world just to install the deity. But now you must work very, very hard to make good your promise to me, otherwise I shall be very disappointed and become very, very angry upon you.

Prabhupāda warned the devotees in Vṛndāvana that they would have to work diligently, finishing before the monsoon season arrived in June if they were actually to fulfill their promise.

But anyone visiting the construction site in Vṛndāvana could understand that the building would never be finished in time. The temple area consisted of foundation lines and steel rods. Only three or four devotees were living there, struggling to organize laborers and to obtain funds and building materials. That summer was extremely hot, and each day the devotees were forced to spend the afternoon lying down in their huts, exhausted from the heat. Prices for cement and steel had doubled. Yet Prabhupāda continued to respond to Guru dāsa's glowing reports, encouraging him to continue with determination.

But Prabhupāda could also read between the lines, and he cautioned Guru dāsa, "I simply want to see that the work is being carried on vigorously, and the money shall not be used to pay bad bills. The money should simply be used for construction." Talk of a temple opening by Janmāṣṭamī gradually disappeared, but Prabhupāda did not express his disappointment. Rather, he continued to encourage and push the devotees onward, asking that at least his own room be completed, so that when he visited in October of 1973, he would have a place to stay.

When Prabhupāda arrived, however, his quarters were far from completion, and he had to live for a week in the home of a Vṛndāvana friend. He did not remove Guru dāsa, but he tried to teach him better management and accounting. He also wrote to his India G.B.C. secretary, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami, to get more funds for the Vṛndāvana project.

So I have arrived here in Vrindaban, but so far the project is concerned, why the money is so irregular? Tejyas reports that in the past three months you have sent Rs. 5,000/- and since then nothing. How will the project go on?

Inspired by Prabhupāda's presence, the devotees rallied. They held a little festival on the land, erecting a tent and decorating the foundation posts with banana trees and flowers. For several evenings Prabhupāda lectured before a crowd of about fifty local people sitting on folding chairs in between the foundation lines.

Prabhupāda was determined in his desire. He wanted a temple as much as ever, and the small band of disciples in Vṛndāvana were convinced of their mission to erect that temple. They knew they were building a temple not merely as their own local project but as something very important for the whole world. Prabhupāda set the next Janmāṣṭamī, August 1974, as the new grand opening.

Surabhi had considerable architectural and construction experience, but he had never worked with such an ornate building before. He doubted, therefore, whether they could finish in a year's time. Tejās wondered whether they could raise the funds in time. Guru dāsa was becoming more competent, and he assured Prabhupāda that they would meet their deadline.

Subala had wanted to stay in Vṛndāvana, but only on the condition that he be relieved of management, free to chant and wander in the groves. But he had long since departed for the West. Those devotees who remained committed to Vṛndāvana knew that, at least for the present, the real spiritual path in Vṛndāvana was one of hard labor, anxiety, combating the elements, and working as pure instruments in the service of Kṛṣṇa's pure devotee.

In February 1974, as Prabhupāda was traveling eastward from Los Angeles, he wrote Guru dāsa that he would like to come to Vṛndāvana as soon as his residential rooms were completed—and he asked when that would be. Guru dāsa consulted Surabhi, who said one month. Trying to be more positive, Guru dāsa invited Prabhupāda to come and move into his new quarters in three weeks, but Śrīla Prabhupāda telegraphed back that he would be coming in two!

At that time Prabhupāda's house had no roof or floor, and only portions of the outer walls. Surabhi began a marathon construction effort and hired two work crews, one for day and one for night. Two weeks nonstop they worked, drastically cutting corners. They plastered and painted simultaneously, and as a result the walls remained wet. A few days before Prabhupāda's arrival they put down a temporary floor: bricks, covered with cow dung, covered with rugs, covered with sheets. The weather was cold, and the house had no heating.

The morning Prabhupāda arrived, the devotees all gathered with him as he sat happily before his desk, praising their achievement. He said if they could keep working like this, they could finish everything before Janmāṣṭamī.

Almost immediately upon his arrival Prabhupāda began to manifest the symptoms of a cold, but he would not hear of moving to another place. "This is my first house," he said. "Now I am going to stay here."

The large brick-and-stone room was simple and austere and remained dark during most of the day, but Prabhupāda considered it his Vṛndāvana residence. Soon local distinguished visitors began calling on him, and he received them warmly, discussing Kṛṣṇa consciousness hour after hour in his room. In the evenings he would lecture there and hold a kīrtana.

Prabhupāda had a problem to face in Vṛndāvana. Guru dāsa had informed him that Mr. S. wanted to take back fifty feet of the donated land, claiming the construction was not going quickly enough and that he had never intended to give the front portion. He was thinking of using it for shops, maybe even a petrol pump. Prabhupāda was alarmed. For Mr. S. to take back the front part of the property would ruin the temple scheme and make a farce of the gift. What good was land without proper access to it?

On further inquiry Prabhupāda learned that Guru dāsa had not yet received the actual deed. Prabhupāda was greatly disturbed, yet he proceeded calmly and intently. Guru dāsa, he said, should immediately secure the deed from the registrar and construct a high brick wall around the property. Prabhupāda's secretary wired Mr. S., who was away from Vṛndāvana: "HARE KRSNA. PRABHUPĀDA NOW IN VRINDABAN UNTIL THE 13TH. NOW SETTLE UP FRONT PIECE AS PROMISED."

Mr. S. wired his reply: "FRONT PART OF LAND WILL BE USED FOR OTHER PURPOSES AS DECIDED EARLIER. LETTER FOLLOWS." Suddenly it seemed that Prabhupāda had another Bombay case on his hands.

Mr. S.'s action, however, confirmed Prabhupāda's urgency for completing the construction. Had the land been already walled and the temple built, there would have been no question of Mr. S.'s taking the land back. Prabhupāda's followers could now see clearly his reasons for pushing them. He had been vigilant, even heavy and critical, but for good reasons. Māyā's opposition to Kṛṣṇa consciousness was always present, so that if the devotees let up for even a moment, they could suffer great losses. The question "Why hurry? Why be so anxious to build a temple right away?" should never have been asked. It was the question of the naive, the lazy. As long as the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement had no temple in Vṛndāvana, the threat would exist that there might never be a temple.

Prabhupāda wrote to a friend in Calcutta,

This statement of K. has given me much concern. He said personally to me that under dictation of Srimate Radharani he has given the land to us in charity. We have invested already lacs of rupees for constructing a temple, and now if he uses the front portion for other purposes there will be great damage to the view of the temple... Kindly see Mr. N. S., brother of K., and settle this up so we can go on in our progressive construction work. Kindly treat this as very urgent.

In Mr. S.'s absence from Vṛndāvana, Prabhupāda took the opportunity to speak with Mr. S.'s brothers as well as with Mr. S.'s lawyers. What had been given in the name of Śrīmatī Rādhārāṇī, he informed them, could not be taken back. Mr. S.'s associates agreed, at least for the moment, that Mr. S. had no substantial position. Meanwhile, the laborers were working quickly to build a twelve-foot-high wall around the property.

It was four A.M. Prabhupāda sat in the cold darkness, with a small desk lamp shining before him. Having risen from bed at two and come into his main room to dictate Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam purports, he now sat silently. He wore a wool knit hat pulled over his ears, a sweater, and a gray wool cādar around his shoulders.

On the other side of the double doors sat his servant, peeking in to see what his spiritual master was doing. On Prabhupāda's last visit to the United States, he had acquired a new secretary-servant, Satsvarūpa dāsa Goswami. Despite the cold, Prabhupāda's new assistant was happy to be in Vṛndāvana and so intimately situated close to his spiritual master.

Prabhupāda rang his bell. The servant jumped up, opened the double doors, and entered the room. In the far corner of the large room, seated at the desk, he saw Prabhupāda, looking grave and mystical, his beautifully intense eyes sparkling. As Satsvarūpa offered obeisances, he thought of his great fortune in being there with his spiritual master. When he sat up, he saw Prabhupāda nod slightly, and he felt that Prabhupāda was acknowledging his servant's good fortune.

Sitting on the floor on the other side of the desk, Satsvarūpa faced Śrīla Prabhupāda. In awe and reverence he tensed, prepared to do whatever Prabhupāda requested, yet fearful that the request might be something he wouldn't know how to do.

"Get the Kṛṣṇa book, Volume Two," Prabhupāda said. His servant ran and got it from the shelf, returned, and again sat down.

"Read the story of King Nṛga," Prabhupāda said. Though terse, Prabhupāda's commands were complete. His servant paused, wondering if there was anything else. He opened the book, then hesitated. "Out loud?" he asked. Prabhupāda nodded, and his servant began to read aloud.

Soon, however, Satsvarūpa became puzzled as to why Prabhupāda was having him do this so early in the morning when he was usually dictating Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam. As Satsvarūpa read aloud, Prabhupāda sat motionless, giving no indication that he was pleased, or even listening. In that silence, Satsvarūpa became very aware of his own voice reading, and he listened intently to the story.

King Nṛga, the story explained, gave many cows in charity to the brāhmaṇas. One day, however, one cow wandered back and entered among King Nṛga's herd, and so the king unknowingly gave it in charity to another brāhmaṇa. But as the new owner was leading the cow away, the former owner returned to claim it. An argument ensued between the two brāhmaṇas. Coming before King Nṛga, they charged that he had taken back a cow previously given in charity—a great sin. The puzzled King Nṛga very humbly offered each brāhmaṇa one hundred thousand cows in exchange for this one cow. Neither accepted, however, since according to Manu's law, a brāhmaṇa's property can't be taken under any condition, even by the government. Consequently, both brāhmaṇas left in anger, and as a result King Nṛga had to take his next birth as a lizard.

As Prabhupāda's servant read on, he suddenly got the feeling that Prabhupāda had asked him to read this story to expose the cheating of his own servant. In a panic, he tried to think of how he had committed the offense of stealing from his spiritual master. He couldn't think of anything wrong—until he recalled having taken a pair of socks which had been given to Prabhupāda as a gift. Prabhupāda was always receiving gifts wherever he went, and it was his practice, after collecting socks and scarves and so on, to give them to his disciples. Prabhupāda would use only a fraction of the things given to him. So because it was cold in Vṛndāvana, Satsvarūpa, who had no socks, had taken one inexpensive-looking pair that he was sure his spiritual master would never want to use. He had assumed that Prabhupāda would not object, but now his cheating was indirectly exposed.

After the story was completed, Prabhupāda remained silent, as did his servant. “Perhaps Prabhupāda is sleeping,” Satsvarūpa thought, though he dared not say anything or even move. They both sat motionless, Satsvarūpa looking down at the book and sometimes up at Prabhupāda, waiting for an indication.

Five minutes passed. Finally Prabhupāda said, “Now take this chapter and type it up.” His servant acknowledged the instruction and got up to leave. But still it wasn't clear. Why had he read the story, and why type it? Prabhupāda then spoke again. “Now I want to dictate one letter.” Satsvarūpa had a notepad with him, and he sat down and immediately began writing Prabhupāda's words.

The letter was to Mr. S., and Prabhupāda referred to Mr. S.'s donation of the land and to his desire to take back the front fifty feet. He reminded Mr. S. that, according to the original agreement, he had given the entire land with the sanction of Śrīmatī Rādhārāṇī. How could he say that now he was taking it back? Mr. S. should please reconsider what he was proposing. In this connection Prabhupāda was enclosing the story from Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam of King Nṛga. Mr. S. should read it and consider the implications.

Prabhupāda's servant felt relieved. But he also felt that his guilt was valid and that he should be wary of becoming too familiar with his spiritual master's possessions. And he had learned another lesson as well: his own viewpoint of Prabhupāda was entirely subjective. Although he had been with Prabhupāda, he had not correctly understood Prabhupāda's thoughts and motives. He felt that perhaps he was not the only disciple who sometimes made that mistake. One may try to comprehend the many aspects of Śrīla Prabhupāda, but one should not expect to understand completely. Even G.B.C. secretaries and other leading devotees who were right with Prabhupāda in his dealings could not know what Prabhupāda was thinking. Satsvarūpa Mahārāja decided that it was best to always follow Śrīla Prabhupāda's instructions, and going back to the adjoining room, he began typing the story of King Nṛga.

At sunrise Prabhupāda stepped out of his house onto the dusty lane, and the devotees of ISKCON Vṛndāvana joined him on his morning walk. As he walked he began saying that one of the devotees had complained that the electricity was always going off. The devotee had said that India was advanced in spiritual knowledge and the West in material knowledge and that the two should combine. Prabhupāda agreed. “Yes,” he said, “that is my mission. To combine them.”

Prabhupāda reached the Chhatikara road in front of the property and began walking down the middle of the road in the direction of Delhi. Large nīm trees lined the road. “The material side of life is also necessary," Prabhupāda continued. "In the West, even for shaving they have a machine. This is very good, but it is also being misused. It is all for the itching sensation, sex, which is insignificant and abominable. The whole intelligence is being employed like the dog's or cat's."

Prabhupāda paused, and a devotee asked, "Prabhupāda, how can we understand that Vṛndāvana is Kṛṣṇa's abode? There seems to be so much contamination in Vṛndāvana."

"This is because your senses are impure," said Prabhupāda. "But when your eyes are smeared with the salve of love, then you can see Vṛndāvana. Don't judge Vṛndāvana by this external manifestation."

As Prabhupāda walked along the road, many persons greeted him and his disciples, calling, "Jaya Rādhē!" "Hare Kṛṣṇa!" Some even stepped out of their shoes and prostrated themselves before Prabhupāda, who returned their respects with folded palms, nodding his head, and saying, "Hare Kṛṣṇa."

The tightly gathered group walking in the cold morning air passed fields, āśramas, and groves. They heard the singing of many varieties of birds: sparrows, parrots, cuckoos, pigeons, and peacocks. Sugarcane stood high and ready for harvest. As Prabhupāda walked farther, the large nīm trees gave way to small thorny acacia trees, and herds of cows and buffalo grazed in the fields. For half an hour Prabhupāda continued. Then, turning, he retraced his route.

On the roadside he passed a man dressed in the simple white cloth of a bābājī, warming himself before a fire of twigs. Prabhupāda said that the Ṣaḍ-gosvāmy-aṣṭakam, by Śrīnivāsa Ācārya, defines the actual qualities of a person in the renounced order. The song glorifies the six Gosvāmīs, who gave up their posts as government ministers and became mendicants, accepting only one cloth and thinking always of Kṛṣṇa and the gopīs.

"Vṛndāvana is the gift of Rūpa and Sanātana Gosvāmī," Prabhupāda said. "They wrote many books so poor people could take advantage and become Kṛṣṇa conscious. We see many imitations of Rūpa Gosvāmī in Vṛndāvana today. But they should never take the dress of Rūpa Gosvāmī, especially if they cannot give up this cigarette-smoking habit. It was the gift of Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī that we should not jump and try to change our garb all of a sudden. We should try to hear of the Absolute Truth from realized souls." Prabhupāda said that especially his disciples living in Vṛndāvana should become gosvāmīs. Whether gṛhasthas or sannyāsīs, they should live simply and austere and engage twenty-four hours in the service of Kṛṣṇa.

Prabhupāda sat in his room talking with Guṇārṇava about finances. "Where are the bills?" Prabhupāda asked.

"I am keeping duplicates, Prabhupāda," Guṇārṇava explained, showing him how he had attached the bills to the vouchers. "Tejās is keeping the originals in Delhi."

"This is just an explanation," Prabhupāda replied. "I am an auditor. I am not A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami. Don't you understand? The auditor wants to see the bills, not just your excuses."

Throughout the day, Prabhupāda would call in Guru dāsa, Surabhi, Mr. Lahadi (the engineer), even the contractor, Mr. Alibuchs. Although the contractor was Muhammadan, Prabhupāda requested him, "Please do a nice job, because this is Kṛṣṇa's temple. If you work very nicely, Kṛṣṇa will bless you." Prabhupāda assured him that money would not be a problem. He would arrange that ten thousand dollars a month would come from his temples in America until the construction was finished.

"It will be finished by Janmāṣṭamī?" Prabhupāda asked.

"Yes," Guru dāsa said firmly. "It will be done."

Māyāpur

March 1974

While traveling from Calcutta to Māyāpur, Prabhupāda stopped as usual at the pleasant, secluded mango grove and, sitting on a straw mat, took a breakfast of fresh fruits. A group of his disciples and his sister, Bhavatārīṇī, were also present, and Prabhupāda saw that everyone received prasādam. He then returned to his car, and the caravan continued to Māyāpur.

As Prabhupāda's car approached the Mayapur Chandrodaya Mandir, he was met by a "roadblock" of ISKCON devotees waiting at the spot known as Śrīvāsāṅgana, over two miles from the ISKCON property. Four hundred devotees from America, England, Europe, South America, Australia, India, and other parts of the world sang Hare Kṛṣṇa, following Prabhupāda as he rode slowly toward the Mayapur Chandrodaya Mandir.

Prabhupāda smiled. Looking out from the back seat of the car, he recognized many faithful disciples, all hankering for his merciful glance of recognition. The car, surrounded tightly by devotees, inched its way through the gates and up the long drive to the temple. Along the roadside and around the temple buildings, colorful marigolds and tagar were abloom, enhancing Śrīla Prabhupāda's joyous reception.

The temple room was completed, its sparkling marble floor, freshly painted walls, and crystal chandeliers all having been readied just a few days before. After offering obeisances before the resplendent golden forms of Rādhā-Mādhava on the altar, Prabhupāda turned and walked the long temple hall to sit on his vyāsāsana and address this first truly international gathering of disciples. He welcomed them to Māyāpur, acknowledging that on this day, Bhaktivinoda Ṭhākura's prediction had come true. The devotees shouted triumphantly, "Jaya! Jaya, Śrīla Prabhupāda!"

Bhaktivinoda Ṭhākura had written,

Oh, for that day when the fortunate English, French, Russian, German and American people will take up banners, mṛdaṅgas and karatālas and raise kīrtana through their streets and towns. When will that day come?

Bhaktivinoda Ṭhākura's prophecy had come to pass. He had also predicted, "Soon a great saint will come and establish Lord Caitanya's movement throughout the world." That great personality—empowered to create devotees of all races and backgrounds and to rally them together in Māyāpur, thousands of miles from their homes—was Śrīla Prabhupāda. And although he saw himself as an instrument of the ācāryas, his disciples saw him as the personification of Lord Caitanya's and Lord Nityānanda's mercy. As stated in the Caitanya-caritāmṛta, yadyapi āmāra guru—caitanyera dāsa/ tathāpi jāniye āmi tānhāra prakāśa: "Although I know that my spiritual master is a servitor of Śrī Caitanya, I know him also as a plenary manifestation of the Lord."

Leaving the temple room, Prabhupāda went upstairs and retired to his room, satisfied that the building was now fulfilling its purpose by giving shelter to hundreds of his spiritual children. He began greeting leading disciples from various parts of the world, hearing the encouraging news of book distribution and dealing with problems. He asked that everyone take advantage of the holy dhāma by maintaining kīrtana in the temple room around the clock, stopping only for scheduled classes in Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam.

The devotees were very happy to be together in the dhāma. Those with experience of India, like Jayapatāka Swami and Acyutānanda Swami, led groups of devotees on parikrama (pilgrimage) to local holy places. This visit to Māyāpur would constitute the first half of the devotees' Indian pilgrimage; after ten days they were scheduled to go to Vṛndāvana.

Almost all of the devotees assembled in Māyāpur preached in areas of the world where the modes of ignorance and passion predominated. Daily they had to mix with materialistic people, and it was inevitable that they would become worn down. This pilgrimage, therefore, was a chance for purification. Although they were not advanced in birth or in knowledge of the Sanskrit Vedas, Prabhupāda had accepted them, and that was their certification as devotees. They were bona fide candidates for understanding the meaning of the dhāma. They would become refreshed by bathing in the Ganges in Māyāpur and the Yamunā in Vṛndāvana, and they would return to their respective centers throughout the world, purified and renewed for more active preaching.

One song by Narottama dāsa Ṭhākura described the pilgrims' eligibility to realize the dhāma:

gaurāṅgera saṅgi-gaṇe, nitya-siddha kari' māne,

se yāya vrajendra-suta-pāśa śrī gauḍa-maṇḍala-bhūmi, yebā jāne cintāmaṇi,

tāra haya vraja-bhūme vāsa

"Those whose intelligence has come to understand that the eternal associates of Vṛndāvana-dhāma are nondifferent from those in Navadvīpa can attain the service of the son of Nanda Mahārāja [Kṛṣṇa]. Such fortunate persons perceive the holy dhāma as an object of service because their transcendental eyes have been opened by the mercy of the eternal perfect associates of Navadvīpa-dhāma. Therefore, those who are enthusiastic realize the touchstone of the holy dhāma of Navadvīpa through their transcendental eyes. Thereafter, they reside in the holy dhāma of Navadvīpa which they know to be nondifferent than Vṛndāvana and serve in their eternally perfected spiritual bodies."

The devotees' main reason for coming to Māyāpur, however, was to associate with Śrīla Prabhupāda. He was always traveling, and his disciples could only expect to see him briefly from time to time as he passed through their area. To see him in Māyāpur and Vṛndāvana, where they could be with him daily on walks and in the temple, was the most ecstatic part of the festival.

Prabhupāda's happiness to be in Māyāpur was increased many times by the large gathering of his international family. He wanted this. Māyāpur was for the devotees. Prabhupāda even thought that, if possible, all the devotees should stay here permanently and simply go on chanting, although he admitted that it was not practical in terms of world preaching. He derived great satisfaction from sitting in his room above the temple hall and hearing the constant rousing kīrtanas. "Bhaktivinoda Ṭhākura has said," he remarked, "there is nothing of value in all the fourteen worlds except the chanting of the holy names."

At Prabhupāda's request, his Governing Body Commission members had gathered in Māyāpur. Their purpose was to discuss ISKCON's preaching activities around the world and then to pass resolutions to direct that preaching. This was the first time they had met as a body in Prabhupāda's presence, and he instructed them how to conduct their meeting. They should not simply talk, he said. Rather, someone should present a proposal, which should then be discussed and voted on. All resolutions should be listed in the minutes.

"Chalk out your plans for the year," Prabhupāda said. "And then whatever you decide, do not change it, but carry it out. Then next year you can meet and discuss again." He was not in favor of prolonged meetings, but he was satisfied to see his G.B.C. secretaries seriously confronting all items on the agenda for the sake of a growing Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement.

One of the main features of the Māyāpur festival was the arrival of advance copies of the recently published volume of the Caitanya-caritāmṛta. The volume contained chapters Seven through Eleven of the Ādi-līlā and included color illustrations by Prabhupāda's disciples. Chapter Nine especially glorified the saṅkīrtana movement begun by Lord Caitanya, and verse after verse ecstatically confirmed the authenticity of Śrīla Prabhupāda's movement.

Kṛṣṇadāsa Kavirāja describes Navadvīpa-dhāma as the place where Lord Caitanya had planted the seed of the Kṛṣṇa consciousness "tree." In one verse he states, "Thus the branches of the Caitanya tree formed a cluster of society, with great branches covering all the universe." And Śrīla Prabhupāda had written a conclusive one-sentence purport to this verse: "Our International Society for Krishna Consciousness is one of the branches of the Caitanya tree."

Prabhupāda's Caitanya-caritāmṛta translation and commentary was the fruit of the Caitanya tree. It was fully authoritative and paramparā, but never merely academic or technical. Its teachings stressed that Caitanya Mahāprabhu's desire to widely distribute devotional service should be the desire of everyone. It left no doubt about what Prabhupāda expected from the members of the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement.

The only purpose of the preachers of the saṅkīrtana movement must be to go on preaching without restriction. That is the way in which Śrī Caitanya Mahāprabhu introduced the saṅkīrtana movement to the world.

This volume also contained one of the most important verses of the Caitanya-caritāmṛta: bhārata-bhūmite haila manuṣya-janma yāra/ janma sārthaka kari' kara para-upākara, "One who has taken his birth as a human being in the land of India should make his life successful and work for the benefit of all people." In his purport to this verse, Prabhupāda explained the special piety of the Indians, who were always ready to take part in a saṅkīrtana festival. Unfortunately, the present leaders of India were leading the people away from God, away from distinguishing pious and sinful acts, and away from belief in a next life. The Indians had the special duty of educating the world in Vedic principles.

"If all Indians had taken to this path as advised by Lord Caitanya Mahāprabhu," Prabhupāda wrote, "India would have given a unique gift to the world, and thus India would have been glorified." Moreover, it was not only the duty of the Indians but the duty of everyone to help the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement: "One should know definitely that the best welfare activity for all of human society is to awaken man's God consciousness, or Kṛṣṇa consciousness."

Prabhupāda stayed with his disciples in Māyāpur for a full week, lecturing daily and meeting with smaller groups for many hours. On the day of Gaura-pūrṇimā he went down to the Ganges and took the sacred water on his head, while his men dove off the high bank and swam. The next day he left for Vṛndāvana, where he would again meet his disciples and introduce them to the dhāma.

Although many of the Western devotees, inexperienced in living and traveling in India, were afflicted with indigestion, dysentery, and even, in some cases, culture shock and homesickness, they nevertheless traveled, a somewhat bedraggled group, from Māyāpur to Calcutta to Delhi, and finally to Vṛndāvana.

Since the Vṛndāvana temple and guesthouse was still mostly a construction site, the devotees had to stay at the nearby Fogel Ashram, while Prabhupāda again took up residence in his newly constructed rooms near the site of the Krishna-Balaram Mandir. The devotees would see him regularly on morning walks and during the morning Bhāgavatam class, and he would also come in the evening sometimes to speak under an outdoor pavilion at Fogel Ashram.

Noticing that not many devotees attended his first evening meeting in his room, Prabhupāda inquired and learned that many of them were out visiting Vṛndāvana's famous old temples and other pilgrimage sites, while others were shopping in the bazaar, and still others were sleeping. "Bring them all back," Prabhupāda said, annoyed. "Coming to pilgrimage means to come where the sādhus are. I am here, so why is everyone going elsewhere?" On hearing this, so many devotees came to Prabhupāda's room that they could not all fit.

Prabhupāda began talking about tapasya, austerity. "The tapasvīs in Vṛndāvana go naked," he said, "even in the cold. They are determined not to take birth again for material life." He described how the living entity before birth remains cramped within the womb, a condition much like being tied by the hands and feet and thrown in the ocean. Worms within the mother's body bite the skin of the embryo, and the living entity suffers. Because māyā deludes us into thinking we are happy, Prabhupāda explained, we have to again enter the womb of a mother. And although in one lifetime we may be a wealthy human being, in the next life we may be a bug or hog or dog.

"So this life is for tapasya," Prabhupāda said. "But we cannot execute severe penances in this age. So our penance is to try to reform poor crazy persons. One should take voluntary pains for Kṛṣṇa. Kṛṣṇa comes to save the fallen souls, so if you help a little, He will be pleased. Kṛṣṇa comes Himself and He sends His devotee and He leaves books, and still we are mad for sense enjoyment. Our penance, therefore, is to try to reform the fallen souls."

Prabhupāda's preaching uplifted his disciples, whose duty was to preach to the citizens of many lands. They had come, at Prabhupāda's bidding, to visit Māyāpur and Vṛndāvana, but their real work was to save the fallen souls of their native countries, and Prabhupāda's preaching filled them with determination.

Later, one of the devotees told Prabhupāda that dealing with the devotees was sometimes more difficult than dealing with the materialists, and he mentioned a well-known problem case, a devotee named Makhana-cora. "That is your penance," Prabhupāda said. "Your penance is to work with Makhana-cora. We should take anxiety. For a sane man to work with a crazy man is not pleasurable, but the service to Kṛṣṇa is pleasurable." Prabhupāda described how he had left his peaceful life in Vṛndāvana to take on so much burden and anxiety for Kṛṣṇa. Just as he had taken a risk by going to America in old age, so his disciples should accept whatever difficulties were required in preaching Kṛṣṇa consciousness. "The work is not pleasurable," Prabhupāda said, "but making so many devotees is pleasurable."

Although the devotees had been visiting the various temples of Vṛndāvana, eager to imbibe the Vṛndāvana spirit, the real nectar came when Prabhupāda, sitting in his room, spoke about Vṛndāvana. "Vṛndāvana is for paramahamsas," he said. "You cannot see Vṛndāvana with viṣaya, or material spirit. The test is how much you have conquered over eating, sleeping, and mating. Don't think you can just come to Vṛndāvana and become a gosvāmī. One who comes to Vṛndāvana with a material spirit will take birth as a dog or a monkey in Vṛndāvana. That is his punishment. But the dogs here are also Vaiṣṇavas.

"People come to Vṛndāvana to give up all material anxieties and family life. So one should not be afraid. He should never mind what is going to happen. There are many devotees in Vṛndāvana who are not disturbed by heat or cold. But another risk in Vṛndāvana is to meet those who talk of the gopīs but are not free from smoking biḍis. They are sahajiyās. We have to see who is a devotee by his personal behavior. If one is seeking money and biḍis and women and talking of the gopīs, then what is his position? Śrī Caitanya Mahāprabhu never talked of the gopīs publicly. The real Vṛndāvana is not to eat prasādam and sleep but to follow the advice of Vṛndāvana-candra [Kṛṣṇa] and broadcast His message. That is His message. That is Vṛndāvana. Vṛndāvana-dhāma is worshipable. Don't commit an offense here. Take it as cintāmaṇi-dhāma, Kṛṣṇa. Narottama dāsa Ṭhākura says to see Vṛndāvana is not possible with viṣaya. So we should take the shelter of Gaura-Nitāi, become cleansed of eating, sleeping, and mating. Then you will see Vṛndāvana. Don't commit offenses here. There is a special influence in Vṛndāvana."

Prabhupāda said that Vṛndāvana's spiritual quality was such that devotional service performed here had one hundred times the effect of service performed elsewhere. But an offense in Vṛndāvana also had one hundred times the effect. Ordinary persons, therefore, were advised to visit a holy place like Vṛndāvana for no more than three days; otherwise they would become slack and return to their sinful activities. "Better to come," Prabhupāda said, "become purified, and leave on the fourth day. And the worst offense to Vṛndāvana is to commit illicit sex here. So do not come and play hide-and-seek with Kṛṣṇa. He sees with His eyes, the sun, and He is also in your heart. Kṛṣṇa knows everything. Those who want to be devotees have to be sincere. They shouldn't play tricks, because Kṛṣṇa knows everything. Be sincere with Kṛṣṇa and His representative. Preach the gospel of Bhagavad-gītā as it is. Become a spiritual master."

After his evening lecture, Prabhupāda mentioned how some of the sahajiyās had walked out during his lecture. "They are so advanced," he said, "that they want to hear only of the embracing and kissing of Rādhārāṇī and Kṛṣṇa. They take my talks as ordinary." Prabhupāda explained that his process of lecturing was to speak on only one verse per lecture, but that that speaking was the same as Kṛṣṇa's speaking. He said that his own Guru Mahārāja had lectured for three months on the first verse of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, and for that he had gained great respect.

Prabhupāda learned one day that one of his disciples had left the company of the ISKCON devotees to live among the bābājīs at Rādhā-kuṇḍa. Prabhupāda became angry and sent for the boy to come immediately. When the boy arrived, Prabhupāda went out to see him. Dressed in only a dhotī, Prabhupāda spoke sternly to his disciple, saying that the monkeys of Vṛndāvana also live simply but are interested only in eating and sex. "Don't become a monkey!" Prabhupāda said, trembling as he spoke. "Why don't you come and live with me?"

The boy replied, "The bābājīs have given me some facility to chant."

"You come with me!" Prabhupāda exclaimed. "I will give you facility. But don't become a monkey." The boy surrendered before Prabhupāda's compassionate concern.

Prabhupāda heard from his disciples living in Vṛndāvana that some of the local gosvāmīs had a complaint about him. They had read an article published in Back to Godhead and considered it insulting. The article, written by Prabhupāda's disciple Hayagrīva, contained a statement that gosvāmīs in Vṛndāvana who misbehaved would become hogs and monkeys in Vṛndāvana in their next life. Prabhupāda replied that the statement was accurate. The article, he said, had not specifically referred to the present gosvāmīs but to any gosvāmī who lived sinfully in Vṛndāvana. This was not merely an opinion but was the authoritative conclusion of the original gosvāmīs of Vṛndāvana.

Although Yamunā dāsī lived in Vṛndāvana with her husband, Guru dāsa, Prabhupāda rarely saw her. So one day he sent for her and inquired why she was not coming to hear him and serve him. Yamunā admitted that she was afraid because Prabhupāda seemed to be in a chastising mood of late. (She was referring to Prabhupāda's insistence and pushing to get the Vṛndāvana temple built.) Prabhupāda said that only by his pushing was the temple being built. But Yamunā again confessed her fear of Prabhupāda's anger.

"You may be afraid of your spiritual master," Prabhupāda said, "but that doesn't mean you shouldn't come and see him." He then narrated the story of how Lord Balarāma had once forced the River Yamunā to come before Him. As he spoke, all the devotees present became aware that Prabhupāda was not only telling the līlā of Lord Balarāma's frightening the River Yamunā, but he was also speaking indirectly about his disciple Yamunā. Absorbed in the pastimes of Lord Balarāma, Prabhupāda described how the Lord, intoxicated from drinking honey, had threatened the River Yamunā, forcing her to come. But when the Yamunā did not come, Lord Balarāma had cut into the earth with His plow, forcing her to flow to Him. "In this way," Prabhupāda said, "I will drag you to come and see me." Yamunā dāsī agreed to stop her foolish reluctance and come and cook for her spiritual master.

Although the afternoons were warm in Vṛndāvana, the early mornings were chilly. Dressed in a sweater, a wool cādar, and a fuzzy wool cap that buttoned under his chin, Prabhupāda led his disciples on a pre-dawn walk along Chhatikara Road. With the ISKCON leaders and sannyāsīs staying close to catch his words, he walked and talked in Vṛndāvana. His walks were so long that most of the devotees became tired, and some joked that Prabhupāda was going to walk all the way back to Delhi. When the sun rose, gradually the air would begin to warm.

Some of the devotees had expected that in Vṛndāvana Prabhupāda would talk more about the places of Kṛṣṇa's pastimes and about Kṛṣṇa and the gopīs and that Prabhupāda himself would want to see the places of Kṛṣṇa's pastimes. But Prabhupāda seemed far more concerned to hear of the preaching of his disciples or to discuss the construction of the Krishna-Balarām Mandir. Often when devotees raised the topic of Vṛndāvana, Prabhupāda would criticize the cheating of certain Vṛn dāvana bābājīs and the corruption within Vṛndāvana. Or he would speak of the special vision required before one could properly see Vṛndāvana. He said Vṛndāvana was wherever a pure devotee lived. And he stressed that the devotees' main business was to go out of Vṛndāvana and preach.

As they walked along the road, the main traffic was pedestrians, workers carrying milk on bicycles, or men riding on bullock carts; only occasionally an automobile would speed by, its horn honking. Almost every person who approached would respectfully greet Prabhupāda with "Jaya Rādhē!" or "Hare Kṛṣṇa!" Or they would hold up their hands or bow their heads and say namas te. One young man driving a bicycle ricksha approached from the opposite direction and, just before reaching Prabhupāda, stopped his ricksha, got down, stepped out of his shoes, and prostrated himself on the road. Prabhupāda smiled and said, "Very good boy."

Prabhupāda paused. "This is Vṛndāvana," he said. The simple habit of the ordinary people in Vṛndāvana to offer respect to a saintly person was, to Prabhupāda, an expression of Vṛndāvana's essence. Vṛndāvana was one of the few remaining places in India where even a common man would chant the name of Rādhārāṇī and Kṛṣṇa as he passed by on the road. To fully understand this extraordinary phenomenon was to understand Vṛndāvana.

One devotee asked Prabhupāda that if so many residents of Vṛndāvana were fallen souls, then what was the meaning of the statement that to be born in Vṛndāvana was to be liberated? "It says in the Kṛṣṇa book," the devotee said, "that the people in Vṛndāvana don't need a spiritual master. Kṛṣṇa is their spiritual master."

"Yes," Prabhupāda replied, "they have an excellent spiritual master. But one may have a spiritual master and not obey him. Then what is his position? So they are fallen who do nonsense things in Vṛndāvana. But their fortune is also there—that they are born in Vṛndāvana. But they misuse that fortune."

The land was very dry. Prabhupāda said that Vṛndāvana was becoming like a desert and would become more so in the future. He said this was because of impiety. "In the West," he said, "I see in America, Germany, there is so much green. But not here."

The devotees then questioned Prabhupāda. "Wasn't the West more impious than Vṛndāvana?"

"Yes," Prabhupāda said. "I came to you in the West, and you did not know anything about Kṛṣṇa. You did not even know that these things were bad—meat-eating and illicit sex. But when I told you to stop, you did it. But this is Kṛṣṇa's land, Vṛndāvana, and they are doing these things here. Therefore it is even worse. And they are being punished directly by Kṛṣṇa."

Prabhupāda's morning walks in Vṛndāvana were as exciting and enlightening as his formal lectures. On two consecutive morning walks, he outlined a comprehensive plan for starting an ISKCON varṇāśrama college. Bhagavad-gītā explains how society should be divided into four orders, according to a person's nature and occupation. Prabhupāda said that although the members of the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement were above the social divisions—brāhmaṇa, kṣatriya, vaiśya, and śūdra—they should teach others by acting perfectly within these divisions. Not everyone would become a brāhmaṇa, but everyone could attain the same perfection by doing his particular duty—for the pleasure of Kṛṣṇa. "We will teach military art," said Prabhupāda, to the amazement of his disciples. "Soldiers will wear tilaka and march, saying, 'Hare Kṛṣṇa, Hare Kṛṣṇa.' They can march with military band and fight."

To Prabhupāda, establishing varṇāśrama-dharma did not seem difficult. ISKCON should begin by starting a college based on the varṇāśrama conception. "There should be no unemployment," Prabhupāda said. "We will say, 'Why are you sitting idly? Come onto the field. Take this plow. Take this bull. Go on working. Why are you sitting idly?' This is the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement. Nobody should be allowed to sit down and sleep. They must find out some employment. Either work as a brāhmaṇa, or as a kṣatriya, or as a vaiśya. Why should there be unemployment?"

"Just as this body is working—that means the leg is working, the hand, the brain, the belly. So why should there be unemployment? You stop this unemployment—you will see the whole world is peaceful. There will be no complaint. They will be happily chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa. Just like this field here. No one is working it. They have all gone to the cities to work in the factory. It is a condemned civilization."

On a morning walk near the end of the Vṛndāvana festival one of the devotees mentioned that the festival was almost over and that the devotees would be going back to their centers. "Yes," said Prabhupāda, and he stopped walking. "Yes, that is our real business—to go and preach."

As the devotees were making travel arrangements for Delhi and onward, Girirāja arrived in Vṛndāvana with upsetting news from Bombay. The municipality of Bombay had denied them permission to begin construction of a temple. According to Girirāja, two permissions were required: permission to build according to rules and regulations and a No-Objection Certificate from the police commissioner. In issuing the No-Objection Certificate the police must consider two points: whether the temple would create a traffic problem and whether the presence of a temple would cause community or religious tensions. The municipality had been delaying their permission, saying they first required an NOC from the police. And the police had been saying that they needed the sanction of the municipality before they would consider giving the NOC. Girirāja had been pursuing this bureaucratic matter, but now a commissioner from the police had written a letter flatly refusing to give an NOC. According to the commissioner, the kīrtana in the temple would produce a "nuisance."

The report from Girirāja deeply disturbed Śrīla Prabhupāda. "You should immediately object," he told Girirāja on his walk the next morning, "that the government is completely unqualified. The pure devotees are always engaged in kīrtana, and the government calls it a nuisance. He could at least be a gentleman and say that the sound should not be amplified while people are trying to take rest. But instead he has said the kīrtana is simply a nuisance." Prabhupāda said that there were many learned persons in Bombay, and they also would not stand for this judgment.

"You have to organize all the Vaiṣṇavas," Prabhupāda continued. "In the Bhagavad-gītā it is said, satataṁ kīrtayanto mām: one has to chant 'Kṛṣṇa' always. Śrī Caitanya Mahāprabhu says, kīrtanīyaḥ sadā hariḥ. And this rascal is saying 'bhajana is nuisance'? Hmm? Is it not possible to invoke an agitation against this? What right has he got to say 'nuisance'? He could have spoken in sweet language that, 'The bhajana may be very good for the devotees, but it creates disturbance to the others. Therefore we cannot allow.' Say like that. But they cannot still stop bhajana. But his remark is that the bhajana is nuisance! Chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa is the culture of India. We must make propaganda and organize kīrtana parties and fight this."

One of the G.B.C. men proposed that instead of going back to the West some of the devotees stay, go to Bombay, and hold massive protests. At first Prabhupāda approved this spirit, likening it to Lord Caitanya's protest against the Kazi, who had stopped the saṅkīrtana movement in Navadvīpa. But on reflecting, he decided it would not be wise to fight with the government. The devotees could not hope to win such a fight, nor would the people appreciate it. Prabhupāda suggested the devotees hold massive kīrtana programs and preach positively to the people of Bombay, convincing them of the value of Kṛṣṇa consciousness. "When the people of Bombay are convinced of the importance of Kṛṣṇa consciousness," Prabhupāda said, "they will see that the temple is built."

In an urgent mood, Śrīla Prabhupāda left Vṛndāvana for Bombay. His last instruction to Guru dāsa and the others in Vṛndāvana: "An ideal gosvāmī should remain here to challenge any false gosvāmīs. But if you also become false, then you cannot challenge."

March 20, 1974

Disciples and ISKCON life members continued to discuss with Śrīla Prabhupāda about confronting the police commissioner's refusal to grant ISKCON permission to build a temple at Hare Krishna Land. Ironically, ISKCON's property was bordered on one side by a large cinema hall, and every evening, both before and after the movie, a long line of traffic would form. The honking horns and the hundreds of pedestrians coming and going created much noise and congestion. If the neighborhood and government could tolerate a cinema, then how, without prejudice, could they call the Kṛṣṇa kīrtanas a nuisance?

Although addressing the specific issue of government permission, Śrīla Prabhupāda also preached on the greater principle of how governments in Kali-yuga restrict religious life. "The government policy," he said, "is that religion is an opiate of the people. They think religion is just a sentiment. They want to open slaughterhouses and kill these mischief, loitering cows. Their conclusion is that religion has no value. Therefore, their decision is to not encourage these temples and this bhajana. From their point of view it is useless."

Some of Prabhupāda's Bombay friends suggested he work through the Jan-Sangh political party, which supported Hinduism, and thus form a strong political coalition. But Śrīla Prabhupāda was more concerned to use this opportunity for preaching. "I suggest that we make vigorous propaganda," he said. "Hold meetings in big halls so that the public may understand, at least, that this movement is very important. Let there be advertisements that we will speak on different subject matters, and then I will come and speak."

"In that meeting, make a nice gentleman the president. Create public opinion so that they will come and sign, 'Yes, here must be one temple.' We will prove from śāstric evidence. As it is stated in Bhagavad-gītā, catur-vidhā bhajante mām janāḥ sukr̥tino 'rjuna. This word bhajana from bhajante is used with reference to the very pious men, sukr̥tinaḥ. The opposite kind of man is duṣkr̥tinaḥ, the miscreants. So bhajana is for the pious man, as recommended in the Bhagavad-gītā. And Bhagavad-gītā is held in great estimation all over the world. And yet he has accused bhajana as nuisance? How rascal and ignorant! We have to make it clear that bhajana is so important. Bhagavad-gītā is meant for solution of all material problems, but the people of India are not accepting it.

"My disciples can also speak and say, 'You please come with us. We are foreigners, but we know Kṛṣṇa is not for this or that. So why are you Indians lacking? You accept your culture. We have taken to Kṛṣṇa, and Kṛṣṇa says that simply by kīrtana one becomes free from all contamination. So why not join with us? What is the wrong there? It is stated in your śāstra, and we have adopted it. And we are feeling better. So why you are so callous, you educated youth and gentlemen?' This kind of propaganda has to be made."

Śrīla Prabhupāda had abandoned the idea of direct political agitation, but he continued to speak against the police commissioner's decision and to deliberate on overcoming it. He considered the matter from all possible angles, pro and con. At one point he said that if they could not get sanction to build a temple, then they should build a hotel. "I am trying to get sanction," he said. "If you don't give permission—then hotel."

"Build a hotel in the front and a temple in the rear," suggested Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami.

"Yes," Prabhupāda replied. And he instructed his men further on dealing with opposition. As with the struggle to acquire the land, the present struggle also threatened to become a long legal battle. Prabhupāda remained always transcendental, however, even while fighting. And he maintained his normal activities in Bombay, enjoying the mild tropical climate.

Although ISKCON owned a number of tenement buildings on the Juhu land, the devotees had not been able to use a single one, since all were occupied. But recently when tenants had vacated one of the apartments, the devotees had prepared it for Prabhupāda. It was a modest place, two small rooms with a little kitchen, but now for the first time Prabhupāda had his own residence at Hare Krishna Land.

Prabhupāda liked to sit on the narrow veranda outside his apartment and take his massage in the sun. Surveying the Juhu land, with its many tall coconut trees, their long palm leaves rustling pleasantly in the breeze, Prabhupāda said Hare Krishna Land was a paradise. The devotees were happy.

One day during his massage Prabhupāda saw that the contractors, whom he had allowed to come and take coconuts for a set price, were also taking away the leaves to sell in the marketplace. Leaping to his feet, Prabhupāda called from the veranda, "Caityaguru!" Soon the devotee in charge of grounds management appeared before Prabhupāda. "I cannot close my eyes!" Prabhupāda said. "No one else sees these things! You are being cheated!"

Every morning several Indian gentlemen would join Prabhupāda as he walked along Juhu Beach. Whenever Prabhupāda would criticize so-called great political and spiritual leaders of India, exposing their poor understanding of Bhagavad-gītā, these men would become disturbed. Similarly, Prabhupāda's disciples became disturbed to hear these men argue with Prabhupāda.

One day when Prabhupāda criticized a favorite hero, a certain doctor argued back, criticizing Prabhupāda's statement that the Absolute Truth was Kṛṣṇa, the Supreme Personality of Godhead. The doctor and others asserted that the Absolute Truth was many things and that ultimately everything was one. The devotees could barely restrain themselves, but still Prabhupāda always treated these men as his friends.

Early the next morning in his room, however, Prabhupāda told his disciples that these men were actually Māyāvādīs. "We will now have a program," he said, "where we will walk on the beach, but we will only chant Hare Kṛṣṇa. If they want to talk, we will just chant, and we will all chant only. If they wish to, they can walk with us."

"Prabhupāda," a devotee said, "they will be restless if we do that."

"Even if they don't chant," said Prabhupāda, "if they only hear, it will be beneficial for them. Māyāvādī philosophy is very dangerous. Śrī Caitanya Mahāprabhu said that whoever hears it is doomed."

A devotee asked why a Māyāvādī would disguise himself as a kṛṣṇa-bhakta. They do it, Prabhupāda said, to get popular reception for being liberal to all. But if a woman says that she is very liberal and accepts any man, that may seem to be a liberal proposal, but it is not good. "We will read the Kṛṣṇa book on the walk," Prabhupāda said. "I am walking with my disciples. If these men like, they can join and hear. But if they want to ask questions, they must accept the guru's answer without argument. Is that all right?"

The next morning, although the usual challengers did not join the walk, Prabhupāda had Girirāja read aloud from the Kṛṣṇa book. Suddenly, Prabhupāda sighted the familiar group of speculators approaching from the opposite direction. But as they drew closer, they purposely turned aside so as to avoid Prabhupāda. One of them came over, however, and, representing the entire group, informed Prabhupāda they were not going to walk with him any more; they had met and decided that their conversations with him created too much argument and criticism. "India has many saints," the man added.

"I am the policeman," Prabhupāda said, "and I have to catch the thief." After a few days, the same group rejoined Prabhupāda on his walk, and the discussions continued as before. Some of Prabhupāda's disciples remained disturbed, but Prabhupāda was jolly, correcting his friends like an older brother, teaching them pure Kṛṣṇa consciousness.

Prabhupāda would take a breakfast of fruit and nuts. Around eleven A.M. he would sit on the veranda in his gamchā while his servant massaged him with mustard oil. During the massage, Prabhupāda would often speak with one or two of his Bombay devotees, giving them pertinent instructions. After lunch he would rest an hour or two and, on arising, take a glass of fresh coconut water or sugarcane juice. In the evening he would meet guests and then around ten P.M. take rest. At one A.M. he would rise and sit at his desk, beneath a tentlike covering of mosquito netting, and dictate his translations and purports to Caitanya-caritāmṛta until time for his morning walk.

Several times a day, Prabhupāda would call for Girirāja and other Bombay managers to confer on the latest strategy in securing permission to build the temple. When Prabhupāda's Bombay friends would visit, they would often find him on the roof of the tenement, sitting on white cotton sheeting and leaning on white bolsters, preaching the philosophy of Bhagavad-gītā by the hour. He would ask his visitors to help him solidly establish Kṛṣṇa consciousness in Bombay.

One day during the massage Prabhupāda confided to his servant, "Most men are retired at my age. I do not want to manage anymore. I just want to do some writing." Prabhupāda asked if there was some place in the world he could go for six months, a place where he would be all alone, where no one would come to disturb him, and where he would not get any mail.

Prabhupāda's servant suggested Tehran. Prabhupāda considered it, then suggested New Vrindaban. He spoke of Mahatma Gandhi, who could not even sleep at night because people were always after him, even though he traveled incognito.

That very day a letter came from Bhagavān in Paris, inviting Prabhupāda to tour his ISKCON centers in Europe. Immediately Prabhupāda was enlivened at this invitation. He said he would go.

"But earlier today," his servant said, "you wanted to go away and be alone."

Prabhupāda laughed. "That will not be possible for me in this lifetime. Better I keep traveling and die on the battlefield. For a warrior, it is glorious to die on the battlefield. Is it not?"

Traveling around the world once or twice a year had become Prabhupāda's routine. In describing his own spiritual master, he had written, "Hindus are not allowed to cross the ocean, but you send your devotees overseas to preach." The injunction for Hindus not to cross the ocean was to protect them from leaving the pious land of India, since so many Indians gave up their culture when they went abroad. When Prabhupāda had been a small child, one of his uncles had suggested he one day go to London and become a lawyer, but Prabhupāda's father had protested; he did not want his son to be exposed to the sinful ways of the West. Years later Prabhupāda had gone to London, as a preacher, to change the ways of the sinful. For this reason the Vaiṣṇava should travel.

Just before starting his European tour, Prabhupāda explained to several devotees in his room that they also should travel and preach. He said they should do so while they were young, and then when they were old and matured in Kṛṣṇa consciousness, they could go to Māyāpur, retire, and simply chant Hare Kṛṣṇa. "Of course, for myself," Prabhupāda added, "I'm not so mature."

The devotees were silent a moment, but then one ventured, "But Śrīla Prabhupāda, if you say that you're not mature, then how can we ever think that we are old or mature enough to retire?" Prabhupāda smiled and said that they would have to decide for themselves. But he was not mature enough.

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami said, "Then we also will never become so mature that we can retire."

Before going to Europe, Prabhupāda responded to an invitation from his devotees in South India to attend a three-day paṇḍāl festival in Hyderabad. No sooner did he arrive at the airport in Hyderabad, however, than a group of reporters asked him for a press conference.

Prabhupāda consented, and a reporter opened with a technical philosophical question, inquiring whether Prabhupāda's philosophy was advaita or dvaita. South India was so steeped in the ancient philosophical debate between the Vaiṣṇavas and the Śāṅkarites that here an ordinary news reporter was concerned with comparative philosophies.

Prabhupāda scoffed at the question. "What is the point of discussing such things," he challenged "—whether one is dvaita or advaita? Kṛṣṇa says, annād bhavanti bhūtāni. Anna means "grains." The people have no grains. Grains are produced from the rains, and rains from sacrifice. So perform sacrifice. You have to divide the society into four orders. You may be dvaita or advaita, but you need grains."

Prabhupāda's secretary wrote to Bhagavān in Paris, keeping him informed of Prabhupāda's location and schedule.

You can contact us here until the 29th or 30th of April after which we will be back in Bombay. Your idea for festivals sounds nice. Here they had a three-day pandal. Last night about a thousand people came, sat very silently through his whole lecture, and then pressed forward to receive blessings from Śrīla Prabhupāda. Devotees had the Deities on stage and a vyasasana and lots of prasadam for the guests.

From Hyderabad Śrīla Prabhupāda flew to Tirupati. There in mountainous Tirumala stands the richest temple in India, where a Deity of Viṣṇu known as Bālajī resides.

The temple managers respectfully welcomed Śrīla Prabhupāda and his party, providing them with two cottages on the mountainside. According to the temple policy, people usually have to wait in a long line before seeing the Deity—since fifteen thousand people enter the temple daily—and they are given only a brief darśana. Non-Hindus are usually not allowed. But Śrīla Prabhupāda and his disciples received the special honor of a private darśana of Bālajī.

At the end of a long inner sanctum, its entrance guarded by two large figures of Jaya and Vijaya, the gatekeepers of Vaikuṇṭha, the Deity was enthroned. The only light in the inner sanctum came from flaming torches affixed to the walls or held by the pūjārīs. When approaching the Deity in the hallway, many pilgrims would traditionally call out, "Govinda!" But as Prabhupāda entered, he sang, "Govindam ādi-puruṣaṁ tam ahaṁ bhajāmi."

Later in his cottage Prabhupāda remarked that the millions of people going to see Bālajī were proof that the masses are still attracted to God, despite government propaganda. Although most people may go to the Lord for alleviating material distress or for getting money, still they called out the holy name, "Govinda!"

A devotee asked Prabhupāda why the Deity was called Bālajī. "Bāla jī," Prabhupāda said, "means 'child'—Kṛṣṇa as a cowherd boy, not in His Vaikuṇṭha aspect."

Prabhupāda was pleased to stay in the cottage and take the Deity's prasādam. He suggested that in New Vrindaban they build cottages like this and that ISKCON build temples like the temple of Bālajī, with its gold dome and extensive facility for visitors.

One day an official of the Tirupati temple, while visiting Prabhupāda, mentioned that their collection was about forty lakhs of rupees per month. Prabhupāda inquired how the temple's income was being spent. When the priest indicated that most of the money went for renovation of the buildings, Prabhupāda replied that temple renovation was good, but propagating the message of Kṛṣṇa all over the world was better. "Bālajī is Kṛṣṇa," Prabhupāda said. "His message should be spread. He descended as Caitanya Mahāprabhu to teach us."

Prabhupāda told the priest of how so many old churches in London were not being used. "How will the spirit of the temple be maintained without preaching?" Prabhupāda asked. The priest then boasted that they were building another temple and installing pañcopāsana (five deities recommended for worship by the impersonalist Śaṅkarācārya). Prabhupāda was surprised. "Your leader is Rāmānuja," he said. "He never recommended pañcopāsana!"

For the two days in Tirupati, Prabhupāda went three or four times daily to see the Deity of Bālajī. And whenever he went, the pūjārīs would clear the inner sanctum of all other visitors and allow him a private darśana for as long as he liked, standing in the torchlight before the mystical, bejeweled form of Bālajī.

Although in a few days Prabhupāda would be leaving for Rome, a problem now faced him and the management of his Indian projects. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami was requesting that Prabhupāda allow him to go to America; after four years of management in India, he was eager to try a different kind of preaching. His Godbrother-friend Viṣṇujana Swami had pleased Prabhupāda with his bus-touring in America and had convinced Tamāla Kṛṣṇa that this was the most opportune preaching. Śrīla Prabhupāda had accepted the proposal, although reluctantly. Certainly it would be good for the preaching in America, and it would be good for Tamāla Kṛṣṇa. But what about India? Once again Prabhupāda was faced with the fact that the only manager for ISKCON in India was himself.

Carefully he reviewed a recent report of the spending and accounts in Māyāpur. Concerned that all money be handled very carefully and spent exactly for the purpose it was intended, he had written to Jayapatāka Swami,

Money for the land must be spent for land purchase; if I send money for constructing of a kitchen it must be spent for that.

Also, if you purchase land it must be properly utilized... And if you actually produce some grains and vegetables, then where is the necessity for further money for maintenance. For maintenance we require 100 rupees per head without any risk for purchasing lands and cultivating the same. I understand there are only 20 men there at present, so utmost 2,000 rupees is necessary for maintenance. I am not competent to understand everything concerning what you plan to do, but that is my rough estimate.

You have tried to explain by long letter which I have not gone through yet. In the meantime go on the above principle: money spent must be used for that purpose intended. That will keep it very clear.

From a previous letter from Śrīla Prabhupāda, Bhavānanda and Jayapatāka had become a little despondent, thinking that they may have displeased their spiritual master. But Prabhupāda reassured them,

I know you are working hard and sincerely. I have no business to criticize but as head of the institution or your spiritual master, it is my duty to find out your faults. Even Caitanya Mahāprabhu presented Himself as faulty before His spiritual master. To remain faulty before the spiritual master is a good qualification so he is subjected to rectification. But if one thinks he is all perfect then there is no scope for rectification. Don't be sorry when I find fault. That is my primary duty. Canakya pandit says one must find fault with disciples and sons, it is good for them.

Prabhupāda also scrutinized the finances in Vṛndāvana, where Guru dāsa was president and Tejās, in Delhi, was financial supervisor. Reviewing Tejās's latest request, Prabhupāda wrote back,

I am enclosing the list of checks requested by you by Registered post except I am not sending one check for Rs 3,000 for Deity clothes to be paid to the tailor Lalit Prasad of Vrindaban. Deity paraphernalia is supposed to be collected separately by Gurudasa and Yamuna, not come out of the construction fund as you have requested. Besides, I have advised Gurudas not to pay any tailor but to make clothes by our own devotees for the deities.

Prabhupāda also found a serious inconsistency in the accounting, which he pointed out to Tejās for correction.

According to my check book, after writing the last check for Rs 17,6000.00 there is a balance of only Rs. 18,745.81. But you are indicating a balance of Rs. 100,313.64. Where is the difference? Send me a complete statement of account.

Guru dāsa and Tejās had assured Prabhupāda that the Krishna-Balaram Mandir would be ready to open by July 1974. Prabhupāda designed the invitation cards himself and asked that they be printed and sent to important persons.

The founder-acarya and the members of the International Society for Krishna Consciousness requests the pleasure of Mr. and Mrs. 's company to visit the installation ceremony of the Krishna-Balarama temple from August 8 to 10 and accept prasadam.

SPL 44: Let There Be a Temple

CHAPTER FORTY-FOUR

Let There Be a Temple

Srīla Prabhupāda's first two stops in Europe were Rome and Geneva. In both places devotees had arranged many outside speaking engagements as well as meetings with important guests in Prabhupāda's room. The Rome temple was a small house at a busy intersection near Piazza Lodi. Traffic was relentless, its noise penetrating into Prabhupāda's quarters within the temple building. "I hope the noise of the traffic doesn't bother you too much," Dhanañjaya, the temple president, apologized.

"No," Prabhupāda replied, "this sound is very pleasing. It means this is a very important part of Rome. This is a very good location."

At the Villa Borghese, in a hotel hall built to seat five hundred people, Prabhupāda spoke before a crowd of more than one thousand. Prabhupāda was pleased by the enthusiastic gathering of Italians, who behaved as if coming to receive the blessings of the Pope. They were pious, but they had not been taught properly how to engage in the Lord's service. This, he said, was the one defect. Although the devotees had arranged a meeting between Prabhupāda and the Pope, the Pope was ill, so Prabhupāda met with Cardinal Pignedoli, who was in charge of non-Christian liaisons.

In flying to Geneva, Prabhupāda and his secretaries viewed the snow-covered Alps. "This is a very dangerous spot," Prabhupāda remarked as the plane flew above the alpine peaks. "Many planes have crashed here."

In Geneva the mayor offered Prabhupāda an official reception. Everything went smoothly, according to diplomatic protocol. Afterward, the mayor asked frankly, "If everyone became like you are saying, wouldn't the economy be threatened?"

Prabhupāda said no. And he quoted the same verse he had given to press reporters in Hyderabad: annād bhavanti bhūtāni. Grains are produced by rains, which are produced by sacrifice to Viṣṇu. Prabhupāda proposed that if men cultivated their own land and kept cows, they would have no economic problems. Kṛṣṇa conscious devotees could work in all ways of life within society; in fact, they could teach how to organize society according to God conscious principles.

While returning to the temple, Prabhupāda asked, "Were my answers all right?" One of the devotees replied that he thought the mayor considered the devotees beggars. "Therefore," Prabhupāda said, "I told him about tilling the land. We are not beggars. We are giving the highest knowledge. I gave him a copy of Bhagavad-gītā, the highest knowledge. He could not give us anything. So who is the beggar?"

Prabhupāda accepted an invitation in Geneva to speak at the World Health Organization of the United Nations. He also met at the temple with Indologist Jean Hurbert and with several scientists and professors.

One of Prabhupāda's leading disciples, Karandhara, came to visit him in Geneva. Karandhara had left the movement four months before, being unable to follow strictly the four regulative principles. Up to that time he had been the leading manager of ISKCON in the United States, and Prabhupāda had depended heavily on him to deal with his Dai Nippon printers, to coordinate book distribution, and to collect funds from all the temples in the U.S. Since leaving, Karandhara had felt great remorse, had had a change of heart, and had telegraphed Prabhupāda that he wanted to come and surrender at his lotus feet once again. Śrīla Prabhupāda had welcomed him back, and Karandhara had flown immediately to Geneva.

After speaking for a few hours with Karandhara, Prabhupāda decided he would be just the man to take up the heavy responsibilities of G.B.C. of India. He should make his headquarters in Bombay and help the devotees there get the No-Objection Certificate. It was a bold move for Prabhupāda, based on trust in his disciple and on the immediate need for Kṛṣṇa conscious leadership in India. He had his secretary immediately type a letter to the leaders of the temples in Hyderabad, Bombay, Calcutta, Māyāpur, Delhi, and Vṛndāvana, authorizing Karandhara's appointment as the new Governing Body Commissioner for India. "It is a great relief for me," wrote Prabhupāda. "Please give him all cooperation and work together for advancement of our mission to make the people of India Kṛṣṇa conscious."

Twenty-five hundred people in the audience as well as fifty devotees onstage awaited Śrīla Prabhupāda's appearance at La Salle Pleyel in Paris. After kīrtana, Prabhupāda began his lecture by having a devotee read in the Bible from the Gospel of St. John: "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was God." Prabhupāda then spoke on the power of the holy name as transcendental sound.

Many persons in the crowd were student radicals, who specifically came to cause trouble. And Śrīla Prabhupāda gave an analogy that agitated them, comparing the conditioned soul's existence in the material world to a citizen's punishment for breaking the laws of the state. As soon as Prabhupāda said that disobedient citizens would be punished, the students began to boo and yell. He was speaking in English, and his disciple Jyotirmayī-devī dāsī was translating each line over the microphone. When the students began shouting, Prabhupāda turned to Jyotirmayī and asked, "What are they saying?"

"They don't like the example you have given," she replied, "because they don't like the government here."

Śrīla Prabhupāda then spoke back to the challengers, "You may not like it, but the fact of the matter is that if you break the laws you will be punished." He was speaking of the absolute law of karma, but the student radicals took it politically. They continued shouting at Prabhupāda. One man jumped up and shouted loudly in French, "You may be speaking spiritual things, but one thing I would never do is sit on a throne and demand that people bow down to my feet!" At these words the audience began applauding and whistling and chanting the words "Par terre! Par terre! Par terre!" Prabhupāda again asked for a translation. Jyotirmayī told him they were shouting, "Get down!"

Returning the challenge, Prabhupāda spoke strongly into the microphone: "I could speak to you from the floor also, but that does not mean you would understand any better. If you know the science of God consciousness, then you also can sit on the vyāsāsana, and they will bow down at your feet."

Prabhupāda's strong reply brought silence to the hall, as if his answer had satisfied the challengers. Suddenly a black man jumped up on the stage and addressed himself to the theater audience. He began by speaking in defense of Prabhupāda and the devotees, but then he began speaking against them. Finally he began speaking incoherently, and Prabhupāda turned to his disciples onstage and said, "All right, have kīrtana." The devotees rose with drums and karatālas and began a rousing kīrtana. Most of the people in attendance joined also, and the protests were drowned out.

After this tumultuous scene, while riding back to the temple, Prabhupāda said that in the future they should not give him a vyāsāsana to sit on before public audiences; in the future they should give him a simple cushion to sit on. He also doubted the value of explaining philosophy to such large audiences. For the balance of his stay in Paris he spoke to smaller groups who were actually interested to hear him.

Frankfurt

When Śrīla Prabhupāda arrived, Hamsadūta and a large group of devotees accompanied him in a procession of twenty cars and vans to the outskirts of the city to the ISKCON center, Schloss Rettershof, a castle on a hill. "My heart becomes engaddened when I hear a mṛdaṅga in a German village," Śrīla Prabhupāda said.

The devotees showed Prabhupāda the Schloss. The central room was a large ground-floor hall with a ceiling two stories high. A second-floor gallery, overlooking the hall, led to Prabhupāda's quarters. While Śrīla Prabhupāda was in his room, the assembled devotees from centers all over Germany and from Amsterdam gathered downstairs, where they held a wildly enthusiastic kīrtana. After half an hour Hamsadūta appeared at the railing and motioned to the devotees to come up to Prabhupāda's room.

Somehow the devotees managed to squeeze into Prabhupāda's quarters or to at least stand in the hallway and watch, as Prabhupāda sat, relaxed, speaking informally. "I worked hard my whole life," he said. "I never liked to sit idle. So devotional service means to be always engaged in Kṛṣṇa's service. Not like the servants in Calcutta. They get an order, and then they go to Dalhousie Park and sleep all day. Then when they come back late, the master asks them, 'Where have you been all day?' And they reply, 'I was busy working for you.' Not like that, you see?"

Prabhupāda laughed, and all the devotees also began laughing, although most of them understood very little English. Prabhupāda then quoted Lord Caitanya's prophecy that His name would be heard in every town and village. The devotees' chanting in the villages of Germany, he said, was fulfilling that prediction.

"But unfortunately," he added, "people object, just like the man who is being saved from danger." He gave the example of a man on a roof flying a kite. When another man, seeing him about to walk off the roof, called out to him, "Look out, you're in danger!" the man on the roof became angry and said, "What, you have checked my movement?" Any gentleman, Prabhupāda said, will speak out if he sees another in danger, even though the one in danger may object.

Prabhupāda's German devotees accompanied him on speaking engagements in nearby towns, and although he was not very enthusiastically received by most people, the devotees became more dedicated than ever to give their lives in the service of Prabhupāda and Kṛṣṇa. For his public engagements he sat on a small cushion, so as not to agitate the indignation of people who could not understand the tradition of the guru.

At one engagement a wealthy businessman, two of whose sons were Prabhupāda's disciples, questioned Prabhupāda. "How can a crocodile of the Nile swim in a German river? In other words, how can you transplant a foreign culture with Indian ways and dress to Germany?"

"You can become Kṛṣṇa conscious in a tie and suit," Prabhupāda replied.

"Isn't this chanting self-hypnosis?" asked another man.

"No," Prabhupāda replied staunchly, "it is purification." And so it went—mostly challenges, with a few sincere inquiries.

While Prabhupāda was in Frankfurt, two interested, distinguished visitors came to see him: a Benedictine monk, Father Emmanuel, and Baron von Durkheim, a prominent German philosopher and spiritual writer. Both men were attracted by Prabhupāda's philosophical explanations and accompanied him on his morning walks for several days.

Śrīla Prabhupāda's next stop was Australia. He had worked out a schedule whereby he would attend three Ratha-yātrā festivals in three cities: first in Melbourne, then a week later in Chicago, and two days later in San Francisco. He would then go to Los Angeles, Dallas, and New Vrindaban, timing everything for his return to Vṛndāvana by July 25 for the Krishna-Balaram Mandir opening two weeks later.

He was now regularly referring to the opening date of the Krishna-Balaram Mandir as a time when many devotees from around the world could gather at Vṛndāvana to be with him. On June 17 he had written from Germany to Jayahari in London.

I am presently traveling through Europe and in the past weeks have held many programs in Rome, Geneva, Paris and now Germany. I, therefore, have no time to carefully study and decide on your proposals. The best thing is if you can come and meet with me personally after I have finished this present tour. I am planning to go to Vrindaban for Janmastami, for the opening in stallation ceremonies of our Kṛṣṇa Balaram Temple. If you can come to see me in Vrindaban I would be glad to discuss and plan with you what is best for your devotional service engagement.

After a twenty-hour flight from Frankfurt to Australia, Prabhupāda was picked up at the Melbourne airport by devotees in a borrowed Rolls Royce. The newspaper reporters were quick to notice the car. "DIVINE GRACE COMES ROLLSING IN," read one headline. The story began, "Sixty young Hare Krishna devotees yesterday welcomed their earthly leader to the city with obeisances—but official Melbourne met him coolly."

Another story began, "A chauffeur-driven Rolls Royce will meet the founder of the materialistic-shunning Hare Krishna sect, Bhaktivedanta Swami Prabhupāda, at Tullamarine today." Another newspaper showed a large picture of Śrīla Prabhupāda smiling and bore the headline "H.D.G. IS HERE TO HOUND US." The story began,

His Divine Grace A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami Prabhupāda, the founder of the Hare Krishna movement, is here to save us from the dog's life. Unless we cultivate some spiritual knowledge, warns HDG, we are left with "the dog's mentality".

News coverage of Prabhupāda's visit didn't end with reports on his arrival at the airport. The next day, while the devotees were preparing the Ratha-yātrā carts, an extraordinary incident resulted in front-page headlines in The Herald.

Krishna sect uses canopy to save women from blazing office

MONKS from the Hare Krishna sect held the painted canvas canopy of their religious wagon as a safety net so five screaming women could jump to safety from a blazing three-story building in Melbourne yesterday.

The article was accompanied by two large pictures showing "Hare Krishnas" holding the large canvas canopy.

Although the news media was unable to understand the disciples' love for Śrīla Prabhupāda, the rescue was something everyone could relate to. Wrote a columnist in The Australian,

The fact that makes the rescue doubly impressive, was the use of a HOLY rug—not just an ordinary bedroom one—for the rescue mission. The rug was being sewn for use at a religious festival in Melbourne tomorrow.

The columnist coyly speculated whether the devotees' "holy rug" was still usable in the religious festival as a canopy for His Divine Grace A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami Prabhupāda.

You see, the Swami is not one of your ordinary swamis. He is the founder of the Hare Krishna, and the group describes him as the Lord Of The Universe. Devotee spokesmen had reported, however, that the "rug" would be used in the festival.

The incident proved to be good publicity for the festival the next day, when Lord Jagannātha, the Lord of the universe, and His pure devotee, Śrīla Prabhupāda, held a Ratha-yātrā procession through the main streets of Melbourne. Regarding media coverage, Prabhupāda had said that simply the printing of the holy names Hare Kṛṣṇa greatly benefited the readers, regardless of whether the names were mentioned in reverence or disrespect.

Amogha: Prabhupāda met Lord Jagannātha at City Square by Town Hall. There was a vyāsāsana on the cart, but he chose to walk before the carts, in front of the Deity of Lord Caitanya. Prabhupāda was wearing a gold wool cap, a peach-colored turtleneck jersey, and an effulgent silk saffron dhotī and kurtā. Around his shoulders he wore a white silk cādar, and he wore a garland of orchids and many yellow flowers. It was winter in Melbourne and quite cold, but he put his hands up and chanted and danced.

We had about eleven new mṛdaṅgas. There were also three men playing big bass drums. And we all formed a circle around Śrīla Prabhupāda. It was ecstatic, all playing drums, chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa, and Prabhupāda himself chanting in the parade, going on through the city. Prabhupāda marched with transcendental power, just taking over the city, walking right down Swanson Street.

Sabhāpati: From the point of view of weather, it wasn't a very nice day. Prabhupāda met the ratha cart at the corner of Swanson Street and Burk Street, and he led from there on. He walked about two miles. All the devotees had been having kīrtana in three different groups, but when Prabhupāda met the Ratha-yātrā procession we all gathered around him. He was leading the procession. Behind him was a fourteen-foot mūrti of Lord Caitanya, followed by three ratha carts. Every now and again in the procession Prabhupāda would stop and turn around and stare up at Lord Caitanya. He would simply stand and look up at Lord Caitanya for a minute or two, and then he would turn around again and lead the procession. It was such an ecstatic experience that one gets the feeling that Prabhupāda had conquered Melbourne, and Australia.

Gaura Gopāla: I was right next to Prabhupāda through the whole ceremony, playing the drum. He particularly liked to sing one tune through the whole time. He put his hands up in the air. He was dancing.

Vaikuṇṭhanātha: The Ratha-yātrā parade was going, and Prabhupāda was walking, and at one point he asked me, "Get me some water." I became panic-stricken because there was nowhere to get water. So I just depended on Kṛṣṇa and ran over to a house as fast as I could and asked the people for some water. They gave it, and I ran back to Śrīla Prabhupāda. When I was getting that water, though, there was this big rainbow out, and it had actually begun to rain a little bit. It was a very vivid rainbow, and the end of the rainbow came right down on top of the huge building where the Ratha-yātrā ended.

Hari-śauri: There is a huge place, the Exhibition Buildings, and we had rented one section of it where the roof was about eighty feet high. So the ratha carts were taken in with the tops lowered, and then the tops were put up again inside the hall. All three ratha carts were brought in, and the tops were pulled up. Then Śrīla Prabhupāda came in, and everyone was seated. About a thousand people were there. Śrīla Prabhupāda sat up on the vyāsāsana on the ratha cart itself and gave a lecture from there.

Sabhāpati: Although it was a cold and rather nasty day, there were a thousand people in that Exhibition Building. Prabhupāda's lecture was brief: He thanked everyone for coming along and joining in the saṅkīrtana movement of Lord Caitanya Mahāprabhu. He told everyone he was very appreciative of how they had come to see Lord Jagannātha and of how they were taking part. He said that actually all these activities of singing and dancing were due to Śrī Caitanya Mahāprabhu.

The Melbourne newspapers duly reported the Ratha-yātrā: "A day for cymbals and chants," "Chariots top the Swami." One newspaper reported, "Don't let Krishna alarm you: cleric."

The sight of the Hare Krishna youths in Melbourne streets should not alarm Australians or cause them to mock, the Rev. Gordon Powell said in Scots Church yesterday.

He said the sect could be a sign of the swing of the pendulum back to spiritual values and traditional virtues on the part of modern youth.

The article praised the devotees' "reaction against extreme materialism" and reported the events of the Ratha-yātrā parade. Reverend Powell, head bishop of the Anglican Church in Melbourne, had paid Śrīla Prabhupāda a visit, and this had resulted in the bishop's Sunday sermon comment that "Hare Krishnas" were not alarming. Śrīla Prabhupāda took the bishop's comments as very significant.

During his week's stay in Melbourne, Prabhupāda attended a large program at the Town Hall, where he inspired a long and ecstatic kīrtana, with one thousand people dancing in a circle before the Deity of Lord Caitanya. He also visited St. Pascal's Teaching College, a Franciscan seminary, and was very well received by the monks there. The seminarians asked intelligent philosophical questions, one of them inquiring about what Prabhupāda thought of their founder, Saint Francis of Assisi. The seminarian described briefly how Saint Francis saw everything in the universe in relation to God and addressed nature's creations as Brother tree, Brother bird, and so on. Saint Francis's attitude, Prabhupāda replied, was first-class God consciousness.

That same evening in his room Prabhupāda met with the vicar-general of the Roman Catholic Church in Australia, Reverend J. A. Kelly. Prabhupāda played a recording of his morning's lecture at St. Pascal's, and afterward the Reverend asked if Prabhupāda would pose with him for a picture to be printed in their religious periodical. Again, the newspapers picked it up: "Swami spreads unity message."

The normally serene cloisters of the Roman Catholic Yarra Theological Union echoed to the chants of Hare Krishna yesterday...

"It does not matter what religion you belong to as long as you love and serve God," said His Divine Grace A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami Prabhupāda.

"We must be delivered from the disease of materialism, or else there will always be want."

After the discussion, the president of the institute's Student Representative Council, Franciscan seminarian Patrick McClure, 25, said that there seemed to be a consensus in many areas.

"In particular we agree with the need to reject materialism," he said.

Mr. McClure said the informal meeting reflected an openness and tolerance in the church.

"Maybe they have something to tell us," he said.

July 1

In Melbourne Prabhupāda dictated a letter to Guru dāsa in Vṛṇ dāvana. It was less than six weeks before the scheduled opening of the Krishna-Balaram Mandir, and Śrīla Prabhupāda had not received regular reports from Vṛndāvana. He was concerned that everything be ready on time for a gorgeous ceremony.

My dear Gurudas,

Please accept my blessings. I am spending my last two days in Australia and after this I shall go to the U.S.A. In the meantime, I wish to give you some instructions regarding our Janmastami installation in Vrindaban.

The main thing is the ceremony shall be conducted by our own men. We do not have to be dependent on taking help from persons who will not even eat with us, thinking us inferior. All over the world, in Paris, New York, Australia, etc., our men and women are worshiping the deity very nicely and I am very proud of their worship. There is no reason why we have to think we are dependent on any Indian goswami in order to conduct our ceremony in Vrindaban. So you understand this and be convinced of it, and let them come as invited but we shall conduct the affair ourselves.

You can also arrange to have the Her Govinda dramatical players and our own players as well. There should be abundant prasadam for whoever comes all day long. The kitchen should go on. So see there is sufficient stock of rice, attar [flour], ghee. The life members should be especially cared for and invited. We shall manage our own affairs. If they come that is good but if not we shall manage. From our side everything should be done nicely.

All big officers in Mathura and Vrindaban should be invited. Goswamis and godbrothers also. Also invite local Marawadis and invite Parthak also. Practically by distributing a general invitation card we shall invite everyone. All the inhabitants of Vrindaban will be invited to come and see the deity and take prasadam. There should be special arrangement for life members, Mr. Birla and many other respectable visitors. There is no question of money. Let it be a firstclass, 1-A arrangement. Kṛṣṇa will provide all expenditures so try to make it gorgeous. Gorgeous means sufficient stock of prasadam and temple decorations as gorgeous as possible. The internal management of dressing can be done by Yamuna, Madira and Jayatirtha they are all expert. The shastric direction can be from Pradyumna...

Also Mr. Jai Purna of Karnapur came to see me, so invitation should be extended to him. Invite all local asramas and sannyasis as well. I do not hear of Pranava; I sent him a telegram but there is no reply.

The whole management should be done combinedly. Do not fight amongst yourselves, that is my only anxiety. I shall leave for Vrindaban by 25th July. In the meantime, reply to me at L.A.

Your ever well-wisher,

A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami

While Guru dāsa got direct instruction on the ceremony, almost every other devotee Prabhupāda wrote received his personal invitation to the Krishna-Balaram Mandir opening. In a letter to Cyavana Mahārāja in West Africa, Prabhupāda wrote,

You want to see me and I also have some important things to discuss with you, so the best thing is if we meet at the end of July in Vrindaban, India. Today I am leaving for the United States to attend Rathayatra in Chicago and San Francisco but at the end of July I will reach Vrindaban. We are having a very big festival there on Janmastami when we will open our Kṛṣṇa Balaram temple by installing the deities. So you must also attend to help in conducting the ceremonies. I will therefore see you in Vrindaban by the end of July.

Śrīla Prabhupāda's engagement at La Trobe University in Melbourne was like a repeat of the unpleasant incident with the radicals at La Salle Pleyel in Paris. It was, again, a large, free-admission audience of students, and again the disciples had prepared Prabhupāda a standard vyāsāsana. Devotees held a kīrtana onstage and introduced Śrīla Prabhupāda, who began speaking very basically about the distinction between the soul and the body and about how this education is required for all people. But after no more than ten minutes, a young man in the audience stood up and began to shout profanities at Śrīla Prabhupāda. "And how do you explain your Rolls Royce?" he added.

The audience, which had been quiet until the interruption, now became noisy and restless. Three of Śrīla Prabhupāda's more aggressive disciples left the front row and went to the back, where the man was shouting. Meanwhile Śrīla Prabhupāda stopped speaking and sat tolerantly, waiting. The shouting stopped, and he began again. "As I was explaining, in material life we have been changing from one body to another. This is not a very good condition of life. Nobody wants to die, but he is forced to die."

After five minutes, the abusive language again broke out. This time Śrīla Prabhupāda's three disciples pushed the shouters out the back door. In the fight, one of the students pulled a knife from his boot, but a devotee disarmed him.

The atmosphere inside the auditorium was tense, and many people were talking loudly. Some got up to leave. Madhudviṣa Swami, taking the microphone, pleaded with the students to remain calm and continue hearing from Śrīla Prabhupāda. Some students in the audience seemed on the verge of violence, and the devotees feared for Prabhupāda's safety. But Prabhupāda was willing to continue. He called for questions.

Student: "I am a Christian, and I would like to know what is your opinion of Jesus Christ."

Śrīla Prabhupāda: "We respect Jesus Christ as you do, because he is representative of God, son of God. We are also speaking of God, so we respect him with our greatest veneration."

Question: "You are a son of Jesus too?"

Śrīla Prabhupāda: "Yes, I am a servant of Jesus. I don't say I am Jesus."

Question: "I want to know if you have the power of Jesus?"

Śrīla Prabhupāda: "No, I have no power of Jesus."

Question: "Well, I've got the power of Jesus! [Laughter.] Because I'm a Christian."

Śrīla Prabhupāda: "That's all right. You are Christian. We are Kṛṣṇian. It is practically the same thing." (Laughter and applause.)

Student: "I have one other question. I believe Jesus is coming back, and not Kṛṣṇa. What are you guys going to do when you see Jesus?" (Laughter)

Śrīla Prabhupāda: "When he is coming, welcome. We shall welcome. It is very good news that Jesus is coming."

Student: "Jesus had no reputation. He wore sandals and was crucified between two thieves. And your spirituality is on a Rolls Royce and a padded seat, and you're all into money—you Kṛṣṇas, you want money."

Śrīla Prabhupāda: "I don't want money."

Student: "And you say violence is violence, that's what you believe. Jesus turned the other cheek, and he expected his followers to." (Applause.)

Śrīla Prabhupāda: "This Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement is not a sentimental religious system. It is science and philosophy." Prabhupāda explained that understanding the science of God was transcendental to Christianity or Hinduism. The real goal was to learn to love God.

Second student: "I have a question about Krishnamurti. Krishnamurti stresses that when you are speaking in the Western world, you should speak and present yourself as a Westerner, not as an Indian or as you would speak in India. Instead of sitting on a raised dais and dressing in the robes of a monk, Krishnamurti would say dress in Western clothes and sit on a chair. What is your opinion of this?"

Śrīla Prabhupāda: "Actually a God conscious person is neither a Westerner nor Easterner. So anywhere the devotee goes, as they receive him, he accepts. These devotees have arranged a raised seat, so I have accepted the raised seat. If they wanted me to sit down on the floor, I would have gladly accepted. I have no objection to this or that. But as devotees receive and give honor, that is good for them, because actually we should honor the Supreme Lord God and His representative. Nowadays it is different. Students are not learning to honor. But that is not actually the system. According to the Vedic system, the representative of God must be honored as God."

Another student (loudly): "Do you consider your movement the major form of enlightenment emanating from the United States today? What particular role does your movement play in the White House psychological warfare department? Will you be coming to our Fourth of July demonstration against the United States this year and take up the real political issues?"

Again many students began shouting. Madhudviṣa Swami took the microphone. "I can answer if you like. Our movement is not from the United States. If you have some paranoia that everything is coming from the United States, well, that is your hang-up, not mine. [Applause.] And second of all, our spiritual master came to the United States to start this Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement because he got a free ticket on the boat to go there. If you would have sent him a free ticket, he probably would have come to Australia first. So he is trying to spread love of God. He is not trying to start any kind of political movement. He is trying to spark a revolutionary consciousness. I think you are also interested in revolution. We are interested in revolution also. But we are interested in revolution which will help people to feel peace themselves, whether they are Communists or Marxists or whatever it is you like. We are trying to help people attain happiness whether they are—"

Madhudviṣa Swami's remarks triggered the largest vocal protest yet. The commotion rose as students all over the hall began to shout. There was no possibility of a peaceful philosophical discussion.

The devotees' greatest concern became getting Prabhupāda out of the hall unharmed. Prabhupāda rose from his vyāsāsana and, escorted by his disciples, left by a side exit. A large crowd of students had gathered outside the door as Prabhupāda emerged, but he entered his waiting car without incident. As he rode slowly through a cluster of students a girl kicked at the car with her booted foot. And as the devotees were getting into their vans students threw stones. Finally, as the devotees drove off the campus, they had to pass under an elevated walkway where some waiting students threw black paint down onto the vans.

Riding in his car, Prabhupāda was mostly silent, but he seemed disgusted. He said that in the future, he would only give lectures in classes where he was invited; no more wide-open lectures.

Śrīla Prabhupāda flew from Melbourne to Chicago, stopping overnight in Hawaii. His schedule allowed him only a couple of days in Chicago, where he would attend that city's first Ratha-yātrā festival.

He was very keen on holding Ratha-yātrās in big cities around the world. And although large crowds often could not hear Kṛṣṇa conscious philosophy without becoming restless, angered, or even violent, everyone could enjoy and benefit from a Ratha-yātrā festival. Śrīla Prabhupāda had written in The Nectar of Devotion, quoting from the Bhaviṣya Purāṇa, "A person who follows the Ratha-yātrā car when the rathas pass in front or from behind, even if born of a lowly family, will surely be elevated to the position of achieving equal opulence with Viṣṇu."

In Jagannātha Purī, India, the original home of Jagannātha worship, a Westerner could see Lord Jagannātha only during the yearly Ratha-yātrā festival, when the Deity would come out of the temple and ride on His cart. And besides, very few Westerners would actually go to Jagannātha Purī. But Śrīla Prabhupāda and his Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement were making Lord Jagannātha available to everyone by bringing the Ratha-yātrā right down the main street of their city. It may seem odd to the average American or Australian, but from the viewpoint of Lord Jagannātha and His followers, it was perfectly proper. Lord Jagannātha, "the Lord of the universe," was for everyone, everywhere, regardless of nationality or religion.

This year's festival, 1974, would mark the eighth annual San Francisco Ratha-yātrā. And now, at Prabhupāda's urging, devotees in more and more cities were beginning to hold the festival. Śrīla Prabhupāda wanted to give utmost prestige to this kind of preaching, and so he had gone out of his way to come to Chicago, where he had never been before, just to ride an hour down State Street on Lord Jagannātha's cart. Prabhupāda felt that his disciples, by holding Ratha-yātrās in cities on every continent, would defeat false religion. And spontaneously people would be attracted to Kṛṣṇa, simply by enjoying a festival of singing, dancing, feasting, and seeing the Lord.

Prabhupāda stood in downtown Chicago before the large, elaborately decorated car, eager to ascend to the seat where he would ride during the procession. But there was no ladder, so he waited while devotees ran to a hardware store and got one. Then he mounted the cart and sat on his vyāsāsana.

The city was busy with thousands of shoppers and workers. Many members of Chicago's large Indian community had turned out to receive the Lord's blessings and to observe this tradition so well known to them. And hundreds of Prabhupāda's disciples from throughout the Midwest had gathered to pull on the ropes of the cart, lead kīrtanas, and distribute prasādam and Back to Godhead magazines, as the big cart plied down one of the busiest streets in America.

Although several policemen on motorcycles led the procession, their mood was hardly that of the King of Orissa, who had traditionally led the Ratha-yātrā procession in India. Each year the king would present himself as a menial servant, leading the parade by sweeping the road before Lord Jagannātha with a gold-handled broom. The Chicago police, however, seemed intent only in getting the parade over with as soon as possible. With stern anxiety they dedicated themselves to keeping open the flow of ordinary automobile traffic. They acknowledged that the devotees had an official permit for the parade, but they continually prodded them to pull the cart faster, threatening to terminate the parade entirely.

By Kṛṣṇa's grace, however, everyone, including the Chicago police, became satisfied as the procession moved along peacefully for several miles, finally arriving at the Civic Center Plaza. Amid skyscrapers and city noise, Śrīla Prabhupāda addressed the outdoor audience. Immediately following the lecture, the devotees began prasādam distribution and kīrtana. Prabhupāda was pleased by the festival.

Thousands followed the three carts for several miles through Golden Gate Park. Śrīla Prabhupāda, riding on the second cart, beneath the deity of Subhadrā, wore the same golden wool cap he had worn in Australia, a white bulky knit sweater, and a garland of red roses. Despite his recent extensive traveling, he was alert and well. He looked out at the sea of devotees and parade-followers and took great satisfaction in the transcendental scene.

In his speech before a crowd of ten thousand, Prabhupāda said that the Americans should lead the world in propagating Kṛṣṇa consciousness. "I know that all American ladies and gentlemen here are educated and intelligent," he said, "and I am very much obliged to the Americans who have helped me make this movement popular all over the world. When Śrī Caitanya Mahāprabhu first introduced the Hare Kṛṣṇa movement, He said, bhārata-bhūmite haila manuṣya-janma/ yāra janma sārthaka kari' kara para-upakāra. He thus expressed His desire by saying that anyone who has taken birth as a human being in Bhārata-varṣa, or India, should understand the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement and spread it all over the world for the benefit of all humanity. He also predicted that in all the villages and towns of the entire world the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement will be known.

"So with the cooperation of you young Americans who are kindly helping to spread this movement, it is now factually becoming well known all over the world. I recently went to Melbourne, Australia, where we held a similar festival in which many thousands of people joined and chanted and danced with us. Then I went to Chicago, where we held the same ceremony. Now this morning I have come here, and I am so glad to see that you are also joining this movement."

Prabhupāda's fingers tapped lightly against his karatālas as he spoke, his eyes half closed. He chose his words with confidence, and those words echoed across the meadow. Prabhupāda requested his audience not to think that Kṛṣṇa consciousness was sectarian; it was meant for everyone, because the real nature of the self was spiritual. Chanting the holy name and dancing, he said, were not ordinary.

"It is open to everyone who will simply chant the mahā-mantra: Hare Kṛṣṇa, Hare Kṛṣṇa, Kṛṣṇa Kṛṣṇa, Hare Hare/ Hare Rāma, Hare Rāma, Rāma Rāma, Hare Hare. You are generally young, whereas I am an old man who may die at any moment. Therefore I request you to take this movement seriously. Understand it yourselves, and then preach it throughout your country. People outside America generally follow and imitate what America does. I am traveling all over the world, and everywhere I see other countries building skyscrapers and in other ways imitating your country. Therefore if you kindly become Kṛṣṇa conscious and chant and dance in ecstasy, in emotional love of God, the entire world will follow you. Thus the entire world can become Vaikuṇṭha, a spiritual world in which there will be no more trouble. Thank you very much."

Guru dāsa had sent a letter to all ISKCON centers inviting devotees to attend the opening of the Krishna-Balaram Mandir in Vṛndāvana. He had invited life members from Bombay and Calcutta and had reserved cars for them on the trains. Prabhupāda also was inviting his disciples to come to Vṛndāvana for Janmāṣṭamī. Lecturing before hundreds of devotees in Los Angeles, he said, "I invite all of you to come to Vṛndāvana to the opening of the Krishna-Balaram Mandir."

Prabhupāda had also mailed invitations to his Godbrothers, and when one of them, Śrīdhara Mahārāja of Navadvīpa, accepted the invitation, Śrīla Prabhupāda replied, assuring him of comfortable accommodations and suggesting the easiest way to travel from Calcutta to Vṛndāvana. Śrīla Prabhupāda also told Śrīdhara Mahārāja of his preaching.

You will be glad to know that our books are selling very nicely. Last year we sold about four million books, and this year within six months we have completed last year's quota, and therefore we can reasonably expect to double the sale of last year. The only difficulty is that we are expanded worldwide organization, and it requires very acute management to keep up the status quo. So by Krishna's grace everything is going on nicely.

Regarding preaching tour, it has become a little difficult for me because I have got the same heart trouble as you have, and still I am moving just to encourage these young boys and girls who are working on my behalf.

On July 15, only ten days before Prabhupāda's proposed arrival in Vṛndāvana, he wrote almost identical letters to his sannyāsī disciples, inviting them to come and resolve the many personal matters and items of business that had been pending during his busy tour.

I cordially invite you to attend our opening ceremony in Vrindaban because all of our sannyasis will be present there. You also come there as a regular sannyasi and take part. That is my desire.

When Karandhara, the newly-appointed G.B.C. for India, began to express doubts that everything would be ready on time, Prabhupāda replied from Los Angeles,

The festival must be gorgeously done. It should not be poor. If there is a scarcity of money, it will be supplied. There must be full prasādam for all the guests. You plan for that, and I will supply the funds. Complete prasad distribution must go on.

Regarding the temple not being finished on time, that is your responsibility. What can I do?

Although Prabhupāda had responded to Karandhara forcefully, the note of uncertainty from his head manager in India disturbed him. He wrote to Surabhi, who was in charge of the Vṛndāvana construction, "I am a little agitated in mind because Karandhara's letter says that there may be some work to be done even during the time of our festival."

While in Los Angeles, Prabhupāda also received word that the London Ratha-yātrā, scheduled for later that month, had been canceled by the local authorities; the previous year's parade, officials said, had seriously interfered with traffic. Prabhupāda insisted that the devotees protest this unreasonable ruling. "It is religious discrimination," he said. And he advised that sympathetic Indians in London approach the ambassador and request him to present the matter before the queen. The recent statements of the Reverend Powell of Melbourne could be used to demonstrate that Christians should not be alarmed by the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement. "The police objection means that the whole religious ceremony should be stopped?" Prabhupāda challenged. "What is this? Simply for some technical mistake, now they will stop our whole religious ceremony?"

Prabhupāda said that if the City continued to prohibit the parade, the devotees should erect a stationary cart in Hyde Park and hold a festival there, without a procession. "After holding our ceremony," said Prabhupāda, "we shall take the deity in a palanquin and go to Trafalgar Square. The ratha will stay. It will not move. But we shall take the deities on palanquin and go to Trafalgar Square. In this way, take police permission and, after going there along with the ceremony, protest. They cannot object. But the ratha must be seen. And the people must know that the rascal police government has stopped it."

Prabhupāda repeated his instructions several times. He was in a grave mood as he instructed his followers. "My Guru Mahārāja used to say, prāṇa āche yāñra sei hetu pracāra: one who has got life, he can preach. The dead man cannot preach. So you become with life, not like dead man. Just like all my Godbrothers, they are dead men. And therefore they are envious of my activities. They have no life. If you want to make an easygoing life, showing the Deity and then sleep, then it is a failure movement."

Prabhupāda could not bear to hear that such an important festival as Ratha-yātrā was being stopped. "We shall abide by all the rules," he said, "but we must have this festival. They saw last year that in the open sunshine thousands of people, tens of thousands of people, stood in Trafalgar Square for three hours. And they do not go to the church. So they have seen there is something. Otherwise, how people have taken so much interest?"

Brahmānanda Swami: "Yes, just like in the San Francisco paper, they admitted, 'This is the most popular festival.'"

Prabhupāda: "Yes, fifteen thousand people attended my lecture silently in San Francisco. So they are seeing there is something in the movement. But sometimes some parties do not want us to go on without objection, or else they will be finished."

On the day of Prabhupāda's departure from Los Angeles, he addressed the assembled devotees in the temple, encouraging them to remain faithful in Kṛṣṇa consciousness. And he revealed his own feelings of urgency. His constant traveling was for his disciples—so they would remain strong. And if they remained strong, following the simple programs he had given them, then their success was guaranteed. “Some way or other,” he said, “we have introduced this program in the Western countries. And you are so intelligent, you have very soon captured it. So stick to the standard. Then your life is successful. It is not at all difficult. But don't deviate. Then you are pakkā. Pakkā means ‘solid’: mām eva ye prapadyante māyām etāṁ taranti te. If you remain solid in Kṛṣṇa consciousness, then māyā cannot touch you.

“So that is my request. I am traveling all over the world. I am going to see how things are going in Dallas and New Vrindaban. So my touring is natural. I have started this movement. I want to see that it is going nicely. Don't deviate. That is my only request.” Prabhupāda began to cry and simply concluded, “Then you will remain solid. Thank you very much.”

New Vrindaban

July 18, 1974

A letter from Karandhara reached Śrīla Prabhupāda, informing him of his resignation as G.B.C. for India. The responsibilities were too great for him, for he had only recently come back to Kṛṣṇa consciousness. He would continue to follow the spiritual program, but he could not be the G.B.C. Again Śrīla Prabhupāda was set back, and before several G.B.C. men in his room at New Vrindaban he asked, “What to do? What shall we do? So maybe I should just give up these projects in India.”

“But Śrīla Prabhupāda,” the devotees replied, “those India projects are very dear to you.”

“But what can be done?” Prabhupāda asked.

Except for Guru dāsa, none of the devotees in Vṛndāvana thought that the building would be ready by the scheduled grand opening. Work was going along slowly, as usual, and except for the Deity hall area, the land was still a construction site. There were no altars, no Deities. Tejās thought Guru dāsa so feared displeasing Prabhupāda that he could not bear to admit that the building would not be ready. The date had been set, and Prabhupāda did not want excuses. “It has to be done by Janmāṣṭamī,” he wrote. “There is no question of delay.” Guru dāsa admitted that the temple construction wouldn't be completely finished by Janmāṣṭamī, but he reasoned that the opening ceremony could still take place, even if the final touches on the temple weren't done.

Because there was no regular G.B.C. secretary for India, Prabhupāda did not receive accurate reports on the Vṛndāvana temple construction. When Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami had left in April to preach in the West, several months had passed before Prabhupāda had appointed a replacement, Karandhara. Now, after only a few weeks, Karandhara had resigned. Guru dāsa's version, therefore, was the only one Prabhupāda had received. The end of July grew near, and devotees prepared to travel to Vṛndāvana—for a fiasco.

Vṛndāvana

August 4, 1974

When Prabhupāda's car pulled up at the ISKCON property in Ramanā-reti, a group of devotees greeted him with kīrtana and flowers. Some twenty-five devotees from temples around the world had already gathered for the grand opening celebration, and along with the Vṛndāvana devotees they crowded happily around Śrīla Prabhupāda. No formal walkways had been constructed, and Prabhupāda walked through the half-constructed walls, past piles of sand and bricks, making his way toward the Deity house. Even here the lack of ornamentation and finishing was apparent, and rubble lay all around.

"What is this?" Prabhupāda demanded as he toured the construction site. "There is nothing here. Where is the temple? You told me the temple was finished." Guru dāsa, Surabhi, Guṇārṇava, and others directly responsible were unable to answer. Their faces went white.

Prabhupāda was furious. "How can you open this?"

The visiting devotees also began speaking among themselves: "It's not ready. How can we open?"

"But Prabhupāda," said one devotee, "devotees from all over the world are coming."

"Stop them immediately!" Prabhupāda said. "There will be no opening!"

Prabhupāda had burst the bubble, the illusion that they would be ready for the grand opening. Prabhupāda's anger was frightening, and the devotees who surrounded him were no longer carefree and joyful. "You were going to open this temple?" Prabhupāda scoffed.

"The altar is ready," said Harikeśa, who had come from Japan to attend the opening. "We can install the Deity and—"

"You cannot open this temple!" Prabhupāda shouted. "This temple is not completed!"

Prabhupāda then walked into his house, followed by the Vṛndāvana managers and a few other leaders. Whoever could keep his distance from Prabhupāda in this mood considered himself spared. Surabhi's wife ran off to pray to Kṛṣṇa, afraid of Prabhupāda's ferocity.

In his room Prabhupāda's anger only increased. He yelled at Guru dāsa for mismanagement. He yelled at Surabhi. He yelled at all of them. No one dared to offer suggestions or excuses. There was nothing to do but turn white and become depressed. Prabhupāda suddenly inquired whether the temple could be opened, despite the mess. "Can you have the Deity rooms ready at least?" He turned to Surabhi. "This is an insult to our Society. What will people think? We have announced it everywhere!"

"Nobody actually knows about it, Śrīla Prabhupāda," Surabhi replied fearfully, exposing himself for another blast.

"Oh?" Prabhupāda somewhat changed his tone. "You have not made any propaganda about it? No invitations?"

"Not yet, Prabhupāda. Not to the people in Vṛndāvana. They do not expect it to open, because everyone who has been here can see that it is not possible to open. They know it's not ready."

"This is a farce," Prabhupāda scowled. "It is a fiasco." Disgusted, he looked at his Vṛndāvana managers. "We have to open. How can we open on Janmāṣṭamī?"

"Śrīla Prabhupāda," Surabhi said, "the doors are not ready. They are still cutting the wood." Prabhupāda inquired about the Deities from Yamunā, who explained that Their paraphernalia had been purchased but that the thrones were not ready.

"What is your opinion?" he asked her.

"I am totally unqualified to speak," Yamunā said, "and although I have no right to speak, I see it as almost impossible to actually open the temple. There is no pūjārī."

With a sense of finality and failure, Prabhupāda said, "Then we won't do it. But we have invited so many people from all around the world to come, and I was not informed of this. Now you all decide."

"When can we open?" Prabhupāda asked. "Can we open on Diwali? When is Diwali?"

"October, Śrīla Prabhupāda."

"How about Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī's appearance day?" a devotee suggested. "That's at the end of December."

Prabhupāda was silent, looking displeased. Surabhi spoke up. "It will take six months, actually seven months." Then Prabhupāda chose the day of Rāma-navamī, in April; the opening could coincide with the annual gathering of devotees in Māyāpur and Vṛndāvana.

Surabhi spoke again. He had grown pessimistic from his experiences with construction in India. "It depends on whether we can get the cement, Śrīla Prabhupāda," he said. "We have to get it from the government. That was the main obstacle preventing us from opening now. We could possibly have the opening in three months, if we could get cement."

"All right," Prabhupāda said, resigned—there was no use trying to set a date. "It will be done before next Janmāṣṭamī." His tone was sarcastic. "And if the cement can be obtained, it can be done after three months."

Later, while meeting with various individuals, Prabhupāda continued to express his displeasure, especially to Guru dāsa. He asked questions but was dissatisfied with the answers. He asked Guru dāsa to bring the financial records, and then he reprimanded him more. Finding a receipt for Guru dāsa's stay in an expensive hotel in Jaipur, Prabhupāda made an issue of it. Guru dāsa became aloof.

When Prabhupāda finished talking with him, Guru dāsa returned to his room, staying there unless Śrīla Prabhupāda called for him.

Prabhupāda began talking about changing the temple presidents in Vṛndāvana; he suggested Harikeśa. Guru dāsa and his wife, he said, could be in charge of the guesthouse, which was as yet only a hole in the ground. He called Guru dāsa again and asked what he thought of his managing the Vṛndāvana guesthouse, suggesting he go to the Jaipuria Guesthouse in Vṛndāvana for ideas about management.

"But Prabhupāda," Guru dāsa said, "they charge such low rates at the Jaipuria Guesthouse. I'm sure those rates must be subsidized."

"This Mr. Jaipuria is a Marwari businessman," Prabhupāda replied. "He's not losing money on the guesthouse. He's making money. That is the art of management. That you have to learn by going there and seeing." But Guru dāsa felt too exhausted by the austerities of living and managing in India, where Prabhupāda's attention and criticism were so demanding and intense and where everything was so difficult. He and his wife began to think of leaving Vṛndāvana.

Prabhupāda continued to pressure Surabhi, calling him in at different times of the day. "Why aren't these Deity doors up?" Prabhupāda demanded.

"I am trying, Śrīla Prabhupāda," Surabhi replied. "There are so many things to do."

"Never mind," Prabhupāda said, "you have to get it done. These hired men are all cheating you. Don't let them cheat you. It is not easy for all these devotees to collect money. It is all Kṛṣṇa's money and can only be used for Kṛṣṇa's projects. Protect that money and see it doesn't go in the hands of the wrong people. I don't want the contractors to become rich men because of our projects. And I want marble on that building. Where is the marble?"

"Where can I get marble?" Surabhi asked.

"Why are you asking me these questions?" Prabhupāda shouted. "You are the expert. I don't know. Use your intelligence."

Ultimately, Prabhupāda's anger with his disciples was incidental, the reaction due them for their foolishness. It was also a way of instructing them and testing them. But deeper was Prabhupāda's transcendental impatience and frustration that his devotional service in Vṛndāvana was still not manifested. He wanted a wonderful temple for the glory of the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement, a temple that would establish Kṛṣṇa consciousness all over the world. It was an offering to his spiritual master, and he had promised it to Kṛṣṇa. But still it was not completed.

As for Prabhupāda's disciples' failure to do the job, Prabhupāda had to take the burden and the agony of that failure. His disciples were his instruments in his service to Kṛṣṇa. If the instruments didn't work properly, then he suffered, just as when one's arms and legs fail to function, the whole body suffers. His disciples' failure to carry out his desires was his loss. In this way, he felt transcendental lamentation over their failure to open the Krishna-Balaram Mandir on Janmāṣṭamī day.

Prabhupāda's disturbance, though transcendental, was nonetheless real; it was not feigned merely for instructing. Nor could the devotees cheaply "cheer up" their spiritual master. For Prabhupāda's disciples to properly assist him, they would have to understand his transcendental mood and serve him accordingly. Prabhupāda wanted practical, down-to-earth service from his disciples. They should not expect to serve him sentimentally but should work hard. Devotional service was dynamic. Prabhupāda wanted his disciples to help him with his projects to serve his Guru Mahārāja—projects which, if successful, could save the world from misery.

Getting concrete was a big problem. Surabhi, Guṇārṇava, Tejās, and others were always meditating and striving, "How to get cement?" Yet it seemed no cement was available in the whole of India, as month after month they waited for government permission. Daily, since Prabhupāda's arrival for the so-called temple opening, the devotees had been traveling by bus and ricksha to Mathurā to see if cement—even a few bags—was available.

Sometimes they were cheated. One shipment of twenty bags had been cut with other materials, and when they used it in casting a column, it remained soft for four days and finally crumbled. When at last enough cement arrived to complete the work, the devotees felt sure it had happened only because of Śrīla Prabhupāda's presence.

Prabhupāda had Guṇārṇava count every bag of cement as it arrived. From eight in the morning until nine-thirty at night the shipment kept coming on trucks, each truck with four coolies to carry the heavy bags on their backs into the storage shed. Guṇārṇava stood outside all day with pad and pen, marking the receipt of each bag. Śrīla Prabhupāda came out of the house several times and watched gravely. In the evening, when they were finished, he called Guṇārṇava in. "So how many bags?" Prabhupāda asked, and Guṇārṇava gave the exact figure.

"Everything is locked away now?" Prabhupāda asked.

"Yes, Śrīla Prabhupāda."

Prabhupāda talked about the cement as if talking about a shipment of gold.

August 12

Prabhupāda felt very weak. It was on the afternoon of his appearance day, and he was sitting at his desk in the main room of his house. He lay down on his seat and put his head against one of the arm pillows. The following day he felt so weak he could not walk or stand. He had no appetite and ran a fever of 104 degrees. A local doctor arrived and examined Prabhupāda—malaria. He prescribed some medication, which Prabhupāda took once or twice and then refused. A second doctor came and prescribed different medicines. "Stop bringing these doctors," Prabhupāda said. "No doctor can cure me."

It was August, the monsoon season, and many devotees fell sick. When Śrutakīrti, who had recently returned to his post as Prabhupāda's personal servant, contracted malaria, Kulādri, who had come to Vṛndāvana to attend the temple opening, volunteered to assist. Then Kulādri got malaria. Other devotees became ill with malaria, jaundice, dysentery, and various digestive problems.

The weather was overcast, hot and humid, and thousands of varieties of insects began appearing. For several days at a time the sky would be cloudy, the temperature in the nineties. Then the sun would come out and steam everything up with almost intolerable heat. It was Vṛndāvana's most unhealthy season.

As Prabhupāda's condition worsened, the devotees became morose and even fearful for their spiritual master's life. They brought Prabhupāda's bed out where it was cooler, on the small patio outside his house. His servants would massage or fan him. Days passed and Prabhupāda didn't eat, except for a few grapes and some slices of orange. This was the way his father had died, he said—by not eating. Such remarks frightened Prabhupāda's disciples all the more, and they began visiting the samādhis of the Gosvāmīs to pray that Prabhupāda would be cured.

One evening Harikeśa stayed up all night near Prabhupāda's room, chanting softly a continuous kīrtana of Hare Kṛṣṇa. Prabhupāda liked it. "This kīrtana," he said, "is what actually gives us life." After that devotees took turns, so that there was always kīrtana.

Prabhupāda explained that his illness was due to the sins of the ISKCON leaders, eighty percent of whom were not strictly following the rules and regulations, he said. Even in Vṛndāvana some of the devotees weren't regularly rising at four A.M. Since Prabhupāda was speaking little, he had only briefly mentioned this cause of his illness. But brief as it was, it crushed his disciples. As for who was guilty, each disciple would have to say for himself. But in a mood of "Oh, God, what have we done?" all the disciples in Vṛndāvana immediately became very attentive to the rules and regulations.

In the morning Bhāgavatam class the devotees who lectured regularly discussed the subject as explained in Śrīla Prabhupāda's books: At the time of initiation Kṛṣṇa absolves the initiate of all karmic reactions due for past sinful acts. The spiritual master, however, as the representative of Kṛṣṇa, also shares in removing the disciple's karma. Kṛṣṇa, being infinite, can never be affected by such karma, whereas the spiritual master, although completely pure, is finite. The spiritual master, therefore, partially suffers the reactions for a disciple's sins, sometimes becoming ill. Jīva Gosvāmī warns that a spiritual master should not take too many disciples, because of the danger of accepting an overload of karma. Not only does the spiritual master accept the previous karma of the disciples, but if the disciples commit sins after initiation, then for those also the spiritual master may sometimes become ill.

Prabhupāda said that his "misdeed" was accepting so many disciples, but he had no choice for spreading Kṛṣṇa consciousness. The spiritual master sometimes suffers, he said, so that the disciples may know, "Due to our sinful activities, our spiritual master is suffering," and this always had a sobering effect on any would-be offender. But now, for the first time, Prabhupāda was specifically blaming his disciples for a serious illness. By neglecting their spiritual master's most basic instructions, they were causing him great distress. They understood that their spiritual master was no ordinary malaria victim, and they knew they had to correct their mistakes and pray to Kṛṣṇa that Prabhupāda would get better.

Prabhupāda's condition was so critical and the implications of his statements so broad that his secretary, Brahmānanda Swami, thought it best to notify the entire International Society for Krishna Consciousness. Because Prabhupāda was pleased by the twenty-four-hour kīrtana, Brahmānanda Swami thought that this program might be introduced in every ISKCON temple in the world. A few telegrams were sent, and word quickly spread that every temple should hold continuous kīrtana, petitioning Kṛṣṇa for Prabhupāda's recovery.

It reminded some of the senior disciples of 1967, when they had stayed up all night chanting and praying for Prabhupāda's recovery from an apparent heart attack. At that time Prabhupāda had encouraged them to chant a hymn to Lord Nṛsiṃhadeva and to pray, "Our master has not finished his work. Please protect him." Due to the sincere prayers of the devotees, Prabhupāda had said, Kṛṣṇa had saved his life. Now, in 1974, there were many more devotees than in 1967, and all of them were praying for Prabhupāda's recovery; but now also, from what Prabhupāda had said, there were also more devotees to misbehave and cause him pain. That message—"Eighty percent of the leaders of my disciples are not following the rules and regulations; this is why I am suffering"—was not telegraphed. It was too heavy.

Prabhupāda had come to Vṛndāvana for a celebration, but there had been none. Now he was very sick, and his servant was carrying him in his arms to and from the bathroom. Other devotees were also massaging and serving him very sincerely. And there was always kīrtana for him. Meanwhile he simply depended on Kṛṣṇa and waited to get better so that he could go on with his work.

While he tolerated his condition as the mercy of Kṛṣṇa, he suddenly received word that the governor of Uttar Pradesh was coming to visit him. The governor, a Muslim named Akbar Ali Khan, was traveling in the area, and Seth Bisenchand, a friend of Prabhupāda's and the governor's, had recommended that the governor visit the temple.

Prabhupāda thought that perhaps the governor would agree to help the devotees, at least in such matters as getting government permission for steel and cement. Therefore, despite his failing health, he insisted that the devotees hold a reception in the courtyard; and he would personally go out and greet the governor. Lying on his back and speaking in a faint voice, he ordered a feast to be cooked and tables and chairs to be arranged in the courtyard.

The devotees pleaded with Prabhupāda to allow them to do everything themselves and tell the governor that Prabhupāda was very ill. "He has come," Prabhupāda said. "I have to go out and meet him."

Śrutakīrti dressed Prabhupāda in a fresh silk dhotī. Prabhupāda tried to apply the Vaiṣṇava tilaka to his forehead, but even that was a struggle and took more than five minutes. When they were ready to go, Prabhupāda asked his servant, "Have I put on my tilaka?" He seemed almost delirious from the fever and was unable to stand. Śrutakīrti and others carried him in a chair and placed him in the middle of the courtyard, where they had arranged several tables with prasādam and Prabhupāda's books.

Just before the governor's arrival, many policemen and soldiers arrived, roping off the area, directing traffic in front of the temple, and holding people outside until the governor arrived. Guṇārṇava had rolled a long red carpet from the edge of the property into the temple courtyard, and devotees lined both sides of the carpet, chanting with karatālas and mṛdaṅgas. When the governor arrived, Surabhi presented him with a garland. Immediately removing the garland, the governor walked down the red carpet and into the courtyard. Prabhupāda stood.

The devotees were amazed to see Prabhupāda standing straight and shaking the governor's hand. Prabhupāda and the governor stood together for a while and then sat down. Except for the guests, everyone present knew that Prabhupāda was not capable of much exertion. They saw him shivering and trembling, yet trying to smile and be gracious with his guest. The devotees were in great anxiety, thinking that Prabhupāda's life might end at any moment, and yet they took part in the sociable pretense along with their spiritual master. The governor, on invitation, gave a speech, talking about how India's future lay in industry.

Then Prabhupāda stood to speak, leaning against his chair. His eyes were very dark, and he was barely able to focus his vision. Although he had spoken very little for almost two weeks, he now spoke for twenty minutes, while the governor listened politely. Afterward Prabhupāda sat and honored prasādam with the governor and his entourage of fifteen ministers. After the governor left, the devotees carried Prabhupāda back to his room, where he collapsed with a 105-degree temperature.

The political guests and military escort gone, the temple site returned to its usual quiet, and the devotees resumed their soft kīrtana, chanting by Prabhupāda's bedside. Amazed at Prabhupāda's strength and determination, they realized how little they themselves were actually putting forth in Kṛṣṇa consciousness.

After two full weeks Prabhupāda's fever finally broke. A great ordeal was now over. The monsoon was ending, but the same problems of temple construction persisted.

And so did Prabhupāda's determination. His disciples also felt determined, and they resolved to work through all the bureaucratic delays and slow labor conditions. Now no one was going to neglect spiritual regulation.

Prabhupāda spoke no more about his illness, and devotees around the world were informed of his improvement; they could stop the emergency kīrtanas and go on with work as usual. Prabhupāda also resumed his usual duties regarding the temple construction.

One thing was clear, however: Prabhupāda was completely spiritual. And the devotees working with him had engaged in a spiritual contract, a contract based on love and trust. He was taking their karma, and they had promised to follow his instructions. Now, despite his disappointment in them for their failures, that contract was still in order. If he continued to give his causeless mercy, then they could carry out his orders. Otherwise they were without spiritual strength. For Prabhupāda there was never a question of not continuing. Even when he had suffered illness on his disciples' account, he had never thought to abandon them.

After more than two weeks of not translating, Prabhupāda resumed his work. He had been working quickly on the Caitanya-caritāmṛta and was up to the discussions between Lord Caitanya and Sanātana Gosvāmī in Madhya-līlā. Taking up where he had left off, Prabhupāda again began rising early and studying the Bengali translations and commentaries. He would turn on his dictating machine and begin to speak, his voice a faint, harsh whisper. But as he continued his voice grew stronger, until by the end of an hour he was speaking normally. By the time he left Vṛndāvana he was working unusually fast, producing two tapes a day.

Bombay

From November 1974 through January 1975 Śrīla Prabhupāda stayed in Bombay. During this time he persistently but patiently tried to obtain the No-Objection Certificate, which would enable him to start construction of Rādhā-Rāsavihārī's beautiful temple. His close involvement with this project impressed Girirāja and others who were dedicating their lives to Hare Krishna Land. As Śrīla Prabhupāda had written in Bhagavad-gītā, "One has no goal in life save and except acting in Kṛṣṇa consciousness just to satisfy Kṛṣṇa. And, while working in that way, one should think of Kṛṣṇa only: "I have been appointed to discharge this particular duty by Kṛṣṇa.' While acting in such a way, one naturally has to think of Kṛṣṇa... That order of Kṛṣṇa comes through disciplic succession from the bona fide spiritual master."

To serve in a particular project, dedicating oneself to giving the local people Kṛṣṇa consciousness, was an opportunity Śrīla Prabhupāda offered every disciple. His field was the entire world, and he was like an emperor who wanted to award vast lands to loyal sons. But his awarding of lands and projects was not for material ownership (which is always illusory) but for service to the Lord. Kṛṣṇa was the proprietor of everything; therefore a preacher could remain in a particular area of Kṛṣṇa's domain and try to free the residents from the clutches of māyā. Hare Krishna Land in Bombay was one of Prabhupāda's major plans, but it was only gradually evolving, as if Kṛṣṇa first wanted to see the devotees pass many tests of obedience to Prabhupāda's order before allowing the project to manifest.

Although ISKCON owned a half-dozen tenement buildings on the Juhu land, law prohibited them from evicting any of the tenants. But no law said that the owner could not add another story onto his buildings. So Śrīla Prabhupāda had requested Mr. Sethi, a loyal life member and a construction contractor, to build rooms on the top of at least two of the tenement buildings. Eagerly, Mr. Sethi had undertaken this order and had obtained permission for the construction.

Now that the work was completed, the rooms were being used for brahmacārī quarters, offices, and book storage. At last the devotees had vacated the straw huts that had been their residence from their first days on the land. This move not only relieved them from living in nasty, rat-infested quarters, but also allowed them to tear down the huts. And demolition of the huts had been a stipulation before the city would issue the NOC.

Another major objection from the city had been that the temple's bhajana would create a nuisance, and that point had to be satisfied first and foremost. When the police saw Prabhupāda's drawing of the projected temple and hotel, they admitted that within such a big temple the kīrtana would not create as much noise as it did at present. So they agreed to accept the master plan for Hare Krishna Land and remove their objections based on "nuisance," provided ISKCON tear down the straw huts and widen the access road so the tenants could approach the back portion of the land. Each of these legal demands involved many detailed points of contention; it was like a long, drawn-out chess game. But Prabhupāda was experienced, cautious, and determined. He proposed to stay at Hare Krishna Land for several months to help Girirāja, Mr. Sethi, and the others.

Meanwhile, Prabhupāda insisted that the spiritual program at Hare Krishna Land go forward unabated. Even without a permanent temple, five to seven hundred guests were coming for the Sunday feasts. Girirāja had reported to Prabhupāda that Janmāṣṭamī in Bombay had been a great success, with several thousand people coming to see the Deities and take prasādam.

For Śrīla Prabhupāda, who was now accustomed to staying in places like New York or Los Angeles for a week or less, to stay in Bombay for a three-month period confirmed again that Hare Krishna Land was very dear to him. It was his special child. When danger threatened, he became alarmed and protective, and when success came, he was very proud and wanted to tell the world.

Prabhupāda seemed satisfied that at least some construction was always going on. He asked that Mr. Sethi build a brick wall around the property, even though parts of the wall were sometimes torn down at night by guṇḍās. "Build something," Prabhupāda said, "even if it is just one brick, but go ahead with construction." Just as when, in acquiring the Bombay property, Prabhupāda had understood the great value of possession even before attaining the deed, so with construction he insisted they go ahead, even without full permission. "The work must begin," Prabhupāda said, "whether you have got sufficient men and bricks or not. Begin even little, little, so it can be understood that we have begun."

Śrīla Prabhupāda had received word from Vṛndāvana that the newly elected governor of Uttar Pradesh, Dr. Channa Reddy, had visited the temple site. Hearing this, Prabhupāda decided to invite him for the rescheduled opening of the Krishna-Balaram Mandir.

Your Excellency:

...Tentatively the date is fixed up on Sri Ram Navami, the Birthday of Lord Ramachandra. Probably it will be the fixed up date because we are depending on the progress of the construction work. If you kindly give me your consent, we can print your Excellency's name on the invitation card as the Chief Guest and Inaugurator of the temple.

You are already our member as well as a great devotee of Lord Krishna, so we shall feel it a great privilege if you kindly agree to this proposal.

Prabhupāda followed his invitation to the governor with a letter to Surabhi in Vṛndāvana.

...Everything must be cent per cent completed by the end of March. Is the contractor cheating? That means it will never be finished. Simply we have to put money. From the photos I have seen, there is not very much progress. What to do?

I want no explanations. I want to see everything finished. If there is still doubt please tell me frankly.

Invitations were coming in for Śrīla Prabhupāda to travel to different places, and another world tour was developing. Prabhupāda wrote to Hṛdayānanda Goswami, who was inviting him to visit Mexico City and Caracas.

...Yes I want to come there very much. Now we are in Bombay trying to get permission from the government to build our temple. And it appears that we will possibly be getting the permission next week. If this works out then I will immediately be going to Honolulu and from Honolulu I can go directly to Mexico City, then Caracas, and then to Australia by the end of Jan. If the Bombay situation is not settled up I may have to stay till mid-Jan. or so and then in mid or end of Jan. I will be going to Australia to stay for one month.

By mid-January of 1975 the city finally issued the NOC. Prabhupāda was jubilant and immediately called for a cornerstone-laying ceremony. He had already held a ground-breaking and cornerstone-laying ceremony in March 1972, on first moving to the land. Nevertheless, he wanted another one, as this would actually signify the beginning of the construction of the temple. He therefore devised a festival involving all life members and friends of ISKCON in Bombay.

Śrīla Prabhupāda was ready to travel, and this time, more than ever, he impressed on his leaders in Bombay that the temple construction should go ahead without interruption. No doubt there would be new opposition from the government. But such opposition would be overcome, as in the past, by Kṛṣṇa's grace. The devotees, however, would have to be very determined. This was the reward of working for Prabhupāda in Hare Krishna Land—that one gained determination in the face of trouble and knew that by staying with one's service he was pleasing Kṛṣṇa and Kṛṣṇa's pure devotee.

During February and March of 1975, Śrīla Prabhupāda toured widely again, traveling eastward via Tokyo and Hawaii to Los Angeles. While traveling, he received word that Governor Reddy had accepted the invitation to attend the Vṛndāvana temple opening on Rāma-navamī. He also received an encouraging report from Surabhi, assuring him that this time the temple opening would definitely take place. "I am encouraged that you expect to have everything completed on time," Prabhupāda wrote. "This I want."

Prabhupāda traveled to Mexico City and Caracas. Again, in answering his mail, he was saying he would soon meet everyone in Vṛndāvana. To an Indian life member who wrote him for advice in touring foreign temples, he wrote,

By the 20th of March I will be in Calcutta and you can see me there. I shall advise you personally. You are also invited to participate in our Mayapur festival during Sri Caitanya Mahaprabhu's appearance day ceremony, as well as the opening celebration of Krishna-Balaram temple in Vrindaban on Rama-Navami day. The Governor of U.P. will also come there to participate and many other important and respectable gentlemen will also be coming. I hope you will also come with your wife and son and mother, and encourage us by taking part in the festival.

Leaving South America, Prabhupāda moved quickly, stopping in Miami, Atlanta, Dallas, and New York—all within a month of his departure from India. He then went to London, stopped in Tehran, and returned to India on March 16. It was Prabhupāda's eighth trip around the world in ten years.

Early in the morning of March 23, Śrīla Prabhupāda left the Calcutta temple for Māyāpur, traveling in a caravan of five cars. Prabhupāda was in the first car, three following cars carried his sannyāsī disciples, and the last car carried his sister, Bhavatārīṇī, and other ladies. As usual, Prabhupāda asked to stop at the mango orchard.

Daivi-śakti dāsī: They all sat around together, just like cowherd boys, Prabhupāda in the center taking his breakfast fruits. It was Ekādaśī, and I had made a cake for Prabhupāda out of dates and coconut—very fancy. When Prabhupāda opened his tiffin and saw it, he said, “Oh, what is this? Who has made this?” So Acyutānanda Swami told him I had made it, and he started eating it right away. Prabhupāda said he liked it. Then they washed their hands, and we were on our way again to Māyāpur.

For this year's festival, almost five hundred devotees from around the world had gathered, and Prabhupāda—while taking his morning walks in the nearby fields, while entering the temple of Rādhā-Mādhava, or while lecturing from the Caitanya-caritāmṛta—was the central attractive feature. Each morning after giving the class, he would circumambulate the temple room, followed by his disciples. A brass bell hung from the ceiling on either side of the Deities' altar, and Prabhupāda, while circumambulating the Deities, would go up to one of the bells and ring it several times, pulling the rope while the kīrtana continued wildly. Then, with cane in hand, he would walk around the back of the Deity altar and emerge on the other side to ring the other bell.

The devotees would jump up and down close around him, singing Hare Kṛṣṇa, Hare Kṛṣṇa, Kṛṣṇa Kṛṣṇa, Hare Hare/ Hare Rāma, Hare Rāma, Rāma Rāma, Hare Hare. Smiling with great pleasure, Prabhupāda would continue the length of the temple room, past the pictures of Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī, Gaurakīśora dāsa Bābājī, and Bhaktivinoda Ṭhākura, then come around and up the other side of the temple room to the first bell again and strongly ring it. After half a dozen such blissful circumambulations, he would leave the temple, while the kīrtana continued to roar. Coming out into the bright morning sunshine, he would walk up the broad staircase to his room.

On at least two occasions during that festival, Prabhupāda became stunned in trance while delivering the morning lecture. One time he was speaking in appreciation of the sacrifice of his disciples, who had spent so much money and come so far from their homes in America, Europe, and Australia to render service and attend the festival in Māyāpur. "You are all young," he was saying. "You have a good opportunity. But I am an old man. I have no opportunity..."

And with these words he suddenly fell completely silent. Such silence before five hundred disciples produced a feeling of suspended time. Everyone waited. Finally, one of the devotees began chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa, and Śrīla Prabhupāda returned to external consciousness, uttering, "Hare Kṛṣṇa." He told the devotees, "Have kīrtana," and went to his room.

Prabhupāda again supervised the annual meeting of his Governing Body Commission and personally approved or modified all their decisions. ISKCON was indeed growing, but as Prabhupāda had told his friend, the aged Gopala Acarya, in Madras, "Kṛṣṇa and Kṛṣṇa's institution are nondifferent. If the devotees are thinking of Kṛṣṇa's institution, they will not forget Kṛṣṇa."

By insisting on the devotees' participation in the annual India pilgrimage, Prabhupāda was solidifying the spiritual basis of ISKCON, his transcendental institution. To gather his devotees like this was the reason he had prayed and struggled to erect centers in the dhāmas. He wanted to extend the purifying shelter of Māyāpur and Vṛndāvana to all his followers, now and in the future. Bit by bit, the plan was coming together; the whole world was being saved by Lord Caitanya's movement.

Vṛndāvana

When Śrīla Prabhupāda arrived to finally conduct the Krishna-Balaram Mandir opening, he was pleasantly surprised to see the three tall domes rising over the temple. The domes had been constructed entirely during the eight months since his last visit. The four-story international guesthouse had also been completely built during his absence. Surabhi had supervised workers in day and night shifts to get everything done on time.

The tall central dome and two side domes, one over each altar, were magnificent. Their graceful form led the mind to higher thoughts and suggested an existence beyond the material world. The strength and beauty of the domes reminded one that beneath resided the Deity of the Supreme Lord. A temple was to enlighten people, to remove their nescience, and the domes eloquently spoke of this purpose. They could be seen for miles, rising boldly above the landscape of Vṛndāvana, proclaiming the worship of Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma.

Each dome was topped by a copper kalaśa consisting of three balls (representing the lower, middle, and higher planets), and at the top, the eternal Sudarśana cakra, the spinning wheel-weapon of Lord Viṣṇu. The Sudarśana cakra was Kṛṣṇa Himself, and just to see this glorious symbol atop the mandira made the devotees feel victorious and satisfied. Even the guests could not help but regard it with awe. Atop the Sudarśana cakras were copper victory flags.

As Prabhupāda toured the completed building, he continually looked up at the domes. "Oh," he said, "the domes have come out very nice. What do you think?" He turned to the devotees accompanying him.

"They are magnificent!" said Hamsadūta.

"Yes, Prabhupāda," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami, "I think that Surabhi has done a nice job."

"Yes." Prabhupāda smiled. "Everyone is telling how nice Surabhi is doing." Prabhupāda turned to Surabhi, who had gone with little sleep for weeks. "But I can't say that. Only me—I am criticizing you, because that is my job. I have to always criticize the disciple."

No less than six hundred devotees from ISKCON centers around the world had come to Vṛndāvana as part of the annual Indian pilgrimage. The high point was to be the installation of the Deities and the opening of the temple. Final preparations were going furiously—cleanups, decorations, cooking. Many important life members and guests had come and were staying in their private rooms in the forty-room guesthouse Prabhupāda's vision had finally come to pass. He had created probably the most beautiful and opulent temple in Vṛndāvana—certainly the one most alive with dynamic devotion and preaching spirit—and along with it he had built one of the best local hotels, for visitors with an eye for kṛṣṇa-bhakti.

Touring the grounds, Prabhupāda walked into the sunken courtyard, its marble floor clean and dazzling. This was no rented house in America, something built for another purpose—it was a temple, like the temples in Vaikuṇṭha described in the Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam. "It is heaven on earth," Prabhupāda said. "I think it surpasses all the temples in India."

Prabhupāda stood smiling before the tamāla tree, its venerable branches spread throughout one corner of the courtyard, and he recounted how there had been a discussion of cutting it down and he had prevented it. Tamāla trees are associated with the pastimes of Śrīmatī Rādhārāṇī and are very rare. In Vṛndāvana there were perhaps only three: one here, one at Seva-kuṅja, and one in the courtyard of the Rādhā-Dāmodara temple. That the tamāla tree was growing so luxuriantly, Prabhupāda said, indicated that the devotees were performing genuine bhakti.

Convinced that the temple was actually ready, Prabhupāda entered his residence, just between the temple and the guesthouse. Many details demanded his attention, and many visiting disciples were present.

Thus in Ramaṇa-reti, in a place where there was no temple, a pure devotee desired, "Let there be a temple, and sevā, devotional service." And what had once been an empty lot was now a place of pilgrimage. Such is the power of the desires of the pure devotee.

EPILOGUE

Śrīla Prabhupāda would often say of his devotional service in India, “Vṛndāvana is my residence, Bombay is my office, and Māyāpur is where I worship the Supreme Personality of Godhead.”

Bombay is the biggest commercial city in India. Prabhupāda's “business” was pure devotional service to Kṛṣṇa, and in Bombay he dealt more with the managerial aspects of Kṛṣṇa consciousness in India. He had incorporated ISKCON in India with the main branch in Bombay. All other branches of ISKCON in India, therefore, were legally part of the Bombay incorporation. In Bombay, Prabhupāda had cultivated more lawyers and businessmen as life members and earned more friends of his Society than in any other city in India. So whenever he was in Bombay, he often sought legal advice, not just about the Bombay center but also about his other affairs in India.

Since Bombay was a modern city with professional and office facilities on a level with many Western cities, Prabhupāda wanted to locate the Indian division of his Book Trust there, for printing Hindi translations of his books as well as English versions for the Indian market. Bombay, unlike Vṛndāvana and Māyāpur, was not a dhāma but a bustling, wealthy city. ISKCON's biggest donors lived there. Although Śrīla Prabhupāda's demeanor was entirely transcendental in Bombay, and his activities were often the same as elsewhere—speaking on Bhagavad-gītā and Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam and worshiping the Deity—nevertheless, Prabhupāda called it his office. And though it was his office, he wanted a temple there.

“Māyāpur,” Prabhupāda said, “is where I worship the Supreme Personality of Godhead.” Prabhupāda conceived of a temple to be built in Māyāpur that would be the grandest of all temples in his movement. He and his devotees would worship the Supreme Lord there in such a magnificent style that the whole world would be attracted to Prabhupāda's place of worship, the Mayapur Chandrodaya Mandir.

According to the Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, the prescribed worship for this age is saṅkīrtana, the chanting of the holy names of God. Saṅkīrtana worship emanated from Māyāpur, the original dhāma of Lord Caitanya. “In the age of Kali,” states Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, “Lord Kṛṣṇa appears in a golden form, as Lord Caitanya, and His activity is to chant Hare Kṛṣṇa. People with sufficient intelligence will worship Him in this form.” Śrīla Prabhupāda wanted to make the most wonderful worship of Caitanya Mahāprabhu in His birthplace and thus completely fulfill the predictions of the previous ācāryas, who foresaw a great Vedic city rising from the plains of Navadvīpa.

Māyāpur could also be considered Prabhupāda's place of worship because his spiritual master, Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī, had preached extensively there and because his samādhi was there. Since Śrīla Prabhupāda's entire preaching mission was in the service of his spiritual master, he worshiped his spiritual master through preaching in Māyāpur. Māyāpur was the origin and symbol of preaching Kṛṣṇa consciousness, because there Lord Caitanya and Nityānanda actually began the saṅkīrtana movement that Prabhupāda was now carrying all over the world.

Śrī Caitanya Mahāprabhu wanted to preach the saṅkīrtana movement of love of Kṛṣṇa throughout the entire world, and therefore during His presence He inspired the saṅkīrtana movement. Specifically, He sent Rūpa Gosvāmī to Vṛndāvana and Nityānanda to Bengal and personally went to South India. In this way He kindly left the task of preaching His cult in the rest of the world to the International Society for Krishna Consciousness.

Vṛndāvana is Prabhupāda's residence. Religious people in India as well as religious scholars in the West saw Prabhupāda as a Vaiṣṇava sādhu—from Vṛndāvana. When he began his preaching in New York City, he would often introduce himself as “coming from Vṛndāvana.” “Here I am now sitting in New York,” he once said, “the world's greatest city, but my heart is always hankering after that Vṛndāvana. I shall be very happy to return to my Vṛndāvana, that sacred place.”

The people of Vṛndāvana also thought of Prabhupāda as their hometown success. Upon retiring from family life in 1954, Prabhupāda had gone to live in Vṛndāvana, first at a temple near Keśi-ghāṭa and then at the Rādhā-Dāmodara temple. After taking sannyāsa in 1959, he had continued to reside in Vṛndāvana and, when not living there, to reserve his two rooms at Rādhā-Dāmodara.

Vṛndāvana is the home of Kṛṣṇa consciousness, the place of Kṛṣṇa's childhood pastimes, the place where the six Gosvāmīs, sent by Lord Caitanya, had excavated holy places, written transcendental literature, and built temples. Any devotee could feel at home there, and thousands of Vṛndāvana's residents carried bead bags, chanted Hare Kṛṣṇa, and wore the Vaiṣṇava tilaka and dress. Vṛndāvana belonged to Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa, and this was still acknowledged by the residents of the present-day Vṛndāvana.

Ultimately, Vṛndāvana is revealed only to the pure devotee. Vṛndāvana is the eternal residence of all spiritual souls in their eternal relationship with Kṛṣṇa. The Vṛndāvana in India is a transcendental replica of Goloka Vṛndāvana, the eternal planet where Kṛṣṇa resides in the spiritual world. The pure devotees aspire to attain to Goloka Vṛndāvana after finishing their life in this world, and Prabhupāda, therefore, as a pure devotee of Kṛṣṇa, naturally felt at home in Vṛndāvana. He sometimes said that if he were to become very ill, he would prefer not to go to a hospital but to simply go to Vṛndāvana and there pass his last days. To spread the glories of Vṛndāvana, Prabhupāda had left Vṛndāvana, but like a traveler away from home, he always thought of returning.

SPL 45: Please Distribute Books

CHAPTER FORTY-FIVE

Please Distribute Books

Śrīla Prabhupāda was attending the 1970 Ratha-yātrā in San Francisco. The day was cold and windy, and about ten thousand people had joined in Lord Jagannātha's procession through Golden Gate Park. Śrīla Prabhupāda had danced in the street with thousands of participants during the parade, addressed a large crowd in an auditorium by the beach, and looked on as his disciples had distributed a free vegetarian prasādam feast to thousands. But when a devotee arrived with a half-dozen advance copies of Volume One of Kṛṣṇa, the Supreme Personality of Godhead, Śrīla Prabhupāda appeared especially pleased.

Surrounded by devotees and curious festival-goers, Śrīla Prabhupāda held one of the books, admiring the front cover, with its full-color picture of Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa. The volume was big, almost seven-and-a-half by ten-and-a-half inches, and its dust jacket shone, silver with large bright red letters: "KṚṢṆA." It was a transcendental wonder in Śrīla Prabhupāda's reverent hands.

Onlookers could barely restrain themselves from pressing in against Śrīla Prabhupāda to peer over his shoulders. And they didn't restrain their exclamations when Prabhupāda smiled and opened the volume. He examined the illustrations, the print, the paper, and the binding. "Very nice," he said. He fixed his attention on a page, reading. Then he looked up and announced that this greatly valuable book, Kṛṣṇa, had just arrived and that everyone should read it. Holding one book in his hand, with the other copies stacked before him, he said that anyone who so desired should come forward and buy a copy.

People began clamoring, and hands with ten-dollar bills thrust forward, while voices cried out, begging for a copy. And Prabhupāda promptly sold every book, not even keeping one for himself.

For the devotees, Śrīla Prabhupāda's selling of the Kṛṣṇa book was the most spectacular event of the Ratha-yatra festival. They pored over the purchased books in groups, discussing Kṛṣṇa's pastimes and the effect they would have on the people of America.

Brahmānanda told how in 1967 Prabhupāda had given away his advance copy of Teachings of Lord Caitanya in his room at 26 Second Avenue in New York City. Just before that book had arrived, Śrīla Prabhupāda had been sitting and talking with Satyavrata, a disciple who had previously stopped coming to the temple due to petty quarreling with his Godbrothers. When the copy of Teachings of Lord Caitanya had arrived, Śrīla Prabhupāda had lovingly inspected it and had then offered it to Satyavrata as a gift.

Brahmānanda had been astounded to see Śrīla Prabhupāda give away his only copy of the book. Having helped publish the book, Brahmānanda knew how painstakingly Prabhupāda had written it and how he had anxiously waited one year for the book to finally see print. Yet once it had arrived, he had immediately given it away, and to a disciple who was not even in good standing. Satyavrata had taken the book, thanked Śrīla Prabhupāda, and left, never to be seen again.

Although Śrīla Prabhupāda wanted his disciples to be as eager to distribute Kṛṣṇa conscious literature as he was, none of them knew how to do it. Distributing a magazine and asking for a small donation was one thing—but a big, hardbound book? When the entire shipment of Teachings of Lord Caitanya had arrived in New York in April of 1967, the devotees had hired a truck, picked up the books at the dock, and unloaded them at 26 Second Avenue. They had then shipped them to ISKCON centers in Los Angeles, San Francisco, Boston, Montreal, and elsewhere. And there they remained.

Some devotees had tried placing ads in magazines and leaving books in book stores on consignment. But the books didn't sell. How to sell these big, hardbound books remained a mystery—until something significant happened, an accidental discovery.

One day in 1971, while driving back to the temple after chanting in downtown San Francisco, two brahmacārīs stopped at a local service station for gas. When the attendant came to the window for money, one of the devotees showed him a Kṛṣṇa book. The attendant seemed interested, and the two devotees began preaching the glories of Kṛṣṇa consciousness. When they suggested he take the book as payment for the gas, he agreed.

Astonished at what had happened and inspired at their success, the two brahmacārīs went the next day with several Kṛṣṇa books and stood in front of a grocery store. And again it happened; this time they sold two books.

Keśava, the San Francisco temple president, phoned his G.B.C. supervisor (and brother), Karandhara, in Los Angeles to tell him what had happened. "It's like a miracle!" Keśava exclaimed. Karandhara encouraged him to experiment further, and soon the San Francisco temple had half a dozen men going from door to door showing the books to people in their homes. When Buddhimanta began selling as many as five books in a day, the devotees in other temples, especially Los Angeles, San Diego, and Denver, wanted to follow his example. And whoever tried it and sold a book became caught up in a euphoric excitement.

The experience and testimonies of devotees selling Śrīla Prabhupāda's books describe a special taste, distinct from the happiness young men might ordinarily experience by stumbling upon a sales technique and finding themselves on the verge of making a lot of money. The difference is that the devotees' book distribution, being devotional service to Kṛṣṇa, produces an ecstasy that is transcendental, an ecstasy far beyond even the greatest material happiness.

Ordinary business and the business of selling Kṛṣṇa conscious literature are as different as material life from spiritual life. And anyone observing spiritual life from the material point of view will not understand it. Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī has compared such empirical attempts to understand the ecstasy of Kṛṣṇa consciousness with attempts to taste honey by licking the outside of the bottle.

The young men and women beginning to distribute books in America knew that Śrīla Prabhupāda, by giving them Kṛṣṇa consciousness, had saved them from hellish life, and they wanted to help him give Kṛṣṇa consciousness to others. And such preaching, by distributing his books, was ecstasy, spiritual ecstasy.

By mid-1971, the temples were selling hundreds of Kṛṣṇa books a week. Karandhara, Prabhupāda's Book Fund manager, began sending saṅkīrtana newsletters to the North American temples and to Śrīla Prabhupāda. By listing the monthly results of each temple's book distribution, the newsletters incited competition. Karandhara's December 1971 newsletter summed up the mood of the year and urged the devotees to increase.

Recently, in an all out program to sell books, the San Francisco Temple has been averaging 20 Krishna Books per day distribution. What is their technique? Keshava Prabhu says, "Simply we make it our priority activity. All you have to do is want to do it and then try as hard as you can. Everywhere we go, we carry BTGs and Krishna books," he says, "on street SKP, door to door, to the laundromat, to the store, everywhere." We have been taxing our brains in so many fancy and complicated ways to try to increase sales, but as it has been experienced, nothing is more successful than simply taking the books personally in hand and going door to door with this Causeless Mercy. Just consider, how many hours a day do we spend specifically trying to distribute Śrīla Prabhupāda's literature, which is the dearest thing to him?

The crowning touch to end the year's sankīrtana however, came not from the newsletter but from Prabhupāda himself, who wrote to Keśava, the “king” of Kṛṣṇa book distribution,

I have been receiving so many reports about how my disciples from the San Francisco Temple cannot be surpassed by anyone in distributing my books. Sometimes they are selling as many as 70 Krishna books daily. So if this is true, then certainly when I return to the U.S. I must come and stay in your Temple. By distributing my books profusely you are giving me great encouragement to translate. And you are all helping me to fulfill the order which Guru Maharaj gave me. So I am so much grateful to you, and I am sure Krishna will bless you a million times over for doing this work.

I hope that you and all my beloved disciples in San Francisco Temple are in strong health and jolly mood.

Copies of this letter went out to every ISKCON center. Prabhupāda had always given his blessings to all the devotees, but never before could anyone recall his saying a devotee would get Kṛṣṇa's blessings “a million times over”!

Although a letter from Prabhupāda usually instructed a specific devotee, the instruction often had universal application; and Śrīla Prabhupāda's letters made clear his disciples' top priority: book distribution.

I am very pleased to hear that you are increasing in your distribution of our books and magazines. This is a good sign that your preaching work is also strong. The more you increase your strength in preaching, the more you will go on selling books. I want especially that my books be distributed widely.

Prabhupāda's ambition was to replace mundane literature with transcendental. At least in every home there should be one piece of Kṛṣṇa conscious literature, he reasoned, because if a person read only one page, his life could be turned toward perfection. “If one percent of the readers become devotees,” he wrote, “that will change the world.” Whereas mail-order advertisers were satisfied with a five-percent response, Śrīla Prabhupāda spoke of an even smaller percentage—one percent—whom he thought could become pure devotees in response to receiving a book. Lord Kṛṣṇa also confirms this in Bhagavad-gītā: “Out of many thousands among men, one may endeavor for perfection, and of those who have achieved perfection, hardly one knows Me in truth.” To make the world Kṛṣṇa conscious, therefore, would require that millions of pieces of transcendental literature be distributed.

Śrīla Prabhupāda wanted his disciples to understand why they should distribute his books, and he instructed them through his letters.

Who God is can be summed up in only five words—Krishna is the Supreme Controller. If you become convinced of this and preach it enthusiastically, success is assured, and you will be doing the greatest service for all living entities.

He wrote to Jayādvaita,

These books and magazines are our most important propaganda weapons to defeat the ignorance of maya's army, and the more we produce such literature and sell them profusely all over the world, the more we shall deliver the world from the suicide course.

To Jagadīśa he wrote,

I am encouraged to see your report of books sold, because it proves that you consider it your responsibility to see that more and more people are reading our literature. Actually, this is the solid basis for our preaching work—no other movement has got such profuse authority for preaching. And if someone reads our Krishna conscious philosophy, he becomes convinced.

Prabhupāda continued to insist that all major Kṛṣṇa conscious programs be maintained, including Deity worship, chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa in public, and holding outside lectures. All programs were important. But book distribution, whenever possible, should accompany the other programs. To a sannyāsī whose main program was public lecturing, Prabhupāda wrote, Distribute books, as many as possible. If anyone hears some philosophy from us, that will help him. But if he purchases one book, that may turn his life. So selling books is the best preaching activity. Sell books, hold the kirtan in public places like schools and colleges, preach.

And in a letter to Bhagavān dāsa in France, he stressed the same thing: "What will your three minutes preaching do? But if they buy one book, it may turn their life."

During this period of increasing book distribution, one of Śrīla Prabhupāda's newly initiated sannyāsīs concocted the idea that the devotees should spend much more time studying. While visiting the New York temple, this sannyāsī openly advocated that devotees read Śrīla Prabhupāda's books five to eight hours daily. The temple was following a new schedule Śrīla Prabhupāda had set up, with devotees attending the morning program, going out all day for street chanting and book distribution, and returning in the evening for a class on Bhagavad-gītā. But now controversy arose, and an urgent phone call was placed to Śrīla Prabhupāda in Los Angeles. When Prabhupāda heard the details from his secretary, he immediately responded.

My reply is that this sankirtan or street chanting must go on; it is our most important program. Lord Chaitanya's movement means the sankirtan movement. You may simply take two hours for chanting sixteen rounds daily, two hours for reading congregationally, and balance of time go out for sankirtan. We must do both, reading books and distributing books, but distributing books is the main propaganda. Reading in class for two hours is sufficient, and other reading can be done in spare time if one has got it. It is not that one has to be always reading. One hour a morning for Bhāgavata class and one hour evening, either Bhagavad-gītā or Nectar of Devotion, that is sufficient.

"You should always think of new outlets for distributing my books," Śrīla Prabhupāda wrote to Jagadīśa. And new outlets the devotees found —shopping centers, malls, parking lots. They were meeting more people than ever before.

By entering the malls and shopping centers, the devotees plunged into the heart of American society, meeting pious and impious, rich and poor, black and white. Book-selling was still difficult, but the devotees persevered, carrying their heavy book bags and distributing the literature they knew could solve all problems.

The devotees saw the shoppers as so many walking victims of the material energy, people living for sensual and mental pleasure and therefore doomed to an inauspicious death. Any serious devotee could philosophically explain from Bhagavad-gītā the predicament of the materialist, but now they were directly witnessing this plight. And by Prabhupāda's mercy, they were working hard to deliver the missing essence of transcendental knowledge to the bewildered souls.

Then came the discovery of traveling from town to town to sell books. Some of the brahmacārīs in Los Angeles had been feeling that by staying in the temple they were wasting time they could be using for book distribution. So they loaded a van with Kṛṣṇa books and went to areas where they could camp for a week, live a simpler life, and distribute books as many hours a day as they liked. This "traveling saṅkīrtana" produced another significant increase by creating an environment wherein the men could become fully absorbed in their work. The new program spread quickly throughout the ISKCON world, and Śrīla Prabhupāda liked it.

I am very glad to hear from you the wonderful news of traveling party in England. I think the people of that place are becoming more and more inclined for this Krishna Consciousness movement. They are inviting you to stay at their houses, they are taking books, becoming sometimes devotees—all of these are very encouraging signs to me. Simply go on in this way, stopping in every village and city in England, Scotland, or if there are other places, like Ireland. Simply stop for some time, distribute books and hold Sankirtan procession, answer their questions, give some leaflets or small informations freely, distribute prasadam wherever possible, at least some small thing, and if there is some genuine interest being shown, then request the townspeople to arrange some engagements for speaking in their schools or in someone's home or a hall, like that. In this way remain always without anxiety for destination and comfortable situations, always relying only on the mercy of Krishna for your plan. Just go on preaching His message and selling His books wherever there is interest. We shall not waste time if there is no interest or if people are unfriendly; there are so many places to go.

Śrīla Prabhupāda began saying that opening new centers was less important now that the traveling parties were combing the country. When he heard that the temple president in Vancouver had acquired a bus for traveling, he wrote,

I think we are becoming like a gigantic guerilla warfare movement fighting with maya. This traveling in buses is the best means to drive away maya and establish Krishna Consciousness all over the world.

Prabhupāda was glad to hear that temple presidents and zonal leaders were also going out with the traveling saṅkīrtana parties. The Vedic concept of the commander, he said, is that he must fight in the front lines, not sit behind the scenes, sheltered. Having already witnessed how some of his leading disciples had become bogged down by managing many things, he advised them all to travel and preach, distributing literature wherever they went.

Practically, this ISKCON organization is there because I have been always traveling. I never sat down in my old age, no. So you follow my example and preach widely all over the world. That is Chaitanya Mahāprabhu's version.

When a devotee in California wrote Śrīla Prabhupāda for permission to give up married life and go on traveling saṅkīrtana, Prabhupāda replied that to give up family life was not necessary. Lord Caitanya had taught that being a sannyāsī or a gr̥hastha did not matter as long as one fully served Kṛṣṇa. A householder could also sometimes travel and distribute books, with or without his wife.

Near the end of 1972, the BBT newsletter, now compiled by Karandhara's assistant, Rāmeśvara, reported the ever-increasing results of book distribution.

Book Distribution continues soaring to all-time highs, as more than 25 Traveling SKP Parties roam the countryside, affecting the lives of hundreds of thousands of conditioned souls! Since mid-September we have distributed over 15,000 complete KRSNA TRILOGY SETS! And since mid-August we have distributed over 9,000 SOFT BHAGAVAD GITAS and over 950 HARD BHAGAVAD GITAS! Macmillan too has completely sold out (20,000 GITAS sold commercially) and is reprinting large quantities for the Christmas rush!

Another breakthrough for book distribution came at the end of 1972. The previous year devotees had taken advantage of the Christmas season by selling the Kṛṣṇa book door to door, but no one had been aware just how significant the Christmas season could actually be.

Rāmeśvara: It was on December 22, 1972, that we accidentally discovered the Christmas marathon in Los Angeles. Of course, we noticed a great increase in the number of people going into the stores, and the stores were staying open sometimes until midnight. I was standing in front of a Burbank Zody's. We were having an intense competition with prizes in Los Angeles, and it was building up to a feverish pitch.

So after distributing madly all day long, I had collected about $350 and had distributed 650 magazines. It was about ten o'clock at night. I was convinced this was the new world's record in ISKCON and that nobody was possibly going to beat me this day. Even though the store was open until twelve, business had started slowing off; and I was thinking, "Maybe I should go back. Undoubtedly everyone is back already. No one has ever stayed out past eight o'clock. They'll all be waiting up for me. I shouldn't keep them waiting up." So in this way my mind was convincing me to go back.

By eleven o'clock the store was completely dead. I got in the car and started driving back. On the way back I passed another Zody's, called Hollywood Zody's, on Sunset and Western. I was torn whether to stop or not, because that store was crowded and was going to be open until midnight. But I decided, "No, I'll go back, because the other devotees will be waiting up to see how many books I distributed." So I just kept driving.

I finally arrived at the temple at about ten minutes to twelve, and I burst into the saṅkīrtana room. But the only person there was the secretary, Madhukāṇṭha. I said, "Oh, no. Everyone went to bed?" He said, "No, nobody is back yet." I was the first one back! That was the discovery of the first Christmas marathon. It was completely unplanned. No one had ever instructed anyone to stay out that late. We just did it spontaneously.

Finally, at about one-thirty in the morning, all the devotees had returned, and we were all sitting around looking at the saṅkīrtana map. We couldn't sleep, we were so excited to go out. We were thinking, "Where can we find plenty of conditioned souls to distribute books to?" Our noise and raucous laughter was like a drunken party, and it woke up Karandhara, who was sleeping in his office in the next room. He came stumbling in, wiping the sleep from his eyes, but when he saw us and saw what was going on, he burst out laughing and sent us all to bed, saying, "Get ready for tomorrow." So in this way we performed the three-day marathon—December 22, 23, and 24.

No one had ever distributed as many books before in the history of our movement. A big day had been considered to be somewhere between twenty-five and forty books. But we were distributing between five thousand and six thousand pieces of literature a day for a three-day period. One temple had distributed almost eighteen thousand pieces of literature in just three days.

At this time Śrīla Prabhupāda was in Bombay, where his attempt to secure the land in Juhu had become entangling. The landlord was now refusing to sell the property and was trying to evict the devotees, even though Śrīla Prabhupāda had already installed Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa Deities on the land. Although these matters were causing Śrīla Prabhupāda anxiety, he continued his usual daily duties: taking his morning walk, lecturing in the evening from The Nectar of Devotion, corresponding with and receiving news from his centers around the world, even organizing a Bombay paṇḍāl festival for January.

When Prabhupāda received news of the book distribution in Los Angeles and elsewhere in the United States, he was very pleased and amazed. Although involved with many affairs from throughout the world, he put them aside and relished the overwhelming victory of book distribution in America. Immediately he called in his personal secretary and dictated letters.

My dear Ramesvar,

I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter dated December 27, 1972, and with great happiness I have read your figures of amount of books sold during three-day period, December 22-24, 1972. It is scarcely believable that more than 17,000 books could have been sold by one temple in three days! That indicates to me that people are at last becoming little serious about this Krishna Consciousness movement in your country. Otherwise, why they should buy our books? But they can see that our boys and girls, devotees, are so much sincere and serious to distribute the message of Krishna Consciousness, they are at once struck, by seeing them, and therefore they appreciate and purchase. This is unique in the world. So I am so much pleased upon all of the boys and girls in Los Angeles and all over the world who are understanding and appreciating this unique quality of our transcendental literature, and voluntarily they are going out to distribute despite all circumstances of difficulty. By this effort alone they are assured to go back to home, back to Godhead.

The same day Prabhupāda dictated a letter to Karandhara.

I could never have thought it was possible to distribute so many of our literatures. Therefore I can understand it is simply Krishna's blessing us for your sincerely working on His behalf. Actually, that is the secret of my success, not that personally I have done anything wonderful, but that because those who are helping me are sincere. They have done the work. That is the reason for our success all over the world where others have failed. A little sincerity is very difficult thing in this age of hypocrisy and bluff, but I am so fortunate that Krishna has sent me all of you nice boys and girls who are sincerely working. Please convey to all of them my deepest appreciation.

Śrīla Prabhupāda's letters acknowledging the Christmas marathon and assuring the devotees that they would go back to Godhead sent the book distribution movement flying into the new year with great momentum. Devotees continued to find new ways and places to distribute books. New records were constantly topping the old, and the devotees were making still higher projections for the future.

Rāmeśvara published in his February 1973 newsletter a letter from a college student who had read one of Śrīla Prabhupāda's books. ISKCON'S mail-order office was receiving hundreds of such letters a month.

Sir:

A couple of weeks ago, devotees of Krishna (from Denver, I understand) were here at the University of Arkansas distributing literature. One young man approached me with a "hard pitch" for my purchasing a copy of the Prabhupāda translation of the Bhagavad-gītā; I was initially quite skeptical (so many people are getting rich from selling their versions of "the answer") and told him to not bother me. He insisted, though, and I finally gave in.

I have been reading the Gītā, having not finished it yet, and have found it quite rewarding; my mind, shaped in logic and empiricism, seems to find itself barely tasting the transcendental material in the book; I discuss it with others; I find myself remembering certain passages...

It has genuinely stimulated my interest, to say the least, in a way that my quite extensive readings in Christianity, Zen Buddhism, the "lower" forms of yoga, etc. have never succeeded in doing.

In short, I think I have finally found the beginning.

Rāmeśvara went on to beat the drum of saṅkīrtana.

Actually no one can properly measure the effect of our book distribution. If it was known how many books we distribute each month we would be listed on every best-seller list in the country! For example, as many of you know, already the new GITA has outsold any other edition of the GITA ever printed. The Macmillan Company has already sold tens of thousands of copies, while we have sold over 27,000 copies ourselves since they first appeared last August.

With increased monies coming into the Book Fund, Śrīla Prabhupāda had approved his trustees' plans to print larger quantities of books and store them in a warehouse, making them available to the temples for distribution throughout the year. Yet keeping up with the temples' demand for books was still difficult, even with a warehouse.

Small, easy-to-sell books like Beyond Birth and Death, On the Way to Kṛṣṇa, Rāja-vidyā, and The Perfection of Yoga were printed in the tens of thousands. Distributors would go out, carrying in their book bags a variety of books: Śrī Īsopaniṣad, Bhagavad-gītā, Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, and Kṛṣṇa, the Supreme Personality of Godhead, as well as an assortment of small books, Back to Godhead magazines, and some inexpensive booklets like Kṛṣṇa, The Reservoir of Pleasure and On Chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa.

Tom Beaudry was living with his wife in Santa Cruz, California. After attending a festival in Berkeley celebrating Lord Caitanya's appearance, where he chanted all day, and after reading Śrīla Prabhupāda's Bhagavad-gītā, he felt he should become Śrīla Prabhupāda's disciple. He began chanting and trying to interest his wife and friends in Kṛṣṇa consciousness. When a traveling party of brahmacārīs arrived to start a center in Santa Cruz, he told them he wanted to join. But they were skeptical. Then one day he showed up with a shaved head and dhotī.

Tom Beaudry: I began going out every day with the chanting party. Then gradually I began to break away from the kīrtana party to sell small books in shopping centers. One day I came back and one of the brahmacārīs, Sarvabhauma, criticized me. He asked me how many big books I had sold. I said, "I didn't sell any." He said, "How many did you bring with you?" I said, "I didn't have any to bring with me." "Then you're in māyā," he said. "You didn't bring any big books? How do you expect to sell them? Prabhupāda wants these big books sold." So I thought to myself, "Gee, I must be in māyā." I said, "How do you sell these books?" He said, "You pray to Prabhupāda. Prabhupāda gives you the mercy." So I thought, "Well, that makes sense. That's how everything works in Kṛṣṇa consciousness."

I went to my house. I thought about it and prayed to Prabhupāda that I could sell these big books. I prayed all evening and then took rest. In the morning I got up, and it was on my mind. So I put out one big book, Teachings of Lord Chaitanya, in my bag of small books. But in the course of selling the small books, I forgot about the big book.

Suddenly a lady came up to me and said, "What is that big book you have there?" Then I remembered Prabhupāda and my prayers, and I said, "This is the Teachings of Lord Chaitanya." I gave her the book, and she gave me three dollars. When I got back to the temple, I told the devotees how Prabhupāda had sold a book.

Praghoṣa: I was coming regularly to the Detroit temple for classes in the evening, and I was doing some odd work to help the devotees prepare the temple. Every night I would be painting, and I would watch the devotees coming back from saṅkīrtana. They seemed very ecstatic and enlivened, and I was always a little curious about what they did out there that made them come back like this. I would be up on my ladder, painting and listening to them talk as they sat on the floor drinking hot milk. They would talk about how they had knocked on one man's door and this had happened and then that had happened—it was very attractive to me.

After I moved into the temple and had been a devotee about a week, someone asked me if I would like to go out and try distributing books. So I went out, wearing a dhotī and tilaka and using a straightforward presentation, walking up to people, giving them a card and a book, telling them about the contents of the book, showing them Prabhupāda's picture, and asking for a donation. The exhilaration I got from that was just incredible. It became extremely blissful to go out and do this. None of us could actually put a finger on why it was so ecstatic.

We used to lie awake at night. All the brahmacārīs stayed in one big room, and we would lie there on the floor in our sleeping bags, whispering to each other: "What did you say to the people out there?" There would be all these different conversations going on in the room at night, with the lights out and everyone talking, trying to relate how we were presenting Prabhupāda's books.

Jagaddhātṛī-devī dasī: My first service was cleaning the temple. I was cleaning the whole temple. I would be looking out the window at the men piling into the vans getting ready for saṅkīrtana, and I would always think that I would really like to be doing that. Finally our temple formed two traveling parties, one of men and one of women, and we went for the summer to distribute books in the fairs of Washington state. The men and the ladies used to have competition to see who could distribute the most.

Sura: I joined Kṛṣṇa consciousness in Seattle in 1973, and they sent me out on book distribution my first day. We would always hear from Los Angeles about the letters Prabhupāda was sending. Everything we heard was centered on Prabhupāda's desire for his books to be distributed. It was by hearing this that newer devotees wanted to go out and be part of the saṅkīrtana party. We wanted to be soldiers for Prabhupāda's book distribution army.

We went to the Spokane Fair, and the leader of the Spokane temple wrote a letter to Śrīla Prabhupāda requesting him to come and telling him the results of our book distribution. Then we received a reply from Prabhupāda saying that he couldn't make it but that the devotees should go to the fair and preach on his behalf. "Fulfill my mission," Prabhupāda said, "that every man and woman in the United States gets a book." That was just what we were waiting for—to get an order directly from Śrīla Prabhupāda that this was what pleases him. Our book distribution kept increasing, and we just thought we'd never had so much fun before. It wasn't like austerity. Some of the devotees were thinking, "Well, it's really hard to go on saṅkīrtana." We were thinking, "You must be nuts! It's the most fun thing you can do to go on saṅkīrtana and sell books." It was fun, not for sense gratification but for the soul, because of our being linked in service to our spiritual master and Kṛṣṇa. I appreciated it in that way. And when I first met Praghōṣa, I could see he was really dedicated and a true lover of Prabhupāda, because he was so dedicated to pleasing Prabhupāda by distributing books.

Praghōṣa: We were distributing in Santa Barbara, California. The area had been worked many times before, and the people were really puffed up. I went there with a couple of brahmacārīs. One day, after trying to distribute for about seven hours, I had only sold one book. I had never before had anything like that happen to me in my whole time as a devotee. I was really working. I never stopped. At one particular point I just couldn't take it any more. I tried to give a book to someone, and they just cracked off to me in a really obnoxious way. I had so much desire, I was trying so hard, that when he did this it just devastated me. I just wanted to punch the guy in the nose. All my intensity came out, and I erupted into tears. I just sat down on an old telephone pole that was lying by the street and started to cry.

Then this devotee walked up and found me sitting there like I had just lost my best friend. He said, "Prabhu, what's the matter?" I said, "I don't know what's the matter. I just can't distribute books. Not one person will take a book. I've been out here for seven hours. Do you know how many books I've distributed? One book." Then he sat down and preached to me and put me back together.

The next day I was really trying to have a better day, and I took my book bag and just ran from one person to another all morning. Then I was showing a book to a girl, and she said she couldn't pay me with money but that she would gladly pay me. I was young and naive, and I didn't know exactly what she was talking about for a minute. Then finally when I realized, I called, "Hare Kṛṣṇa!" and took the book back from her, took off my wig and just bolted to another parking lot. I ran from person to person all day, praying real hard to Kṛṣṇa. By the end of the day I had distributed a large number of books.

Lavaṅga-latikā-devī dāsī: When I first came to Los Angeles, Śrīmatī told me that Śrīla Prabhupāda had said that being in the temple all the time was māyā. Prabhupāda wanted us to go out and distribute BTGs door to door. I learned from the other devotees how to distribute books. There were so many experienced devotees who knew how, so I just followed in their footsteps. I would say what they'd say and do what they'd do. Then it became easy. When a person took a book and gave a donation, I could see it was Lord Caitanya acting. I could see that everything was working under the direction of Kṛṣṇa's internal energy.

Tom Beaudry had moved from Santa Cruz to Los Angeles, and by associating with devotees like Rāmeśvara and other book distributors, he soon became a leader. He was initiated in June 1972 and received the name Tripurāri dāsa. Every day he would go to a supermarket parking lot near the temple and sell a couple hundred copies of Easy Journey to Other Planets. One evening at the University of California at Long Beach, he and a few other book distributors dropped in on a lecture given by a popular yoga leader.

Rāmeśvara: I remember when they came back. It was the middle of Bhagavad-gītā class, and I was giving the class in the temple room. All of a sudden the door burst open, and they were standing there. Tripurāri was in his street clothes, and the girls were in their sārīs. They just ran into the temple. You could see that something very special had taken place, because their faces were glowing. They couldn't even speak. They were dazed or stunned. The whole temple was anxious to hear the news, so I quickly finished the class. Then Tripurāri told us that he had just distributed seventeen Bhagavad-gītās—the full, hardbound, unabridged Bhagavad-gītās—in two hours. Līlāśakti had distributed thirteen, Vṛndāvana had distributed eleven, Tilaka had distributed eleven, and Makhana Lāl had distributed nine. Nothing like this had ever been done before. We were all completely astonished that anyone could sell so many big books like that.

One morning a few days later, Tripurāri was driving down the San Diego Freeway to go on traveling saṅkīrtana when he saw the sign for the Los Angeles airport and spontaneously decided to try it. After selling a dozen big books that day, he realized the airport was wonderful for book distribution. He started going out regularly to the airport and was soon distributing thirty to forty books a day, sometimes giving individuals as many as six volumes of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam at once.

Śrīla Prabhupāda flew from New York to Los Angeles, and a crowd of loving devotees greeted him.

Tripurāri: Prabhupāda was arriving at two in the afternoon, and all the devotees were going to meet him. But it was also Easter weekend and a big day for book distribution at the airport. At that time I was the only one working the airport. I was doing rather well and had sold about thirty books by one-thirty. Then I changed into my dhoti and walked over to the arrivals area to meet His Divine Grace. When he entered the terminal building, he looked at me and smiled, and I melted in ecstasy.

We had kīrtana all the way down the stairs, and when we got outside, all the devotees were going back to the temple. Then I thought, "What business do I have going back to the temple and chanting with all the devotees? My business is to stay out and distribute the books. That is my service to Prabhupāda." So I was the only one who didn't return to the temple. I stayed and distributed sixty-seven books. When I got back, I found that Karandhara had told Prabhupāda about me and how I had been distributing books. When I heard that, I became very enthusiastic and continued to distribute books every day that week.

In Los Angeles Śrīla Prabhupāda took his morning walks either at the shore of the Pacific Ocean or in Cheviot Hills Park. Every morning a few disciples would join him, as well as Thoudam Singh, a Ph.D. candidate in organic chemistry at the University of California. Śrīla Prabhupāda would regularly discuss with Dr. Singh the scientific theory of life's originating from matter. Day after day, Prabhupāda would expose Darwin's theory as foolish and unscientific.

The sun would just be appearing on the horizon as Prabhupāda and a small group of disciples walked. The air would be chilly, and Śrīla Prabhupāda would wear his hooded saffron overcoat, while his disciples, wearing sweaters or wool cādars, followed him, listening and asking questions.

Most of the conversation, however, would be between Prabhupāda and Dr. Singh, who played the role of a materialistic scientist. Dr. Singh would present atheistic arguments, and Śrīla Prabhupāda would defeat them with scripture and logic. "I say to the scientists," Prabhupāda said, "if life originated from chemicals, and if your science is so advanced, then why can't you create life biochemically in your laboratories?"

On one of these morning walks, the older devotees introduced Rāmeśvara to Prabhupāda, and at the devotees' request, Rāmeśvara began telling Śrīla Prabhupāda about book distribution. He mentioned that sometimes the distributors would meet impersonalists and convince them to buy a copy of Bhagavad-gītā As It Is.

Śrīla Prabhupāda stopped and turned gravely to Rāmeśvara. "What do you say to them?" he asked.

Rāmeśvara told Prabhupāda some of his techniques for selling a book.

After a few moments Prabhupāda said, "Our men need to study our books also."

On the morning Tripurāri accompanied Prabhupāda on his walk, Prabhupāda said little as they walked up and down the beach. Only when they were walking back toward the car did one of the devotees mention, "Prabhupāda, Tripurāri is here."

Prabhupāda turned and smiled. "Ah. How is the book distribution going?" he asked.

This was Tripurāri's first time to speak directly with his spiritual master, and he wanted to say many things at once. In nervous enthusiasm he began blurting out his realizations. Prabhupāda interrupted, "This is the best service for humanity." And he quoted from the Bhagavad-gītā, "There will never be a devotee more dear to Me than he who preaches this message."

With the exception of Rāmeśvara's and Tripurāri's brief encounters with Prabhupāda, none of the book distributors in Los Angeles had any personal exchanges or meetings with their spiritual master. But the closeness of their relationship with him was not dependent on physical proximity.

Tripurāri: My association with Śrīla Prabhupāda was always more or less in separation and in the field. While many of the older devotees were trained personally by Prabhupāda, I never got that training. I was trained by Śrīla Prabhupāda more from within my own heart. I think that's the case with all of our book distributors. They have a very intimate sense of feeling for Prabhupāda, but they never had much personal contact. Their intimacy and real sense of knowing Prabhupāda very closely was because of that service which Prabhupāda said was his life and soul—seeing that the books went out.

Śrīla Prabhupāda liked to sit in his garden, with its roses, jasmine, azaleas, honeysuckle, mint, silver lace vine, marigolds, and banana trees, and he liked the sound of the fountain. The small compound, with its lawn, flowers, bushes, and seat for Śrīla Prabhupāda, was surrounded by high cinder-block walls. When Prabhupāda received special guests, the devotees would bring chairs for them, but Prabhupāda's disciples would always sit on thin mats on the lawn and look up at Śrīla Prabhupāda on his elevated seat. The neighborhood was quieter and more peaceful in the evening, and Prabhupāda could hear the kīrtana in the temple and the cars passing along Venice Boulevard. Men's shouts from the nearby karate school were a disturbance Prabhupāda had come to tolerate.

For an hour or more Prabhupāda would sit, listening to a reading from Kṛṣṇa, the Supreme Personality of Godhead, while around him on the grass, sharing the transcendental moment, sat his disciples. Prabhupāda was fully satisfied to hear Kṛṣṇa līlā, and he would sit erect, head held high, in a meditative mood. It was only an informal group, but his presence made the occasion very special, momentous. From time to time he would interrupt the reader to comment. Night would fall, and he would end the reading and leave the garden, walking on the gravel path past the main temple building and up to his second floor suite.

Śrīla Prabhupāda so much liked his Los Angeles garden that he decided he wanted one like it at his Māyāpur headquarters.

With regard to the Māyāpur house, I may suggest you make one roof garden. On the top of the house you can put soil of six inches and then plant so many tulasi plants and nice bushes. I like the garden very much. Just like here in Los Angeles temple they have made one very nice garden for me and I sit there every evening. So you please also make a first-class Māyāpur garden.

At about ten in the evening Śrīla Prabhupāda would usually go into his bedroom and lie down. His servant, Śrutakīrti, would massage his legs, and Prabhupāda would then close his eyes. Meanwhile, Rāmeśvara would be waiting at the bottom of the stairs, hoping that the secretary or servant would come down with a message from Prabhupāda.

Rāmeśvara: I was too afraid to go into Śrīla Prabhupāda's room, so I would be waiting at the bottom of the stairs, just hanging there, just waiting for one word. Śrīla Prabhupāda would often say something, and it would be passed to me. Then every morning the saṅkīrtana devotees would just surround me and ask, "What did he say?" They would be begging for some nectar. It was an intense experience. We felt that we were all having a special direct connection with Prabhupāda.

While waiting outside Prabhupāda's door, I would be in transcendental bliss just thinking how we were distributing books as an offering of pure love for our spiritual master. This was the first time that devotees were going to the airports. No one else in the movement was going to an airport except the devotees in Los Angeles, so it was something very special. No one was doing big books in the quantity that we were.

At one point, when Śrīla Prabhupāda saw one of my daily saṅkīrtana reports, he commented, "Who is Rāmeśvara?"

Day after day, Śrīla Prabhupāda was seeing these ecstatic reports, sprinkled with nectarean quotes from his Caitanya-caritāmṛta Ādi-līlā chapter that had just been published. He realized that these disciples were in ecstasy, and so he asked, "Who are they?" He could see we loved saṅkīrtana. It was not an artificial burden or that we were struggling. He could see that there didn't seem to be any struggle. It was like fun, bliss, ecstasy. And the whole philosophy was there. We were completely tuning in to the Caitanya-caritāmṛta philosophy that Lord Caitanya descends with His confidential associates to spread love of God but doesn't discriminate who is a fit candidate and who is not. These were the verses we were putting into the daily letter. This was our mood, and Prabhupāda loved it.

From Śrutakīrti's point of view, the evening massage was a very special time, because Śrīla Prabhupāda seemed free of the pressure of the day's management. Śrutakīrti would bring several night-blooming jasmine flowers from the garden, and Prabhupāda would place the fragrant blossoms near his nose during the massage. He would be even quieter and more relaxed than during the Kṛṣṇa book reading. There was no business to attend to; he had done a hard day's work. Although he would be rising after only three hours' rest, he now lay back, enwrapped in thought or chanting softly.

Some evenings Śrīla Prabhupāda would delay the massage and slowly walk back and forth in his bedroom, chanting on his beads, or he would sit on his bed and chant. But on most nights he would lie on his back, while Śrutakīrti massaged his legs. If he conversed with his servant at all, it wouldn't be about ISKCON management. He might look at a picture on the wall and say, "How beautiful Kṛṣṇa is! How could they not be attracted to Kṛṣṇa?" Or sometimes he would talk about his childhood and other informal topics. But even at this relaxed time, he relished hearing the saṅkīrtana results, and so he would sometimes read Rāmeśvara's daily report or simply say something about preaching Kṛṣṇa consciousness.

One night, after reading Rāmeśvara's ecstatic daily saṅkīrtana report, Prabhupāda felt moved to write a message on the back of the report. Dating the paper April 20, 1973, he wrote,

My dear boys and girls, you are working so hard for broadcasting the glories of Lord Krishna's lotus feet and thus my Guru Maharaj will be so pleased upon you. Certainly my Guru Maharaj will bestow His blessings thousand times more than me and that is my satisfaction. All Glories to the assembled devotees.

A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami

N.B. Everyone should go with the Sankirtan Party as soon as possible.

Rāmeśvara may have been shy while quietly waiting at the bottom of the stairs for the slightest recognition from Śrīla Prabhupāda, but when he received the prize jewel of this handwritten note, he ran off, shouting to share the good fortune with any devotee who was still awake.

Tripurāri: Every morning after maṅgala-ārati there was always a little group clustered around the door of the temple, because you weren't supposed to talk in the temple while chanting japa early in the morning. So Rāmeśvara was standing at the doorway chanting, and he called us over, until a little cluster of devotees were there at the doorway. He showed us Prabhupāda's note. Some of the other devotees got frustrated, seeing that we were talking during the japa period. They felt we were a distraction or that we weren't absorbed in our service or in japa. But actually we were really intensely absorbed in thinking of saṅkīrtana, and when we returned to our japa, we began chanting with the desire to be able to go out and please Prabhupāda.

In a few days Prabhupāda's words—"Everyone should go with the Sankirtan Party as soon as possible"—reached the other temples. And although Śrīla Prabhupāda soon left Los Angeles, returning to India, his message stayed and deepened the devotees' convictions.

In the summer of 1973 the devotees found that at concerts they could distribute hundreds of Kṛṣṇa books in a few hours. The Kṛṣṇa book, available now as a paperback trilogy with a foreword by George Harrison, was especially attractive to young people. In July, Rāmeśvara wrote to Prabhupāda in London, telling him that the Los Angeles temple was distributing two thousand Kṛṣṇa books a week and that at one concert devotees had distributed six hundred books in two hours.

The devotees in Los Angeles decided that Tripurāri and a few other leading saṅkīrtana men should travel from temple to temple and share their experience. Rāmeśvara wrote to Prabhupāda, "This is the mercy of Sri Sri Rukmini-Dvarakadhisa [the Deities of the L.A. temple] that we can send out so many devotees to other centers. It is the real opulence of New Dvārakā." Śrīla Prabhupāda replied on August 3.

There is no doubt about it, to distribute books is our most important activity. The temple is a place not for eating and sleeping, but as a base from which we send out our soldiers to fight with maya. Fight with maya means to drop thousands and millions of books into the laps of the conditioned souls. Just like during the war time the Bombs are raining from the sky like anything...

I like also your program of sending out your best men to teach the others. That is the actual progress of Krishna Consciousness, to train others. Continue this program so that in the future every devotee in our movement will know the art of distributing books. This is approved by me.

A letter from a woman who had recently received some of Prabhupāda's books appeared in the July BBT newsletter. The letter had been written on TWA in-flight stationery.

In the S.F. airport before I departed for London, the Kṛṣṇa book was given to me by one of your followers... I never felt so happy & privileged, or honored would be a better phrase...

I am sick of this material rat race, I want a higher life without material riches and games.

On her way back from London she had purchased another book, Rāja-vidyā, in the Chicago airport and now asked for more help. "It is beautiful," she concluded.

As Tripurāri traveled and taught his method of saṅkīrtana, more devotees followed his example and began wearing a wig and conventional dress while selling books. This way of dressing made approaching people much easier and increased the potential for distributing books. Some devotees, however, disapproved.

One day in September 1973, during Śrīla Prabhupāda's morning walk on Juhu Beach in Bombay, a few of his sannyāsī disciples brought the matter before him. Prabhupāda referred to the many gentlemen strolling along Juhu Beach who would always offer respects to the devotees by folding their hands and saying, "Hare Kṛṣṇa." This was the sign of a real Vaiṣṇava, Śrīla Prabhupāda said: anyone who sees him immediately thinks of Kṛṣṇa. The devotees, therefore, should prominently display such Vaiṣṇava markings as tilaka, śikhā, and neck beads, so that people could know, "Here are Hare Kṛṣṇa people."

One sannyāsī remarked that in America devotees were now wearing wigs and dressing like hippies to distribute books. He did not let his own men do this because he felt it self-defeating if people didn't even know they were speaking to a devotee. If someone wanted to distribute books, he concluded, Kṛṣṇa would help that devotee find a place where he could do so without having to disguise himself.

Śrīla Prabhupāda turned to the others, asking their opinions. One devotee suggested that the reason the devotees in America wore "disguises" was because otherwise they would not be permitted to distribute books in certain places. Prabhupāda heard the opinions and then gave his decision: these disguises should be stopped immediately. "We shall not in any way sacrifice our standards," he said. "We must maintain our principles strictly. This dressing with long hair and karmī clothes is the tendency to once again become hippies. Because you were hippies, that tendency is still there. So this should be stopped."

Walking back toward the temple, Prabhupāda saw a poor man evacuating by the roadside in public view. "He is not changing his standard, despite public opinion," Prabhupāda said. "Can we not maintain our standards as strictly as they are maintaining theirs?"

A letter was drafted and signed by Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami, Prabhupāda's secretary, and Prabhupāda signed also, on a line marked "approved." The letter stated that all saṅkīrtana devotees should always wear tilaka, dhotīs, neck beads, and śikhā, and should depend on Kṛṣṇa rather than disguises to help distribute books. At the bottom of the letter, however, was a P.S.—"Śrīla Prabhupāda, upon checking the above, added, 'If they like, they may wear coat and pants... But tilak, sikha, beads—these things should be there.' " Previously Śrīla Prabhupāda had addressed this subject in various letters. To Jagadīśa in Canada Prabhupāda had replied that there was no objection to wearing Western clothes, including a wig or hat. "We have to take whatever is favorable position for executing Kṛṣṇa consciousness," Prabhupāda had written. "Sometimes we may adopt such means in order to help distribute books." But in February 1973 he had written to Rūpānuga that he did not want devotees dressing as hippies.

...This should be stopped. We should not give anyone cause to call us hippies, but the devotees may dress up in respectable clothes like ladies and gentlemen in order to distribute my literatures under special circumstances...

Wherever there are individuals there are bound to be differences of opinion.

Śrīla Prabhupāda preferred to be spared such detailed management. His G.B.C. men should consult among themselves and then present their conclusions to him for a final decision. "In this way," Prabhupāda had written, "I will be free to concentrate on my translation of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam."

The letter from India reached Karandhara in Los Angeles, but before announcing that all saṅkīrtana in Western clothes must be stopped, he wanted Prabhupāda to hear his side of the story. He gave an elaborate report on the benefits of devotees' wearing ordinary Western dress while selling books. The main thing Prabhupāda seemed to be objecting to, he concluded, was a disreputable appearance—devotees looking like hippies. He now informed Prabhupāda that the distributors were actually clean, well groomed, and presentable. If the book distributors were restricted to appearing in public with shaved head and dhotī, he said, then the distribution would decline by about two thirds. "If extremes and misapplications have occurred," he wrote, "they should be worked out rather than giving up the whole program."

This time Śrīla Prabhupāda replied in favor of Western dress.

Yes, you can go on with your book distribution as you were doing before, there is not any harm. I thought that our men were becoming like hippies, but now I understand from you that this is not the case. So I have no objection. Our main business is to distribute books, and from the reports I am receiving from all over the world, the progress is very encouraging.

A disagreement arose about the distributors' techniques. A few people had written the ISKCON secretary complaining that they had been misled or pressured into buying a book, a complaint to which devotees responded variously.

The book distributors were protective of Prabhupāda's order that as many books as possible be distributed. Just because a few people had complained, they argued, was no reason to cool down book distribution. They quoted Śrīla Prabhupāda's statements that opposition to saṅkīrtana indicates its purity and genuineness.

Śrīla Prabhupāda had explained this point in his books in discussing the historical incident of Lord Caitanya's saṅkīrtana parties' being stopped by the Muslim government. Prabhupāda had written,

We must remember that such incidents took place in the past, five hundred years ago, and the fact that they are still going on indicates that our saṅkīrtana movement is really authorized, for if saṅkīrtana were an insignificant material affair, demons would not object to it.

People in America had also objected to public chanting, to the devotees' dress, to the Kṛṣṇa consciousness philosophy, to the food. Someone would always oppose. The main thing, the book distributors said, was to save the conditioned souls, who were heading for a hellish next life. If a person got a book and read just one page, his life could be changed.

Other devotees, however, including temple presidents, were disturbed by the complaints. Someone recalled that Prabhupāda had already addressed this point in 1970.

Do all activities with great enthusiasm. All our activities must be open so that no one may criticize our mission, so all dealing must be to the standard of Vaishnavism. As everything is undertaken forthrightly in Krishna Consciousness, in a Krishna Conscious way, then Lord Krishna will be pleased to provide all facilities for aiding such sincere service.

Śrīla Prabhupāda wanted the book distributors to execute his order, but he was not giving them a license to do anything and everything and claim it was for Kṛṣṇa. Preaching required expertise, not only in getting people to take a book but in giving them the right impression.

The book distributors maintained that they were doing the best they could but that they would try to improve. If other devotees thought they could do better, then they should demonstrate how to distribute books without disturbing anyone. Distributing books all day, day after day, was hard. People were already agitated by their minds and senses and harassed by their occupations, governments, and personal relationships. No wonder even an innocent devotee sometimes disturbed them.

The tactics in question were mostly the book distributors' lines. The distributors would say that they were students, that they were helping get young people off drugs, or that the books were about how to solve modern day crises. None of these things were untrue, but the emphasis was sometimes excessive.

A mature devotee could speak more directly. Tripurāri would tell how the books described an ancient civilization in which people knew how life should be lived. He would present himself as a representative of an organization that had communities all over the world where people could benefit from the example of an alternative life-style. Tripurāri and others were able to be both personal and, in a casual way, philosophical, as they spoke about spiritual life. They made quick friends with strangers and convinced them to take books. But more and more devotees were taking up book distribution and many were inexperienced.

Śrīla Prabhupāda's philosophy was clear, but different interpretations persisted. Without referring to specific techniques, Prabhupāda simply stressed the purity of book distribution and encouraged the book distributors to continue without interruption; the main thing was to distribute books.

Devotees continued to press Śrīla Prabhupāda for further clarification. The book distributors were concerned that the urgency of book distribution not be minimized, whereas other responsible ISKCON leaders were concerned that loose practices might hamper the Society's progress. Prabhupāda replied to questions by Bali-mardana of New York with a letter that became particularly influential.

The real preaching is selling books. You should know the tactic how to sell without irritating. What your lecture will do for three minutes, but if he reads one page his life may be turned. We don't want to irritate anyone, however. If he goes away by your aggressive tactics, then you are nonsense and it is your failure. Neither you could sell a book, neither he would remain. But if he buys a book, that is the real successful preaching.

Prabhupāda's position was clear: the books should be sold, but expertly. And lest there be any doubt, Prabhupāda reiterated that the book distribution was the best preaching. "The success of your preaching will be substantiated by how many books are sold." Prabhupāda also wrote, "The art is to sell many, many books and not to irritate the public."

As books continued to go out by the millions, many people expressed their thanks on receiving a book. Only occasionally would someone complain. But within ISKCON, the dialogue regarding book distribution techniques continued. When Śrī Govinda, the president of ISKCON Chicago, wrote Prabhupāda, Prabhupāda encouraged him in his attempt to reform the devotees engaged in excessive practices.

So it is not very much advisable to make lies just to sell books. If we simply stick to describing how wonderful is Krishna, that will not be a lie! But other things, lies, they will not help us to train ourselves in truthfulness. Lie to some, not to others, that is not a good philosophy. Rather the brahmins are always truthful, even to their enemies. There is sufficient merit in our books that if you simply describe them sincerely to anyone, they will buy. That art you must develop, not art of lying. Convince them to give by your preaching the Absolute Truth, not by tricking. That is the more mature stage of development of Krishna Consciousness.

Scores of men and women were going out every day to distribute books. One November day the devotees of the New York City temple broke the ISKCON world record by distributing 13,200 pieces of literature. On the same day they also distributed 15,000 pieces of prasādam. The ISKCON total for 1973 was 4,169,000 books sold. When Śrīla Prabhupāda received these figures, he replied to Rāmeśvara,

I have faith in your words that next year the figures will be far beyond what they were last year. It is the nature of the spiritual energy, it is always increasing if we just apply our energy.

Early in January 1974, Śrīla Prabhupāda again returned to Los Angeles. One morning he gave a Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam lecture stressing book distribution. "There is no literature throughout the universe like Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam," he said. "There is no comparison or competition. Every word is for the good of the human society. Each and every word. Therefore we stress so much in the book distribution. Somehow or other, if the book goes in one's hand, he'll be benefited. At least he'll see, 'I have taken so much price—let me see what is there.' If he reads one śloka, his life will become successful. If he reads one śloka, one word! This is such a nice thing. Therefore, we are stressing so much, please distribute books, distribute books, distribute books."

The year 1974 began with what appeared to be a serious setback. The Supreme Court ruled against Vietnamese war protestors' distributing political leaflets in private malls. Citizens of nonprofit groups—religious included—could solicit on private property only with permission from the proprietor. The malls that the book distributors had frequented were suddenly off limits.

The same constitution that barred the devotees from private property, however, gave them access to public property, and when ISKCON devotees filed a lawsuit against the city-owned Las Vegas airport, they won an immediate injunction on the basis that the airport was denying them their right to free speech. This ruling promised to open a new era in book distribution, with possibilities of legalizing saṅkīrtana in all major airports.

Devotees saw this as proof that Kṛṣṇa was working through Prabhupāda to increase book distribution. No previous spiritual master had ever distributed Vedic literature on so great a scale. This was another sign that Śrīla Prabhupāda was Kṛṣṇa's empowered representative. And by the devotees' efforts to follow Prabhupāda's order, Kṛṣṇa was empowering them also. But only if they were willing to go through the trials of surrender and renunciation.

Praghoṣa: I went out one day to the airport, and I walked up to one black man and said, "Excuse me, sir." And BAM! He punched me right in the face and knocked me down. At that moment so many thoughts went through my mind. I could just hear Tripurāri's words ringing in my ears from the class that morning: "We must be determined..." So I just said to myself, "Well, I'll just stand right back up and keep trying." I stood up, and I got the inspiration to just turn around and try to hand the next person one of Prabhupāda's books.

Another time a husband and wife approached me, but the husband didn't want anything to do with me. When the woman saw that the book was spiritual, she stopped and said, "What's this book about?" I said very bluntly, "This book explains birth and death and what's beyond." She said, "Oh." Then she turned to her husband and said, "Please buy it." But he said, "I don't want it. Come on, let's go." She said, "Please!" But her husband said, "You buy it." And he walked off.

So she stayed with me and said, "Could you tell me a little more about this?" I started to explain the book, and then I said, "Where are you coming from?" She said, "I'm coming from Rochester." Then she revealed to me that she was coming from the Mayo Clinic and that she had terminal cancer and was going to die. She said, "I desperately want to read this book." She gave me ten dollars and said, "Thank you very much." Then she took the book and ran off.

A little later she came back and found me and shook my hand and thanked me. These kind of experiences that devotees would have day in and day out gave us the feeling of being like emissaries or representatives of something very special. By this we became more attached to Śrīla Prabhupāda and to executing his work. We would see these miracles take place.

Keśava Bhāratī: I used to distribute books in the San Francisco airport. I thought that this airport was particularly difficult and that if I could be in L.A. I could probably distribute as many books as Tripurāri. I was a little proud. Then I got the chance to distribute with him.

I am very outgoing and gregarious, so I don't have any problem stopping people or anything like that. But half an hour and then an hour went by, and Tripurāri had distributed five and then ten books. But I couldn't get anybody to stop and shake my hand even. It was incredible! But I knew it was because I was too proud. Another hour went by, and still no one would stop and shake my hand. I was bewildered, because I wanted to pass out Prabhupāda's books. Finally I just sat down out of frustration. I was nearly crying.

Tripurāri came up and preached to me. He told me I should pray to Lord Caitanya and Nityānanda in times like this and not to worry about it, that this happens. So I got it together, and then about ten to fifteen people in a row came and talked with me, and some of them took books. So when we discussed it afterward, we could understand that we were just instruments in Lord Caitanya's hands. This is how we developed the saṅkīrtana philosophy. Through the book distribution we came to realize who Prabhupāda was and to appreciate him more.

Lavaṅga-latikā: All day I would stand at the top of the stairs, and thousands and thousands of people would come by. And we would distribute hundreds and hundreds of books. We used to take lines from Prabhupāda's books. Tripurāri used to talk about the swans' taking milk from water. So we used to use that a lot in approaching someone. We'd say how these great sages used to know how to separate milk from water, separate the essence. He also said the pictures were windows to the spiritual world. We'd say, "This book is like the brilliant sun that will drive away the darkness of ignorance in this age of Kali."

I found the best way to distribute the books was to use Prabhupāda's own words. Prabhupāda said if we read one line to someone, that person can make one hundred times spiritual advancement. One time a devotee complained to Prabhupāda that people were throwing some of the books away. But then we could understand that Prabhupāda wanted them distributed on a large scale. Not that you kept the book for a special person you thought might be intelligent enough to read it. Because Prabhupāda said that if they read only one line they would be very much affected. So we could understand that Prabhupāda wanted mass distribution, not that we just keep them for the special, right person.

Sura: Vaiṣeṣika was selling books in the airport with me. He would walk up to people and say, "Well, how are you doing, sir? All glories to the śrī-kṛṣṇa saṅkīrtana movement, the prime benediction for humanity at large, which cleanses the heart." He was repeating the Śikṣāṣṭakam prayers of Lord Caitanya right out of the book, and yet he was selling books. The books had pictures of Kṛṣṇa and devotional scenes on the cover, and sometimes some devotees couldn't understand how people could relate to these books. But Prabhupāda wanted them distributed. And he was saying that we should preach on the merit of the book. When a devotee asked Prabhupāda what we should say to distribute the books, Prabhupāda replied kṛṣṇe sva-dhāmopagate, which is the verse that says the Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam is as brilliant as the sun and it has arisen just to give people religion in this age of darkness. So we were also repeating that verse and distributing books on faith.

We would go out and see the people actually becoming struck by Kṛṣṇa consciousness. They would see that the devotees were very sincere and serious, and they would become impressed. Daily on saṅkīrtana we would see people appreciating Prabhupāda's books. There was also harassment, but Prabhupāda had talked about it, that there was always difficulty. So everything was there from Prabhupāda to confirm whatever realizations we had. Śrīla Prabhupāda said a book salesman would sometimes have difficulty because he'll be sometimes accepted and sometimes rejected. But he tolerates.

In the airport we met professors, lawyers, all kinds of people who would stop and talk. They would challenge, and we would constantly have to defend Prabhupāda's books and his movement and speak up on behalf of Prabhupāda, more so than when we were just kids out on the parking lots talking to women and begging fifty cents for a pack of incense. We were presenting Prabhupāda's books to the scholars, coming into contact with Māyāvādīs, scientists, businessmen, people who were very sharp, in Chicago, New York, Los Angeles, and San Diego. People there were very sharp and hard. And just by having to spiritually combat them and defend the movement, we became more mature in our understanding of Prabhupāda's books and how to present them in such a way that we could convince even people who didn't want to be convinced. We had to study Prabhupāda's books.

In 1974 several new parties formed just for disTributing books. Tripurāri had been traveling as an emissary from Los Angeles, but now, with Śrīla Prabhupāda's permission, he formed a Bhaktivedanta Book Trust (BBT) saṅkīrtana party of some leading book distributors. The BBT distributors stationed themselves in various airports around the country, creating a significant increase in book distribution.

"Your entire program is approved by me," Prabhupāda wrote to Tripurāri. When Tripurāri asked if he could take sannyāsa, Prabhupāda replied that he was already doing more than any sannyāsī. In one letter Prabhupāda called him "the incarnation of book distribution."

Book distribution took another great stride forward when Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami, Śrīla Prabhupāda's zonal secretary in India for four years, returned to the U.S. Joining with his friend Viṣṇujana Swami, he helped form the Rādhā-Dāmodara saṅkīrtana party, traveling in a bus with Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa Deities to distribute books and hold festivals all over the U.S.

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami: When we first began the Rādhā-Dāmodara party our idea was to make as many devotees as possible by holding festivals at which we chanted Hare Kṛṣṇa and distributed prasādam. After Kṛṣṇa sent so many nice young men it was difficult to keep them always engaged. Then suddenly a letter arrived from Śrīla Prabhupāda in which he said that the kīrtana of book distribution was better than the kīrtana of public chanting. This transcendental instruction changed the course of our Rādhā-Dāmodara party. From then on I concentrated more and more on book distribution, and this gave Prabhupāda greater and greater pleasure. I had been in India for four years, but our main program had been enrolling life members. But now that I was in America Śrīla Prabhupāda was reminding me that preaching meant to distribute his books. So I became inspired that our party should distribute so many books that it equal all of the other book distribution of the rest of ISKCON worldwide. Day and night I was thinking of how to get out more and more books and thus overflow America with transcendental literature. Śrīla Prabhupāda wrote me that this was his real ambition, to turn all of America into Vaiṣṇavas.

Until we formed our Rādhā-Dāmodara party, the method of distributing books had been that an individual would be given either a large, medium, or small book, according to the size of the donation. But Prabhupāda told me that of all types of book distribution, to distribute his large books was most important. So I was always considering how to increase the number of large books. The problem was that people were willing to give small donations, but rarely would they give us large enough contributions to award giving them a large book. Then Kṛṣṇa gave me the idea that by adding together a few small donations from a number of persons, at least one of them could be given a large book, while the others could be given a Back to Godhead magazine or a small book. By this method we were able to increase the distribution of big books tremendously. Prabhupāda fully approved of this idea. As long as the Book Fund received payment for the books, Śrīla Prabhupāda allowed us to pass them out as quickly as we could, irrespective of the size of donation. Thus our Rādhā-Dāmodara party was able to distribute as many as fifty thousand big books in a single month.

Śrīla Prabhupāda showed special interest in the Rādhā-Dāmodara party and approved loans from the BBT for the purchase of more buses, thus creating a saṅkīrtana army traveling in renovated Greyhound buses. By the end of 1974 the Rādhā-Dāmodara party had three buses, vans, and numerous men. Prabhupāda called the buses "moving temples," and he urged the Rādhā-Dāmodara devotees to continue their program, with certainty that they were pleasing Lord Caitanya. "I am glad that you have understood the importance of my books," Prabhupāda wrote, "therefore I am stressing it so much. Let everyone take these books."

Śrīla Prabhupāda encouraged the Rādhā-Dāmodara party to expand to hundreds of buses and thus fulfill the mission of Śrī Caitanya Mahāprabhu to bring Kṛṣṇa consciousness to every town and village. When a tight transcendental competition arose between the Los Angeles temple, Tripurāri's BBT party, and the Rādhā-Dāmodara party, Prabhupāda watched and approved it with pleasure.

Another party forming in 1974 was the BBT library party. It began with Hṛdayānanda Goswami's sending some brahmacārīs from his traveling party to visit prestigious universities in New England. The men attempted to sell entire sets of Śrīla Prabhupāda's books to the professors, and even in their first attempts they met with great success.

Śrīla Prabhupāda had long cherished this idea, and even before coming to America he had gone to libraries in India with copies of his Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam First Canto. By his efforts in New Delhi, the United States Library of Congress had obtained copies of those early volumes. Now his desire to see his books placed in all the U.S. libraries and universities was becoming a reality. Within a few months professors began writing favorable reviews, and some even ordered Prabhupāda's books for their college courses. "I very much like this program of the standing orders," Prabhupāda wrote. "Try to increase it up to fifty thousand such orders from the libraries."

Another party that formed in 1974 was Nāma-haṭṭa, a group of brahmacārīs led by two sannyāsīs. The Nāma-haṭṭa party would travel and distribute books, donating their profits toward Śrīla Prabhupāda's projects in Bombay, Māyāpur, and Vṛndāvana.

When Śrīla Prabhupāda became ill for several weeks in September of 1974, the book distribution reports were his best medicine. "Whenever I get report of my books selling," he wrote to the library party, "I feel strength. Even now in this weakened condition I have got strength from your report." And during the same illness he wrote to Rāmeśvara, Regarding book sales figures, please endeavor in this way. This is the only solace of my life. When I hear that my books are selling so nicely, I become energetic like a young man.

Śrīla Prabhupāda recovered his health, and by the end of 1974 his BBT was also in extraordinary health, with the temples again competing in a furious Christmas marathon. In America, the BBT reported to Prabhupāda that approximately 387,000 hardbound books had been sold during the year, a 67% increase over the previous year. And almost 4,000,000 Back to Godheads had been sold, an 89% increase. The American BBT sold the individual temples a total of 6,668,000 pieces of literature, a 60% increase.

Such news made Śrīla Prabhupāda “become energetic like a young man,” and Prabhupāda and his book distribution movement headed into 1975 with all signs of increasing—doubling and tripling—the already astounding figures of 1974.

Śrīla Prabhupāda had created his Bhaktivedanta Book Trust in 1972 as an independent entity to insure that his books could continue being produced and distributed. The BBT would operate exclusively for the benefit of the International Society for Krishna Consciousness, and yet it would exist independently.

The trust document stated that the trustees should divide the money from the sale of the books to ISKCON temples into two funds: one for printing books and one for purchasing ISKCON properties and building temples. Prabhupāda believed that if this fifty-fifty formula were followed, Kṛṣṇa would assure the success of ISKCON. Repeatedly he would refer to this formula in conversations and letters, even in his purports on Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam.

Śrīla Prabhupāda gave his BBT trustees authority to make printing plans, and the trustees would then consult him for approval. He would set the standards and guidelines for his BBT trustees to follow. Only after consulting him could they institute changes.

And to changes Prabhupāda was particularly averse. He would choose the book size, determine the artwork, and make suggestions about the size of a particular printing, about shipping policies, about sales to temples—about almost every aspect of the BBT's publishing activities. Even when certain temples did not remit their payments to the BBT, Prabhupāda would become involved.

It is not good if such big temples who are setting the example for the whole Society do not pay their bills. This is most irregular. I am trying to retire from the administrative affairs, but if the presidents and G.B.C. men make such disturbances, then how can I be peaceful? Things should be maintained automatically, then it will be peaceful for me.

He was a strict manager. “According to Vedic instruction,” he said, “fire, debt, and disease should never be neglected. They must be extinguished by all means.”

Śrīla Prabhupāda saw book distribution as (among other things) the basis for an economically sound ISKCON. Other businesses could also operate, but book-selling was the best, for it combined preaching with a good source of income. As he wrote to one of his temple presidents,

I am very encouraged by the report of how nicely our books are being distributed. This is our main business all over the world. If you give full attention to this, there will never be any shortage of funds.

And on another occasion,

Regarding the society's leaders emphasizing business, you should understand what is the meaning of business. Business means to help the preaching. Preaching needs financial help, otherwise, we have no need for business. So far as I understand, our book business is sufficient to support our movement.

Śrīla Prabhupāda also oversaw all BBT loans to temples; any G.B.C. secretary or temple president requesting a loan would have to approach him. In 1973 and 1974 he granted sizable loans for building, purchasing, or improving temples in Dallas, Hawaii, Sydney, Chicago, and Vancouver. He also granted a loan to the Rādhā-Dāmodara party for buying "traveling temples," or buses, and one to South America for printing books. Kīrtanānanda Mahārāja automatically received a fifty-thousand-dollar loan each year for New Vrindaban. But Prabhupāda would deny money requests for projects he considered inconsistent with the purposes of the BBT. On November 6 he wrote to Rāmeśvara,

No, we cannot loan BBT money for any other purposes than what is mentioned in the BBT Agreement. These other loans for cows, equipment, and restaurants must all be re-paid, and no other loans other than for publishing and temple construction can be granted.

Beginning in 1974, Śrīla Prabhupāda utilized the BBT profits for constructing his main temples in India—Vṛndāvana, Māyāpur, and especially Bombay. Rāmeśvara informed the devotees of this special function of the BBT.

Śrīla Prabhupāda is personally overseeing all the Indian programs and spending... If one rupee is misspent Śrīla Prabhupāda becomes disturbed and chastises the devotees (mercifully)—"...this money is earned by the sweat of many devotees, so why you are not careful?" Śrīla Prabhupāda wants to see our Vrindavana temple, SRI SRI KRISHNA-BALARAM Mandir completed by Janmastami. Prabhupāda wants to establish Sri Mayapur Temple as well... One interesting note in this connection is that in India, I've been told that 10 paise purchases 1 brick! 10 paise means US $0.01—just think every penny you collect may buy one brick in India. EVERY PENNY COUNTS TOWARDS THESE TRANSCENDENTAL GOALS!

"These places in India," Prabhupāda wrote, "are spiritually potent. By establishing temples in Māyāpur and Vṛndāvana we assure that the purity of our movement will be kept intact."

In October of 1974 Śrīla Prabhupāda wrote to Hamsadūta, his G.B.C. secretary for Germany, "Whenever there is any publication in any language, it enlivens me one hundred times." Although Śrīla Prabhupāda's order from Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī was to preach and publish in the English language, he had expanded that order to include all the languages and countries of the world. "My first concern is that my books shall be published and distributed profusely all over the world," Śrīla Prabhupāda had written to one of the first devotees in Europe in 1972. Prabhupāda wrote always in English, but ever since 1968, when ISKCON had first begun spreading to other countries, he had been talking of printing his books in foreign languages.

When in 1972 a German edition of Bhagavad-gītā had been printed, Śrīla Prabhupāda had written Hamsadūta, "You have done the right thing by printing Bhagavad-gītā in German language, and I very much appreciate that you have done this great service." By 1973, saṅkīrtana parties had been traveling throughout Germany, distributing several hundred copies of Bhagavad-gītā a week. Hamsadūta had promised that he would translate one book a month into German, and when in the fall of 1974 Prabhupāda heard of six recently printed German translations, he replied, "This is very happy news for me. Thank you. Overflood Europe with German books."

Śrīla Prabhupāda said that whenever he published a book he felt that he had conquered an empire. His books were the basis of the spiritual revolution that would eventually change humanity and save it from the pernicious effects of the age of Kali.

"Produce voluminously Spanish language literature," Śrīla Prabhupāda requested. When Hṛdayānanda Goswami had become the zonal leader for South America, Śrīla Prabhupāda had instructed him to emphasize printing and distributing books above opening temples. "I also was printing even before I had big temples in the U.S.," Prabhupāda had written. "So you may follow the footsteps of the previous ācāryas."

Hṛdayānanda Goswami had organized a Spanish BBT in Mexico and had made book distribution his priority. Early in 1974, when the Spanish BBT was ready to print translations of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam's first volume, Bhagavad-gītā, and Kṛṣṇa, the Supreme Personality of Godhead, Prabhupāda wrote,

By printing these books of our Kṛṣṇa Conscious philosophy in so many different languages we can actually inject our movement into the masses of persons all over the world, especially there in the western countries and we can literally turn whole nations into Kṛṣṇa conscious nations.

When one hundred thousand copies of a Spanish Back to Godhead were printed, Śrīla Prabhupāda wrote, "Now give them to everyone." Spanish book distribution became the second largest in the world, next to American.

Bhagavān, Śrīla Prabhupāda's representative in southern Europe, had been printing in French and Italian, and as early as December 1972 he had printed Prabhupāda's Easy Journey to Other Planets in French. By the beginning of 1974, three parties in France were distributing daily one thousand books, including a French Bhagavad-gītā As It Is. Already Bhagavān had printed the first Italian Back to Godhead, and a French Śrī Īsopaniṣad was forthcoming.

Wherever devotees went, they knew their program was to chant Hare Kṛṣṇa, follow the regulative principles, and arrange for printing and distributing Śrīla Prabhupāda's books. When the first devotees had reached South Africa, they had proceeded just according to Śrīla Prabhupāda's desire, and he had replied to them, "Your report is very encouraging to me, that you distributed 110 Gītās in two days in Capetown."

Śrīla Prabhupāda often thought of having his books printed in Russian, and he wrote to the minister of education and culture in the U.S.S.R., suggesting they publish "a translation of the ancient classical Vedic literature, namely, Bhagavad-gītā" as already published by "the famous London publishing house of M.S.S. Macmillan Company." He also talked with his disciples about printing Russian translations in America.

Whenever Śrīla Prabhupāda met an interested person proficient in any foreign language, he would request that person to translate his books. In 1972 he had written,

I am also very encouraged to hear that Japanese language translations of some of my books will be brought out soon, because without books and magazines, what authority or what basis have we got for preaching?

Similarly, Śrīla Prabhupāda had written to an American devotee in Indonesia,

I am especially happy to hear that you have got a Chinese boy there who is doing some translating work. Yes, the Chinese-speaking portion of the world is very huge and it requires to infiltrate gradually, especially by distributing our literatures widely in Chinese languages. So his service is the greatest to Kṛṣṇa.

Later, when Prabhupāda heard that the Chinese boy, Yaśomatī-suta, had finished translating three chapters of Bhagavad-gītā into Chinese, he wrote that they should immediately print those three chapters as a small book.

ISKCON Australia rose to prominence in the book distribution competition and, by 1974, was competing with Los Angeles ISKCON and the Rādhā Dāmodara party for world leadership. By the fall of 1974 about a dozen top Australian and New Zealand distributors were selling daily more than twenty big books each. The centers in Australia, like those in America, more than doubled their book distribution between 1973 and 1974.

When book distribution had been just beginning in America in 1970, no books had been available in England. But within a year, Kṛṣṇa book distribution had begun there, and Śrīla Prabhupāda had written, "All of my disciples in London center are very intelligent, and they should unite around this single task of selling Krishna book widely throughout Britain." By 1974 the devotees in Britain were valiantly distributing books. During one busy six-day period, they distributed six hundred volumes of Teachings of Lord Chaitanya, four hundred of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, and one thousand Back to Godhead magazines.

India was special. There Śrīla Prabhupāda had introduced book distribution through the ISKCON life membership program. Wealthy Indians were more inclined to accept the books as part of an ISKCON membership package, which included such benefits as free accommodations in ISKCON temples throughout the world. But in India, as elsewhere, Śrīla Prabhupāda wanted his books distributed to colleges, to libraries, to prominent citizens, and to the masses.

By the end of 1974 Prabhupāda's disciples were ready to print Hindi and Bengali editions of Back to Godhead. When Śrīla Prabhupāda heard that Western devotees in India were complaining of insufficient engagement, he replied, "I am pleased you are selling many Krishna Books daily. All our men should go out with books. There is sufficient engagement." To his G.B.C. secretary in India he wrote, "Engage all of them in book distribution specifically, and take with you some sankirtan party."

"Without books we will make no progress in India," Śrīla Prabhupāda had written to Tejās, his temple president in Delhi. Prabhupāda had also trained his leaders in India in the strict policy of "fifty-fifty." "Proceeds from life membership or any other collections should go fifty percent to the BBT and fifty percent for construction and other projects." On his order the American BBT had been making donations of books to India and by 1974 had donated three hundred thousand dollars' worth of literature. Although America was the leading pioneer in book printing and distribution, Prabhupāda foresaw worldwide printing and distribution of his books—eventually to surpass that in the U.S.

Śrīla Prabhupāda had created transcendental competition among his disciples. In 1971 he had observed with pleasure Keśava in San Francisco leading the society in Kṛṣṇa book distribution. Prabhupāda had promised that he would leave Los Angeles and stay in San Francisco if Keśava outdistributed his brother, Karandhara. And over the years he had continued to instigate such competition, fanning the fires of book distribution. He would encourage the leaders to send him reports, and then he would respond with letters, raising the book distribution fever even higher.

The whole of ISKCON waited to hear the latest quote from Prabhupāda, inspiring them to go on and on. When Śrīla Prabhupāda had given the lecture in January 1974 stressing, "Distribute books, distribute books, distribute books," several devotees in the audience had vowed on the spot to dedicate their lives to that instruction. And when Prabhupāda had sent the handwritten note down from his room in Los Angeles—"Everyone should go with the Sankirtan Party as soon as possible"—that one line had created a spirit of sacrifice and dedication in the hearts of many disciples, who felt themselves destined to take up that order as their life and soul.

Although Rāmeśvara had been caught up by the waves of the saṅkīrtana ocean from the beginning, Śrīla Prabhupāda cast Rāmeśvara's service when he wrote,

Make program to distribute our books all over the world. Our books are being appreciated by learned circles, so we should take advantage. Whatever progress we have made is simply due to distributing these books. So go on and do not divert your mind for a moment from this.

When devotees in London reported to Śrīla Prabhupāda their increase in book and magazine sales, he responded by inviting them to compete.

I have heard that in San Francisco they are selling daily not less than 75 Kṛṣṇa Books. So I am very much encouraged to hear this. Now take this spirit of transcendental rivalry and consult with Dayananda and the others there in England to become the first-rate book-sellers.

When writing to a sannyāsī disciple preaching in Scotland, where the devotees were perhaps not fully aware of the scope of book distribution in the U.S., Śrīla Prabhupāda mentioned the latest book scores from New York and commented, "New York is leading the list."

Śrīla Prabhupāda also inspired the Society as a whole to compete with its previous years' efforts: "Somehow the book distribution must be doubled and tripled as far as possible. Do it." As soon as the BBT library party had been formed, Prabhupāda had told the members to get fifty thousand orders. And he had asked the Rādhā-Dāmodara party to expand to one hundred buses. The competition was particularly high between Los Angeles, the Rādhā-Dāmodara party, and Australia, and Śrīla Prabhupāda encouraged them all, like a maestro calling for a fortissimo from the orchestra.

Śrīla Prabhupāda was not giving careless, boastful instructions. The determination and sacrifice required to achieve these seemingly unattainable goals he knew well, and he wanted his devotees to work as he worked, with total dedication. He wanted them to try their utmost. His was the logic of "hunting for the rhinoceros," he said. If a man attempting to shoot a rhinoceros failed, no one would criticize him. But if he succeeded, it would be considered wonderful. Prabhupāda wrote to Rūpānuga,

Your sankirtana reports are very encouraging, especially that one girl, Gauri dasi, has set an all ISKCON women's record of 108 big books. This is very wonderful. Formerly this would have been considered impossible, but now by Kṛṣṇa's grace everything is becoming possible. Encourage them all to increase more and more.

Some devotees became confused by their Godbrothers' and God sisters' rousing calls for competition and rivalry. This seemed like the rivalry of the material world, which they had hoped to leave forever. Śrīla Prabhupāda, however, explained the proper attitude of transcendental competition.

Competition and profiteering spirit are always there in the living entity. It is not that they can be artificially removed in some matter. Factually we saw in Russia that by removing competition and profit calculation from society the people were not at all happy, and still these things are going on. So we shall not expect that we are any different. Only difference is, that our profit is for Krishna's pleasure, and our competition is how to please Krishna more than someone else. Even amongst the Gopis there is competition to please Krishna, and there is envy also. But this envy is not material, it is transcendental. They are thinking, Oh, she has done something more wonderful than me, that is very nice, but now let me do something even more wonderful, like that. So I am pleased that you desire for competition with your Godbrothers to spread Krishna Consciousness Movement all over the world by printing our books.

When a traveling sankirtana party from one temple intensively distributed books in another city, the authorities at the local temple would often be disturbed. This problem came before Śrīla Prabhupāda, who was inevitably called in to judge and to cool down the fires of competition. Prabhupāda wrote to Keśava and Bhūtātmā, who had traveled all the way from San Francisco to London to distribute books but had disturbed the devotees there by their fervor.

Ultimately, it shall be up to the local temple president if the presence of your party is favorable or not. Everything considered, if he agrees, you may stay; otherwise, if he judges it is unfavorable at the time, he may order you to go out. But just to avoid these things, better to arrange in advance with the G.B.C. men concerned. Ours is a cooperative movement, with Kṛṣṇa and the advancement of the Kṛṣṇa movement at the center, and we must continue to sell as many books as possible. But discuss everything amongst yourselves and do it nicely without irritating anyone; that is the art.

Seeing the mighty efforts of the top book distributors, some devotees became envious, or at least dispirited, thinking themselves useless and unable to please Śrīla Prabhupāda. This problem also came before Śrīla Prabhupāda, who replied, "There must always be competition. That gives life. That cannot be separated from life... The perfect society does not eliminate competition, but it eliminates envy, because everyone is weak before Kṛṣṇa."

But competition had its limit, as Prabhupāda explained to a doubting brahmacārī in Florida.

It is not so much important the quantity of books that we distribute, but that we serve Kṛṣṇa as best we can and depend on Him for the result. But it should not come to the point of making us lose our Kṛṣṇa Consciousness. When you have these feelings, do not mistake it for enviousness, but take it to be an indirect appreciation of the service done by your other Godbrothers. This is spiritual. In the material world, when someone surpasses us in some way we become angry and plan how to stop him, but in the spiritual world when someone does some better service, we think, "Oh, he has done so nicely. Let me help him to execute his service."

Competition might have been a catalyst, but by steadfastly distributing Śrīla Prabhupāda's books, the members of the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement were experiencing the essence of loving service to Kṛṣṇa in separation, which is the highest spiritual ecstasy. "Don't try to see God," Śrīla Prabhupāda's spiritual master had often said, "but act in such a way that God sees you." In other words, by submissively acting on the order of the servant of the servant of the servant of Kṛṣṇa, Prabhupāda's disciples were sure to attract Kṛṣṇa's loving attention.

The quickest way to catch Kṛṣṇa's attention, Śrīla Prabhupāda said, was to direct another person to Kṛṣṇa consciousness. The book distributors, therefore, felt a special reciprocation with their spiritual master, and this impelled them to go on serving and distributing.

Saṅjaya: Philosophically we saw that going out and distributing books was what our spiritual master wanted us to do. We knew that. That was clear to us. We also had a real sense of idealism—that these books and magazines would change the world. Once you come to Kṛṣṇa consciousness, you actually see how crummy the world really is, how really contaminated things are, how envious people are, and how horrible material life is. You can see that. You don't feel that you yourself can change it, but you feel that whoever gets one of Prabhupāda's books and looks at it will be changed in a spiritual way. There was no question about it. We also felt a big change would come in the world in the future as Kṛṣṇa consciousness spread. Prabhupāda also said that if people just touch one of these books their lives will change. Our faith was in the books and Śrīla Prabhupāda.

Keśava Bhāratī: When you pass out a book, there is a certain reciprocation from Prabhupāda. There was a dramatic difference in our internal experience when a person would take a book compared to just taking some incense or something. We would actually experience Prabhupāda's association all day by distributing those books. We didn't feel left out just because certain devotees were physically closer to Prabhupāda. Book distributors always got strong enlivenment. We would read about Haridāsa Ṭhākura going out and rolling on the ground and begging people to chant. That kind of thing would inspire us.

Vaiṣeṣika: We had Prabhupāda's books and different letters from him. And we also knew that if we distributed lots of books, we could get our name in the newsletter, and we could think of how Prabhupāda would read it. But I was just trying to keep up with the others. Sometimes I would go a couple of hours without giving anyone a book. Everyone else would just be passing them out like crazy. I would try, and people would all but spit in my face. They were pushing me around. It was very heavy for me. I would sometimes just walk off and start crying, it was so heavy. But I knew this book distribution was pleasing to Prabhupāda, and I just wanted to be part of it.

We used to think how Prabhupāda was spending so much time behind a dictating machine just writing these books. We would meditate on how he would sleep just a few hours a day and minimize everything else to write these books. So we were also trying to cut down our other activities and just go out and distribute books. Prabhupāda said a devotee should live in the mood of the six Gosvāmīs, so we were singing those prayers every day. We felt a real connection. Even in the beginning a devotee told me, "Where is Prabhupāda, do you know?" And then he said, "He's in his books." That mood was always there. We always felt that connection.

Jagaddhātṛī-devī dāsī: When I was distributing Prabhupāda's books, I understood that that was the most pleasing thing I could do for him. I was helping him to fulfill his spiritual master's instructions, and so he was pleased. And he was even more pleased if I did it nicely. I always used to hear the story about how Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī would be happy if someone went out and distributed even one magazine, because it's actually the mood of saṅkīrtana, of going out and trying to give mercy to the conditioned souls, that counts.

I always wanted to do welfare work. I like the feeling of doing something for people. So this is the summum bonum of helping people. You are helping them to go back to Godhead. So that was my motivation. And we automatically become purified by bringing other living entities to Kṛṣṇa.

Tripurāri: I got inspired mostly by Prabhupāda's greatness—how he was staunchly following his Guru Mahārāja. It was his Guru Mahārāja's order, and therefore he was doing it. I was never very scholarly or intelligent. I never thought that I had much brains or talent. I was never trained practically in any kind of skill, and I didn't have much education. I took it like that—that I was talking to the most fallen people and that I was the most fallen myself. I was just doing what Prabhupāda wanted, because he wanted. I would pray to Prabhupāda to help me realize why he wanted book distribution. Then within I would get inspiration, and it would come out in all of my talks about book distribution.

That time that I stayed out at the airport when all the devotees went back with Prabhupāda to the temple very much affected my whole spiritual life. I was very much intimately connected with Prabhupāda. But my closest association with him was by following his instructions and just getting down to work and not trying to enjoy the spiritual master but serve him.

Vṛndāvana-vilāsinī-devī dāśī: When Prabhupāda gave that famous lecture in Los Angeles, "Distribute books, distribute books, distribute books," right then I wanted to take it up. Whenever he wrote to Rāmeśvara, it was really to "Rāmeśvara and Company." We all felt included. We are all eternal book distributors—a team together. And I wanted to be part of it. It was Lord Caitanya's eternal saṅkīrtana party, and we all wanted to be part of it. It's going on in every planet, in every universe. I know it is pleasing to Śrīla Prabhupāda.

I would relate to book distribution like the battle of Kurukṣetra. It's a battle, but Kṛṣṇa is right there. It's like Kurukṣetra Number Two. I'm sure all book distributors feel like that. You feel like Kṛṣṇa is right there, and He's going to win. You just have to take shelter of Him. You may not win this battle, but you win the overall war. So I always felt connected with Prabhupāda, because he's telling us in his books about the great devotees that we can take shelter of. It's all by his mercy. He's giving us these books, and he's in these books.

Sura: We were so much addicted to selling Prabhupāda's books that we didn't want to do anything else. We would just go straight to the airport and start distributing and not stop, except for maybe a twenty minute lunch break and maybe some reading for twenty minutes—otherwise nonstop until 7:30 or 8:00 at night. We really felt that Śrīla Prabhupāda was protecting us.

One time out at the airport I was given a BBT newsletter. Maybe it was due to the exhaustion or maybe it was due to some false sentimentality or whatever, but I was reading Prabhupāda's remarks about book distribution, and I became very moved. I was by myself at the airport, and I just started crying, because I thought of how devotees all over the world are so beautiful, so wonderful-hearted, distributing books and working so hard. I was just really appreciating Prabhupāda and the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement. Prabhupāda had said something in the newsletter about book distribution, and it just touched me. We were so absorbed in books, books, books, that whenever Prabhupāda would say anything about book distribution, we would go nuts. That meant it was our connection to Prabhupāda. We weren't big guns who could sit at a meeting with Prabhupāda or get personal attention so much. Maybe during some morning walks at the Māyāpur festival we got to sneak in with the sannyāsīs, but otherwise our book distribution was our connection with Prabhupāda. When he would mention something about book distribution, it would be our life and soul.

Lavaṅga-latikā-devī dāśī: Having heard Śrīla Prabhupāda speak and knowing that he was always reading from these books, the Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, and that he was preaching that you have to distribute this knowledge to others made it all very simple. That is, you just knew that this was Śrīla Prabhupāda's desire. He was always telling us that he was giving us this knowledge and that once you have this knowledge, you have to distribute it to others. Śrīla Prabhupāda came to America to preach with his disciples. So we must do it, because it's Prabhupāda's desire. He spent so much time translating these books to be distributed. You just want to distribute to others, and you want people to have these books in their homes.

Vṛndāvana, India

April 20, 1975

Śrīla Prabhupāda installed the Deities for the grand opening of the Krishna-Balaram Mandir. Almost a thousand disciples were present, and the governor of Uttar Pradesh was the guest of honor. After years of hard endeavor, the grand opening was a climactic triumph for Śrīla Prabhupāda and his movement. While still standing at the altar after having offered the first āratī to Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma, Prabhupāda addressed the crowd, explaining that this was an international temple, where people from all over the world could come to worship and take shelter of Gaura-Nitai, Kṛṣṇa-Balarāma, and Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa.

Later that evening, Śrīla Prabhupāda sat in his room with a few G.B.C. men. The buttons on his kurtā open because of the heat, his legs and bare feet extended under the low table, he relaxed, and his men sat close around him in the dim light of the desk lamp. It was a milestone, he said, but still they had to go forward, not merely savor their success. Many things were still required to make the temple and guesthouse operative.

Śrīla Prabhupāda was thinking beyond Vṛndāvana. "This temple construction is so important," he said, "that I'm willing to spend many lakhs to open a temple like this. And yet as important as it is, the book production is even more important." This was a significant reaffirmation of the priority of book production; even while in the midst of this splendid temple opening, he was stressing that book production was more important.

Śrīla Prabhupāda seemed displeased, however, because for months his Caitanya-caritāmṛta had been delayed by his Sanskrit editor. He said with a scowl that although he had finished the Caitanya-caritāmṛta, it remained unpublished. He had also completed all four volumes of the Fourth Canto of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam and was beginning the Fifth, yet only one volume of the Fourth Canto had been published.

One of the devotees present, not understanding Prabhupāda's point, remarked that since Prabhupāda was going next to Hawaii he would be able to write there in peace and quiet. Prabhupāda replied that he was not encouraged to write when his manuscripts were not being published.

The BBT Press, after several years in New York, was about to relocate in Los Angeles, where Rāmeśvara would become the new BBT Press supervisor. Rāmeśvara, unaware of the delay in publishing the Caitanya-caritāmṛta manuscript, learned of it now, in Vṛndāvana. He promised Prabhupāda that he would immediately get the Press set up in Los Angeles and begin producing Caitanya-caritāmṛta.

That Śrīla Prabhupāda had completed the entire Caitanya-caritāmṛta manuscript in eighteen months during 1973 and 1974 was a remarkable feat. In those same months he had been intensely engaged in many affairs of management while constantly traveling. He had confronted major problems with leaders who had left their posts, he had personally attended to G.B.C. duties in India, and he had dealt with other ISKCON managerial affairs. He had authorized many large BBT loans and had approved the expansion and development of ISKCON in all areas of the world, in addition to responding regularly to large volumes of mail, speaking daily to guests, and giving Bhāgavatam lectures wherever he went. His only time for writing had been on arising at one in the morning, and he had persistently worked two or three hours each day.

While Śrīla Prabhupāda traveled from Vṛndāvana to Australia, Rāmeśvara and Rādhāvallabha worked in Los Angeles to establish the new BBT offices. Prabhupāda was still meditating on his completed Caitanya-caritāmṛta manuscript waiting to be published. From Australia he wrote,

The Caitanya-caritamṛta is complete (12 parts) and only 3 parts are published, and now the 5th Canto is almost finished. So why these books are not being published? This is our first business. Immediately these pending books (17 in total) must all be published. Why the delay? The U.S. printer's binding is better than Dai Nippon. So, some may be printed in the U.S. and some in Japan, but the pending books must be finished in a very short time. When I see so many books pending, it does not encourage me to translate. When I see books printed, I become encouraged to write more and more. We can talk this over more in Hawaii. Now you and Hansaduta expedite the publishing work. This is your business. And push on the selling. You request Tripurari Maharaja in this connection along with others. Now, Bhavananda Swami and Gargamuni Swami are there. They are also expert in pushing this on. By combined effort, publish as quickly as possible and immediately Caitanya-caritamṛta should be done.

In Los Angeles Rāmeśvara had only completed the lease arrangements for the new building for the Press. The BBT artists had just arrived, and editors, proofreaders, and other production workers would soon be coming. The Press had purchased a computer typesetter, and the devotees were being trained to use it. Carpenters knocked down walls to build a photo lab and darkroom. Additional plumbing had to be installed, and the entire Press had to be set up within one month. Śrīla Prabhupāda was coming in June, and everything would have to be ready and running.

By the time Śrīla Prabhupāda reached Hawaii in May, the Press in Los Angeles was preparing for operation. Śrīla Prabhupāda's secretary phoned Los Angeles often: "Prabhupāda is angry. He keeps talking about the unpublished books. You'd better be prepared when he arrives."

Rāmeśvara and Rādhāvallabha had investigated the necessities and the difficulties in printing the Caitanya-caritāmṛta manuscript, which they concluded would come to seventeen volumes. One of the main problems they discovered was the lack of an expert Bengali editor.

Most of the Caitanya-caritāmṛta was in Bengali. Although the BBT editors were experienced in Sanskrit, because they were not proficient in Bengali, the work was progressing slowly. Also Śrīla Prabhupāda wanted many paintings in his books, and the art department would need many months to meet his requests.

Never before had the BBT lagged so far behind Śrīla Prabhupāda. Rāmeśvara and Rādhāvallabha, straining their brains to produce books quickly and efficiently, devised a stepped-up production schedule. By the old schedule they could publish a book every three or four months, but on the new schedule they decided they could produce a book a month. In that way, they would eventually catch up with Śrīla Prabhupāda. Rāmeśvara was eager to present Prabhupāda with this plan when he came to Los Angeles.

More phone calls came from Prabhupāda's secretary. Prabhupāda had heard about the preparation of the Press buildings, but he had also heard that his name had not been displayed on the front of the BBT building. He was always insistent to preserve ISKCON's disciplic succession, foreseeing that unless ISKCON stressed A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami as the founder ācārya, in the future persons might claim their rights of ISKCON leadership or of ownership of ISKCON properties. In the rush for completing the buildings, the BBT managers had overlooked this important detail.

On arriving in Los Angeles, Śrīla Prabhupāda received a joyous welcome. He was accompanied by leading sannyāsīs and G.B.C. secretaries, including Kīrtanānanda Swami, Viṣṇujana Swami, Brahmānanda Swami, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami, and others. Later, sitting in his room—one of his favorites in all of ISKCON—he spoke only briefly about the backlog of unprinted books. He seemed mildly disturbed but said little. He was very pleased, however, to see the temple and the Deities of Rukmiṇī-Dvārakādhiśa.

In his short arrival speech he had explained why he was so urgently pressing his disciples to produce his books. "I have no personal qualification," he had said from the plushly upholstered vyāsāsana, "but I simply try to satisfy my guru, that's all. My Guru Mahārāja asked me that, 'If you get some money, you print books.' So there was a private meeting, talking. Some of my important Godbrothers also were there—it was in Rādhā-kunda. So Guru Mahārāja was speaking to me that, 'Since we have got this Baghbazar marble temple, there has been so much dissension. And everyone thinking who will occupy this room or that room. I wish therefore to sell this temple and the marble and print some books.' Yes, so I took up this from his mouth, that he is very fond of books. And he told me personally, 'If you get some money, print books.' Therefore I am stressing on this point—Where is book? Where is book? So kindly help me. That is my request. Print as many books as possible in as many languages as possible, and distribute throughout the whole world. Then the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement will automatically increase."

The next morning, while walking on Venice Beach, Śrīla Prabhupāda delivered an extraordinary ultimatum. Surrounded by devotees, he walked along, poking the sand softly with his cane. "These seventeen volumes unpublished," he began, "are a great problem for our movement."

"Yes, Prabhupāda," Rāmeśvara responded, attentive and concerned. The other devotees also nodded, commiserating. Something must be done.

"Yes," Prabhupāda continued, "they must be published immediately."

"Yes, Prabhupāda," Rāmeśvara replied obediently.

"So I think they can be printed in two months," Śrīla Prabhupāda said conclusively.

Rāmeśvara wasn't sure he had heard correctly. The Press had only just opened. The artists didn't even have the lights in their room. Two months was illogical, impossible. Now was the moment to tell Śrīla Prabhupāda the plan for increased production. Rāmeśvara stepped closer.

"Śrīla Prabhupāda," he began, "we've been meeting about this, and now that the Press is finally here and established, I think we can increase production four times. We think that now we can go from producing one book every four months to producing one of your books every month." Now both Rāmeśvara and Rādhāvallabha were walking together beside Śrīla Prabhupāda, with Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami and Brahmānanda Swami walking on his other side.

"One book every month," Śrīla Prabhupāda said, as if thinking out loud and considering it. "That means over one year. It is not fast enough." The other devotees looked over at Rāmeśvara and Rādhāvallabha, who glanced at each other.

"You have to do all the books in two months' time," Śrīla Prabhupāda said again. They had clearly heard it this time, and the two managers were stunned in disbelief.

"Śrīla Prabhupāda," Rāmeśvara said, "I think that's impossible. Maybe we can go faster..."

Śrīla Prabhupāda suddenly stopped walking. Planting his cane firmly in the sand, he turned to Rāmeśvara and said, without anger but very gravely, "Impossible is a word found in the fool's dictionary."

Suddenly Rāmeśvara realized his spiritual life was on the line. To say "impossible" now would mean he had no faith in Kṛṣṇa's representative, no faith in the power of God. He must throw away his material estimations and rational common sense.

While Rāmeśvara and Rādhāvallabha stood speechless, Śrīla Prabhupāda resumed walking, accompanied by the others. The two devotees hurried to catch up, but now everyone looked at them as if to say, "Come on. Stop doubting. You have to do it." Rāmeśvara asked Śrīla Prabhupāda if he could discuss this with the other devotees at the Press and then report back. "Oh, yes," Prabhupāda replied, "whatever is required." Rāmeśvara and Rādhāvallabha dropped back, while Śrīla Prabhupāda and the others continued down the beach.

Śrīla Prabhupāda returned to the temple and toured the new Press facilities—a graphic arts building and an editorial building. While walking outside on a second-floor veranda, he noticed below a two-foot strip of bare earth running between the two buildings. He seemed annoyed and said that they should plant grass there.

In the layout room a transparency of baby Kṛṣṇa carrying Nanda Mahārāja's shoes was on the light table, and Śrīla Prabhupāda began laughing when he saw it. He approved of the new typesetting equipment, which worked faster than the previous equipment, and when the devotees demonstrated it for him, he remarked that in India he had dreamed of having such a Press.

In Rādhāvallabha's office Prabhupāda sat in the production manager's chair and looked up at the large bulletin board that displayed all the steps in the production of a book. He laughed and said, "For someone like me, this makes it even more complicated."

Śrīla Prabhupāda walked into every room in the two buildings and saw all the equipment. This modern technology was fine, he concluded, as long as they could use it to meet the deadline of seventeen books in two months; otherwise, their equipment was like the technology of the material scientists who tried to go to the moon—useless.

All through the morning program in the temple, Rāmeśvara and Rādhāvallabha tried to concentrate on chanting their japa and on Prabhupāda's class, but all they could think of was arranging for the production of seventeen volumes in two months. And by the time they met with the Press workers, they had become convinced it could be done. It was as if some mystical power was going to descend. Somehow or other it could be done. So they presented the plan and convinced the other workers.

"It can be done," Rāmeśvara said later, talking with Śrīla Prabhupāda. "Hmmm," Śrīla Prabhupāda replied.

But there were some conditions, Rāmeśvara said. For the Bengali editing to go smoothly, the editors would have to be able to regularly consult Śrīla Prabhupāda. Immediately Prabhupāda agreed, adding that he was prepared to stay in Los Angeles as long as necessary to insure that they met the two-month deadline. Another condition Rāmeśvara raised was that the artists would be working as quickly as humanly possible, but the paintings might not be of the best quality. "A blind uncle is better than no uncle," Śrīla Prabhupāda said. When Rāmeśvara mentioned that the artists would have many technical questions, Prabhupāda agreed to make time to answer them. He also agreed that photographs of Indian holy places connected with Caitanya līlā could be used to supplement the paintings.

After their meeting with Śrīla Prabhupāda, Rāmeśvara and Rādhāvallabha felt that they had a chance. They left Śrīla Prabhupāda's room, running down the stairs. The marathon was on.

SPL 46: Preaching to America: Part 1

CHAPTER FORTY-SIX

Preaching to America:

Part 1

Although Śrīla Prabhupāda had said he would stay in Los Angeles, he soon decided to follow his original travel plans. Feeling compelled to see to the welfare of his disciples around the country, he left on a tour of thirteen ISKCON centers in the U.S. and Canada. About half a dozen of his sannyāsī disciples traveled with him.

Denver

Śrīla Prabhupāda was pleasantly surprised to see the brick church building that was now a Kṛṣṇa temple. The temple hall was spacious, and afternoon sunshine streamed into the room. He beheld the small golden forms of Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa on the altar and then walked to the rear of the hall, where he sat on the vyāsāsana, allowing the devotees to bathe his feet. These devotees, unaccustomed to being with their spiritual master, were awkward in performing the standard formalities. But they were enthusiastic and happy.

Sitting on the floor before Śrīla Prabhupāda, Daśaratha began singing O he vaiṣṇava Ṭhākura, accompanying himself on the harmonium. Śrīla Prabhupāda liked his singing and, when the song was finished, asked, "You know the meaning?"

Daśaratha replied, "“O venerable Vaiṣṇava, O ocean of mercy, please be merciful unto your servant.”"

Another devotee added, "“I pray for the shade of your lotus feet.”"

"Yes," Prabhupāda acknowledged, and he began to speak about the song's author, Narottama dāsa Ṭhākura. He then quoted another song by Narottama dāsa, chādiyā vaiṣṇava-sevā nistāra pāyeche kebā. This Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement is for nistāra, he said. "Nistāra means to be liberated from the capture of māyā. When we hear songs by the Vaiṣṇavas, that is called liberation."

Although the devotees had heard before of Narottama dāsa Ṭhākura and of liberation, they listened especially attentively now. Here was the Vaiṣṇava Ṭhākura in person, come to teach them to control their passions, to impart to them the strength to carry out the saṅkīrtana movement, and to bless them, as Narottama dāsa Ṭhākura described, "with one drop of faith with which to attain the great treasure of the holy name."

"So I am very glad to see this temple," Śrīla Prabhupāda said to the group of about forty devotees. "You have purchased it? That's nice. Very good space. And the devotees here are very nice. So, our process is very simple—that we dedicate our life to the service of the Vaiṣṇava, and according to his direction, we engage in śravaṇaṁ kīrtanam, hearing and chanting of Viṣṇu. And refrain from the sinful activities. Then life is successful. We do not require to be very learned or very rich man or to take birth in very high family."

For driving Śrīla Prabhupāda to the park, a friend of the Denver temple had lent his Lincoln Continental, formerly Richard Nixon's presidential limousine. Brahmānanda Swami pointed out the car's luxurious features to Prabhupāda, including bulletproof glass windows.

"So bullet is expected also?" Prabhupāda laughed.

Brahmānanda remarked that the world leaders were always in anxiety. Prabhupāda agreed—in the material world there was danger at every step.

He began talking of Indian politics: Indira Gandhi and Jayaprakash Narayan in bitter disagreement. "Both of them are in distressed position," Prabhupāda said. "I am thinking of writing them on the basis of our Bhagavad-gītā. Do you think it is advised?" When Śrīla Prabhupāda mentioned that Indira Gandhi occasionally went to see her guru, Ānandamayī, Brahmānanda remarked that her guru had commented favorably about the chanting of Hare Kṛṣṇa.

"So, what do you think?" Prabhupāda asked his sannyāsīs, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, Bhavānanda, and Satsvarūpa. "Shall I write? Hmmm? I have made a draft of a letter this night. So you come and see. Let us take a chance. We want good for everyone, and this is the only medicine, Hare Kṛṣṇa, for all wrongs. Para-duḥkha-dukhī. People are suffering."

The devotees agreed the letters would be a good idea, although they doubted whether the politicians would take the advice or even read such letters.

Prabhupāda then asked about the public's response to Kṛṣṇa consciousness in Denver.

"They get nice attendance on Sundays," Satsvarūpa answered. "Many people come."

"There is good hope," Prabhupāda affirmed.

"Good book distribution here, too."

Prabhupāda nodded. "That is the most successful. Wherever book distribution is going on nicely, that is successful. Because people are in gross ignorance, they are taking this temporary life as everything. Very horrible condition. We are trying to explain what is the actual life."

They arrived at the park, which was filled with tall old pines, maples, and oaks. Getting out of the car, Prabhupāda stood facing a pond. In the distance he could see the Denver skyline and the Rocky Mountains. He could hear the quacking of ducks and geese from the pond.

A second carload of devotees arrived, and Prabhupāda and his followers began walking along a paved path beside the lake. "Very nice park," Prabhupāda remarked, "and not far away."

They soon came upon a large modern building, the Museum of Natural History. "That means Darwin's theory, that's all," said Prabhupāda. "Their whole civilization is based on this Darwin's theory. How long you shall keep history? Do you know what is the history of the sun, when it was created, when it came into appearance? Can Darwin give us the history of the sun, or the moon, or the sky? Where is the history? There is history, but where is your history? You simply imagine, "There was a chunk, and it became manifested as the sun, moon. And I am also this.' What do you actually know? How has this cosmic manifestation come into existence?"

The sun rose with dazzling, golden rays and quickly warmed the air. The devotees offered Prabhupāda information about Denver, "the mile- high city." It was good for health, they said. Prabhupāda said the climate was as in Punjab, the upcountry in India. He also heard how Colorado was known as "cow country" because its main industry was slaughter.

Prabhupāda walked past a zoo and down a hill. He passed a Civil War cannon and saw many colorful flower beds, expansive lawns, and everywhere the tall pines. Although the air seemed chilly for July, the brightness of the rising sun was unusual, and the natural scenery of the park stood out sharply. Śrīla Prabhupāda also appeared bathed in golden light as he walked briskly, wrapped in his gray cādar, talking from time to time with his disciples.

Prabhupāda mentioned Gopal Agarwal, the man at whose home he had first stayed after arriving in America in 1965. Gopal's father, he said, was a very rich man in Mathurā, and Gopal had come to America to be an electrical engineer. He was not doing as well as he would have by staying in India, Prabhupāda said. Gopal's wife, Sally, used to say, "My husband is a lost child of his parents."

"People are working so hard day and night for these temporary years," Prabhupāda said, "although by laboring less than that, they can go back to Godhead. Just to get a nice car, a nice wife and a few children by working so hard. And by the same labor, if he devotes himself to Kṛṣṇa consciousness then he goes back home, back to Godhead. And what is wrong there? We have got so many Kṛṣṇa conscious devotees. What is wrong there, compared to these ordinary karmīs? Hmm? Are you unhappy? What do you think? All their efforts will be finished, and after death they will become a cat or a dog or a tree."

Devotee: "Sometimes, Śrīla Prabhupāda, even if we explain this and the people seem to understand, still they won't do anything about it."

Prabhupāda: "So you have to constantly poke them. Just like when a man is sleeping, you have to call him constantly, "Mr. John! Mr. John! Wake up, you rascal! Why are you sleeping? You have got this opportunity of human form of life. Now get up! Take to Kṛṣṇa consciousness and solve all your problems.' "

Devotee: "Some people say that if we want to do this it's all right, but we shouldn't preach and insist to them. Everyone has his own way."

Śrīla Prabhupāda: "But you are a human being You rascal, you are sleeping! And we are just trying to awaken you. Suppose a child was going off to one side where there is danger. We are human beings, so we shall say, "No, no, go to the right.' We shall try to save him. That is our business, to do good to others. That is the mission of Caitanya Mahāprabhu. Not that, "This man is going to hell, so let him go to hell. But at least I am happy.' That is not humane."

Devotee: "A lot of times, Śrīla Prabhupāda, they feel we're just escaping material life. They say we don't have jobs and that we should work for a living."

Prabhupāda (addressing an imaginary challenger): "You rascal! You have no money—you work. But we are rich men. We are Kṛṣṇa's sons. So why shall I work like you, an ass? An ass will work unnecessarily. We are not asses."

Bhagavad-gītā, Prabhupāda said, establishes Lord Kṛṣṇa as the proprietor of everything. The servants of Kṛṣṇa, therefore, should not be expected to work hard like asses. Asses work hard, not human beings. This was also the instruction of Rṣabhadeva in the Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam. Rṣabhadeva told His sons that human life is not meant for working hard simply for food and sex enjoyment. That was the business of hogs.

Prabhupāda: "Tell them they are working like hogs, and we are living like human beings. That is the difference. If somebody does not work hard like a hog, does that mean he is escaping?"

Śrīla Prabhupāda continued to vigorously develop his theme. He argued very seriously and yet in a delightful way, showing the fortune of one who becomes a servant of the Supreme Personality of Godhead. The devotees could not refrain from smiling and laughing as they hurried to keep up with his pace and with his Kṛṣṇa conscious logic.

Prabhupāda: "I was a student of economics. There we learned Marshall's theory. He says that human nature is such that unless a person has obligation, he will not work. That is the beginning of economics. If one already has something sufficient to eat, then he will not work. So if we have sufficient to eat, why shall we work? What is the answer? This is not escaping, it is coming to the light. To not work and yet get our necessities is comfort. But to work hard just to get the bare necessities of life, that is for the hogs and dogs."

Devotee: "They have no faith or trust that this can be done."

Prabhupāda: "See us, you rascal! See! Open your eyes! See that we have no business. We have no food stock. Still we are not worried. We do not know what we shall eat in the evening, but still we are not worried. I came to your country without any subsistence." Prabhupāda argued that man's economic necessities could be easily settled by keeping cows and land. He said that men have made an unnecessary, complex arrangement just for maintaining the body, thereby forgetting the purpose of human life. When a devotee contended that not everyone had the opportunity to get land, Prabhupāda said that this was simply mismanagement. There was plenty of land in America.

Devotee: "Śrīla Prabhupāda, they accuse us of being parasites."

Śrīla Prabhupāda: "No. A parasite means if he takes others' property and tries to enjoy it. But we are not enjoying others' property. We are enjoying our father's property. Īśāvāsyam idaṁ sarvaṁ. Kṛṣṇa is the proprietor. Why do you say parasite? We are good children of Kṛṣṇa, and Kṛṣṇa says, "Don't work. I shall give you everything." Actually Kṛṣṇa says that: "Why are you working so hard? Just surrender to Me and I will give you protection—whatever you want." So we are giving everything. Why say parasite?"

The devotees were well aware that Śrīla Prabhupāda did work, traveling constantly, managing his worldwide Kṛṣṇa conscious society, rising in the middle of the night to translate Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam. And his disciples also worked hard. But they did not work like animals and animal-like persons for things that would be destroyed in time, and they did not work at horrible enterprises that ruined the best part of human nature. They did not work like asses and claim they had no time left in the day to chant the holy name of God.

Prabhupāda: “Now this is a nice park, but nobody is coming here. We Kṛṣṇa conscious people, we are taking advantage. So they are escaping or we are escaping? Just see how foolish they are. They work so hard, but they are not taking advantage. But we are taking. So our policy is that you work hard, and we go and take from you. This is not escaping, this is intelligence.”

Śrīla Prabhupāda's example was a delightful revelation to the devotees, and they laughed at the obvious truth. Here they were, walking so pleasantly with their spiritual master, and yet no one else was coming to enjoy the park.

Prabhupāda: “But as soon as we ask, ‘You also come and join,’ they will not. They say, ‘No, we shall work like this.’ We are asking everyone, ‘Come here,’ but they will not come. That is their enviousness. Therefore they say we are escaping and living at the cost of others. They see that we have got so many cars and the devotees' faces are bright. We are eating nicely and have no problems. But if we ask them to come, then it is very difficult. If we ask them to chant Hare Kṛṣṇa and dance, oh, it is a very big, heavy task for them. As soon as they will come, they will know that there is no tea, no liquor, no meat, no cigarette. So you can say that we are escaping these things. But we are not escaping happiness. They are escaping happiness.”

When Śrīla Prabhupāda did not have a specific engagement in Denver, a few of his men sometimes gathered in his room. Occasionally he would provoke some of them into a mock debate with him.

Śrīla Prabhupāda: “Everything must come from something. No one can deny that. Now we give our challenge: Do you know what that Absolute Truth is?”

Brahmānanda: “We know there is an Absolute Truth, but at this time we cannot directly say what it is.”

Prabhupāda immediately replied that if a person admits not knowing the Absolute Truth, then that person has no grounds for rejecting the Vedic explanation of the Absolute. That person cannot deny Kṛṣṇa is the Absolute Truth. “If you don't know the philosophy,” Prabhupāda said, “then you must agree to hear from an authority who does.”

Satsvarūpa: “Yes, that argument is logical, and we should at least listen to you. But we have heard so many versions of the truth. Why should we accept your version?”

Prabhupāda: "That is like saying, 'I have come across so many counterfeit coins. Why should I think there are real coins?' There are counterfeit coins, and there must also be genuine coins. It is our misfortune if we are unable to distinguish the real coins from the counterfeit coins."

Another sannyāsī challenged that the Kṛṣṇa conscious version was dogmatic, since there were many truths and many gods. But the Absolute Truth is one, Śrīla Prabhupāda replied, because God is one. God has no competitors. If a person does not accept Kṛṣṇa as God, then he has to present someone who is more fully God than Kṛṣṇa. But if someone does not know who is God, then that person cannot deny Kṛṣṇa.

"If you speak that way," Prabhupāda continued, "then you are being dogmatic. You do not know what God is, yet dogmatically you are saying that Kṛṣṇa is not God."

Prabhupāda compared those who deny the supremacy of Kṛṣṇa to owls who do not open their eyes to see the sunlight. Such persons demand to see God, but when God comes before them personally or when He sends His pure representative, they will not see.

On another morning walk in Denver, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami told Prabhupāda that some of the devotees were reading books about health diets and were avoiding the prasādam offered to the Deity in the temple. Śrīla Prabhupāda immediately replied that this was not good. Fasting, he acknowledged, was good for health, but the devotees should not become weak. They should take prasādam and do their work.

When one of the devotees told Prabhupāda he got drowsy after eating heavily of grains and therefore preferred fruit, Prabhupāda said that was all right; fruit was offered to the Deity. When Yadubara said that in Los Angeles the families often cooked in their own homes instead of taking the prasādam of the Deity, Bhavānanda Goswami testified how wonderful it was at the Māyāpur festival when hundreds of devotees sat down and took prasādam together.

Prabhupāda: "Yes, what is the difficulty? Capātis, rice, they are innocent foods. What is the difficulty?"

Harikeśa: "A lot of devotees are quoting you. They say there is no need to eat grains and that you said that grains were for the animals."

Prabhupāda: "But I am eating grains."

Harikeśa: "I tell them that."

Prabhupāda: "They say, 'Prabhupāda says.' Then you believe that."

Prabhupāda said that devotees should not listen to health advice if it resulted in their refusing to honor the Lord's prasādam.

Prabhupāda: "Therefore, follow taking prasādam. Let whatever may happen."

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa: "Let us die eating prasādam."

Prabhupāda: "Yes. [Laughter.] That is devotee. But we must prepare very first class foodstuffs. And then, where is the complaint, if it is first class?"

Returning from the walk, Śrīla Prabhupāda continued to discuss the topic in Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam class: "I was hearing that we are not taking prasādam—especially the gṛhasthas. No. That is not good. You should take prasādam." Prabhupāda described how bhakti-yoga begins with controlling the tongue—by chanting and by eating kṛṣṇa-prasādam.

"So in our branches," he continued, "all the devotees take prasādam together. That is nice. Why we should not be liking to take prasādam in the temple? What is the fault? No, this is not good. Everyone should take prasādam.... It is called prasāda-sevā [service], not prasādam enjoyment. Prasādam means giving service. Prasādam is as good as Kṛṣṇa and should be respected as good as Kṛṣṇa. So one must have faith that it is not material. Those who are attached to the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement and are attached to the service, they should take prasādam—first-class prasādam. Everyone likes the taste of prasādam."

July 2, 1975

On the plane from Denver to Chicago, Prabhupāda scanned a Time magazine essay on crime, a cover story entitled, "Crime: Why and What To Do?" Landing at O'Hare Airport, he was greeted by hundreds of cheering devotees and the press.

"Your Divine Grace," Śrī Govinda, the Chicago temple president, said, pushing forward, "this is Ms. Jones from NBC television."

"How do you do?" smiled Ms. Jones, and several other reporters held microphones before Prabhupāda. "I would like to know what the occasion is. Why are you visiting Chicago?"

"Just now I have seen one article in Time magazine," Śrīla Prabhupāda replied. He raised his right hand in an instructing gesture and leaned against the cane he held in his left hand. "It was four or five pages," he continued—" 'Crime: Why and How to Solve It?' If you are serious, then you can take our method and suggestions. Then you can stop this crime."

"You have a way to stop the crime?"

"Oh, yes, I have."

"Can you explain a little bit more how you do it?"

Śrīla Prabhupāda nodded. "That we have to suggest. The social, political, educational, cultural—everything has to be changed. So if you come, we can give you in details how it can be done."

Ms. Jones dropped the issue and asked Prabhupāda how he felt about his welcome. She seemed unnerved by the devotees crowding around to see and hear Śrīla Prabhupāda.

"By God's grace," Śrīla Prabhupāda said, "wherever I go they welcome me like that."

Ms. Jones: "Are you used to anything a bit more serene?"

"Serene?" Prabhupāda thoughtfully considered the word as they all stood together in the midst of the noisy, heavily trafficked airport. "Of course, our whole propaganda is serene," he said. "Yes. We are distributing God consciousness. It is the most serene movement. People have to learn it very nicely."

"Thank you," said Ms. Jones. She had gotten enough.

But Prabhupāda added a last word. "My message is to stop the crimes of your country. This is my sum and substance. You have read the article in Time magazine, 'Crime and How to Stop It'? So if you take my advice, that can be stopped."

"The world is simply full of criminals," Prabhupāda continued, seated in the back seat of the car as they pulled away from the airport's entrance. "Crime means pāpī, sinful." To Śrīla Prabhupāda it seemed to make no difference that he was sitting in a car with a few disciples and not speaking with the press. "If simply by law you want to suppress them, it will not be successful. Deliver them. Then you also come along with them. Not that these criminals only should be delivered, and you will go on continuing with criminal activities, slaughterhouse and killing the child in the womb. You are criminal yourself. The whole state."

Śrīla Prabhupāda sat waiting for his massage to begin. His regular daily schedule was to take a massage at 11:30 A.M., before bathing and taking prasādam. But today, because of his plane travel, his routine was interrupted. Nevertheless, he wanted to follow his general program as far as possible. Upendra was getting mustard oil and the mat for Śrīla Prabhupāda to sit on.

"So we can solve this," Prabhupāda said to the few disciples with him. "Why not invite them to hear us, how we can solve? We can arrange big, big meetings on this point. 'Crime: Why and What To Do?' A very suitable headline it is."

Prabhupāda continued to develop a Kṛṣṇa conscious analysis of crime. As long as society violates the laws of nature, he said, there must be crime. He thought it significant that, according to the Time article, the leaders of the country were actually wondering what to do about the increasing crime rate and that they were admitting they didn't know the solution. "Now," he said, "our business is to give the solution to these leaders, if they actually want the welfare of the country."

All the problems could be solved by Kṛṣṇa consciousness, Śrīla Prabhupāda had often said, and now he was eager to tackle the particular problem of crime. America's leaders were admitting their bewilderment, and if they were actually sincere, then they might accept the Kṛṣṇa conscious solution. Prabhupāda was keen to preach to the government leaders; Kṛṣṇa consciousness was meant especially for them. Bhagavad-gītā stated that the rājarṣis, or saintly kings, should disseminate the teachings of the Gītā to the citizens. But were the leaders actually serious? Śrīla Prabhupāda wondered. He was serious, and he anticipated the special opportunity that might arise here in Chicago to preach to the leaders about ending crime.

While sitting with a group of disciples in his room, Śrīla Prabhupāda asked for a particular Bhāgavatam verse to be read, and he gave the opening Sanskrit, kāmasya nendriya-prītiḥ.

Harikeśa read, "A completely bewildered material civilization is wrongly directed toward the fulfillment of desires in sense gratification. In such civilization, in all spheres of life, the ultimate end is sense gratification. In politics, social service, altruism, philanthropy and ultimately in religion or even in salvation, the very same tint of sense gratification is ever-increasingly predominant. In the political field leaders of men fight with one another to fulfill their personal sense gratification."

Śrīla Prabhupāda interrupted, "Now in India this is happening. All these things are foreseen. I have already discussed all this in the purport. Then?"

Harikeśa continued reading: "The voters adore the so-called leaders only when they promise sense gratification. As soon as the voters are dissatisfied in their own sense satisfaction, they dethrone the leaders. The leaders must always dissatisfy the voters by not satisfying their senses."

Again Prabhupāda interrupted. "There are protest meetings and processions, but nobody will be able to satisfy them, because they do not know how to keep the mass of people satisfied. These rascals, they do not know. I have always said they are rascals. Now they ask, 'What to do?' They will face so many problems. 'What to do?'—this is the beginning. The whole world will be in chaos if they do not take to Kṛṣṇa consciousness. So many 'What to do?' will come. Just tell them that here is the remedy. Now it is the time for preaching. They are thinking. They are sleeping, but now they are thinking what to do. They are blindly following sense gratification, and now it has come to the stage of what to do.

"This is the opportunity for preaching. We are the only persons who can give solution. There is no other group or any man in the world. We are only. So let them take advantage of our knowledge and apply. Now all the sannyāsīs have got the good opportunity to preach."

The ISKCON temple was in the Chicago suburb of Evanston, and on July 4, the day after Prabhupāda's arrival, Edgar Vaneman Jr., the mayor of Evanston, came to visit Prabhupāda in his apartment.

Immediately Prabhupāda referred to the Time news article on crime. "The remedy," he said, "is to train first-class men." He told the mayor briefly of the Vedic society's four natural divisions, pointing out that society had become so degraded that everyone is in the fourth class, the lowest class—and sinking. The only hope was to train some first-class and second-class men.

"We certainly need a new approach," admitted Mayor Vaneman, "because we're not being successful now."

After less than half an hour's conversation, Śrīla Prabhupāda was ready to make a bold request. Previously Jagadīśa, the G.B.C. secretary for Chicago, had mentioned that a very large municipally-owned building across the street was vacant. Śrīla Prabhupāda decided to ask the mayor to donate it. Already he had explained to the mayor that Kṛṣṇa consciousness could stop crime and drug addiction, and he now asked Harikeśa to read a letter by Dr. Stillson Judah, author of Hare Krishna and the Counterculture. In the letter Dr. Judah appreciated Kṛṣṇa consciousness for "transforming lives from drug-addicted hippies to loving servants of Kṛṣṇa and humanity."

"So we can stop this, provided we are given the facility to work on," said Prabhupāda. When the mayor replied yes, Śrīla Prabhupāda made his request.

"So I was thinking," Prabhupāda said, "just in front of here there is a very nice house, Merrywood, a big house. You have knowledge about this house?"

The mayor replied that this building was to be the new city hall of Evanston. Śrīla Prabhupāda had not been told about this, and he hesitated, while the mayor spoke of how the city's offices, scattered for so long in nine different locations, could now all be together in this one building.

"But this is more important," Prabhupāda said. "City service is going on, but criminals are increasing. So why not give us a little opportunity?"

Mayor Vaneman explained politely that he would have to talk with the city manager, tactfully excusing himself from commitment.

"If we get a good place," Prabhupāda continued, "with the cooperation of the authorities, then our simple program is, as Professor Judah has remarked, to turn drug-addicted hippies into devotees. We shall invite everyone to come and chant Hare Kṛṣṇa mantra and take prasādam. I began this movement in New York, alone. And these boys gradually came to me. But my process was this: chanting and giving them prasādam. Everyone will be glad to accept it. They will read these books. These devotees here are practical examples. I am a poor Indian. I did not bribe them, neither have I any money." Prabhupāda laughed. "So now they have dedicated their lives for this purpose. So I want to do it on a large scale."

But there were practical alternatives. Perhaps, Prabhupāda suggested, the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement could use part of the building for a year. He continued describing the efficacy of Kṛṣṇa consciousness. But the mayor had little else to say. Prabhupāda had prasādam brought in and asked his guest if he had any further inquiry.

"No, I really don't think I do," Mayor Vaneman replied, "but I think I'd like to learn more about your movement. And I have enjoyed talking and listening to you, and I appreciate it."

After the mayor left, one of Prabhupāda's disciples questioned why they would want such a big building. The Chicago temple was large and not at all crowded.

"My idea is," Prabhupāda said, "I want to draw the attention of the authorities. If they cooperate, then we can push on our movement more vigorously."

"But with our present location here, we cannot?" a devotee asked.

"We are doing it on a small scale," Prabhupāda explained. "It is going on. But if we get support from the authorities, we can push on in a larger scale."

Lieutenant David Mozee, public relations representative of the Chicago police department, was interested in Śrīla Prabhupāda's idea for stopping crime, and Śrīla Prabhupāda offered his simple proposal. The government should give ISKCON a large building, where the devotees could regularly hold mass kīrtanas and distribute prasādam, and gradually people would become purified. Lieutenant Mozee, like Mayor Vaneman, was respectful and interested.

"Unless you clean the heart," Śrīla Prabhupāda said, "you cannot stop criminality simply by laws. The laws are already known by the thief and murderer, but still they commit, because the heart is unclean. And our process is to cleanse the heart."

"A very difficult task, sir," said Lieutenant Mozee.

Prabhupāda replied that it wasn't difficult; he was already doing it on a small scale. "They are faced with the problem 'Why crime and what to do?'" he said, "and we are giving the answer. So you take advantage of it. Why crime? We are saying because they are godless. And what to do? Chant Hare Kṛṣṇa and take prasādam. Now if you like you can take. Otherwise we are doing our own business. Just like a poor medical man—he is also giving medicine. But if he is given facility, he can open a big hospital. That is our proposition. We are already doing that business, but if we get facility from the authorities then we can open a big place, a big hospital. And the problem is already big. Otherwise, why are they saying, 'What to do?'"

Illinois state assemblyman John Porter, who came with his wife, also asked about the solution to crime, but he had a more direct, personal interest in spiritual life. Was it possible, he asked, to make spiritual advancement without living in the temple? Śrīla Prabhupāda told him yes, if he chanted Hare Kṛṣṇa, which he could do anywhere. And he should read the standard books of the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement.

Mr. Porter also inquired about the Kṛṣṇa conscious understanding of certain Christian theological points, such as original sin and salvation. Śrīla Prabhupāda, however, did not indulge in discussing theoretical or comparative religion but emphasized the necessity of strictly following the instructions given by God or His representative. "The main business," Prabhupāda said, "is to understand God."

Mr. Porter seemed unlikely to help the devotees get a large building, but he had inquired humbly about spiritual life. Prabhupāda's unstinting deliverance of Kṛṣṇa consciousness was not conditional. If anyone sincerely inquired, be he assemblyman or criminal, Śrīla Prabhupāda was always eager to give him the mercy of Lord Caitanya.

Śrīla Prabhupāda's Chicago visit included several important functions at the temple. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami and Viṣṇujana Swami had come to Chicago to see Śrīla Prabhupāda and to recommend for initiation seventy-five new men who had joined their Rādhā-Dāmodara traveling saṅkīrtana party. And at the end of the week Prabhupāda would be attending a Ratha-yatra procession in downtown Chicago.

Each morning he lectured in the large hall at the Evanston temple before several hundred devotees, speaking about the life of Ajāmila. Each day he would tell more of the history of the sinner Ajāmila, who was saved at the time of death by calling out the name of God, Nārāyaṇa. On the fourth morning Prabhupāda was explaining how Ajāmila had named one of his sons Nārāyaṇa.

"So the idea is that by God's grace, in the beginning of his life Ajāmila engaged himself to be Kṛṣṇa conscious and was initiated. Then years later Kṛṣṇa gave him the advice, "All right, you keep this youngest son's name Nārāyaṇa. Because you'll be naturally attached to this body, and you will call him, "Nārāyaṇa, Nārāyaṇa, please come here. Nārāyaṇa, take your food. Nārāyaṇa, take your drink." So you will chant Nārāyaṇa.' "

Śrīla Prabhupāda suddenly became stunned, unable to speak. Such a thing had happened before, but rarely. He remained in trance, while a pregnant silence held the room. The devotees could see that Prabhupāda was experiencing a powerful spiritual emotion. Many of them felt that when he had called out "Nārāyaṇa," he had come face to face with Nārāyaṇa; he was seeing Kṛṣṇa, who was showing how very pleased He was with His pure devotee.

Surely Kṛṣṇa was very pleased with Prabhupāda, and although Prabhu pāda was fully engaged with the details of his movement within the material world, Kṛṣṇa was with him, giving him assurance from the spiritual world. For the devotees this moment confirmed the existence of the spiritual world and confirmed that Prabhupāda belonged to that world and was only visiting the material world to give Kṛṣṇa consciousness. Most of the devotees were neophytes, still attached to the material and having little vision of the spiritual. But now they could see the spiritual world through Śrīla Prabhupāda's ecstatic trance.

After about a minute, Śrīla Prabhupāda returned to external consciousness. "All right," he said. And then, with the same words he used to end all his lectures, he said, "Thank you very much." Then devotees began a rousing, melodic kīrtana. It had been a special moment, and they kept it in their hearts.

Śrīla Prabhupāda held a press conference at the Sheraton Chicago, and the turnout by TV and the press was good. Sitting on a cushion on a platform, surrounded by his sannyāsis, Prabhupāda lectured to a group of media people, who sat patiently. He introduced his topic as "Talking about the spiritual existence of the living being," and described the unavoidable miseries of the material world and how to transcend them by learning to love God and thus return to the eternal, spiritual world. Those persons endeavoring to attain this spiritual goal are first-class men, he said, and he described the four natural social divisions. On concluding, he called for questions.

A reporter challenged that the four divisions of society were contrary to everything in American tradition, but Śrīla Prabhupāda replied that only training was required. America was training doctors, engineers, lawyers, and America could train some first-class men.

Woman reporter: "Where do women fit into this social structure? You keep referring to a man."

Prabhupāda replied that a woman was a man's (her husband's) assistant. If a woman was faithful to a first-class man (a brāhmaṇa), then she also became first class. If she was married to a second-class man (a kṣatriya), then she would be considered second class. If she was married to a third-class man (a vaiśya), then she was third class. According to the status of her husband, she became first, second, third, or fourth.

Woman reporter: "You mean she's not qualified as first, second, or third class until she's married?"

Śrīla Prabhupāda: "Yes, a woman requires protection. In childhood she should be protected by the father, in youth by the husband, and in old age by the elderly sons."

The same reporter asked if Prabhupāda thought Indira Gandhi was having political trouble because she was a woman and therefore incapable.

"Why are you trying to put me in the emergency law?" Prabhupāda laughed. He then quoted Cāṇakya Paṇḍita: "Never trust a woman or a politician."

Prabhupāda had created a sensation, and within a few hours Chicago's radio and TV stations were talking of the news conference, concentrating almost entirely on his comments about women. A woman alderman, scheduled to visit Prabhupāda, phoned to say that she was cancelling because of Śrīla Prabhupāda's expressed attitudes toward women. A TV station phoned and requested to come over that evening to do an interview.

While the Chicago news reporters wrote their stories for the evening and morning editions, Prabhupāda's comments were further picked up by United Press International and Associated Press wire services. Śrīla Prabhupāda had wanted to reach the public with his Kṛṣṇa conscious message, and therefore he had arrived in Chicago with the specific idea of broadcasting his solution to crime; but now he had hit on a topic that was attracting far more attention. He had had the boldness to assert, in the midst of America's predominant mood of women's liberation, woman's real place in society.

The devotees were excited by the controversy and were eager to understand the Kṛṣṇa consciousness philosophy more deeply and to present it exactly.

They complained that none of the reporters had delved deeply or allowed Prabhupāda to express his ideas of spiritual equality, yet when Prabhupāda heard that evening that he had touched off so much media response, he was amused. He was ready to tell them more.

"Why only the woman should become pregnant?" he said, reiterating his point before the small group of devotees in his room. "The man goes away, and she has to take care of the children and beg from the government. Is that independence?"

Devotee: "Then the independence has become contraception. They say, 'I do not want to have the child.' "

Prabhupāda: "That means you commit another sinful activity. You will be punished."

Devotee: "Śrīla Prabhupāda, the whole civilization, American Western civilization, is now bewildered by this theory of women's liberation."

Prabhupāda: "But how they will be liberated? On this point first of all let me know. Anyway, I am not speaking of my experience. When we speak, we speak from the śāstra. Women's dependence is described in Manu-saṁhitā. Just like Queen Kuntī—she is not an ordinary woman. She was learned and exalted."

Brahmānanda Swami: "This is one point. In our devotional line there are spiritual leaders who have been women, such as Kuntī."

Prabhupāda: "Therefore I say that Kuntī remained dependent on her sons. That is my proposition. Her sons were banished. But when they went to the forest she followed, because she thought, 'I am a widow. I am dependent on my sons. So wherever they remain, I shall remain.' Similarly Sītā, the wife of Lord Rāmacandra. Lord Rāmacandra was requested by His father to go to the forest, not Sītā. But she preferred to go with her husband. When her husband said, 'You are not banished. You stay at home,' she said, 'No. I am dependent on You. Wherever You shall go, I must go.' This is Vedic culture."

Devotee: "Her chastity was her great virtue. But nowadays that is no longer true."

Prabhupāda: "Nowadays may be different, but I am speaking the Vedic idea. That's all. In all circumstances, unless her husband is crazy or something like that—mad—in every case, the wife is faithful and subservient to the husband. Even the husband goes out of home, vānaprastha, the wife also goes with him. When he takes sannyāsa, at that time there is no accompanying of wife. Otherwise, in gr̥hastha life and even vānaprastha life, the wife is the constant companion and subservient. Gāndhārī—her husband was blind. So when the marriage settlement was done, she was not blind, but she voluntarily became blind by wrapping cloth over her eyes. There are instances in the Vedic literature. The wife remains always faithful and subservient to the husband. That is her perfection. The Americans may not like this idea, but that is a different thing."

A five-person TV crew arrived at Prabhupāda's apartment—four women and a male assistant. Obviously they were making a point. While the crew set up their lights and equipment, Prabhupāda sat serenely behind his low desk, a few of his disciples sitting before him on the floor.

The interviewer first asked Prabhupāda about his solutions to America's problems. Comparing society to the human body, Prabhupāda replied that while all parts of the body were important, the head was the most important. Without a properly functioning head, the person (or society) was mad. There was need, therefore, for training first-class men.

"Where do women fit into these four classes?" the newswoman asked. Śrīla Prabhupāda duly repeated that woman, being subordinate to man, had her position according to the position of her husband.

And so it went. The questions were challenges—"Do you think I'm inferior to you?" The interviewer was out to make Prabhupāda appear prejudiced, but he spoke only pure philosophy.

"Spiritually they are all one," Prabhupāda said. Yet he emphasized a distinction, materially, between man and woman. "For example," he said, "women can bear children, but the man cannot. Is it possible for the man to become pregnant?"

Interviewer: "What happens when women are not subordinate to men?"

Prabhupāda: "Then there is disruption, social disruption. Therefore in the Western countries there are so many divorce cases, because the woman does not agree to become subordinate to man."

Interviewer: "What advice do you have to women who do not want to become subordinate to men?"

Prabhupāda: "It is not my advice, but it is the advice of the Vedic knowledge that woman should be chaste and faithful to man."

Śrīla Prabhupāda returned to the point that women bear children but men cannot. "By nature's way," he said, "as soon as you get children you require support from the husband. Otherwise you are in difficulty."

Interviewer: "Many woman have children and have no support from their husbands. They have no husband."

Prabhupāda: "Then they have to take support from others. You cannot deny that. The government is giving you support. But the government is embarrassed. If the husband supports the wife and children, the government is relieved of so much welfare contribution. So that is a problem. Man and woman unite. The woman becomes pregnant, and the husband goes away. Then the poor woman is embarrassed with the child. She has to beg from the government. So do you think it is a very nice thing? The Vedic idea is that woman should be married to a man and the man should take charge of the woman and the children so that they do not become a burden to the government or to the public."

Interviewer: "What about women who do not have children?"

Prabhupāda: "Well, that is another unnatural thing. Sometimes they use contraceptives. They kill children—abortion. That is also not very good. These are all sinful activities. One has to suffer for them."

It was a heated interview—the feminist interviewer set on disparaging Prabhupāda for his outrageous remarks. Yet he remained strong and uncompromising, arguing in such a way as to point out many anomalies of materialistic civilization.

Prabhupāda didn't discriminate against women as a class and in fact gave women in his Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement the same opportunity as men. Although the reporter misunderstood him, labeling him as a male chauvinist, actually he was compassionate. According to the Vedic view, women should be protected from exploitative men. Prabhupāda was aware that his words were not being appreciated, but he continued, hopeful that the truth would prevail and that intelligent people would understand. The important point was liberation, not temporary social or sexist stances.

After the TV crew left, Prabhupāda continued the discussion. He said that their becoming angry showed their defeat. They were unwilling to accept logic.

Prabhupāda: "This women's liberation is not successful. It has caused disaster. When the women become dependent on the welfare gift of the government, then the government has to raise taxes heavily for this purpose. If they think it is not a problem, then what can be said? By nature's way, if the husband takes care of the wife and children, this problem is solved immediately. But the man takes advantage and goes away after making the woman pregnant. And the woman is embarrassed, and the government is embarrassed."

Devotee: "And the child grows up to be a criminal."

Prabhupāda: "Yes, that is another problem. So they are not far-seeing. Therefore we have to take advice from Kṛṣṇa. We are spreading this knowledge that you take your counsel from Kṛṣṇa, then you will be happy."

Satsvarūpa: "Śrīla Prabhupāda, if we speak these things on television and the newspapers and people become angry, if all the people become angry like she just did, is it still good propaganda for us?"

Prabhupāda: "No. Then we chant Hare Kṛṣṇa. But in the Bhagavad-gītā everything is discussed—varṇa-saṅkara and the first-class man, the second-class man. If you have to push on the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement, then we have to discuss. But if they do not like, better to chant Hare Kṛṣṇa. Don't discuss anything. If you are not agreeable to hear from Bhagavad-gītā, then let us chant together Hare Kṛṣṇa—that's all. But these things are discussed in the Bhagavad-gītā. There it is said that when there is unwanted population and it is increased, then it becomes hell. So if you want to increase the hellish persons, then don't discuss. But if you think it is a problem, then discuss."

Satsvarūpa: "As brāhmaṇas we have to be truthful. In Hong Kong they asked you what you thought of that guru who says he is God. You said you could not help yourself, and you spoke out."

Prabhupāda: "Yes, I said he is a great cheat. What can I say? And now it has been proven. As I said in my book Easy Journey to Other Planets, this moon excursion is childish, and that has also been proven now. Now they don't talk about the moon excursion. Because they are a failure."

The next morning Śrīla Prabhupāda rode to Loyola Park for his morning walk. On the way, one of the devotees read aloud the news article from that morning's edition of the Chicago Tribune.

"Forgive me if this story is not well-written," the article began. "I am a woman." The article continued:

His Divine Grace A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami Prabhupāda, the 77-year-old founder of the International Society for Krishna Consciousness, said so Wednesday. The Society is dedicated to peace in the world through love of God and relinquishment of all things material. The Swami spoke seated cross-legged on an expensive-looking cushion, surrounded by fresh flowers, microphones, and burning incense in the conference room he rented at the Sheraton Chicago Hotel. He is in town for a Krishna parade at 1:30 P.M. Saturday down State Street in which he will ride on a flower-bedecked float. Then he will fly to Philadelphia for more celebration and philosophical chats. He looked occasionally at his gold watch as he explained his life philosophy. His adoring disciples, five men, knelt at his side.

The article continued, implying that Śrīla Prabhupāda was a male chauvinist. "He said women do not figure in his class system except as daughters or wives. An unmarried woman is presumably classless."

Śrīla Prabhupāda chuckled in the back seat of the car and remarked, "That is a fact. She is prostitute, that's all. If you classify, then she is prostitute. There is no other way."

The devotee continued reading.

The Swami now lives in Los Angeles, and he trains his followers there. Their income is from sales of his books, magazines, and incense. He says he has about 10,000 followers. "We do not have so many," he said. "It is hard to find a first-class man." It's a pity, half the population are women.

"So it is not bad," said Prabhupāda. And he offered his own positive proposal for women in Kṛṣṇa consciousness. "Our policy should be that at Dallas Gurukula we shall create first-class men. And we shall teach the girls two things: how to become chaste and faithful to their husband and how to cook nicely. If they have these two qualifications, then I will take a guarantee to get them a good husband. So try to do that."

At the park Prabhupāda was joined by several carloads of devotees. Followed closely by a dozen eager disciples, he proceeded down a path that ran among many tall shade trees along the shore of Lake Michigan. Since the walkway was wide enough for only a few devotees to walk abreast, most of the devotees fanned out onto the grass, trying to keep within hearing distance of Śrīla Prabhupāda.

"Ordinary education is sufficient," Prabhupāda was saying "—ABCD. This is nonsense—big, big education and then later on become a prostitute. To make them prostitute doesn't require education. So in Dallas Gurukula there is no problem. Educate the girls how to become faithful, chaste wife, how to cook nicely. Let them learn varieties of cooking. Is it very difficult? These two qualifications. There are many stories such as of Damāyāntī, Pārvatī, Sītā—great women in the history. Our girls should read their lives. And by fifteen and sixteen years they should be married. If they are qualified, it will not be difficult to find out a nice husband. If a woman is chaste, even though she is not very beautiful, she will be liked by her husband. So train them in that way."

Before starting back, Śrīla Prabhupāda stopped and suggested they all sit together on the grass. A disciple volunteered his wool cādar as a seat for Prabhupāda, and the devotees all sat down, facing their spiritual master. Special, unexpected occasions like this made them blissful, and the opinions of a TV news reporter or the Chicago Tribune seemed remote and unimportant. The devotees often wished such persons could be present at times like these to see that Śrīla Prabhupāda was not at all like they thought.

Śrīla Prabhupāda began discussing the proper relations between men and women. "Women and men should live separately," he said. "That is also essential. Butter and fire must be kept apart. Otherwise the butter will melt. You cannot stop it."

Devotee: "Śrīla Prabhupāda, in a purport in the Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam you say that even fifty years ago in India the householders had separate quarters in the apartment for men and women, and the husband would not see his wife during the day. Is this the standard we should develop in our movement?"

Prabhupāda: "Yes, that is good. The example is that butter and fire should be kept as far apart as possible. Otherwise the butter will melt. The man is butter, and the woman is fire. So this is restricted, even if the man happens to be father, brother, or son. Mātrā svasrā duhitṛā vā. One may say that people will not think of sex impulse in the presence of a daughter, mother, or sister. But the śāstra says no, there is possibility. So they should not sit together. People may say this is only advice for the tenth-class rascal. But the next line of the śāstra says no: vidvamsam api karṣati. It is not the question of the tenth-class rascal, but even first-class, learned, he may be attracted. Balavān indriya-grāmo vidvāmsam api karṣati. The senses are so strong that they can mislead even the most learned scholar.

"Lord Brahma was attracted to his daughter. Just see, there is the example. Lord Śiva was attracted by the Mohinī-mūrti. Caitanya Mahāprabhu said, "Even if I see a wooden woman, I become attracted." Prabhupāda laughed. "He is giving this information to teach us that it is possible. So, shall we go now?"

Returning in the car, Prabhupāda asked for news of Indira Gandhi and India. Some of her policies had become highly controversial, and political opposition to her was mounting. The latest news was of her emergency rule.

"If Indira Gandhi takes my advice," Prabhupāda said, "then I can keep her on the post, and she can do greater service to India. Immediately the whole public will give her support."

"What would your advice to her be?" asked Brahmānanda Swami.

"My first step," said Prabhupāda, "will be to capture all the hoarders and distribute the grains free. Immediately the public will be obliged to her. There are immense amounts of food grains, and they are simply hoarded. They are not selling without good price. This is going on. Immediately she can win the public. Some of the hoarders should be hanged, so that in the future nobody will hoard. People are hungry, and she says she has got some program to drive away the poverty. This is the point. If she can supply all consumer goods free to the poor for the time being, then immediately the whole population will like her. And the hoarders should be exemplarily punished. Then nobody will hoard. But to remain the leader she requires spiritual knowledge, otherwise it will be another disaster. If she wants to remain leader then she must be a spiritual person. She must become a Vaiṣṇavī."

Philadelphia

Prabhupāda's receptions were usually large, spontaneous turnouts. The temple population would increase greatly just before his arrival in a city, as devotees from other centers converged. Except for a handful of disciples—the woman preparing Prabhupāda's meal, the men laying down the last tiles in his room or working on the Ratha-yatra cart—everyone would go to the airport to greet him.

At the airports Śrīla Prabhupāda was accustomed to much fanfare, the rhythmic crash of hand cymbals, the beating of mṛdaṅgas, and the chanting chorus of a hundred or more happy devotees. Only if they became wild or disruptive would he object. Otherwise, as Kṛṣṇa's representative, he would be pleased to see an enthusiastic reception, as he collected flowers and obeisances, like a viceroy accepting tribute on behalf of the king. By his grace, the praise and worship was going directly to Kṛṣṇa.

Thus in Philadelphia, as at almost every airport reception, Śrīla Prabhupāda felt satisfied. With loving glances he acknowledged the familiar faces of his spiritual sons and daughters. Devotees stepped forward to place flower garlands around his neck, and the reporters also stepped forward, with cameras, microphones, and notepads. They had not come to offer Prabhupāda devotional praise, and yet they also appeared to be serving him by offering him the opportunity to preach.

A woman reporter asked, "It has been said that the Kṛṣṇa conscious movement is what some people consider sexist or racist, because certain propensities for women and for blacks have been defined either by the devotees or the Vedic scriptures. I wonder if you would comment on that."

She had spoken rapidly, and Brahmānanda Swami repeated for Śrīla Prabhupāda, "She says you give inferior roles to women and Negroes." Prabhupāda: "We give equal roles spiritually. Materially, one man is servant, one man is master. How can you avoid this? Do you think everyone will be master, no one will be servant? Materially? Materially one is father, one is son, one is master, one is servant, one is man, one is woman. How can you stop this? But spiritually they are all equal."

Here was the same news theme that had begun in Chicago, and here came the same challenges.

Reporter: "So what is happening materially is unimportant?"

Prabhupāda: "Materially there is distinction. But when you come to the spiritual platform, then when you discern the spirit soul within everything—that is equal. Like you are differently dressed in a red shirt, and I am differently dressed. This difference must be there. There are so many men and women, and they are differently dressed. You cannot say they are all equal by the dress. But within the dress, the living entities, they are the same. We make this distinction materially, but not spiritually."

"I would like to ask one question," said another reporter. "What is it that you are offering that has resulted in such an emotional response from all the people here?"

Prabhupāda: "Because they are being spiritually educated. We are above the material platform. Therefore we have no distinction that one is American, one is Indian, one is black, one is white. There is no such distinction. Everyone is servant of God. Is that all right?"

Another reporter mentioned that there were many gurus and asked why Prabhupāda thought his teaching was the truth.

Prabhupāda: "Because we speak the truth. We don't give bluff, saying, 'I am God.' We know the actual position—that God is great and we are all servants."

The question had been asked in the typical reporters' attitude of irreverent interrogation, but Prabhupāda was replying soberly, reflecting on his own position in relation to Kṛṣṇa. "How can I say I am God?" he asked. And he lowered his head. "No, we do not give bluff. We say the real truth. Therefore it appeals. If I say something humbug, it may act for some time, but it will not endure."

Reporter: "Your celebration is tomorrow. Of what will that celebration consist?"

Prabhupāda: "Celebration? It is remembering Kṛṣṇa, or the Lord. He with His brother and sister visited Kurukṣetra, a place in India. So in memory of that visit, we observe this Ratha-yātrā."

Śrīla Prabhupāda got into the rented Cadillac limousine, along with Kīrtanānanda Swami, Brahmānanda Swami, and Ravindra Svarūpa, the Philadelphia temple president.

"So again the same question was raised," said Prabhupāda. "So reply was all right?"

"Yes," said Brahmānanda, "it was very nice."

Prabhupāda: "Materially there is distinction. You are differently dressed, I am differently dressed. But spiritually there is no distinction."

The chauffeur glanced to the back seat. "If you want any more air in the back, there is a control over there."

"We can put on the air conditioner, Śrīla Prabhupāda," said Brahmānanda.

"Oh, all right," said Prabhupāda. "But sky condition is better." They opened the windows.

Prabhupāda recalled that he had been to Philadelphia twice before. In 1969 he had come from New York City with some devotees to lecture at Temple University. And back in 1965, after leaving Butler, Pennsylvania, he had come to the University of Pennsylvania for a meeting with Professor Norman Brown. Ravindra Svarūpa told how he had been a student at Temple University and had enrolled in Swami Nikhilananda's class a year after Śrīla Prabhupāda had spoken there.

Ravindra Svarūpa: "The students remembered you. They told me you had asked Swami Nikhilananda, 'So you are studying Vedānta. But what is Vedānta?' And no one knew. Then you said that veda means 'knowledge' and anta means 'end,' so Vedānta means the end of knowledge, and that is Kṛṣṇa. They had never heard that before, even though they had so many hours of courses in Vedānta."

Prabhupāda: "That is the difficulty. Those who are foolish people are taking the leading part. One who has no knowledge is taking the part of a teacher. Just like this—one does not know what is Vedānta, and he is reading Vedānta. It is a very simple truth. Veda means 'knowledge' and anta means 'end.' There must be some ultimate goal. But the modern process is that we go on unlimitedly, but we never come to the end. Is it not like that? What do you think?"

Ravindra Svarūpa: "Yes, it's a fact. No conclusion."

They passed a large junkyard filled with scrapped automobiles. "Motorcar," Prabhupāda said.

Kīrtanānanda: "That is the end of their knowledge—a pile of junk."

Prabhupāda: "Yes. Their time is spent in breaking and building, that's all. They do not inquire, 'Why breaking and building? Why not permanent?' That question does not arise. And they cannot solve it. They think this breaking and building is the nature. But we are giving information of another nature, where there is no breaking and building—permanent. But they cannot believe that there is such a thing. We are giving that information, how you can keep yourself eternal. This is the greatest gift to the human society. He wants to live eternally, but he doesn't know how to live eternally. His energy is being spoiled by the skyscraper building construction. But he is not very serious to construct his body eternal. We are speaking this in our meetings everywhere, but they have no brain to understand."

They rode around the sharply winding curves alongside the Schuylkill River. Passing Fairmont Park, the devotees pointed out to Prabhupāda that it contained a thousand acres of forest land. Prabhupāda asked Kīrtanānanda Swami how far it was to New Vrindaban, and they began talking. When Prabhupāda asked about the gr̥hasthas there, Kīrtanānanda replied, "We are developing very nice householder couples at New Vrindaban. Very good families."

"That is essential," said Prabhupāda. "The peaceful life of householders, that is required."

The ISKCON center was a converted two-story house. The temple room was packed with devotees, and others filled the hallway, straining to see Prabhupāda as he entered.

"Thank you very much for your kind reception," said Śrīla Prabhupāda from his seat in the temple room. "The press reporters were asking me that why do we make distinction between man and woman and black and white? But we make distinction not in that way." Śrīla Prabhupāda explained that the attempt to make everyone equal materially would be a failure always, just as the United Nations' attempt at unity was a failure. Bhagavad-gītā states that one with equal vision recognizes the differences between the bodies, but sees all beings as one spiritually.

Śrīla Prabhupāda continued, "If we make unfair distinction between man and woman or black and white, then how in our temple are we all enjoying together? Because we are actually equal on the spiritual platform. We do not say that you are a woman, so you cannot become my disciple. Or you are black, therefore you cannot become my disciple. No, we welcome everyone. So that people may not misunderstand, you can just issue one statement that we say if you want to see everyone equally, treat everyone equally, then you have to come to the spiritual platform, Kṛṣṇa consciousness. Materially it is not possible. But the aim should be one. If artificially you do not make distinction, that will not stay.

"Just like in your country, the blacks and whites, they have equal rights. But why they fight sometimes, racial fight? Because it is on a material platform. Our point is that you come to the spiritual platform and then this equality will be possible. Practically you can see. Here while you are chanting, dancing, the boy is dancing, the father is dancing, the black is dancing, the white is dancing, the young is dancing, the old is dancing. You can see practically—everyone dancing. And they are not artificially dancing like dog, but by spiritual ecstasy."

After his talk, Prabhupāda called for questions.

Ravindra Svarūpa: "What is the best way to deal with skepticism?"

Prabhupāda: "Skepticism—rascalism. [Devotees laugh] We are not going to deal with rascalism. We are going to deal with sense. Skepticism, they do not believe in anything—everything is false. They are so disappointed, they think everything is false. We are not going to deal with such men. What is the use? Is not that skepticism? What is that skepticism?"

Ravindra Svarūpa: "Disappointment, that's all."

Prabhupāda: "So why should one be disappointed? We say that you should come to the spiritual platform and you will be happy. We want to deliver him from the platform of his disappointment. Sometimes one being very disappointed commits suicide. We say, 'Why are you disappointed? You come to the spiritual platform and you will be happy.' So we are not going to accept his philosophy, skepticism, but we want to deliver him from his fallen condition. That is our mission.

"The living entity, the spirit soul, is by nature happy. There is no question of disappointment. You see Kṛṣṇa's picture anywhere. How happy they are. The gopīs are happy, the cowherd boys are happy, Kṛṣṇa is happy. Simply happiness. Where is disappointment? So you come to that platform, and then you will also be happy. Come to Kṛṣṇa, come and dance with Kṛṣṇa, eat with Kṛṣṇa. That is information we are giving. What is the question of disappointment? Come to Kṛṣṇa. Kṛṣṇa therefore personally comes to show how happy He is in Vṛndāvana. And He is inviting, "Come to Me."

Prabhupāda continued his ecstatic description of happiness in Kṛṣṇa consciousness and then concluded, "Is that all right?" Many voices together answered, "Yes!" There was no disappointment or skepticism in Śrīla Prabhupāda's presence.

Śrīla Prabhupāda had come to Philadelphia primarily for the Ratha-yātrā. Since 1970, the devotees had been holding Ratha-yatra in Philadelphia, although the early festivals had been small. For the first festival the devotees had taken small deities on procession on a decorated cigar box. They had placed the deities on an altar on the bank of the Schuylkill River and had held kīrtana while people picnicked and lay around in the sunshine. The next year's festival had been a little bigger, with foot-high deities riding on a palanquin. It was still not a very ambitious festival, but Śrīla Prabhupāda had written in appreciation.

I am so glad to hear how nicely you performed Rathayatra festival. Next year you can perform the regular ceremony with the cart as we are doing in San Francisco and London. That will be very nice. It doesn't matter if you construct a small one, but you can hold a festival.

Ravindra Svarūpa had become temple president just after Prabhupāda's letter had arrived, and he had resolved to have a real Ratha-yatra cart for 1972. So the devotees had done it—a small cart, but a cart, pulled in procession down to Washington Square Park. By 1973 they had made a large cart, and devotees from other cities had come to help with the festival. Again Śrīla Prabhupāda responded.

At Rathayatra there must be either one or three carts. It is very good news to hear that one television station is interested to do a special program on the Rathayatra festival. These festivals are good for showing to the people in general that Krishna consciousness is real enjoyment. Everything else is simply artificial. Your plans for Rathayatra festival are very nice.

In the summer of 1974 Ravindra Svarūpa had written to Prabhupāda about the preaching activities in Philadelphia and had sent photos of their Jagannātha Deities. Śrīla Prabhupāda had been moved by the pictures.

I want to thank you a hundred times for the excellent way you are worshiping the Deity there as I can see from the color photographs you have sent. From my childhood I was also worshiping Lord Jagannath. When I was six years old my father gave me a ratha and I was performing the Rathayatra in my neighborhood. Now in the Western world you are worshiping Lord Jagannath so gorgeously and it pleases me very much. Thank you again for the way you are conducting the deity worship in the Philadelphia temple. As for the Rathayatra ceremony, you should go on with it, and I shall attend there next year. But you go on holding a splendid ceremony for the people of the city. I am sure that it will be a success.

In 1975 Śrīla Prabhupāda had written from Denver, assuring the Philadelphia devotees, "Yes, I am coming to your city on Friday morning, July 11, 1975, from Chicago. I look forward to meeting the professors." Therefore, when the devotees in Chicago had tried to convince Prabhupāda to stay and attend their festival, scheduled at the same time as Philadelphia's, he had declined.

Shortly after Śrīla Prabhupāda's arrival it began to rain, all day Friday and all day Saturday. When time came for Prabhupāda's morning walk and rain was still pouring, he said, "So today I will take my walk by riding." Getting into his car along with some of his sannyāsīs and G.B.C. men, he set off in the rain for a ride through Fairmont Park. The rain continued on Saturday right up until the time for the Ratha-yātrā parade.

The parade was to start at Independence Mall, head down Walnut Street to Broad, circle City Hall, and end on the grassy slope behind the Philadelphia Museum of Art. Prabhupāda rode into the city, where he was to meet the Ratha-yātrā cart halfway through the procession. The rain had stopped, but dark clouds still hung ominously overhead.

Majestically the large forty-foot-high cart moved down Walnut Street. By the time it reached Eleventh Street, Śrīla Prabhupāda had gotten out of his car two blocks away and was walking toward Lord Jagannātha. A large group of devotees surrounded Prabhupāda, and the devotees on the cart could see him approaching. The two groups joined, and the kīrtana swelled. Standing before the cart now, Śrīla Prabhupāda got down on his hands and knees and touched his head to the road in obeisance to Lord Jagannātha.

This cart was the best yet, Prabhupāda said. He especially liked the large, strong wheels, ornately decorated with small round and diamond-shaped mirrors. Mounting the cart, he took his seat beneath the Deities, and for the first time in days, the clouds parted and the sun shone through.

Now people started pouring out of offices and stores. They lined the sidewalks and came out into the road to join the procession. As the cart circled City Hall, the sound of the devotees' singing became magnified, echoing off the tall buildings. The crowd was the largest ever at any Philadelphia Ratha-yatra.

Hecklers—Christian fundamentalists with big banners reading "Get smart, get saved!" and "Repent or burn!"—were ineffectual amid the large crowd and the uproarious kīrtana. At one point, when Śrīla Prabhu pāda appeared particularly satisfied, a devotee on the cart leaned over and asked Śrīla Prabhupāda what he thought of the festival. Prabhupāda replied that he was thinking the American Vaiṣṇavas were now permanently in the West.

The park behind the art museum was crowded with people waiting. Śrīla Prabhupāda took his seat onstage and began lecturing over the public address system: "Ladies and gentlemen, first of all I wish to thank you, the inhabitants of this great city, Philadelphia. You are so kind and enthusiastic in taking part in this movement. So I am very much obliged to you. I am especially obliged to the American boys and girls who are helping me so much in spreading this Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement in the Western countries."

Prabhupāda explained how all living entities are eternal but, having taken material bodies, are subject to the tribulations of birth, death, disease, and old age. In the human form, the soul can choose to go back to the spiritual world or to suffer birth after birth in the material world. "But why should we remain in this material body and undergo repetition, change of body?" Prabhupāda asked. "Let us have our original, spiritual body. That is wanted. That is intelligent."

Prabhupāda explained the science of chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa and invited everyone to try it. "We don't charge anything for this Hare Kṛṣṇa mantra," he said. "We are chanting everywhere, as you saw in this Ratha-yatra. Our only means is chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa. And these thousands of men are following, simply by chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa mantra. So you can understand what is the potency of this Hare Kṛṣṇa mantra. We did not pay you ladies and gentlemen anything to follow us, but we simply chant Hare Kṛṣṇa. So it is very potent. You will never feel tired chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa. You see practically. You can go on chanting twenty-four hours, you will never feel tired. Therefore it is said, golokera prema-dhana. This chanting vibration is coming from the spiritual world."

Śrīla Prabhupāda talked about the inner meaning of Ratha-yatra: Rādhārāṇī's meeting Kṛṣṇa at Kurukṣetra and trying to bring Him back to Vṛndāvana. "It is a very ecstatic feeling," he said. "Those who are advanced devotees, they can enjoy." Concluding his address, he invited everyone to look at the Kṛṣṇa conscious literature and try to understand.

The devotees had prepared twelve hundred pounds of halavā and large quantities of vegetables, sweets, and fruit punch, which they very efficiently served to the crowd. Prabhupāda was satisfied with everything and returned to his house, while the devotees continued until sunset, feasting, chanting, and hosting thousands of festival-goers.

The day after Ratha-yātrā, Śrīla Prabhupāda met with a roomful of people, including two reporters and several parents of his disciples. The reporters were Ms. Sandy Nixon, a freelance writer, and from the Philadelphia Inquirer Ms. Jones, the same woman who had spoken with Śrīla Prabhupāda at the airport. Seeing japa beads around Ms. Nixon's neck, Prabhupāda said, "She is a devotee. She was chanting."

Ms. Nixon said she was writing a book on the popular gurus and had about fifteen questions to ask Śrīla Prabhupāda. "I am going to ask you questions," she said, "and most of the time I might be able to answer them myself." Śrīla Prabhupāda seemed to like her, if only because she wore the japa beads, but some of the devotees flinched at her remark about already knowing the answers to the questions she was about to ask.

"How did Kṛṣṇa consciousness develop?" Ms. Nixon asked.

"Kṛṣṇa consciousness is already there in everyone's core of heart," replied Śrīla Prabhupāda. "You have seen how during the whole procession they were chanting and dancing in ecstasy. So do you think that is artificial? No. Artificially nobody can chant and dance for hours together. That means the awakening of Kṛṣṇa consciousness."

Śrīla Prabhupāda patiently and carefully answered each question—about Christ, about gurus, about the daily lives of the devotees. While discussing the evils of a godless society, he mentioned the slaughter of cows. "It is an innocent animal," he said. "It is simply eating grass given by God and supplying milk. And from milk we can live. And the gratefulness is—cut her throat. Is that civilization? What do you say?"

"I agree a hundred percent," Ms. Nixon replied. "I want you to say these things instead of me. I am asking the questions for others, of course, who do not understand Kṛṣṇa consciousness."

Again, the devotees flinched. That Prabhupāda did not always respond to a person's attitude or nuance did not mean that he was imperceptive. He sometimes chose not to relate to a certain idiom or react to a certain foolishness, like Ms. Nixon's claims to be an expert on Kṛṣṇa consciousness. And often he simply ignored a person's trivial conversation or mundane philosophy. But he was always in touch with whomever he talked to, addressing that person's true self-interest. He knew Ms. Nixon didn't know the answers to the questions she asked, and he understood that she was, despite her temporarily donned japa beads, not inquiring as a submissive disciple. Nevertheless, he was compassionate, answering to enlighten both her and her readers.

Ms. Nixon plunged onward. "How do you feel about women's lib?"

Prabhupāda remained silent, and a devotee repeated, "She wants to know about the women's liberation. What is your feeling about women's liberation?"

"That I don't want to discuss," said Śrīla Prabhupāda, "because..." Śrīla Prabhupāda's serious expression slowly changed to a smile, and then he laughed. Everyone laughed. His Chicago remarks were famous. On the one hand, he didn't want to start another controversy; but he did want to clear up the issue.

He continued, "As you have asked, so I may explain how the foolish women are being cheated by the intelligent men. In your country they have given you liberty. Liberty means equal rights. Is it not? Man and woman have equal rights."

Ms. Nixon: "They are trying in this country."

Prabhupāda: "All right, trying. But you women, you cannot see that this so-called equal rights means cheating the women. Now I say more clearly that a woman and man meet, now they become lovers, then they have sex, and the woman becomes pregnant, and the man goes away. The simple woman, she has to take charge of the child and beg for government alms, 'Please give me money.' This is your independence. So you admit this is independence? Or she tries to kill the child. Do you think it is very good independence? What is your answer?" Śrīla Prabhupāda looked challengingly at both women. They had asked their questions, now he was asking.

Ms. Jones: "What is my answer to whether or not I was going to kill a child? Is that the question?"

Prabhupāda: "Yes, they are killing now, abortion."

Ms. Jones: "Well, she has made the choice."

Prabhupāda: "You have made your choice to kill your child. Is that a very good choice?"

Ms. Nixon: "It's the worst crime you could make."

Śrīla Prabhupāda (to Ms. Jones): "Do you think it is very good business?"

Ms. Jones: "I think it is a very complicated question."

Prabhupāda: "Therefore I say they are cheating you in the name of independence. That you do not understand. They are cheating you, and you are thinking you are independent."

Ms. Nixon: "They forget the responsibility that comes with freedom."

Prabhupāda: "Yes, they [the men] do not take the responsibility. They go away. They enjoy and go away. And the woman has to take the responsibility. Either kill the child or maintain begging. Do you think begging is very good? In India, although they are poverty-stricken, still they do not become independent. They remain under the care of the husband, and he takes all responsibility. She has neither to kill the child nor to beg for maintaining the child.

"So which is independence? To maintain under a husband is independence, or to become free to be enjoyed by everyone? There is no freedom, but still they think they have freedom. That means under some plea the men are cheating the women, that's all. So in the name of independence they have agreed to be cheated by another class. That is the situation."

Prabhupāda explained that the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement had the highest regard for women. "But to protect them from this exploitation by man," he said, "we teach that you do like this, you do like that. You be married, be settled up. Don't wander independently. We teach them like that. But so far Kṛṣṇa consciousness is concerned, we equally distribute. There is no such thing that 'Oh, you are a woman, less intelligent or more intelligent, therefore you cannot come.' We don't say that. We welcome woman, man, poor, rich—everyone. Because on that platform there is equality. That is equality."

Next Ms. Jones began to question. Ever since Śrīla Prabhupāda's arrival in Chicago, she had been noting what she thought was Prabhupāda's excessive material opulence.

"You have said that you are very small," she began, "and that you are not God. Yet it appears to me, as an outsider, that the devotees treat you as if you were God."

Prabhupāda: "Yes, that is devotees' duty. Just like a government officer. Personally he is not very important, but so long as he executes the government order, he should be respected as the government. That is the way. Even if an ordinary policeman comes, you have to respect him—because he is government man. But that does not mean he is respected. If that man thinks, 'I have become government. People are respecting me,' then he is foolish. But the etiquette is that when the government man comes, you should give him respect as the government."

Ms. Jones: "I wonder about the many beautiful material things that the devotees bring to you. For instance, when you left the airport you left in a big, beautiful, fancy car. I wonder about this."

Prabhupāda: "That is teaching them how to respect. If you respect a government man as government, then you must treat him like that. If you respect the spiritual master as God, then you must offer him the facilities of God. Otherwise, how should he treat me as God, simply in his mind? No. In action also."

Ms. Jones: "I am sorry, what was that you said?"

Prabhupāda: "If the spiritual master is treated as God, so the devotee must practically show how he is treating him as God. God travels by a golden car, so if the spiritual master is offered an ordinary motorcar, still it is not sufficient, because he has to be treated like God. What is this motorcar for God?"

The devotees laughed at Prabhupāda's bold logic. They had never thought of it quite like that: If the guru is God's representative, then why quibble if he is offered a mere Cadillac of this material world?

Prabhupāda: "They are still deficient. If God comes to your home, will you bring Him an ordinary motorcar, or would you arrange for a golden car? So your point is that they offer me a nice motorcar, but I say it is not sufficient. They are still lacking to treat him as God. Be practical."

Ms. Jones didn't think it was funny. She had another question. Her questions became more challenging. Prabhupāda explained to her how she must have spiritual vision to see things in their proper perspective. "But if you have no eyes—therefore you are envious because they have offered me a nice motorcar. So you have to make your eyes to see. A blind man cannot see. The eyes are to be treated, how to see."

Ms. Jones had one more question. One of the most difficult things to understand in Kṛṣṇa consciousness, she said, was the Deities. How could someone brought up in the West accept that the Deities represented God?

Śrīla Prabhupāda first explained that the spiritual soul within the body was the real self. "Therefore," he said, "as you cannot see the spirit, so you cannot see the Supreme Spirit, or God. But to show His kindness upon you He has appeared just like wood and stone, so that you can see."

The two reporters were finished with their questions, and they thanked Prabhupāda, who then turned his attention to others in the room. When a father of one of the devotees mentioned that he himself professed no religion, Śrīla Prabhupāda replied indirectly that the father was therefore a fool. The man admitted it. The mother, however, was more spiritually inclined, and Prabhupāda praised her, stating that the son takes on the traits of the mother.

Another guest spoke. "I would like to ask, Swami, would you pray for me?"

"I am praying for everyone," Prabhupāda replied softly. "That is my business. Otherwise, why have I come here?"

A woman addressed Prabhupāda: "As a mother, I too wish to thank you. My daughter Joy has found Kṛṣṇa consciousness. She has been recommended for initiation tomorrow."

Prabhupāda: "So we recommend everyone. Every American should be initiated. That is our recommendation. The sooner you accept this proposal, it is good for you. To know God and love Him. Is there any difficulty? Some have become interested, why not others?"

Prabhupāda again glanced at the father who claimed to have no religion. "Your son is interested," he said. "Why the father is not interested? What is the reason?"

Thus the evening darśana continued, until after a few hours Prabhupāda ended it and distributed prasādam.

When the last guest had left, several of the women devotees asked Prabhupāda about the actual position of his women disciples. He smiled. "When a woman becomes Kṛṣṇa conscious," he said, "her brain is automatically bigger." The devotees laughed.

As he smiled, his devotees understood him perfectly: whoever became a devotee, man or woman, became more intelligent. Being transcendental to the issue of men's or women's rights, Prabhupāda saw beyond the designation of the body. He saw that the criterion for intelligence wasn't material—one's sex, race, or nationality—but was one's desire for spiritual life.

A woman devotee asked Prabhupāda a further question about the position of women, and he replied, "Of course you are not a woman. You are a devotee."

Śrīla Prabhupāda agreed to see several professors—acquaintances of Ravindra Svarūpa's. Having received his B.A. in philosophy from the University of Pennsylvania and his M.A. from Temple University, Ravindra Svarūpa was now pursuing a Ph.D. from Temple. He had once given up academics as part of the world of māyā and had fully engaged in Kṛṣṇa consciousness, but Prabhupāda had encouraged him to return for a further degree.

While in Philadelphia Śrīla Prabhupāda had spoken out against the process of inductive reasoning. On one morning walk Ravindra Svarūpa had said, "Prabhupāda, the same criticism that you just made of induction was also made by John Stewart Mill and Bertrand Russell, but they became skeptics. They say, therefore, there is no knowledge at all."

"That is another nonsense," Śrīla Prabhupāda had replied. "That is also speculation—"Because I have failed, therefore there is no knowledge.' "

Dr. Yogesh Patel, a Western-educated, Indian-born scholar of Buddhism and Māyāvāda Hinduism, taught in the religion department at Temple University. Accompanied by two graduate students, Dr. Patel dropped by one afternoon while Śrīla Prabhupāda was talking in his room with several of his disciples. Ravindra Svarūpa made the introductions.

Prabhupāda: "So you are teaching Hinduism?"

Dr. Patel: "Yes."

Prabhupāda: "What is that Hinduism?"

Dr. Patel: "I don't know. You tell me what Hinduism is."

Prabhupāda: "You don't know? You are teaching Hinduism but you don't know what it is? This is our Dr. Svarūpa Dāmodara. He is also a Ph.D. Let us get his opinion on this. [Turning to Svarūpa Dāmodara.] What do you think of that? He is teaching, but he does not know."

Svarūpa Dāmodara: "Cheater, Śrīla Prabhupāda. That is called cheater."

Prabhupāda: "So you have heard his judgment that you are a cheater?" Dr. Patel became angry and raised his voice at Śrīla Prabhupāda. The professor and Śrīla Prabhupāda were immediately into a battle.

Dr. Patel: "You teach me! If I say I don't know what is religion, then you teach me."

Prabhupāda: "A spiritual master is not your servant. First you become shaven-headed like my students, then I will teach you. You have to offer your obeisances and surrender to the spiritual master. Then he will reveal the truth."

Dr. Patel replied that he did offer his obeisances to Prabhupāda when he first entered the room.

Prabhupāda: "Then my first instruction to you is to stop this cheating." By now both Śrīla Prabhupāda and Dr. Patel were speaking with raised voices. Most of the devotees were shocked speechless. Some of them, like Brahmānanda Swami, felt compelled to somehow end the meeting.

Prabhupāda: "You ask me what is religion. My reply is, sarva-dharmān parityajya. Kṛṣṇa says religion means śaraṇam vraja—fully surrender."

Dr. Patel: "What do you mean by surrender?"

Prabhupāda: "You don't know the meaning of surrender? Give me a dictionary. Let us see."

Dr. Patel (yelling): "No! I want the Sanskrit etymological meaning of surrender!"

Prabhupāda: "You don't want a spiritual master. You want a Sanskrit teacher. We cannot waste our time any more." Brahmānanda Swami saw this as his cue. He leaned over to Dr. Patel and asked him to leave, "before you get offensive." Dr. Patel and Brahmānanda Swami then rose and left the room together.

Śrīla Prabhupāda remained shaking with anger. The senior devotees looked over at Ravīndra Svarūpa reproachfully. How could he bring such a man to see Prabhupāda? Ravīndra Svarūpa was appalled and frightened. Never before had anyone seen Prabhupāda explode with such anger.

After staying up all night, Ravindra Svarūpa approached Prabhupāda the next morning with a prepared apology. "Śrīla Prabhupāda," he began, "I am really sorry that I brought that professor to see you last night. I had no idea he was such a rascal."

Śrīla Prabhupāda looked up in surprise. "Oh," he said, "that is all right." He paused, and then added with quiet satisfaction, "At least he was chastised."

Dr. Thomas Hopkins, another teacher of Hinduism, came to see Prabhupāda, but in a much different mood. From the beginning they experienced an immediate rapport. Dr. Hopkins asked Prabhupāda the relationship of Bhagavad-gītā to Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, and Prabhupāda replied that the Bhāgavatam was like the graduate study of the Gītā, beginning where the Gītā left off.

Dr. Hopkins: "If someone was going to collect a very small section of your work, say one or two verses, what would you want them to collect?"

"That is stated in two verses," Prabhupāda replied. "Dharmasya hy āpavargasya..." And he had the translation read: "All occupational engagements, dharmas, are certainly meant for ultimate liberation. They should never be performed for material gain. Furthermore, one who is engaged in the ultimate occupational service, dharma, should never use material gain to cultivate sense gratification."

Prabhupāda had the purport read, and he expanded on it further, explaining how people are only after material gain, neglecting the real purpose of life.

Dr. Hopkins: "Do you think, then, that this message is the most important message that you have to convey?"

Prabhupāda: "That is the most important message, because you are not this material body. Suppose you have got this shirt. So if you simply try to maintain this shirt, is that a very good intelligence? Without taking care of your person? Similarly, we are spirit soul, and the body is just like dress. So in the whole material world everyone is engaged to take care of the body. Nobody knows what is spirit soul, what is his need."

Dr. Hopkins seemed pleased to hear such a broad explanation of Vaiṣṇavism. When he asked about Śiva, Prabhupāda explained that although Lord Śiva should not be considered equal to Lord Viṣṇu, he was the best Vaiṣṇava, the chief devotee of Viṣṇu, and he could be worshiped as such.

And Lord Rāma?

Śrīla Prabhupāda explained that Rāma was an incarnation of Kṛṣṇa. Professor Hopkins was pleased to hear this. Prabhupāda explained that Madhva, Rāmānuja, and Viṣṇu Svami were all "big, big ācāryas." Dr. Hopkins then asked about Tukarāma, the saint of Mahārāṣṭra.

Prabhupāda: "Yes, Tukarāma accepted Viṣṇu as Supreme. He accepted the process of Caitanya Mahāprabhu, saṅkīrtan. And he accepted Caitanya Mahāprabhu as his guru. So there is no difference between Tukarāma and Caitanya."

Dr. Hopkins: "So Lord Viṭṭhala and Kṛṣṇa are the same?"

Prabhupāda: "Lord Viṭṭhala is Viṣṇu."

Dr. Hopkins: "And the Alvars of Tamil Nadu, Ādivāsī—you accept their teachings also? So the real question is between Vaiṣṇava and others."

Prabhupāda: "Yes, that is the question—Vaiṣṇava and non-Vaiṣṇava. The actual difference is personalist and impersonalist."

Dr. Hopkins: "You would see the worshipers of Śiva as impersonalists?"

Prabhupāda: "Yes, impersonalists. Śaṅkarācārya said that ultimately the Absolute Truth is impersonal, and one can imagine a personal form for the benefit of the worshiper."

When Dr. Hopkins pointed out that some of the Śiva worshipers seemed to be personalists, Prabhupāda explained the real mentality of the Śaivites, according to Śaṅkara. "'Now I am a devotee,'" said Prabhupāda, " 'but as soon as I become perfect, I become One.' That is their theory. 'In the preliminary state, when I am not perfect, I am worshiping some imaginary form of God. But when I become perfect, there is no need of worshiping. I become One.' "

As a scholar, Dr. Hopkins was visibly pleased to hear the authentic philosophy of Lord Caitanya Mahāprabhu. When Prabhupāda mentioned the smārta-brāhmaṇas as also being impersonalists, Dr. Hopkins was surprised.

"It would be very difficult to pick them out," said Prabhupāda. "Most of the so-called Vaiṣṇavas are impersonalists."

Dr. Hopkins: "So the deciding test as to whether one is a serious devotee or not is not only whether one is devoted now, but that he sees the goal as perpetual devotion."

Prabhupāda: "Yes, he is nitya-yukta. That means perpetually."

Dr. Hopkins, considering this criterion, inquired about the position of Śrī Aurobindo, who seemed to be beyond impersonalism. Prabhupāda agreed.

"He says that above the Māyāvāda philosophy there is something else," Prabhupāda explained. "That is bhakti. But Aurobindo could not understand, because he did not take education from realized persons. He wanted to realize by himself."

Dr. Hopkins: "So his problem was the effort to do this on his own?"

Prabhupāda: "Yes. He did not go through the guru-paramparā. Therefore it will take a long time."

Dr. Hopkins finally had to leave and thanked Prabhupāda for his time and wisdom. "Why don't you join us also?" asked Prabhupāda. "The whole human society should join us." Dr. Hopkins replied that he had been a friend of the devotees for many years and suspected that in the end he might end up as a sannyāsī. Prabhupāda pointed out that sannyāsa didn't mean a change of dress but rather giving everything to Kṛṣṇa.

July 15, 1975

Śrīla Prabhupāda had a direct flight from Philadelphia to San Francisco. He and Upendra sat in the first-class section, while Brahmānanda Swami, Harikeśa, and Pradyumna traveled economy class. Viśākhā-devī dāśī had also come, to photograph Śrīla Prabhupāda.

After the plane had reached cruising altitude, a uniformed gentleman emerged from the cabin. Immediately he caught sight of Śrīla Prabhupāda sitting by the window and walked over. When he leaned over and asked Prabhupāda how he was, Prabhupāda saw that the man wanted to talk, so he asked Upendra to get up and give the gentleman his seat.

"You are the captain?" Prabhupāda surmised.

"No," the man replied. "I am a flight supervisor, come to overlook the pilot and the crew. Would it be all right if I asked you a philosophical question?"

Prabhupāda nodded, apparently pleased.

"Is everything created by God?"

Śrīla Prabhupāda said yes and quoted the Vedānta-sūtra: janmādy asya yataḥ. Everything in existence, Prabhupāda said, has its origin in God.

"Then what is evil?" the flight supervisor asked. "Is evil also God's creation?"

"For God there is not good or evil," Prabhupāda explained. "Everything is good. Goodness is God's frontage, and evil is God's back portion. Taking this example, the chest or the back of the body are equal. It is not that when there is some pain in the back side I don't care for it, I simply take care of it when there is pain in the chest. No. Although it is the back side, it is as important as the front side.

"So evil and good are also of the same importance? No. For God there is nothing evil. Just like for the sun there is no darkness. But for us there is light and darkness. If you keep your back to the sun, you will find darkness. And if you face the sun, then there is no darkness.

"We create darkness as soon as we change our position. If instead of remaining in front of God I keep God on the back, then there is darkness. Otherwise, there is no question of darkness. But in the sun as it is, there is no such darkness. Therefore God is all-good. But for us, when we forget God, that is evil. And when we are in God consciousness always, then everything is good. Is that all right?"

The man seemed to understand and respectfully accepted the answer. He was about to ask another question when a well-dressed but somewhat drunken passenger came up to them and spoke. Śrīla Prabhupāda looked up at the man and asked, "Are you afraid of death?" The intoxicated man stammered, sobered, and walked away.

The flight supervisor inquired again, taking his meeting with Śrīla Prabhupāda as a rare opportunity. "Can you tell me how one can become peaceful?" he asked.

Śrīla Prabhupāda began quoting Bhagavad-gītā, bhoktāraṁ yajña tapasām..., and, signaling Viśākhā, asked for a copy of the Gītā. The devotees quickly consulted, but no one had a Bhagavad-gītā.

When Prabhupāda heard this he became angry, although containing his feelings in the presence of his guest. He then explained to the man that one had to have knowledge of God as the supreme controller, the supreme enjoyer, and the best friend of everyone; only then could one have peace. "Out of foolishness," Prabhupāda said, "we are claiming the land is our property. Therefore there is no peace. But actually, God is the proprietor."

Both Śrīla Prabhupāda and the flight supervisor enjoyed their talk, and as the flight supervisor excused himself, he heartily shook Prabhupāda's hand.

Prabhupāda called for Pradyumna. His eyes glowing in transcendental anger, he reprimanded Upendra and Pradyumna for not having a copy of Bhagavad-gītā; they should have one with them at all times. Pradyumna offered that although he didn't have Prabhupāda's Bhagavad-gītā As It Is, he just happened to be carrying an edition by another author. This infuriated Prabhupāda even more. He then ordered Upendra never to travel again without carrying three books: Bhagavad-gītā As It Is, and the first volume of Caitanya-caritāmṛta and Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam.

Berkeley

July 15, 1975

Within less than two weeks Prabhupāda had traveled from west coast to east coast and back. This was his first visit to ISKCON Berkeley's recently acquired headquarters, a large church complex, and as usual, hundreds of devotees from many Western centers had converged to meet him.

His arrival address specifically dealt with the position of the guru. Only unto one with unflinching faith in Kṛṣṇa and guru, he explained, is the essence of Vedic wisdom revealed. "Outsiders may think that the guru is very puffed up," said Prabhupāda, "and he is sitting and taking respect from the disciple. But the fact is that they are to be taught like that, how to offer respect to the spiritual master."

Śrīla Prabhupāda repeatedly encountered this misunderstanding. A year ago in Paris he had been heckled by radical students who envied his sitting on an elevated seat. And in America the reporters often portrayed him as enjoying material comforts provided by his disciples. But Prabhupāda maintained that despite a plethora of charlatans bringing disrepute to the word guru, anyone sincerely desiring to learn transcendental science had to go to a bona fide guru, the representative of God.

"A guru's business," said Śrīla Prabhupāda, "is to protect the subordinate disciples from falldown. Just like I am traveling all over the world, twice, thrice in a year. My duty is to see that my disciples, who have accepted me as guru, may not fall down. That is my anxiety.

"Now how can one become guru and representative of Kṛṣṇa? Everyone will say, 'I am representative of Kṛṣṇa. I am guru.' No. The real thing is enunciated by Śrī Caitanya Mahāprabhu, who says, āmāra ājñāya guru ha...ā tāra ei deśa: 'You just become guru on My order.' So guru means he who is carrying out the order of Śrī Caitanya Mahāprabhu—not self-made guru."

Śrīla Prabhupāda said that sometimes people gave him much credit for having done a wonderful thing for the whole world. "But," he confessed, "I do not know that I am a wonderful man. But I know one thing: that I am speaking what Kṛṣṇa has spoken—that's all. I am not making any addition or alteration. I am presenting Bhagavad-gītā as it is. This credit I can take."

Prabhupāda continued to stress that the guru must repeat the message of Kṛṣṇa. If a so-called guru wanted to be a cheater, that was a different thing. There would always be cheaters and people who wanted to be cheated. Usually such "gurus" cheated by accepting disciples without ordering them to stop sinful acts. "If I say that you can do all nonsense," Prabhupāda said, "simply take this mantra and give me $125, they will like. So I would have collected millions of dollars if I would have cheated like that. But I do not want that. I want one student who follows my instructions. I don't want millions. Ekaś candras tamo hanti na ca tāraḥ sahasraśaḥ. If there is one moon in the sky, that is sufficient for illumination. There is no need of millions of stars. My position is that I want to see that at least one disciple has become a pure devotee. Of course, I have got many sincere and pure devotees. That is my good luck. But I would have been satisfied if I could find out only one. There is no need of millions of stars."

Due to zoning restrictions, the devotees were not allowed to use the Berkeley temple as a residence. But since no suitable rooms were immediately available in the neighborhood, the devotees decided to accommodate Śrīla Prabhupāda and his personal staff in the temple for the few days of his visit, hoping the authorities wouldn't find out.

But on the first night, at two A.M., the police came by to check. Śrīla Prabhupāda was already up, working at his Bhāgavatam translation, when the police knocked loudly on the outside door near his room. Young Mike, who was to receive initiation in a few days, had been posted as a guard. He opened the door, and three flashlights shone into his face. The officers entered and showed their credentials. "You're not supposed to be sleeping in here," one of them said roughly.

"I wasn't," said Mike.

"Come on, we saw you in your sleeping bag."

"No," Mike protested. "I was just lying there because I'm guarding my spiritual master."

Śrīla Prabhupāda could easily hear the disturbance just outside his room. Other devotees who were spending the night in the building with Prabhupāda came out of their rooms and tried reasoning with the officers about the special occasion of the spiritual master's visit. One of the policemen began roaming around, checking in corners with his flashlight, opening doors. Now all the devotees in the building, about half a dozen, were standing with the policemen in the hall outside Prabhupāda's room.

"Where's the old man?" one of the policemen asked.

Bahulāśva, the temple president, requested them not to disturb Śrīla Prabhupāda. But the policemen made no attempt at politeness; they were, in fact, overtly nasty. One policeman banged on the window to Prabhupāda's room.

"Don't disturb him," Bahulāśva requested. "He's a very elderly man. He's not sleeping. These are the hours in which he writes, and all these men are his personal entourage. They're staying here to help him. We are not violating the rules."

Suddenly one of the policemen opened Prabhupāda's door and shone his light in on Prabhupāda's face. All three policemen peered in, while Śrīla Prabhupāda looked up at them, concerned, yet detached. The policeman shone his flashlight into the corners of Prabhupāda's simple, dimly lit room. No one said anything, and after about ten seconds they shut the door.

The police officers and the devotees continued arguing, the devotees contending that they were not using the building as a residence, the police citing infractions and taking down notes. Warning that they would be back, they finally left.

The incident had constituted about a half-hour interruption of Prabhupāda's work. But as the building became quiet again, Prabhupāda continued translating the verses of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam and speaking his purports into the dictating machine.

Prabhupāda agreed to hold a press conference. He welcomed regular opportunities to address the press, because even though their stories were often negative or dwelt on controversies, whatever truth the paper printed generally outweighed the damaging reports. The holy name of Kṛṣṇa always appeared, and usually there would be mention of Prabhupāda's preaching or of Bhagavad-gītā. Personal details about Prabhupāda were generally not offensive. He no longer expected the press to print much of the Kṛṣṇa consciousness philosophy, although occasionally some philosophy appeared. He would often request reporters to please report accurately and not misrepresent or skip over what he had said.

The reporters, however, seemed to have a fascination for the trivial. In 1968, a reporter in Montreal had dwelt on Prabhupāda's casual shoes—"Hush-Puppied High Priest." Nevertheless, for Prabhupāda, press interviews and press conferences were a way of preaching.

The press conference was held in the temple and was attended by about a dozen reporters and photographers. Brahmānanda Swami had the reporters write their questions on a piece of paper, so that one of the devotees could read them to Prabhupāda. Prabhupāda asked the photographers not to take pictures during the conference, since it would divert people's attention.

Devotee: "Śrīla Prabhupāda, would you comment on opposition to the Hare Kṛṣṇa movement in this country?"

Prabhupāda: "Why should they oppose? What is the reason? If they are Christian or Jewish religious men, so we are advocating you chant the holy name of God. So why should there be objection? Is there any reason for such objection? What is the objection?"

Devotee: "Some of the objections are that the followers of the Hare Kṛṣṇa sect are on the streets or in the airports bothering people."

Prabhupāda: "The airport itself is a botheration. So much sound, so much accident. So why this little botheration they cannot tolerate? That means intolerance. It is full of botheration, and because we are chanting they are very much disturbed. We don't chant in the airport, but we ask people that, 'Here is a very good book—you will benefit. If you like, you can take.' So what is the wrong there? Tell me, what is the wrong? If I give you something very nice, is that wrong? You read any book—we have got fifty books—and you find out any fault in that. If we are distributing some bad literature which is against the social welfare, then you can object. But you see. Bring all our books here and you will see. Any page you open you will find something good. Why are you denying to distribute such literature for the benefit of the people in general? What is the wrong there?"

Devotee: "One of the things that people say is that the devotees are asking for donations, not just distributing books but asking for money. That's a bother."

Prabhupāda: "But he pays. If he feels botheration, why does he pay? One who feels botheration does not pay. But one who thinks that here is a nice book, then he says, 'All right, let me take it.' Why you take this botheration? If it is botheration, how they are purchasing? They are paying their money, hard-earned money. Do you think they are bothered and at the same time they pay?"

Prabhupāda's sensible remark made the reporters laugh. Now they began questioning him directly.

Reporter: "What will happen to the movement in the United States when you die?"

Prabhupāda: "I will never die."

Devotees: "Jaya! Haribol!"

Prabhupāda: "I shall live from my books, and you will utilize."

Reporter: "Why does the Hare Kṛṣṇa movement not engage in social protest?"

Prabhupāda: “We are the best social workers. People are fools and rascals, and we are teaching them nice idea of God consciousness. We are the best social workers. We will stop all crimes. What is your social work? Producing hippies and criminals—that is not social work. Social work means the population must be very peaceful, wise, intelligent, and God conscious—first-class men. That is social work. If you produce some fourth-class, fifth-class, tenth-class of men, what is social work? We are not producing that. Just see, here is a first-class man. They do not have any bad habit—illicit sex, intoxication, meat-eating, and gambling. They are all young men. They are not addicted to all these things. This is social work.”

When a reporter asked about the political effects of the Hare Kṛṣṇa movement, Prabhupāda said, “If this God consciousness is spread, then everyone will be brilliantly qualified.” Recalling a discussion from his morning walk on the campus of the University of California, Berkeley, he added, “The students are studying psychology, but the result is that they are falling down from the tower in disappointment. And they have protected with glass.”

Bahulāśva explained further what Prabhupāda meant: “In the bell tower on the Berkeley campus, students in the sixties would jump from that tower to kill themselves. So they put glass there to stop the students from jumping. So Prabhupāda was explaining that this is their education, that after getting their education they have to commit suicide.”

Brahmānanda: “Śrīla Prabhupāda, one press man wanted to know what is this Ratha-yatra festival. Why is it going on over here in the Western world?”

Prabhupāda: “If God is the proprietor of everything, He is also the proprietor of the Western world. Is there any dispute? If you say God is the proprietor of the Western world, what is wrong there? So if the Western world has forgotten God, and He comes to remind them, what is the wrong?”

Reporter: “But what is the purpose of the large carts and other things you use?”

Prabhupāda: “Large cart means God is very great. He requires very great car. [The devotees laugh.] Why should He go in a small car?”

Prabhupāda continued speaking until all questions were answered. Now whatever the reporters would write was up to them, but Prabhupāda had used the occasion for glorifying Lord Kṛṣṇa and explaining His movement. Whether press conference, public festival, private conversation, or translating, his purpose was the same.

During a morning walk on the Berkeley campus, Prabhupāda pronounced that nuclear war was inevitable. Devotees had brought up the topic of proliferation of atomic weapons: “Russia has so many weapons, China has so many weapons, the United States has so much...”

Prabhupāda: “Everyone now. India also.”

Devotee: “They are all afraid of using them.”

Prabhupāda: "They must use it. That is nature's arrangement. [Chuckling.] That you all die—that is nature's arrangement."

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami: "When someone gets some power, he wants to try it out. Just like there was that demon, Lord Śiva gave him power so that anyone's head he touched would fall off."

Prabhupāda: "Yes, just like in your country there are so many cars, so that a poor man like me has car always—not an inch move on leg. But because there are so many cars, naturally they must be used. Similarly, there are so many weapons now that must be used. That is the natural sequence. They must use it."

Bahulāśva: "That is why they have wars, just to use up the weapons."

Prabhupāda: "Oh, yes."

Devotee: "The only difficulty is that for one person to use the atomic weapon, that means it would be the entire waste of mankind. So everyone is afraid of using the ultimate."

Prabhupāda: "Anyway, they must be used. There's no doubt about it. Therefore we can say there will be war. This is no astrology. It is a natural conclusion."

Devotee: "That will be total destruction."

Prabhupāda: "Well, total or partial, that we shall see. But they must be used."

Devotee: "Under the threat of nuclear war, wouldn't Kṛṣṇa consciousness be more easy to spread?"

Prabhupāda: "No. Threat is already there. But they are such fools that they are not afraid of the threat. Threat is already there. Everyone will die—that is the problem. But who is caring for this? They are avoiding this. They cannot take any antimeasures."

Yadubara: "So it will take a war to bring them to their senses a bit?"

Prabhupāda: "No, war is already going on. But they are so senseless that they will not come to this. They are so rascal. Therefore they are described as mūḍha—all rascals."

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa: "It is very hard to preach to these fools, Prabhupāda."

Prabhupāda: "No, chant Hare Kṛṣṇa. That will be sufficient."

Śrīla Prabhupāda had rarely been so conclusive about nuclear war. Earlier in the year, on a walk in Māyāpur, he had discussed how there would be a World War III, and that talk had become a sensation throughout ISKCON. But before, he had always offered the alternative: if the people of the world could take to Kṛṣṇa consciousness, then the cumulative karma could be reversed. But now he said it was inevitable.

While in Berkeley, Śrīla Prabhupāda received a visit from Yogi Bhajan, founder of the HHH Foundation, Swami Chidananda, president of the Divine Life Society, and Jain leader Swami Sushill Muni, president of the World Fellowship of Religion. Swami Sushill wore a white turban and, across his mouth, a white mask, in the tradition of the nonviolent Jains, who try to avoid killing even airborne microbes. Yogi Bhajan, dressed in typical Sikh fashion of white turban and white loose-fitting garments, was accompanied by a few of his Western disciples, similarly attired. Visits from various swamis and yogīs were not uncommon for Śrīla Prabhupāda. Even when he did not agree with a particular philosophy, he was always the cordial host, pleasantly receiving guests in his simple quarters.

In Hawaii Yogi Bhajan had also visited Śrīla Prabhupāda to invite him to his Unity of Man Conference, which many sādhus were already scheduled to attend. Śrīla Prabhupāda had spoken sternly, pointing out that simply gathering people at a meeting was not unity. Real unity could be achieved only if the participants of the meeting agreed to accept the authorized science of God in the revealed scriptures. Now they had come to invite him to a second Unity of Man conference.

Swami Sushill and Swami Chidananda were particularly enthusiastic in praising Śrīla Prabhupāda and his ISKCON. "Your movement is something different," said Swami Chidananda. "It's all over the world, and you have so many thousands of people all over the world. We can't describe it. It's so amazing, and in this age how wonderfully it has been done! Without God's mercy nothing could have been done. That six lakhs of magazines have come out and been distributed in one month—it's amazing!"

Swami Sushill added, "You have established the same principles without any change here in a modern way. In Bengal, without your āśrama we couldn't have done anything. When we know there is an āśrama of Caitanya Mahāprabhu, we don't need to worry about anything, where to stay. What strikes me is that you don't compromise anywhere."

They mentioned the horrible sin of cow slaughter, and Śrīla Prabhupāda told how his movement was protecting cows in New Vrindaban. When Swami Sushill asked how Prabhupāda interested the young people in God, Prabhupāda gave the example that the most popular sweet shop in Delhi was the one where everything was made with pure ghee. "If the thing is good," Prabhupāda said, "then there won't be a shortage of customers." He further pointed out that his teachings were based purely on Bhagavad-gītā, surrender to Kṛṣṇa.

When Swami Sushill asked how Prabhupāda got his followers to take shelter of Kṛṣṇa, Prabhupāda replied, "It's God who did it. God says, mām ekaṁ śaraṇaṁ vraja. So that is our duty—just to take shelter of Him. Lord Caitanya says, yāre dekha tāre kaha kṛṣṇa-upadeśa. That is, whoever you meet, just preach the teachings of Kṛṣṇa as in the Bhagavad-gītā. I don't have any upadeśa [instructions]. It's just Kṛṣṇa's upadeśa. We are all foolish. We can't have any upadeśa. So what are the teachings of Kṛṣṇa? We just keep on saying them. Kṛṣṇa says do like that, and that's what we do. So this is our secret. I do this, and that's what I teach to all these people. I am totally against manufactured religion. Evam paramparā-prāptam—just as Kṛṣṇa says."

In reply to Swami Sushill's question of how people could be brought together, Prabhupāda quoted a verse from Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam that lists many races of the world and explains that all of them can be purified by taking shelter of Kṛṣṇa's pure devotee.

Prabhupāda's guests again invited him to their conference, and Swami Sushill added, "We were very glad to meet you today. We would like to call you sometime in our meeting of yoga-dharma."

"We'll come," said Prabhupāda. "What about your fellowship?"

"It's called World Fellowship of Religion," said Swami Chidananda. "Yogiji has made this Unity of Man Conference."

"But we invited him," said Yogi Bhajan, referring to the previous invitation.

Swami Chidananda: "But now you are having the second one."

Yogi Bhajan: "Yes, the second meeting is in Mexico. We will call him then as well."

Śrīla Prabhupāda smiled and said, "I told you before, there is not going to be any unity." This candid remark made them laugh.

"You say," said Swami Chidananda, remembering Prabhupāda's analysis, "that until everyone is God-minded, until then... "

"When God will desire," said Yogi Bhajan, "then everyone will become God-minded. What's the great deal about it?"

"God Himself says," said Śrīla Prabhupāda, "duḥkhālayam aśāśvatam—there is suffering. You cannot stay in this world. You have to leave. The main problem is birth, old age, disease, and death. So we are not anxious to adjust these things here, but these are the real problems."

"What can we do about birth, old age, disease, and death?" asked Swami Chidananda.

Śrīla Prabhupāda continued preaching Bhagavad-gītā. Without overtly disagreeing, Prabhupāda's guests inquired and listened with respect, considering him a great spiritual leader, potent in spreading Hindu dharma.

"He is great," said Yogi Bhajan. "That's what I want to learn—how he can do that."

The conversation turned, and Prabhupāda mentioned that Yogi Bhajan was from the Sikh community, which is famous for its brave fighters. "When the British people were defeated," said Śrīla Prabhupāda, "it was by the Sikh people. I have seen it. It is due to the Sikhs only. The Sikhs are kṣatriyas. Some of them are brāhmaṇas, brāhmaṇa-kṣatriyas."

Swami Sushill: "Yes, I said to some of my students that you go to Prabhupādajī, and he'll make you brāhmaṇa-kṣatriyas."

Prabhupāda: “Yes, let us cooperate like that. You take the work of kṣatriyas, and we take the work of brāhmaṇas. For brāhmaṇas we need brain, and for kṣatriyas we need strength.”

As they spoke about nonviolence, Śrīla Prabhupāda argued that if one does not become God conscious, then he will undoubtedly be committing himśā, or violence.

Yogi Bhajan: “Yes, when they come to their senses, then they remember God.”

Prabhupāda (laughing): “Here in the West there is only himśā, nothing else.” Prabhupāda's guests laughed with him.

Afterward, they took some photographs, and Śrīla Prabhupāda invited them, along with some of his disciples, to sit and take Kṛṣṇa prasādam together. Śrīla Prabhupāda requested his guests to attend the San Francisco Ratha-yātrā, to be held the next day, and they agreed.

July 20, 1975

This was not only the largest ISKCON Ratha-yatra ever but also the largest gathering of devotees to date, larger even than the international gathering at Māyāpur earlier that year. Preparations at the festival site had expanded to include prasādam booths, Deity paraphernalia displays, souvenirs, and Prabhupāda's books. Thousands joined the more than eight hundred devotees in the procession through Golden Gate Park.

Because the builders of the carts had decided to make steel wheels instead of the usual wooden ones, difficulty arose. Śrīla Prabhupāda had warned them, “This is your American disease—always changing. Do not change the old design.” But they had already done it. Riding in Subhadrā's cart, which had wooden wheels, Śrīla Prabhupāda experienced no personal inconvenience. The other two carts, however, did not fare so well; they began to vibrate so severely that support beams had to be added to the spokes during the procession. Soon the wheels became misshapen, and they creaked and rattled as though about to collapse. But somehow, after much difficulty, all three carts completed the course.

In the midst of the Ratha-yatra activities, one of the devotees asked Śrīla Prabhupāda if he had ever attended the Ratha-yatra festival in Jagannātha Purī. “No,” Prabhupāda replied, “I was having my own Ratha-yatra.”

SPL 47: Preaching to America: Part 2

CHAPTER FORTY-SEVEN

Preaching to America:

Part 2

= Los Angeles

July 22, 1975

More than three weeks had passed since Prabhupāda had given the order for the BBT to produce seventeen books in two months. Now Rāmeśvara and Rādhāvallabha reported that work was going on around the clock in all departments and that devotees were determined to meet their deadlines. Most Press workers attended maṅgala-arati at four-thirty A.M., chanted their prescribed rounds of japa, and worked all day until late at night, sometimes taking only one meal.

Additional editors, painters, photographers, indexers, typists, proofreaders, and layout men had been called in from other ISKCON departments. Everyone was cooperating to fulfill Śrīla Prabhupāda's desire. It was as though nothing else existed except the task before them.

Kingsport Press, one of the largest printers in the country, had taken the job of printing, agreeing to push back all other assignments to free their presses and bindery for work twenty-four hours a day until all seventeen volumes were printed. A paper company in New York had agreed to supply paper at affordable terms to meet all the deadlines. The BBT's top photographer was in India photographing places of Caitanya līlā, especially in Bengal and Orissa.

Śrīla Prabhupāda freely gave his time to the artists and the Bengali editors, answering their questions. Several times a day his disciples would come to him about the exact use of Sanskrit and Bengali words. This was not merely a matter of lingual scholarship, since each word had to be translated in light of the previous ācārya's explanations and Prabhupāda's own Kṛṣṇa conscious realization. Prabhupāda had cautioned disciple editors not to change but to ask.

The artists had their usual questions about how things should look according to Śrīla Prabhupāda's transcendental vision. In their desire to have the paintings completely accurate, they were greedy to ask him almost endless questions. Prabhupāda had said the transcendental paintings of his disciples were windows to the spiritual world; the artists didn't want their imaginations to obscure the view.

One day, Rāmeśvara came into Śrīla Prabhupāda's room carrying canvases by one of the artists whose proficiency the more experienced artists questioned. The artist in question, Gaurī-devī dāśī, was a book distributor with artistic talent, pressed into emergency service for the book production marathon. Rāmeśvara showed Śrīla Prabhupāda her painting of the Guṇḍicā temple. Prabhupāda's verdict: "Oh, this is very nice." One of the senior artists was present and pointed out several technical errors, but Prabhupāda replied, "A blind uncle is better than none." Besides, he said, the painting showed a devotional spirit the readers of the book would appreciate.

Due to Śrīla Prabhupāda's presence in Los Angeles, the book production marathon intensified. Even without attending Prabhupāda's morning walks or classes or evening readings in the garden, the Press workers felt ecstasy. All day they worked at what Prabhupāda wanted most, and to take time off to go see him, they reasoned, would be selfish. Giving all their energy for Kṛṣṇa, they felt blissful.

The Press was busy day and night. To see devotees slumped over their desks or typewriters or lying beside their easels at two or three in the morning was not unusual. Proofreaders saw manuscripts come into and out of their hands so quickly they could hardly bear it. An artist might fall asleep before an uncompleted painting and awaken to find it being finished at another artist's easel.

Rāmeśvara, running on very little sleep, orchestrated everything, including the photographer in India, the printer, and the paper company. Sometimes he would work directly with Rādhāvallabha on various aspects of the production.

Rādhāvallabha had set the deadlines, and he kept to them at all costs. To the Press workers, he seemed to be present everywhere—encouraging them, bringing them supplies, seeing to their needs, begging and coercing them to complete their quotas. But one night he took a break and entered Prabhupāda's room during an informal gathering of devotees. Prabhupāda, his eyes closed, his head gently rocking, was listening to a tape of himself singing bhajanas. Opening his eyes and seeing Rādhāvallabha seated among the others, he said, "I am keeping you," and again closed his eyes.

One of the devotees spoke up and said, "Oh, no, no, Prabhupāda. You're not bothering us." But another devotee turned to Rādhāvallabha and said, "I think Prabhupāda was talking to you." Rādhāvallabha realized what Prabhupāda meant; he was telling him to go back to work. It was as if Prabhupāda were actually saying, "Why are you sitting here looking at me? Get back to work."

Śrīla Prabhupāda was pleased with the sincerity of his disciples. Seventeen books in two months he had asked them to produce, and they, rather than try to explain to him why this was impossible, had taken the order so seriously that they could not conceive of rejecting or changing or modifying it. Instead of modifying the order, they had modified their lives. They had gone beyond the realm of routine work into the realm of extraordinary effort. As a result, both they and Prabhupāda felt great satisfaction. As Prabhupāda said, it was all an arrangement for the satisfaction of Lord Caitanya and the previous ācāryas.

Śrīla Prabhupāda decided to continue his U.S. tour, visiting Laguna Beach and San Diego and then going on to Dallas. From there he would visit New Orleans and the nearby ISKCON farm in Mississippi. Then on to Detroit, Toronto, Boston, and New York, eventually traveling to Europe and India.

From Prabhupāda's point of view, his touring was imperative for spreading Kṛṣṇa consciousness. As he had said in his arrival address at Berkeley, "I am traveling all over the world, twice, thrice in a year. My duty is to see that my disciples, who have accepted me as guru, may not fall down. That is my anxiety."

Prabhupāda's concern was for his disciples, but also for all people. Distressed by the fallen and ignorant state of humanity, especially in the West, he wanted to help the English-speaking world, as his spiritual master had ordered. This had been his spirit two years ago in Calcutta, when he had risen from his sickbed and flown to London to take part in the Ratha-yatra. This was his great desire: to preach in the West, where people were so strongly under the grip of speculative philosophies, denying God and glorifying sense enjoyment. The mass of people would not easily change their ignorant ways, but if he could make only one person a pure devotee, he said, then his work would be successful.

Prabhupāda would work intensively with his important India projects for a few months, but then would always return to the West to again tour and preach. Both were required—developing his projects in India and touring the West. When Yogi Bhaṇan and company in Berkeley had expressed their amazement at how Prabhupāda was personally maintaining his disciples by traveling all over the world, Prabhupāda had admitted that it was difficult and that he was trying to train his G.B.C. secretaries to lead his movement. But so far, it seemed that as long as he had the power to do so, he would continue to travel.

Laguna Beach

July 25, 1975

Laguna Beach was about a two-hour drive south of Los Angeles. The temple, a house near the beach, was crowded with guests and visiting devotees. After Prabhupāda had taken his seat upon the newly up holstered vyāsāsana, some of the temple leaders came forward one at a time and bathed his feet.

In the course of his lecture, Prabhupāda spoke against taking intoxicating drugs: “Is there anyone here who can say, ‘I am the controller’? Is there anyone who will answer this? You may think that you are the controller, but you are controlled by drugs...” The city of Laguna Beach was notorious as an illicit drug center. Prabhupāda had come not to flatter anyone with sentimental spirituality but to cut through their illusion. Bathing the feet of the spiritual master was good, but to be a genuine devotee one had to strictly follow the regulations. One had to choose whether to be controlled by drugs or by Kṛṣṇa.

Prabhupāda stayed next door to the temple in a neighbor's house. His first visitor was Ṛṣi dāsa, who had given up his initiation vows and fallen away from Kṛṣṇa consciousness. Sporting long, curly hair and a beard, he had casually dropped by to pay a little visit to his former spiritual master. Prabhupāda received Ṛṣi warmly, and they both exchanged smiles and laughed. Ṛṣi's demeanor, however, was brazen, almost defiant, and he showed no contrition. Prabhupāda was not very happy to see the state of this boy to whom he had awarded the sannyāsa order a few years before.

In earlier years, Prabhupāda had cried when a dear disciple had left him. In those days, the fall of a disciple had been rare, almost unheard of. But over the years Prabhupāda had seen more casualties, even among his G.B.C. leaders and sannyāsīs. In 1967, when one of his first disciples, Kṛṣṇa-devī dāsī, had left her husband, Subala, and gone off with a boyfriend, Prabhupāda had consoled Subala by reminding him how rare it was that one could become a devotee of Kṛṣṇa. “The wonderful thing is not that Kṛṣṇa dāsī has left,” Śrīla Prabhupāda had said, “but that we can stay in Kṛṣṇa consciousness.”

Although devotees left Kṛṣṇa consciousness for various reasons, Śrīla Prabhupāda saw them all as having been tricked by illusion. The result was almost always the same, whether the defector left on the plea of a new religion, or new economic opportunities, or whatever; usually he or she would take up a life of sense gratification, abandoning the strict path of self-realization.

This was certainly true of R̥ṣi. When Prabhupāda asked him what he was doing with his life, he laughed and said he was playing saxophone. There was no need to ask him whether he was chanting sixteen rounds or following the four rules. But R̥ṣi wanted to assure Śrīla Prabhupāda that he was doing fine. "I think I have more freedom now," said R̥ṣi.

"Do you think you have freedom?" Prabhupāda challenged.

"Some," R̥ṣi replied. "By studying and working."

"What is your age?" Prabhupāda asked.

"Twenty-nine."

"Are you free not to become older?" Śrīla Prabhupāda persisted.

"No."

"Then what is your freedom?"

R̥ṣi gave a short laugh. "I don't care."

"That's all right," Prabhupāda replied, "but I am researching. I am now seventy-eight. I don't wish to die, but I am forced. But you too are forced to become old. No one wants to be old."

Recalling some of the Kṛṣṇa conscious philosophy, R̥ṣi tried to argue against Prabhupāda, saying that although he was forced to grow old, according to transmigration of the soul he would be free after death. And anyway, there were other freedoms.

Prabhupāda stuck to his original point and said, "Death is inevitable. Old age, no one wants. Everyone wants youth. Even an old man goes to the beach for health. I want youth, but I cannot have it. So where is the freedom?"

Prabhupāda then spoke at length, for R̥ṣi's benefit as well as for the benefit of the other devotees in the room. Persons under the influence of māyā, he said, declare that they are free. The drug addict or the drunkard thinks he is free—to lie down on the street. Yet his actions involve him in the strict laws of material nature. The outlaw declares himself free from the laws of the state, but he is put into jail. What is the use of his saying he is free? "Therefore Kṛṣṇa says," Prabhupāda explained, "that 'Whatever little freedom you have got, just surrender that freedom to Me.'"

Prabhupāda's comments on false freedom were to the point. Within two hours of his arrival, he had already exposed the Laguna Beach mystique. R̥ṣi continued to smile and argue, but before Prabhupāda he was just another youth with no real answers. Prabhupāda was not interested in debating; he wanted to help his disciple. Ṛṣi, however, was using whatever freedom he had to defy Kṛṣṇa's representative, trusting instead in his youth, his intoxication, and his music.

The door opened. "These are some professors, Śrīla Prabhupāda," announced a devotee, "who form part of our congregation." Prabhupāda greeted the new guests and asked that they sit up front on cushions.

"I was talking with this boy about freedom," said Prabhupāda. "So I say there is no freedom for us. We are always dependent. What is your opinion about it?" One of the professors said he agreed, and Prabhupāda continued speaking. He talked with the professors for more than an hour.

Near the end, Upendra's three-year-old son, Saumya, walked up to Prabhupāda from the back of the room. Prabhupāda gave him some money that was on the desk, and the boy ran back to his mother and gave her the money. "Yes. When I was young," Prabhupāda reminisced, "if I got money I would take it to my mother. But then when I would become angry at her, I would demand it back. Sometimes I would steal money from my mother's purse and go watch Charlie Chaplin movies." His favorite scene was in a film called Hard Times, he said, when Charlie Chaplin sat down at a table with a knife and fork to eat a boot.

San Diego

July 27, 1975

Śrīla Prabhupāda rode down the San Diego Freeway in the predawn darkness, on his way to San Diego to attend a festival in Balboa Park. On the way he passed through San Clemente, where former president Richard Nixon was staying. Prabhupāda had followed Nixon's exposure and resignation and had often mentioned it in his lectures, sometimes as an example of how even the most powerful men are subject to anxiety and loss, sometimes to illustrate the need for proper training in the four natural social orders.

A devotee mentioned that Mr. Nixon lived here with no position, scorned by his countrymen. "Then you should go and preach to him," Śrīla Prabhupāda said. Since the man had lost everything and was lamenting, he said, he might be receptive to hearing about the Absolute Truth. Prabhupāda had attempted a similar approach to Mahātmā Gandhi.

At Balboa Park Prabhupāda was pleased with the devotees' booths and colorful tents and the stage they had erected in the meadow. He had just begun addressing the large crowd, when a man in the audience began shouting. Prabhupāda asked what he was saying, and a devotee explained, "Śrīla Prabhupāda, the man says he wants to have sex more than once a month."

"He is creating disturbance," said Prabhupāda into the microphone.

After a tense moment, Prabhupāda continued his lecture. "So, as this man is talking about sex, so this whole material world is enchanted by sex." Taking the shouted protest as a new focus for his speech, Śrīla Prabhupāda quoted Prahāda Mahārāja's statement that all material entanglement begins from sexual enjoyment, which in comparison to transcendental pleasure is paltry and abominable. "But real happiness," Prabhupāda asserted, "is above the senses. Whatever we enjoy with the gross senses is temporary, but permanent enjoyment is transcendental.

"So this man," he continued, "was suggesting he wants sex at least once in a month. Yes, that is allowed. Five days after the wife's menstrual period the husband and wife can have sex for begetting rightful children." Prabhupāda used the Vedic technical term, garbhādhāna-saṁskāra, to describe the process of purifying sex within marriage. The devotees were astonished that before a crowd of sexually liberated Southern Californians Prabhupāda was espousing responsible, legitimate sex. Usually he discussed such matters, if at all, in letters to householders. But if the Americans were intent on sex, then Prabhupāda would let them have it. But he stressed responsible, restricted sex. Otherwise, by irresponsible sex, one has to suffer.

"Sex life is not denied," Prabhupāda said, "but one must take responsibility for sex life. Otherwise he becomes entangled in so many sinful activities. You can have sex life once in a month. That is prescribed. Because a woman has once in a month menstrual period. So sex life is meant for simply begetting nice children, not for sense gratification. If it is in regulative form, the world may not become hell. If it is in irregular form, then the whole world will be hell. Sex life is not denied. Sex life is not denied, but in a regulated form, so that you can get nice population and live very happily.

"Especially at the present moment, if you can produce children to become Kṛṣṇa conscious, that would be a great service to the Lord, because we want a Kṛṣṇa conscious population. Otherwise this world is going to hell. There were great empires like the Roman, Greek, and later on the Mogul empire, the British empire. Then there was Napoleon, Hitler, Mussolini. So all these powerful empires and men have come and gone. Only a name is there now. Nothing is remaining. So I came to your country, America. I decided to come here because I heard your country is very nice, and when I came here I saw actually that your country is very nice—your cities, your buildings. Your men also—because mostly my students are Americans, and they help me very kindly to push on this movement.

"So I have studied the American life very nicely. They have a good heart. The only thing that is wanting is Kṛṣṇa consciousness. For want of this Kṛṣṇa consciousness, despite all your opulences, you are becoming confused and frustrated. I hear that out of three, one man is a patient of a psychiatrist. Why? Why are you unhappy? Why should you be unhappy? You have got everything—enough food, land, money, intelligence. Why should you be unhappy? The cause of this you should try to find out. The cause is that without Kṛṣṇa consciousness, without God consciousness, nobody can be happy."

The outdoor audience was now quiet and attentive. Prabhupāda spoke for about forty minutes, ranging over different areas of Kṛṣṇa conscious philosophy, and concluded with a request to the American men and women to seriously cooperate in Kṛṣṇa consciousness and thereby find happiness. His talk was greeted with cheers, and the devotees continued to host the crowd throughout the afternoon, chanting and dancing and distributing prasādam.

An Indian visitor was explaining to Prabhupāda why India had to build up nuclear weapons and armed forces, but Prabhupāda disagreed. The reason, he said, was the dearth of genuine kṣatriyas. There were no more men of courage; therefore a woman was now in charge.

In the newspapers also had been much coverage of a U.S. merchant ship, the Mayaguez, which, when sailing within the twelve-mile limit of Cambodia, had been seized without warning. President Ford had taken a strong stand, sending in the U.S. Marines. Fifteen Marines had been killed and fifty wounded in recovering the vessel, and the U.S. had bombed Cambodia. It was proper, Prabhupāda said, for the U.S. to take a strong stand in defending its citizens abroad. “Yes, America should be strong,” he asserted. “But first of all they should become Kṛṣṇa conscious. If they were actually a Kṛṣṇa conscious nation, they should declare, ‘If you touch the hair of one of our men, there will be a fight.’ ”

Śrīla Prabhupāda spoke strongly, giving the devotees a vision of a powerful America leading the world in Kṛṣṇa consciousness. And this stirred within them hopes for a pure patriotism, such as in the ancient Vedic culture, when the world had been ruled by God conscious leaders.

The next morning, before going to the airport, Śrīla Prabhupāda took a walk in Balboa Park. Hearing the sweet singing of birds, he said they were happy. “They just take the fruits, and they are singing in the morning,” he said.

Rāmeśvara: “But when we tell people that they may take their next birth as an animal or bird, they say that's all right, because these creatures are happier than the humans.”

Prabhupāda: “But because you are rascal, you do not know that you can become more happy—go back home, back to Godhead. That you do not know.”

Devotees liked to bring before Śrīla Prabhupāda all kinds of topics for his comment. Conversations would jump from one thing to another as devotees sometimes brought up horrendous examples of contemporary degradation or sometimes tested their own doubts by posing as agnostics. Or sometimes they would simply bring to Prabhupāda's attention ordinary sights and sounds. Whatever the topic, Prabhupāda showed the devotees how to see things from the transcendental perspective. And thus he also showed to them his own purity and humanness. When a devotee told Prabhupāda that Balboa was the first man to see the Pacific, Prabhupāda at first seemed impressed, but a moment later he scoffed, “Everyone was already there. That they do not know. The Pacific and Atlantic oceans are mentioned in Kalidāsa Kavi's book Kumāra-sambhava. They are all mentioned—Pacific, Atlantic oceans. These fools do not know anything. They say, ‘I am the first man to come,’ as if before him there was no man. Just see!”

Prabhupāda complimented the devotees on the previous day's festival in the park and advised them to hold such festivals every day. “You are so rich,” he said laughingly, “you can do it. Continual festival. Tell them, ‘Come on. Take prasādam. Chant Hare Kṛṣṇa.’ Just like—what is that? Who told me?—continual massage.”

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami: “Yes, they have twenty-four-hour massage parlors.”

"Twenty-four hours," Prabhupāda said, laughing. "Similarly, twenty-four-hours free prasādam—come on. But they are not hungry. Not for that."

While walking to a meadow, they came upon a man standing on his head. "Is this our man?" Prabhupāda asked.

The devotees laughed and replied, "No, yoga."

"He wants to be immortal," said Rāmeśvara.

"No," said Prabhupāda. "This keeps them healthy."

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa: "It's good for the body?"

Prabhupāda: "Yes, śīrṣāsana it is called, sitting on the head. Śīrṣāsana, padmāsana, yogāsana—there are so many āsanās."

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa: "We don't practice those."

"Yes, we have no time from sleeping," said Prabhupāda sarcastically. The devotees laughed at his cutting remark. "Otherwise," Prabhupāda continued, "this is not bad. This is not bad. It keeps good health, this yoga-āsana."

Hearing Prabhupāda's surprising praise of haṭha yoga, a devotee asked the inevitable—"So if we have time, can we do that?"

By now they had finished their walk and had arrived back at the cars. Śrīla Prabhupāda chuckled, as if aware that he was being baited with a controversial question. "Hare Kṛṣṇa," he said. On getting into the car, he added, "Not required."

Dallas

July 28, 1975

"Swami, why are you here?" asked a reporter at the Dallas–Forth Worth Airport.

"This is my home," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. The reply delighted his disciples. "I have got so many children, grandchildren. So I have come to see them."

Śrīla Prabhupāda had written about Dallas Gurukula in his commentary on the Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam. The Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement, he had written, was training a new generation of Vaiṣṇavas in its own school in Dallas, Texas.

More than a hundred boys and girls were now enrolled, and Śrīla Prabhupāda liked to visit here whenever he toured the United States. Here, as in other ISKCON projects in the U.S., he involved himself little in the management; but he visited, making himself available to the teachers, who were always ready with questions. Since there was no precedent in the West for Kṛṣṇa conscious education, and since the devotees wanted to develop the school just as Prabhupāda desired, they felt they had to ask him about curriculum, teaching methods, hygiene, recreation, and so on.

In the one-hundred-degree weather, the schoolboys wore no shirts, and Śrīla Prabhupāda ran the electric fan in his room. As soon as he arrived in his quarters, he asked that all the children and adults come into his room, and one by one they entered his room, held out a hand, and Prabhupāda gave them a large rasagulā. That evening he sat in a rocking chair on the lawn behind the temple, while devotees fanned him with a large peacock fan and locusts droned loudly in the trees. He sat there with his disciples amid many thriving tulasī plants, listening to a reading from the Kṛṣṇa book. This was as much a lesson in how to conduct a gurukula as were his answers to the teachers' intricate questions. At Gurukula, everything should be based on chanting and hearing about Kṛṣṇa.

Brahmānanda Swami was reading about Kṛṣṇa's rescuing His beloved Rukmiṇī, when suddenly Śrīla Prabhupāda interrupted and said that when they had been escaping on Kṛṣṇa's chariot and the other princes had been attacking, Rukmiṇī had taken the reins and had driven the chariot. Kṛṣṇa had then taken His bow and arrows and had defeated His opponents. The devotees were amazed. Many of them were keen students of Kṛṣṇa book, and nowhere was that particular detail mentioned. Never before had any of them heard of Rukmiṇī's taking the reins, nor had they ever thought of her in that way. But Prabhupāda assured them that she had fearlessly driven Kṛṣṇa's chariot during the fight.

While Prabhupāda was speaking, Dayānanda, the Gurukula headmaster, stretched out his leg to find a more comfortable position, and Prabhupāda turned to him and said sternly, "Do not put your feet near Tulasī. She is a pure devotee."

When Brahmānanda read a prayer in the Kṛṣṇa book describing Kṛṣṇa as the creator of the material elements, Prabhupāda spoke up. "If we do not accept that Kṛṣṇa made the sky," he challenged, "then who made it?" The blue of the Texas sky was now fading into twilight, and guests and devotees alike looked up at the sky and then back to Prabhupāda.

"According to Bhagavad-gītā," Śrīla Prabhupāda said, "Kṛṣṇa made the sky—bhūmir āpo 'nalo vāyuḥ kham. So we should study like this—aham sarvasya prabhavaḥ. The sky is the greatest material thing, but He created it. In this way, study Kṛṣṇa. Not just studying Kṛṣṇa with the gopīs—then you will misunderstand. But the more you understand Kṛṣṇa, the more you will become His staunch follower. Unauthorized persons never paint Kṛṣṇa creating the sky. They always want to see Kṛṣṇa dancing with the gopīs, and in this way they try to support their own lusty activities."

Two Dallas newspapers had covered Prabhupāda's arrival. The Dallas Times Herald printed a photo of Śrīla Prabhupāda seated and garlanded with roses, his right hand raised, his index finger extended, instructing. "Barefoot swami draws admiring Krishna crowd," the headline read.

Aside from claiming that Śrīla Prabhupāda was barefoot (actually he had worn shoes but had removed them when sitting cross-legged), the article pointed out a controversy around the Kṛṣṇa devotees in Dallas. The article cited ISKCON's injunction against officials of the Dallas– Fort Worth Airport, who had forbidden them to distribute literature and take donations.

On hearing the article, Śrīla Prabhupāda had commented, “This is good literature. It should be encouraged.” By reading it, people would become sane, and they would understand their constitutional position. Otherwise the people would go on being perturbed by crime and wondering what to do.

Śrīla Prabhupāda was particularly interested in the newspaper's version of his reply to the question about Indian politics.

... the Swami replied that, “Mrs. Gandhi is inclined to some spiritual understanding, and if she fully develops it the situation will improve.

“Democracy is not much beneficial if its leaders have no spiritual values. Mahatma Gandhi was practically a dictator, but he was a man of a high moral character, so people accepted him. Dictatorship can be good, provided the dictator is spiritually developed.”

Śrīla Prabhupāda was repeatedly being asked about Indira Gandhi. The U.S. government was critical of her newly instituted emergency rule, and particularly in Chicago, the reporters had tried to construe Prabhupāda's comments about women as criticism of Prime Minister Gandhi. Both in Chicago and Dallas Śrīla Prabhupāda had stressed that he was not much concerned with politics, although he indicated that politics were useless without Kṛṣṇa.

Eager to keep good relations with the Indian government, Prabhupāda did not like to speak publicly against India's leaders. He had often expressed a desire to meet with the Prime Minister to assure her of the good work the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement was doing for the benefit of India and the whole world, and to request her assistance. In India, visas had always been a problem for the devotees. They had to continually leave the country and their service to renew their visas and then reenter, at great cost. Now some devotees, especially in the Māyāpur area, were being asked to leave the country because of America's stance against Indira Gandhi's political actions. recently Prabhupāda had received word from the devotees in Delhi that they were trying to arrange such a meeting. So he liked the favorable statements on Indira Gandhi in the Dallas Times Herald and asked that the article be saved.

While walking near White Rock Lake the morning he was to leave for New Orleans, Śrīla Prabhupāda dropped behind the main group of devotees and said to his servant, “I am not feeling well.” The few sannyāsīs close by pressed in near him with concern. “Yesterday also,” he added.

“Is it due to the heat, Śrīla Prabhupāda?”

“I do not know why, but now I am feeling headache and some spasm.”

"Should we cancel the trip this morning?"

Śrīla Prabhupāda didn't answer. He admitted, however, the heat may have weakened his digestion. When asked if the food was to his liking, he replied, "Not very all right. Constantly change of hand is not good." Brahmānanda Swami suggested that another difficulty for health was the constant flying, but when he again suggested postponing the flight to New Orleans, Śrīla Prabhupāda said, "No, no," and continued forward.

The weather was stormy enroute to New Orleans. Śrīla Prabhupāda, in the first-class section with Upendra, was looking out the window when the "Fasten Your Seat Belt" announcement came, just ten minutes before the scheduled landing.

Suddenly the plane dropped violently. Passengers screamed and clutched their armrests, bracing themselves. Upendra, frightened speechless, thought, If I have to die, it's all right, because Prabhupāda is here. The downward plunge stopped abruptly, but then the plane began to lurch and roll, tossed by turbulent air currents. Overhead bins snapped open, and articles fell out, bouncing off passengers and onto the floor. Śrīla Prabhupāda turned to Upendra. "Why is it rocking?" he asked.

"It's a storm," replied Upendra. He could see that Śrīla Prabhupāda was calm. His expression was one of irritation, like over some minor incident, as when his lunch would be served late.

In wind and downpour, the pilot finally touched the wheels onto the runway, landing without mishap. A sigh rose from the passengers, then cheering and applause. Śrīla Prabhupāda seemed unaffected. He asked Upendra how long a drive it would be to the temple.

Śrīla Prabhupāda and his party arrived at the large mansion on Esplanade Boulevard in heavy rain. Nityānanda, the New Orleans temple president, having been given two weeks' notice of Prabhupāda's visit, had hurriedly repainted and readied all the buildings, both here and at the Mississippi farm. Despite a thorough search of the city's markets, however, he had been unable to find any bitter melon, which he had heard Śrīla Prabhupāda took daily for digestion. Therefore he had arranged for one of Prabhupāda's secretaries to bring some from Dallas. Nityānanda and the New Orleans devotees felt they were as ready for Prabhupāda's visit as they would ever be.

A wide marble staircase led up to the entrance, and Prabhupāda, leaning on his cane, climbed it slowly, as devotees threw flower petals down from the third floor. The entire distance from the car to the house, about 250 feet, was covered with a three-foot-wide white cloth, leading up to the vyāsāsana. Prabhupāda bowed down before the Deities of Gaura-Nitāi, Rādhā-Rādhākānta, and Lord Jagannātha, sat down, but then decided it was too late in the morning to speak. Instead, he went at once to his quarters in the building next door.

As soon as Śrīla Prabhupāda reached his room, he was introduced to an official from City Hall who had come from the mayor's office to present him with an honorary welcome to New Orleans. Prabhupāda graciously accepted a symbolic key to the city and a scroll welcoming and praising him as an honorable visitor. Seizing the opportunity, he began preaching to the man, treating his guest not as a city official but as any other conditioned soul.

When the welcoming flurry had abated and Śrīla Prabhupāda had bathed, taken prasādam, and rested, he called for Nityānanda. When Nityānanda entered, Prabhupāda had sandalwood pulp on his forehead and wore a fresh garland. Nityānanda offered obeisances. Alone in the room with his spiritual master, he felt embarrassed and fearful. Prabhupāda picked up a photo album from his desk containing pictures of the farm in Mississippi. "You know," he said, "I have come especially to see your farm."

Before sunrise the next morning Śrīla Prabhupāda left in the rain on a two-hour drive to the farm. He would have to return to New Orleans that night, as he was scheduled to fly to Detroit the next morning.

The rain had stopped in Carriere, Mississippi, and Śrīla Prabhupāda looked out across the gently rolling land. The ISKCON farm—cleared land, surrounded by a pine forest—was situated on a ridge. The previous owner had used the property as a horse ranch, and the modern fourteen-room brick house, the large barn, and several sheds were all in good condition. Prabhupāda liked the land. He said it looked just like Bengal.

Most of the devotees from New Orleans had raced to the farm to be with Prabhupāda, and they crowded into the temple room, waiting for him to give the morning Bhāgavatam class. As soon as he began to speak, however, many flies came, buzzing, landing on his head and body. A devotee began fanning him with a cāmara whisk, but to no avail.

"Come near," Prabhupāda said. "This cāmara is especially meant for driving away the flies. Even it is touching the body, there is no harm."

Toward the end of the lecture, Śrīla Prabhupāda began speaking of the farm. "Now this place, I see, although I have not seen all, it is a nice place. The gṛhasthas may come here, have some small cottage, grow your own food grains and vegetables, and have your own cow's milk. Get nice foodstuff, and save time. Why should you go into the city hundreds of miles in a car and again hundreds of miles back and take unnecessary trouble? Stick to this spot and grow your own food, make your own cloth, and live peacefully. Save time and chant Hare Kṛṣṇa. This is actual life.

"What is this nonsense life—big, big cities, and all these people busy? To see a friend he has to go thirty miles. If he has to see a physician, he has to go fifty miles. If he has to go to work, another hundred miles. So what is this life? This is not life. Be satisfied. A devotee's life should be prayojana. We require material necessities—as much as is required. No artificial life."

Śrīla Prabhupāda went on to deprecate the life of "simply machine, machine, machine, machine." He asked the devotees to show by practical example how to live simply and advance in Kṛṣṇa consciousness. If they could show the example, people would try to follow.

Although Nityānanda and the others had been living on the land for many months, Prabhupāda's words gave them the real direction and purpose for the project. It was as if he were now breathing life into his project.

Śrīla Prabhupāda went to his room and sat with Brahmānanda Swami, Satsvarūpa dāsa Goswami, Harikeśa, Jagadīśa, and Upendra. When he began speaking about varṇāśrama, he called for Nityānanda. They should try not to use machines, he said. The men and animals should do the work.

Nityānanda asked whether the householders should produce food cooperatively or as individual families. "They should work together," said Prabhupāda, "or what's the use of living in a community center?"

When Upendra asked how the milk should be used, Śrīla Prabhupāda explained what he called the Indian village system. "As Nanda Mahārāja was keeping cows," he said, "similarly there are many villages. They have a big pan, and whatever milk is collected they put into that pan. It is kept on a fire and is warm. So the whole family can drink milk whenever they like. Then whatever milk remains at night, they have to convert it into yogurt. The next day they use milk and yogurt also as they like. Then after converting the milk into yogurt, whatever remains is stored. If there is sufficient old yogurt, they churn, and then butter comes out. They take that butter, and the water separated from the butter is called whey. So instead of dāl, they use this whey for eating with capātīs. It will be very healthy and tasty. Meanwhile, the butter they turn into ghee. There is not a single drop of waste."

Śrīla Prabhupāda said that everyone could take as much milk as necessary and that the ghee could be used in ISKCON restaurants in the cities. Curd could also be used in the restaurants for making sandeśa, rasagulā, and other dishes.

Śrīla Prabhupāda stressed that the farm be well organized, engaging all classes of men—brāhmaṇas, kṣatriyas, vaiśyas, and śūdras. No laziness or unemployment. "Otherwise," he said, "people will criticize that we are simply eating and sleeping and escaping."

Nityānanda asked whether they should immediately stop using farm machinery.

"We are not against the machine," Prabhupāda explained. "You can utilize machine. But we should not allow others to be unemployed while we use the machine. This is the point. You can use the machine, but the first thing is that everyone should be employed. If you have got many men, then why should you engage the machine?"

Śrīla Prabhupāda also explained that in Vedic culture, the kṣatriyas collected taxes and protected the citizens while the śūdras worked in the fields or at trade. The women would cook, spin, weave, and take care of the milk products. The low-class men, such as cobblers, who used the skin of dead cows, were allowed to eat meat. "But not that one is Professor Such-and-such and yet he is eating meat," Prabhupāda said. "This is the way of the degraded modern society. Teacher means brāhmaṇa, and yet he is eating meat. How horrible! So do these things and organize. I can give you the idea, but I will not live very long. If you can carry it out, you can change the whole world. Especially if you can change America, then the whole world will change."

Śrīla Prabhupāda became emotional, and tears came to his eyes. "It is the duty!" he said. "Caitanya Mahāprabhu has explained para-upakāra: Save them! If it is not possible to save everyone—as many as possible. This is human life. This is Kṛṣṇa consciousness—to save those who are in the darkness.

"Don't think," he said, "'Kṛṣṇa consciousness is my profession. I am getting a living, food, and shelter.' That is just what the Indians are doing. Not like that. It is para-upakāra. That is Kṛṣṇa consciousness. Then Kṛṣṇa will be very much pleased. Kṛṣṇa personally comes for giving this benefit to the people, and if you do, then how much Kṛṣṇa will be pleased. Just like I am traveling to my centers, and if I see that my students, my men, are doing very nice, everything is going nice, how much pleased I will be. Then I can save my labors and now write books for the rest of my life. Similarly, if Kṛṣṇa sees that you are, on behalf of Kṛṣṇa, trying to save these rascals, then you will very much please Kṛṣṇa. The Vaiṣṇava's qualification is para-duḥkha-duḥkhī. He is unhappy seeing others' distress. This is a Vaiṣṇava." Śrīla Prabhupāda ended the intimate meeting by rising and leaving the room.

When Harikeśa mentioned that he was spending two-and-a-half hours to cook Śrīla Prabhupāda's lunch, Prabhupāda said, "You do not know how to cook. I will show you and do it in one hour."

"One hour?" said Harikeśa, almost in disbelief. "This is amazing!"

Prabhupāda then took off his shirt and entered the little kitchen of the Mississippi farm. While a crowd of devotees peered in through the open door, Prabhupāda looked at his wristwatch and announced, "It is now twelve o'clock."

He used the same three-tiered brass cooker he had brought to America in 1965. In the bottom section he put mung beans and water, in the middle section he put rice, and in the top he arranged various cut vegetables— squash, peas, potatoes, and cauliflower. Putting the cooker over a low flame, he then poured an inch of ghee into a frying pan and placed it over a flame. Next he cut up an eggplant, dipped the pieces into turmeric and salt, and began to fry them in the hot ghee. He mixed and kneaded dough and began rolling out capātis. Periodically he checked his wristwatch, and when forty-five minutes had passed, he took the cooker's top off and turned it upside down to use as a small frying pan. He put in ghee and cooked some bitter melon, then deftly added cumin, anise, chili, and asafoetida. He squeezed lemon on the steamed vegetables and, within a few minutes, had finished.

Śrīla Prabhupāda looked at his watch. "One hour," he said. "We have cooked nine preparations." He then left the kitchen while his servant prepared his plate. Prabhupāda said that everyone who had watched him cook should be given some of the prasādam.

About five in the afternoon, Prabhupāda toured the farm. In the barn he saw the calves taking milk.

"How are you using the bulls?" he asked.

Like a hesitant student, Nityananda replied, "To plow?"

"Yes," said Prabhupāda, "to plow and transport. You have to engage more men for plowing. Two bulls may be used for each plow."

Passing by a hayfield, Prabhupāda asked why the cut hay still lay in the field. Nityānanda explained that he had to wait for it to dry after the rain. Prabhupāda warned that rain could spoil the hay; it should be harvested soon. Coming upon a three-acre plot of sugarcane, they walked up one row and entered deep into the cane patch, which stood several feet above their heads. Emerging on the other side, they came to the edge of a forest of pine.

"These jungles are natural arrangement," said Prabhupāda. "You cut the trees, make your home, and the balance of it you can make for fuel. Then the ground you can plow and grow your own food. That's all. It's natural." Prabhupāda lamented modern society's waste of trees by printing heaps of useless newspapers. He saw the two acres of fruit trees the devotees had planted—satsumas, peaches, pears, and figs—as well as the twenty-five large pecan trees.

But he discovered discrepancies. Nityānanda had lined up for Prabhupāda's inspection two tractors, a large forage harvester, a hay conditioner, hay mowers, rakes, a blower, and a wagon. But when Prabhupāda saw the machines standing in the open, he asked why they were not being kept under cover. Nityānanda replied that they were still building a shed.

"In the meantime it will be finished," said Prabhupāda. "By the time you finish your shed, they will be rusty and gradually become useless." He quoted a Hindi proverb and translated. " 'A woman was dressing to go to a fair, but when she was finally dressed, the fair was already finished.' " The devotees laughed, but Nityānanda was grave.

Prabhupāda continued: "Utilize these machines, otherwise, while they are in working order, sell them. But don't keep idle in this neglected way."

Nityānanda showed Prabhupāda where twenty-five acres of sorghum was growing. This grain was for the animals and when harvested would go into the silos.

"So everything is for the animals?" asked Prabhupāda. "Nothing for man?"

"The cows give us milk," explained Nityānanda.

"That's all?" asked Prabhupāda. "And you are not growing any food grains? Why?" Prabhupāda's instruction was clear. Just before the walk was over, he again asked Nityānanda, "What the oxen will do?"

"Plow the fields," Nityānanda replied, like a student having learned his lesson.

"Yes," said Prabhupāda, "that is wanted. Transport and plowing the fields. And unless our men are trained up in Kṛṣṇa consciousness, they will think, 'What is the use of taking care of the cow? Better go to the city, earn money, and eat them.' "

This statement was similar to an instruction Prabhupāda had given in various temples after installing the Deities of Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa. If the devotees were not enthusiastic, he had warned, the Deity worship would deteriorate into mere ritual, until finally the devotees would resent the spiritual master's giving them such a burden. Likewise on the farms, if the devotees did not utilize the bulls in the natural way and if they did not use the milk properly, then eventually they would want to get rid of the animals. By conducting things as Prabhupāda had taught, however, the devotees, the cows, and the bulls would live cooperatively and happily and Kṛṣṇa would be pleased.

Although for years Śrīla Prabhupāda had given many practical instructions in other areas of the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement, this was one of the first times he had given so many practical directions on conducting varṇāśrama society. He felt satisfied and pleased to have seen such a promising Kṛṣṇa conscious farm community and, reentering the house, said he was ready to return to New Orleans. It had been a busy, productive day in the service of Kṛṣṇa, and tomorrow would be another.

Detroit

August 2, 1975

Alfred Ford, the great-grandson of Henry Ford, had become attracted to Kṛṣṇa consciousness through meeting some of Śrīla Prabhupāda's disciples in Detroit and through reading Bhagavad-gītā As It Is. He had adopted the principles of Kṛṣṇa consciousness, begun regularly chanting sixteen rounds, and was now Śrīla Prabhupāda's initiated disciple, Ambarīṣa. Today Ambarīṣa was at the airport, behind the wheel of a white Lincoln Continental limousine, waiting to meet Śrīla Prabhupāda. On seeing Śrīla Prabhupāda approach, Ambarīṣa got out of the driver's seat and offered obeisances. He opened the back door of the limousine for Śrīla Prabhupāda, shut it, and returned to his seat, just like a menial chauffeur.

"We devotees also have a car," said Prabhupāda as they drove away, "but we are going to the temple and distributing books with it. Anything can be used for Kṛṣṇa. Here is a rich man's son, Alfred Ford. We are giving him a little spiritual teaching, and he is happy."

Another of Śrīla Prabhupāda's Detroit disciples was Elisabeth Reuther, now Lekhaśravantī-devi dāsī, the daughter of labor leader Walter Reuther. Ambarīṣa told Prabhupāda that the Fords and the Reuthers had been enemies, but now two of their descendants were peacefully working together in Kṛṣṇa consciousness. Śrīla Prabhupāda was pleased with the humility of these two disciples, and while he gave them some special status, he did not dote on the fact that they were from such famous families. Ambarīṣa and Lekhaśravantī saw themselves as humble servants of the Vaiṣṇavas.

On the way to the temple, Prabhupāda's car passed a large, modern building displaying flags of many nations and a large sign: "World Headquarters, Ford." One of the devotees turned to Ambarīṣa and asked, "Is this where you work?"

From the back seat, Prabhupāda spoke up. “No, he is the proprietor.”

As they passed by a big urban redevelopment project, Prabhupāda asked, “What is this?”

“This is known as Detroit's Renaissance Center,” said Ambarīṣa.

“They will never have a Renaissance,” Prabhupāda replied.

The Detroit temple was located in an old brick house, with the temple room in the third-floor attic. The lease was soon due to run out, and Govardhana, the temple president, was looking for a new place. He showed Prabhupāda photos of likely buildings, one of them a mansion of the late auto industry millionaire Lawrence Fisher. The place was probably too expensive, Govardhana said, and was located in a bad neighborhood.

But Prabhupāda was interested. In fact, whatever the devotees cited as bad about the mansion, Prabhupāda would say was actually good, or at least could be easily rectified. As for the high crime rate in the area, he said, “You'll have nothing to fear. Just chant Hare Kṛṣṇa and distribute prasādam. Invite all the neighborhood people, thieves, and rascals, to take prasādam and chant, and you won't have any thefts.”

Devotees emphasized that Detroit was the crime capital of the U.S. and that the poor slum area where the mansion was located was known for drug trafficking, robberies, and murders. But Śrīla Prabhupāda repeated that they should not be afraid. “I lived in the Bowery,” he said, and he described how the bums used to urinate on his front door and lie across the doorway. But when he would come to enter the building, they would get up and say, “Yes, sir. Come on, sir.”

“Get the place,” Prabhupāda said, “and chant Hare Kṛṣṇa there twenty-four hours a day. If a thief comes, we will say, “Yes, first take prasādam, and then take whatever you want.’ What do we have?”

Śrīla Prabhupāda went to see the mansion with Govardhana, Ambarīṣa, and several G.B.C. men. They were met by the owner and a lady who introduced herself as a real estate agent.

As the owner guided them on a tour, Prabhupāda came to like the estate even more. The palatial building was situated on four acres surrounded by a high stone wall. There were gardens and walkways, now in disrepair, as well as fountains and a swimming pool. Some of the devotees thought the place gaudy, with its extravagant 1920s decor, but Śrīla Prabhupāda saw the great potential.

As soon as he entered the vestibule and saw the ornate Italian tiles and marble archways, he began to smile. The group entered the lobby, its high ceiling covered with classically sculptured leaves, rosettes, and hand-painted plaster flowers. Next they entered the ballroom, with its marble floor and high, vaulted ceiling painted to resemble an early-evening blue sky with clouds and stars. Special lighting gave the effect of natural starlight. At one end of the hall, three marble arches exactly resembled the design Prabhupāda had given for the Deity altars in his temples. Three altars could be installed there and the ballroom made into a temple with very little renovation.

Prabhupāda did not comment to the owner on the ballroom's suitability, but to the devotees it was obvious.

The tour then proceeded to the boat well, an indoor water garage capable of holding several yachts. The boat well opened into a channel, which opened into the nearby Detroit River. Prabhupāda mentioned that the devotees could get a boat for their preaching.

As Prabhupāda and his entourage entered one gorgeous room after another, they saw the many carved stone columns, hand-painted floor and wall tiles from Italy and Greece, and ceilings ornamented with gold-leafed figures. Rare antique crystal chandeliers adorned many of the rooms. There were living rooms, library rooms, a dining room, a billiard room, a music room, two master bedrooms, other bedrooms—all extravaganzas. "Each room is worth the entire price," said Prabhupāda privately to the devotees.

The owner spoke of Mayan, Moorish, Spanish, Greek, and Italian influences, and pointed out that the two hand-carved spiral columns in the dining room were salvaged from an ancient European palace. Wherever Śrīla Prabhupāda looked, he saw opulence: an indoor marble fountain, a wall of iridescent tiles, hand-painted cornices. Even the large bathrooms were extraordinary, with glamorous imported tiles and gold-plated accents.

The introductory tour completed, Prabhupāda, his followers, the owner, and the real estate agent sat together at an umbrella-covered patio table by the swimming pool. Already Śrīla Prabhupāda had mentioned to his disciples that the owner should donate the building for ISKCON's missionary purposes, and he had told Brahmānanda Swami to make the request. Since the owner had not mentioned the price, Prabhupāda spoke up.

"So, we are beggars," he began. He was serious, and yet he spoke with an air of humor. Ambarīṣa and Upendra hid their faces in embarrassment. "We have no money," Prabhupāda continued boldly. "Therefore, we are asking you, please give us this building."

The owner glanced incredulously at his real estate agent and then laughed nervously. "It's out of the question," he said. "I can't do that."

The agent was also taken aback and upset. "He can't do that," she whispered.

"I can't give it to you," explained the owner, "because I have taken a loss in maintaining this property. So I have to make my money back. This property represents a major part of my income."

"Then," said Prabhupāda, "how much do you want?"

"Well," the man replied, "I have to get at least $350,000."

None of the devotees dared say anything. Prabhupāda thought for a moment and then said, "We will give you $300,000 cash."

"I'll have to think about it," the man replied.

The real estate agent got to her feet, saying that a transaction like this is usually not done straight to the owner. But Prabhupāda ignored her and spoke with the owner about how lovely the mansion was. Prabhupāda then got up and took a short walk in the garden with his men.

Govardhana asked Prabhupāda if he'd liked it, and Prabhupāda said, "Yes, who would not like such a building?"

"Ambarīṣa doesn't like it," said Govardhana.

"Oh?"

Ambarīṣa said he thought the mansion was mājā.

"Yes," said Prabhupāda, "but mājā is also Kṛṣṇa. We can use anything in Kṛṣṇa's service."

Leaving the garden path and returning to their cars, Prabhupāda asked Ambarīṣa, "So, is this possible?"

"Yes, Prabhupāda. This is possible."

As soon as they returned to the temple, Ambarīṣa and Lekhaśravantī conferred. Her inheritance was limited, but she was able to give $125,000. Ambarīṣa had to come up with the balance.

The next day the owner came to see Śrīla Prabhupāda. The man was accompanied by two women, and they all appeared a little intoxicated. He had come to say that he accepted the offer. Prabhupāda smiled and reaffirmed his intention to buy.

Afterward, Śrīla Prabhupāda openly showed his blissfulness about the purchase. "Just see," he said, "I didn't have one penny, and yet I offered him $300,000 cash. And now Kṛṣṇa has provided the money."

As Prabhupāda had told the estate owner, "I am a sannyāsī. I have no money." And after collecting $300,000 from his disciples, he still had no money. Within a few days he left for Toronto, taking nothing for himself. Everything was Kṛṣṇa's, to be used in Kṛṣṇa's service.

Toronto

August 7, 1975

Despite a severe toothache and swollen jaw, Śrīla Prabhupāda continued with lectures, interviews, and his usual activities. He could not chew and took only pureed fruit. When asked if he would see a dentist, he told the devotees not to worry; he was used to difficulties.

The Toronto temple was a small, run-down building, and Prabhupāda was interested in helping the devotees relocate. All the real estate brokers they had approached had told them about a fabulous church for sale downtown. The temple president, Viśvakarmā, had looked at the building, but the owners were asking almost half a million dollars, with a large down payment. When Prabhupāda went to see the church, he decided that somehow they must get it. If necessary he could send the total BBT collections for two months as a loan to the Toronto temple. Prabhupāda told them to offer $300,000 cash, but when Uttamaśloka went, the church directors rejected the offer, saying they had already rejected an offer for much more.

Śrīla Prabhupāda did not give up the idea of getting the church, however, and he mentioned it before a meeting of Indians. Near the end of the program, when the host begged Prabhupāda to return again to bless them, Prabhupāda took the opportunity to request all present to please help the devotees raise money to purchase the church. Once they had actually purchased it, he said, he would return to Toronto. Many of the gentlemen present promised to help.

Suddenly, Śrīla Prabhupāda's North American tour was interrupted. A telegram from Tejas in New Delhi announced that if Prabhupāda wanted an interview with Indira Gandhi, he would have to come at once. The telegram contained no details, and his secretary was unable to reach the Delhi temple by phone. But Prabhupāda didn't need to hear anything more. When an auspicious opportunity arose, he said, a devotee should act at once.

Harikeśa planned the trip so they could stop in Montreal overnight. From Montreal they would fly to Paris, where Prabhupāda could rest before going on to Delhi. As word of Prabhupāda's imminent departure spread, several devotees in Toronto tried to see Prabhupāda for last instructions about their projects. Rāmeśvara also phoned from Los Angeles, pressing Harikeśa to ask Prabhupāda a list of last-minute editorial questions regarding the Fifth Canto of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam. The questions, however, concerning the Bhāgavatam's explanation of the structure of the universe, Prabhupāda rejected as unintelligent. He ordered the BBT to simply print the books as they were.

Not only was the prospect of meeting with Prime Minister Gandhi prompting Prabhupāda's return to India, but so were his uncompleted projects, especially Hare Krishna Land in Bombay. Brahmānanda Swami said he thought Prabhupāda had been looking for such a chance to end his Western tour and get back into personally managing the projects in India. Prabhupāda had just dictated a letter to Surabhi in Vṛndāvana, expressing disappointment that things could not get done without him.

You are all simply writing letters to me. Without my personal presence there you cannot do anything. Simply correspondence. Anyway, be careful there is no underhanded dealing in this transaction [purchasing land]. It is very much risky, so be careful. Please send me a regular report of the Bombay construction. I am very much anxious and will be glad to receive your regular report.

Devotees in Boston, New Vrindaban, and New York received the news of Prabhupāda's sudden departure with shock—he would not be visiting their temples! And they felt the impact of the stark realization that Śrīla Prabhupāda could leave them at any moment. He was not obliged to stay with them, and they should not take his presence for granted. They had his instructions; this was sufficient. Of course, important decisions still had to be made. In Boston the devotees had expected Prabhupāda to look at a new building with them; but based on his instruction, they could become responsible and carry out his will, even in his absence.

The devotees who had recently received Prabhupāda in their temples realized how valuable had been those moments. The personal association they had had should be relished, remembered, and acted upon. The book distributors already knew that their work was most important to Prabhupāda, and that was sufficient. The Press workers in Los Angeles weren't dependent on Prabhupāda's staying in America; they had their mission—seventeen books in two months—and they were working day and night.

Śrīla Prabhupāda's traveling in the U.S. and Canada had been exactly in the mood of a wandering sannyāsī. And he was showing his G.B.C. men that they should not simply sit behind desks and manage but should travel and preach. Traveling, Prabhupāda stressed, did not mean aimless wandering or pleasure-seeking. While traveling, the preacher had to do some substantial work for the Kṛṣṇa consciousness society. And that also Śrīla Prabhupāda had shown—at the Dallas Gurukula, the Mississippi farm, Ratha-yatra. In Detroit he had secured a mansion, and in Toronto he was praying for a wonderful church, to be financed by the Indians. In Chicago he had shown how to preach on contemporary issues like crime and women's liberation—without compromise. His disciples could not match or imitate him, but his example of selfless work on behalf of Kṛṣṇa should be their standard.

In spite of Prabhupāda's traveling to so many cities, most people in the United States did not recognize his position. Reporters would interview him, but their superficial stories in the newspapers drew little attention. To the press, Prabhupāda was just another celebrity in the constant parade of faces and events. As Lord Kṛṣṇa had predicted in Bhagavad-gītā, out of thousands of men, only one seeks perfection. Śrīla Prabhupāda, in his tireless search for that one person out of thousands, had shown his enthusiasm and willingness to speak with whoever came to see him. And through Ratha-yātrā and other public festivals, he was offering millions a first taste of potent spiritual life. Even one moment's association with a pure devotee could save them from a most inauspicious fate in their next life.

Besides the hundreds of thousands who benefited incidentally, in each city a fortunate few felt their lives greatly affected by Śrīla Prabhupāda. Professor Thomas Hopkins in Philadelphia, Assemblyman John Porter in Chicago, a flight supervisor on the plane to San Francisco, an appreciative mother in Philadelphia, and many others—all understood that their meeting with Śrīla Prabhupāda was special.

Śrīla Prabhupāda often cited a specific reason for his touring. "My duty," he had said in Berkeley, "is to see that my disciples, who have accepted me as guru, may not fall down. That is my anxiety." And as he had lovingly expressed it in Dallas, "I have got so many children and grandchildren, so I have come to see them." He was the spiritual father of his disciples, and every ISKCON center was his home.

While touring his movement in the West, Śrīla Prabhupāda had felt satisfied that it was growing stronger. Opposition was also growing, but he took that as another sign of ISKCON's authenticity.

His original plan was still intact, and on this tour he had been pursuing it. America had a chance of becoming Kṛṣṇa conscious—at least he and his disciples should try for that. If they succeeded, then the whole world could be uplifted by that transcendental influence.

Prabhupāda liked preaching in America. “Mostly my students are American,” he had said, “and they help me very kindly push on this movement.” But one man in the San Diego crowd had shouted back that he wanted more sex than was allowed in Kṛṣṇa consciousness. So Prabhupāda's estimation was that Americans had good hearts, but that for want of Kṛṣṇa consciousness they were becoming completely confused, frustrated, and degraded.

Śrīla Prabhupāda had come first to America in 1965 to plant the seed of Kṛṣṇa consciousness. That he had done. Now, with dozens of centers across the country and many others around the world, he was realizing that his ambitions were not going unfulfilled. He also accepted that to make Kṛṣṇa consciousness the dominant force in America and the world was something he might not see in his lifetime. “It is not one man's work,” he had said, and he asked everyone—Americans, Indians, and all world citizens—to take part in distributing Lord Caitanya's mercy.

Only a rare few came forward to help him, however, and he worked with them. Touring, therefore, was but another attempt at making his organization as strong as possible while it was within his power to do so. Actually, he was living for others, and he didn't think he would live much longer. He wanted to continue touring, building ISKCON, saving as many lost souls as possible. And he wanted to impress upon his sincere followers and upon others who would read his books that every human being should take up this same work and live for the benefit of others by distributing Kṛṣṇa consciousness.

SPL 48: At Home in India

CHAPTER FORTY-EIGHT

At Home in India

There were, of course, other reasons for Prabhupāda's returning to India besides meeting Indira Gandhi. His regular rhythm had become to alternate touring the West with staying in India. He was leading his movement by traveling from center to center, but for at least five years now, he had devoted more of his time to India.

His ambitious projects in Māyāpur and Vṛndāvana, although increasing the prestige of the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement, were by no means completed. And Hare Krishna Land in Bombay was still only a construction site. Unlike in America and Europe, where Śrīla Prabhupāda achieved his objectives by inspiring disciples to carry on the management, in India he was the manager. He had to be; otherwise his Western disciples would be cheated and become dispirited. Pressing managerial decisions, therefore, brought him frequently to India.

Moreover, he had a special inclination to be in India. He had a deep spiritual attraction to the holy dhāmas—Vṛndāvana was his home and Māyāpur was his place of worship—and he liked the unique opportunities for meeting and influencing people in places like Bombay. His upcoming meeting with India's chief executive was the kind of opportunity that came rarely in the West.

And in addition to all these reasons Prabhupāda also felt most relaxed and at home there. When breaking some of his commitments to visit more cities in the U.S., he had written to a disciple, “I was not able to come to Atlanta because I was called here to India on urgent business. Also I was feeling inconvenienced by so much traveling.” Prabhupāda often referred to New York, London, and Los Angeles as his special homes and to America as his fatherland. And when a disciple had once remarked that Prabhupāda would feel more at home in India, he had replied, “My only home is the lotus feet of Kṛṣṇa.” Nevertheless, for whatever reason or combination of reasons, Śrīla Prabhupāda was showing a definite preference for staying in India.

Prabhupāda was displeased to see how slowly the construction was progressing at Hare Krishna Land in Bombay. The monsoons had flooded the foundation, and what little work had been done appeared to be of poor quality. The whole project should have been finished in six months, Prabhupāda said, but he startled the devotees by saying, “At least complete it within my lifetime.”

Surabhi and Mūrti showed him drawings for other temples. An interested person in Nellore, near Hyderabad, was speaking of donating land, and the devotees had drawn up plans for a temple complex, complete with library and dormitories. Prabhupāda approved the plans. The temple buildings, he said, should be traditional, according to the śāstric directions, but the other buildings could incorporate more modern designs. He also studied and approved plans for temples in Hyderabad and Fiji.

Early the next morning, Śrīla Prabhupāda called for Surabhi and Mūrti and again went over their various plans with detailed interest. He had little time left before his meeting with the prime minister, however, and the next day he left for Delhi.

New Delhi

August 22, 1975

At 9:15 in the morning, Śrīla Prabhupāda and several of his leading disciples arrived at the prime minister's home, where they were confronted by a formidable security check. Two days before, the prime minister of Bangladesh had been assassinated, and Mrs. Gandhi was rumored to be next. Armed soldiers, therefore, surrounded her residence. The guards at the outer gate decided that the foreigners could not go in; Śrīla Prabhupāda alone could enter. While one guard opened the gate, another ushered Śrīla Prabhupāda into a car, which carried him to the prime minister's front door.

Meanwhile, the devotees waited in anxiety by the outer gate. Always some disciples would accompany Prabhupāda wherever he went; his disciples worried, almost like doting parents, that he might need their assistance.

In tiny, cramped handwriting, Śrīla Prabhupāda had noted down in a small address book a list of points he wanted to discuss with Mrs. Gandhi.

1. Grant immigration for 500 foreigners.
2. All M.P.'s initiated brahmanas.
3. Sanjaya the King.
4. Close slaughterhouses.
5. Chanting.
6. Meat-eaters—at home. No public meat eating.
7. Prostitution punishable.
8. No religious group except Bhagavad Gītā as it is.
9. All government officers must join kirtan at least twice a day.
10. Support Krishna consciousness all over the world.

The most pressing item was at the head of the list: Mrs. Gandhi should grant permanent visas to Prabhupāda's Western disciples in India. Just a few weeks before, some of the foreign devotees in Māyāpur had been asked to leave the country. For years Prabhupāda had been asking for permanent visas whenever he met governors, members of Parliament, or other men of influence. Devotees were constantly being asked to leave the country to renew their six-month visas. The travel costs incurred and the disruption of the devotees' services seriously hampered ISKCON's work in India; therefore, Prabhupāda wanted Indira Gandhi to sanction up to five hundred foreign disciples to stay permanently in India.

The other points on Śrīla Prabhupāda's list were scriptural directions for how the prime minister could make her leadership Kṛṣṇa conscious, in the spirit of the great rājārṣis of the Vedic age. These were the same tenets of God conscious leadership he preached wherever he went, and he had deep conviction that if the world's leaders would apply them, an era of peace, prosperity, and happiness would dawn. Indira Gandhi had a tendency toward authoritative control, so she should exercise it in terms of Vedic directions. Then her rule could become most effective and beneficial.

A government official opened the door to Śrīla Prabhupāda's car, ushered him into the house, and brought him before the prime minister. As Prabhupāda entered the room, Mrs. Gandhi stood up. Although she greeted him cordially and offered him a seat, he could immediately detect that she was distracted, fearful for her life. She openly admitted it, and added that this was not, therefore, a good time for their meeting. Prabhupāda felt that she would have preferred not to meet at all, but was allowing it only because she had promised. Her agreeing to see him, he felt, was an indication that she had some attraction for spiritual life, but he understood that on this visit at least, he could not introduce the extensive advice he had been contemplating.

Mrs. Gandhi complimented Śrīla Prabhupāda on the work he was doing all over the world. "They are good boys," he replied, and he asked if she could arrange for permanent visas. She agreed, but again mentioned her present anxiety. They soon ended their talk, and Śrīla Prabhupāda left.

A few days later, while still in New Delhi, Śrīla Prabhupāda received a letter from Rāmeśvara. The BBT in Los Angeles was miraculously fulfilling Śrīla Prabhupāda's order to publish seventeen volumes in two months. The composers, editors, artists, and workers had ecstatically finished their marathon—on schedule! When the first books had come back from the printers and had been offered on the altar of Rukmīṇī-Dvārakādhiśa, the devotees had cried in transcendental bliss, chanting again and again the mantras to Śrīla Prabhupāda. They were feeling the potency of the order of their spiritual master and seeing themselves as instruments in carrying out what had once seemed an impossible request.

Today our composer finished the last volumes of Caitanya-caritāmṛta. By Wednesday next week, August 20th, all volumes will be at the printer. Now they are just starting to compose the Fifth Canto, and the entire canto will definitely be at the printer by Vyasa-puja day.

After promising delivery of books by October at the latest, the letter was signed by about sixty devotees: "Your unworthy servants at ISKCON Press." On their behalf, Rāmeśvara stated,

We have lost all desire to do anything except be engaged in producing and distributing your transcendental books by the millions in every town and village.

Śrīla Prabhupāda wrote back the next day from Delhi.

Regarding your desire for all twelve Cantos, you will get it, rest assured. Your so much ardent desire will be fulfilled by Krishna.

On August 21 Rāmeśvara sent Śrīla Prabhupāda a telegram.

BY THE MERCY OF LORD BALARAMA, NITYĀNANDA, THE LAST VOLUME OF CAITANYA-CARITAMRTA IS LEAVING TODAY FOR THE PRINTER. BY YOUR MERCY AND DIVINE ORDER IT IS DONE.

Although Śrīla Prabhupāda traveled on to Vṛndāvana, the devotees were able to dispatch advance copies of all fifteen volumes to him by his eightieth birthday on August 31. Just after Prabhupāda observed the ceremony in the temple, a devotee arrived in Vṛndāvana with the final six volumes of the Caitanya-caritāmṛta.

With great relish and satisfaction Śrīla Prabhupāda examined the books. He was pleased with the artwork and quickly became absorbed in reading the pastimes of Lord Caitanya. He felt so inspired he remarked to the devotees in Vṛndāvana that he was thinking of stopping all touring and just staying in Vṛndāvana and translating. The reciprocation of the devotees at ISKCON Press was so sincere that it increased Śrīla Prabhupāda's desire to reciprocate with them. He wrote to “My dear Rāmeśvara and company,”

You have taken seriously the publishing and also the distribution of these books, and that is the success of our mission. You have taken seriously this work and I know that my Guru Maharaja is pleased with you because he wanted this. So by this endeavor you will all go back home, back to Godhead.

Although Śrīla Prabhupāda had mentioned that he would like to sit in Vṛndāvana and simply translate Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, his stay there was characterized by intensive management, not by writing. He had presided over the grand opening of the Krishna-Balaram Mandir four months earlier, and now he would demonstrate how the temple should be run. The Krishna-Balaram Mandir was a Vedic temple complex at a famous holy place, and it was being scrutinized by persons already strongly opinionated on how a temple should be run.

Immediately Prabhupāda found discrepancies. In the guesthouse, which was for guests, not disciples, he found married disciples living with their children. This was not proper, he said, and these families would have to find other quarters nearby or leave Vṛndāvana. He also found problems with the plumbing, the municipal sewage system, the financial management, the Deity worship, the cleanliness, and the devotees' behavior.

Almost every area of temple life and every devotee required special attention. In the smallest discrepancies, Prabhupāda would sometimes see the essence of all problems, and he would instantly point it out. And because his disciples took his words with utmost seriousness, as coming directly from Kṛṣṇa, his reprimands were often devastating.

Prabhupāda was a difficult taskmaster. A Vaiṣṇava is said to be “as soft as a rose and as hard as a thunderbolt,” but Prabhupāda began showing more the thunderbolt side of his personality. Sometimes a neophyte's conception of the spiritual master is that he must always be peaceful and pleased with everything that happens, and that this is a sign of his being situated in transcendental consciousness. Śrīla Prabhupāda, however, demonstrated many moods—including anger.

In its material form, anger (krodha) is described in Bhagavad-gītā as occurring when one's lust (kāma) cannot be fully satisfied. A true sādhu, therefore, because he does not have lusty desires, does not become possessed by anger.

The Vaiṣṇava poet Narottama dāsa Ṭhākura, however, declares that anger may also be used in serving Kṛṣṇa. Narottama dāsa gives the example of Hanumān, the eternal servant of Lord Rāma, who displayed his great anger in fighting against Rāvaṇa and the other demoniac enemies of the Lord. Rūpa Gosvāmī also wrote in the Bhakti-rasāmṛta-sindhu that a devotee should not tolerate blasphemy to Kṛṣṇa or to the Vaiṣṇavas and that his response might justifiably be transcendental anger. Even Lord Kṛṣṇa incited the anger of the nonviolent Arjuna, inducing him to fight. And that fighting was transcendental, whereas Arjuna's reluctance to fight was material.

Among sentimentalists and impersonalists, however, the image persists that a sādhu should never show anger. When, at a large paṇḍāl festival in Delhi, Śrīla Prabhupāda had shown anger toward a man who spoke against Kṛṣṇa, many in the audience had misunderstood; some had even walked out.

Prabhupāda's disciples could accept his anger. They even welcomed it—theoretically. But to bear it was difficult. The spiritual master must cut through his student's false ego to engage that student in pure service. The guru's show of anger, therefore, is good for the disciple. According to Cāṇakya Paṇḍita, one should not be lenient with sons and disciples. Unless he deals strictly with them, he will spoil them.

Prabhupāda's anger in Vṛndāvana was not, however, a mere exercise in student training. He strongly desired to see the temple solidly established. He trusted that his disciples were sufficiently loyal to him to withstand the pain of chastisement and take it for what it was: mercy.

Prabhupāda was vigilant about the devotees' attendance at the morning devotional program in the temple. Calling for the temple president, he asked why some devotees were regularly absent. Maṅgala-arati, he said, was very important, and everyone must attend. Punctuality was also important. The exact time for the maṅgala-arati would vary according to the clock, he said, but it must always be one-and-a-half hours before sunrise.

Prabhupāda would take his morning walk, timing it so he would be back in the temple a few moments before the Deity doors were supposed to open for darśana. Once when he was waiting, with all the devotees gathered around, he looked at his watch and then asked Akṣayānanda Swami, "What is the time?" Aware that Śrīla Prabhupāda was speaking with exactitude, Akṣayānanda replied that it was thirty seconds after seven-thirty. Prabhupāda shook his head, and with a resigned look he said, "It is very difficult to be a brāhmaṇa—thirty seconds late. Why are they taking so long to dress the Deity?"

Akṣayānanda explained that the Deity dressing took about one-and-a-half hours.

"They are simply lazy," Prabhupāda replied.

"How long should it take, Śrīla Prabhupāda?"

"Half an hour at most."

Akṣayānanda was flabbergasted, since he knew of no pūjārī who could come even close to that. He remained silent.

"What is the difficulty?" Prabhupāda challenged. "Half an hour at most."

Shortly after Prabhupāda had arrived, he had noticed that the path leading to the front gate was not clean. He had complained strongly, "Why this is not clean? It should be cleaned by the time daybreak comes. I want to see this cleaned." The temple commander, a young Englishman from Australia named Hari-śauri, was supposed to supervise all the cleaning, but he had taken much of it for himself. After hearing Prabhupāda's remarks about the pathway, Hari-śauri had resolved to rectify the problem. Immediately after maṅgala-arati he would run out to the front of the temple, throw water on the stone pathways, and madly run the large squeegee over the front steps and walkway, so that by the time Prabhupāda came by, most of the area would be sparkling clean. And by the time he would return from his walk, all the outdoor walkways would be clean. Śrīla Prabhupāda didn't say anything further about the walkway, which seemed to be a positive sign.

Getting the devotees to ring the bell in the temple dome on time was a major effort for Śrīla Prabhupāda, as was getting them to ring the bell in the temple hall at all. His desire was that the bell in the temple dome should sound the hour and ring once every half hour. The grounds watchman, or chaukīdār, was supposed to do it, and Guṇārṇava was to see that he did. But for weeks there were problems, especially during the hours of the night, when the chaukīdār tended to fall asleep.

For Śrīla Prabhupāda, the undependable bell ringing revealed much about the overall temple management in Vṛndāvana. He made it clear: "I am judging the management of this temple by the ringing of the bell." If the nightwatchman was sleeping, and if the temple leaders could not execute a simple order, how would the temple and guesthouse, with all their complexities, operate smoothly? Akṣayānanda Swami and Guṇārṇava sometimes thought that they would never solve the problem of the bells, especially since they already had so many other things to do.

But Śrīla Prabhupāda was relentless. Whenever the bell missed by even a few minutes he would demand to know what was wrong. During the night he was usually the only one not sleeping, but he would wake Akṣayānanda or others and reprimand them if the bell failed. One night at midnight he woke Harikeśa, his traveling secretary.

"Do you hear that?" demanded Śrīla Prabhupāda.

Harikeśa strained to hear. "I don't hear anything."

"You can't hear it?" repeated Prabhupāda.

"I'm sorry, but I can't hear anything."

"That's right! Go out there and wake up the chaukīdār, and make him ring the bell!"

Harikeśa went out into the darkness, woke the sleeping chaukīdār, got him to ring the bell, and then returned to sleep. And so did the chaukīdār.

At 12:30 Prabhupāda again rang.

"Did you hear it again?"

"No, Śrīla Prabhupāda," said Harikeśa.

"So go out and wake him again!"

In addition to getting the temple dome bell to ring on time, getting both the bells to operate properly was also a problem. The bells were of heavy brass, worked by a rope. Prabhupāda wanted the bell in the temple to be rung constantly during the āraṭi kīrtanas. It took weeks for Guṇārṇava to arrange it.

And the bell in the temple dome was particularly difficult, since the rope rubbed on the stone walls and soon snapped. The thicker rope Guṇārṇava got simply spoiled the clarity of the chime and made the ringing uneven, which Prabhupāda immediately noticed. Guṇārṇava tried a chain—too heavy. A nylon rope—it broke. Materials were scarce in Vṛndāvana, and each change meant another delay, sometimes days. Nothing seemed to make the bell work properly.

Śrīla Prabhupāda told Guṇārṇava to try a pulley. Somehow Guṇārṇava couldn't surrender to that particular instruction. He thought the rope would just jump the track. One of the devotees did purchase a pulley, but Guṇārṇava said it was useless.

When Prabhupāda called Guṇārṇava to his room and demanded, "Where are the pulley wheels?" Guṇārṇava said he had sent them back. "You rascal!" Prabhupāda shouted. "I am asking for pulleys, and you are sending them back!"

Guṇārṇava apologized, ran out, and got a pulley. It didn't work. Then he got the idea of designing a bracket with a hole in it. The next morning Prabhupāda came out of his room and walked around to the front of the temple to check on the bell. For Guṇārṇava and others the whole affair was becoming unbearable.

"Let us hear the bell," said Prabhupāda.

Giving mighty tugs to the rope, a devotee rang the bell again and again.

"No, that's wrong," said Prabhupāda.

Guṇārṇava showed Prabhupāda the wooden bracket arrangement, and Prabhupāda thought it was a good idea. Guṇārṇava even tried to improve it by greasing the hole, and it worked for a while. But then the rope snapped again.

Prabhupāda's morning walks were usually filled with managerial and administrative talks, as he pointed out how the devotees could prevent being cheated, how they could save and collect money, how they could keep the temple clean, and so on. These talks were directed at specific individuals and were usually marked by criticism. Morning walks, therefore, were sometimes tense.

One morning Guṇārṇava invited Prabhupāda to see the new book display. In a sincere effort to please Prabhupāda, the devotees had set up a book display just inside the entrance to the temple. There were bookshelves with built-in lighting, a display case, and a counter for sales.

Showing off the book display was a triumph for the temple managers. The lights worked, and Śrīla Prabhupāda's books were neatly placed. The G.B.C. secretary for Vṛndāvana, Gopāla Kṛṣṇa, was also present, telling Śrīla Prabhupāda that actually the temple was first class and that things were now going smoothly. As Gopāla Kṛṣṇa, Akṣayānanda Swami, Guṇārṇava, and others pointed out the features of the book display, Śrīla Prabhupāda was silent, then suddenly agitated.

"You say that everything is first class," he said, "but I see that it is fifth class! Just see!" He banged his cane on the floor and then lifted it up, pointing. "I have come six thousand miles to tell you about a bird's nest." The assembled devotees all looked up to behold a large bird's nest within the chandelier. Birds were nesting there, amid the protruding straw. Yet until now, no one had noticed the dirty, unsightly presence.

Śrīla Prabhupāda had explained in his letters and books that one duty of a spiritual master is to expose the faults in his disciples—even if the fault is only slight. And the qualified disciple considers himself bereft of spiritual knowledge, always a fool before his spiritual master. He therefore considers the spiritual master's criticisms as mercy.

One day Śrīla Prabhupāda was meeting with the temple managers. He wanted practical ideas, not sentiments. He complained about overspending, in Vṛndāvana and now in Bombay also, where construction was just beginning. "You will squander money here," he said, "and Surabhi will squander money there. What is your plan to stop this? What will you do?" No one knew what to say. There was a long silence.

Finally Akṣayānanda spoke up. "We will become Kṛṣṇa conscious."

"An impractical suggestion!" Prabhupāda exclaimed.

Akṣayānanda Swami regularly expected the thunderbolt, but that didn't keep him from wanting to be with Śrīla Prabhupāda. On one morning walk Prabhupāda mentioned how the climate in Vṛndāvana was very harsh, both in summer and in winter. In winter, he said, the cold would sometimes be accompanied by rain.

"But Prabhupāda," said Akṣayānanda, "even if it rains stool and urine and pus and blood from the sky, still we should stay in Vṛndāvana?"

Śrīla Prabhupāda gave an almost impish smile and said, "Oh, you are expecting?" The devotees burst out laughing.

Another time Akṣayānanda Swami asked, "Is it true that it says in the śāstra that if you pass stool once a day you are a yogī, twice a day you are a bhogī [sense enjoyer], and three times a day you are a rogī [diseased person]?"

"Yes," said Prabhupāda, and he kept walking. After a while he added, "But don't try for passing stool once a day."

"Acchā," responded Akṣayānanda.

Śrīla Prabhupāda smiled. "Do you think if you pass stool once a day that you are a yogī?"

Hari-śauri had had little personal association with his spiritual master. But one day in Vṛndāvana Prabhupāda asked to see him—to point out a serious discrepancy. As temple commander, Hari-śauri had asked an old man not to eat in front of the Deity in the temple. The old man had become upset, and a young Bengali man had defended him, shouting at Hari-śauri that he had no right to criticize anyone in the temple. Hari-śauri had attempted to ignore him, but the young Bengali had continued shouting and threatening to throw him out of the temple and cut off his śikhā. Finally Hari-śauri had twisted the young man's arm and had told the chaukidār to throw him out. Śrīla Prabhupāda soon heard of the incident and called for Hari-śauri.

"How inauspicious," Hari-śauri thought. "The first time my spiritual master has ever called for me, and it's over a bad incident like this."

Prabhupāda did not immediately reprimand him, but first asked for his version of what had happened. Hari-śauri appreciated the opportunity, and he began to tell the whole story. When he mentioned that the old man had asked to speak with an authority and that he had told him he was the temple commander, Śrīla Prabhupāda interrupted. "Hmmm." Prabhupāda gave his disciple a penetrating glance. "Temple commander does not mean commander-in-chief. Where have you heard this, about eating prasādam in front of the Deity?"

Hari-śauri could not remember an exact reference, and he became embarrassed. "Well, I thought I read it in one of your books, Śrīla Prabhupāda," he said.

"Hmmm." Prabhupāda looked at him again. He could understand his disciple's ignorant mistake. Because of the boy's inexperience in India, he had not understood the serious implications of what he had done. Actually, because of the sensitive relationship between ISKCON devotees and the residents of Vṛndāvana, he should have tolerated the abuse. His was an ignorant mistake, but ignorance was no excuse.

"This is a great offense," said Prabhupāda. "He will go out and tell so many people that the foreigners have thrown him out. This is very bad."

Prabhupāda looked gravely at Hari-śauri. "Now you find out where this man is staying," he said, "and you bring him back here. Invite him to come back."

Hari-śauri tried his best, looking all day for the young Bengali man, who was reportedly staying at a hotel in Mathurā. He was unsuccessful, however. Disappointed, he returned to the temple, and as soon as he returned, a devotee came and told him Prabhupāda wanted to see him. "Oh, no," he thought. "Now Prabhupāda will really be angry."

Hari-śauri entered Śrīla Prabhupāda's room, which was filled with guests.

"This boy has come," said Prabhupāda, and as Hari-śauri looked around he saw the young Bengali man. The man smiled and said, "Hare Kṛṣṇa." They embraced and began to make apologies.

"So you give him this fruit," said Prabhupāda to Hari-śauri, indicating a basket of fruit sitting on the floor. He then dismissed them and continued preaching to the others in the room. The disagreement was settled, but it had been Prabhupāda himself who had changed the young man's heart and rectified a volatile incident.

One of Prabhupāda's women disciples in Vṛndāvana who got the benefit of his criticisms was Daivī-śakti, who was responsible for cleaning Prabhupāda's quarters. Others helped her, but she was the supervisor. When Śrīla Prabhupāda noticed a glass that had not been polished, he asked who was doing the cleaning, and his servant replied, "Daivī-śakti."

"Oh, she must do everything?" Prabhupāda replied. It was far from being as heavy as some of his criticisms of the temple managers, but Daivī-śakti took it as an indication that she should become much more attentive to the details of her service.

Kiśorī-devī dāsī, the Deities' cook, inquired from Śrīla Prabhupāda about certain aspects of her service. Cook for Kṛṣṇa as for a young man with a big appetite, he advised her. Kṛṣṇa should get ten purīs, four capātīs, lots of rice, two samosās, two kachaurīs, two vaḍas, and two of each sweet. The cooked preparations should be served hot. "So now you have to teach everyone how to cook," he said. "You have to give everyone what you have received."

Kiśorī would also bring a garland for Śrīla Prabhupāda in the afternoon. To make it cooling, she would sprinkle it with water. For two days Prabhupāda said nothing, but on the third day he remarked, "Take this away. Why do you put water like that? It is very displeasing."

Viśāla had a practice, which other devotees considered eccentric, of standing at the gate and loudly reciting Sanskrit verses as Śrīla Prabhupāda passed. One morning Prabhupāda approached the gate in a thunderbolt mood, and as usual Viśāla came forward reciting verses.

"Why don't you do something useful?" Prabhupāda said. "Sweep this water away."

Śrīla Prabhupāda would sample the guesthouse cooking daily, often suggesting how to improve the quality. Each day Nava-yogendra would bring Prabhupāda a plate from the restaurant and then note down Prabhupāda's comment on each preparation. The following day the cooks would attempt to improve the food, based on Prabhupāda's remarks.

And so it was with each department. Even when riding in the car, Prabhupāda would ask, "You are having it oiled regularly? You are having it lubricated and serviced?"

Other temples were homes away from home, said Prabhupāda, but Vṛndāvana was home. Those who wished to live there with him, however, had to pass the test of his constant scrutiny and sharp criticism; they had to accept the hard work and austerity. And special austerities meant special blessings. When a devotee asked to be excused from his duties in Vṛndāvana to operate a farm in the West, Prabhupāda said that even opening twenty farms would not be as important as remaining in Vṛndāvana. Those who persevered eventually began to see all difficulties as nectar, as had been expressed by Bhaktivinoda Ṭhākura: "When difficulties arise in service I find them sources of happiness."

On Rādhāṣṭamī Śrīla Prabhupāda laid the cornerstone for a large gurukula building adjacent to the Krishna-Balaram Mandir. He said that when it was built, the devotees should accommodate five hundred students there from all over the world. Through the gorgeous temple, the guesthouse, and soon the gurukula, Śrīla Prabhupāda intended to draw as many people as possible to the shelter of Kṛṣṇa in Vṛndāvana. For this end he was willing to sacrifice everything, even his peaceful writing. And for this end he also demanded his disciples to sacrifice.

Constant travel, Śrīla Prabhupāda said, was becoming more and more inconvenient—one reason for his return to India. But he was by no means stopping; unless he traveled, his movement could not remain vital and healthy. So he was prepared, despite inconvenience, to continue touring. Disciples never stopped inviting him to travel, and recently Puṣṭa Kṛṣṇa Swami had asked him to come to South Africa. When Prabhupāda agreed, Puṣṭa Kṛṣṇa had quickly arranged ten festivals and other engagements in Durban and Johannesburg, covering a period of three weeks in October.

Devotees on the predominantly Hindu island of Mauritius had also requested Prabhupāda to visit, mentioning that the prime minister wanted to meet him. Prabhupāda agreed. Leaving Vṛndāvana—making brief stops in Delhi, Ahmedabad, and Bombay—he was off to Africa.

Mauritius

October 1, 1975

Relieved of management, Prabhupāda was freer now to lecture to interested gatherings. Reception by the press and government ministers in Mauritius was good, but most public questions reflected a lack of sincere interest in spiritual knowledge: “Is it necessary to be a vegetarian?” “Is the soul locked in the third eye?” “You seem dogmatic. Is there any doubt in your philosophy?” Nevertheless, people were respectful and considered Śrīla Prabhupāda an important leader and spiritual authority. He remained there a week.

Durban

This was Prabhupāda's first visit to South Africa. For two years the devotees there had been trying to get him a visa, but the government was wary of foreign missionaries. The bureaucratic delays, therefore, had taken months. The devotees had even had to send copies of Prabhupāda's books for the government officials to review.

Every night for a week, Śrīla Prabhupāda delivered public lectures to crowds of at least a thousand—mostly Hindus, but also many whites. After Prabhupāda's lecture at the University of Durban, Westville, a member of the faculty tried to discredit the lecture by stating, “Well, this is just the Hindu concept.” Repeatedly Śrīla Prabhupāda tried explaining how the principles of Kṛṣṇa consciousness were universal and scientific, but the man kept replying that it was Hindu culture. Dr. S. P. Olivier, rector of the university, sympathized with Prabhupāda's presentation and stayed afterward to speak at length with him. "I think you are quite right," Dr. Olivier began, "but very few people tonight got the point you were trying to make, that this is a scientific reality."

Johannesburg

October 12

Śrīla Prabhupāda's arrival at the Johannesburg airport was culturally extraordinary for South Africa—white men bowing down before an Indian! The devotees had borrowed a yellow Mercedes-Benz and had parked it in a spot reserved for state ministers and other dignitaries. No one objected. As Śrīla Prabhupāda arrived, devotees threw flower petals, some young European onlookers bowed down, and the police—impressed by all the protocol—saluted Śrīla Prabhupāda and respectfully opened the door to his Mercedes.

As in Durban, Prabhupāda's lectures were well attended. He was keen to have his books sold during these programs, and he would go to the book booths and ask his disciples, "Are they buying the books?" He was concerned that the Europeans, not just the Hindus, buy the books.

Prabhupāda spoke strongly against racial discrimination, but unlike Mahatma Gandhi, who had been imprisoned in South Africa for his outspoken views, Prabhupāda spoke on the authority of scripture. "What is this black-white business?" he said. "It is nonsense. It is the bodily concept of life." In South Africa such statements would ordinarily have been considered volatile politics, yet everyone appreciated Śrīla Prabhupāda, because he spoke on a purely spiritual level.

One of Prabhupāda's disciples in South Africa, Ṛddha, asked privately how to deal with the racial issue in Johannesburg. The only solution, Prabhupāda said, was mass hari-nāma saṅkīrtana. When Ṛddha asked about starting a farm community, Prabhupāda replied, "Don't be so eager to move out to the country. The preaching is in the cities." He said he was very pleased with what his disciples had done in South Africa within such a short time.

While Prabhupāda was in Johannesburg, Rāmeśvara and company fulfilled their promise and reached him with copies of both volumes of the Fifth Canto of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam. Śrīla Prabhupāda took the books with him to his lecture at one university and quoted from them, speaking on Lord Rṣabhadeva's instructions, beginning with the verse in which Rṣabhadeva advises His sons not to live for sense gratification.

Mauritius

Prabhupāda had returned to meet with the prime minister. As a friendly gesture, the prime minister had sent a chauffeured car for Śrīla Prabhupāda's use in Mauritius. One day Prabhupāda was leaving to take a ride in the countryside, but as he was about to enter the car on the right side, Puṣṭa Kṛṣṇa Swami suggested, "Śrīla Prabhupāda, come to the other side. It's safer." And Prabhupāda complied. For half an hour they rode through the beautiful countryside, past sugarcane fields, mountains, and the ocean. At one point, they stopped and walked along a cliff beside the sea.

When they returned to the car, Brahmānanda Swami opened the right-side door and Prabhupāda said, "No, the other side is safer," just as Puṣṭa Kṛṣṇa had previously suggested.

A few minutes later, as Prabhupāda's black Citroen was rounding a curve, a Volkswagen suddenly appeared, heading toward them in the same lane. Prabhupāda was seated behind Puṣṭa Kṛṣṇa, and Brahmānanda was seated behind the driver. The moment before the Volkswagen had appeared, Śrīla Prabhupāda had sat up, cross-legged, planting his cane against the floor of the car to support himself.

As the Volkswagen rushed toward them, the chauffeur braked, swerving to the left, but the Volkswagen swerved in the same direction. There was a head-on collision. Puṣṭa Kṛṣṇa's head hit the windshield, cracking the glass. The driver's head also slammed against the glass, and his face was covered with blood.

In the back seat, Śrīla Prabhupāda remained sitting, his face set gravely. Brahmānanda, in shock, suddenly embraced Prabhupāda, as if to protect him, although the danger had already passed.

Brahmānanda then jumped out of the car to try and flag down a motorist, and Puṣṭa Kṛṣṇa got out and opened the back door, where he found Śrīla Prabhupāda with his face bruised, his leg bleeding, and pieces of glass scattered at his feet. Prabhupāda didn't speak or indicate how he felt. Suddenly Puṣṭa Kṛṣṇa realized that the car, disabled on a curve, was in a dangerous position, so he joined Brahmānanda in the road to caution motorists and to try to get someone to stop.

The Citroen and the Volkswagen were totaled, and the man and woman in the Volkswagen were both injured. Motorists soon stopped, and when the injured persons had received help, Prabhupāda and the devotees got into a car and rode back to the temple.

Harikeśa was waiting anxiously, wondering why Śrīla Prabhupāda was so late, when suddenly Prabhupāda entered, walking very stiffly, saying nothing. When Harikeśa saw all three were injured, he cried out, "My God! What happened? What happened?" But Śrīla Prabhupāda just walked to his quarters and sat down, silent. A devotee brought bandages for the obvious injuries: Prabhupāda's chin, hand, and leg, and Puṣṭa Kṛṣṇa's and Brahmānanda's heads.

Śrīla Prabhupāda had said nothing since the accident. Finally he spoke: "Asann api kleśa-da āsa dehaḥ." And he translated: "As soon as you accept this material body, there are so many difficulties. We were sitting peacefully in the car, and the next moment—crash." He talked briefly about the collision, and Brahmānanda Swami told how just before the accident Prabhupāda had braced himself with his cane, preventing perhaps more serious injuries.

"Get some resin and turmeric," Prabhupāda said. "Mix it together with a bit of lye, and heat it." Prabhupāda was again speaking—Bhāgavata philosophy and practical medical remedies. It remained a frightening event, however, and Prabhupāda asked the devotees to have kīrtana. Kṛṣṇa had saved them, he said. Considering that both cars had been destroyed, the injuries were negligible.

Prabhupāda sat like a battle hero, anointed in three places with the yellow poultice, while Harikeśa read aloud from Caitanya-caritāmṛta—"The Disappearance of Haridāsa Ṭhākura."

Then Śrīla Prabhupāda began talking about the dangers of traveling, questioning the advisability of his extensive touring. His mission of translating Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam and other Vaiṣṇava literature was too important for him to be risking his life traveling in automobiles. He had been considering a visit to Nairobi before returning to Bombay, but now he said he would cancel his visit. He said he had never wanted to leave Bombay, but because they had made so many arrangements in Africa, he had come. Perhaps the accident was a sign that he should go back to India.

The next morning, with Brahmānanda Swami and Puṣṭa Kṛṣṇa Swami hobbling along, Prabhupāda went on his morning walk as usual, although he favored his injured knee. Again he discussed with his disciples whether he should go on to Nairobi or return to India. Cyavana, the president of ISKCON Nairobi, argued that Prabhupāda should go to Nairobi. The devotees there were expecting it, he said, and they had made arrangements. If Prabhupāda canceled now, he would probably not come back for a long time. Others, however, argued that there was no question of asking Śrīla Prabhupāda to keep going now, after this traumatic accident; he should go directly to Bombay.

Prabhupāda heard both opinions, but he was more affected by the consideration of disappointing the devotees in Nairobi than of recuperating after the accident. He decided to go to Nairobi.

But after only a few days in Nairobi, Prabhupāda became anxious to return to India. Reports were reaching him about mismanagement in Bombay and about building materials being stolen from the property through a conspiracy involving the workers, the storekeeper, and the chaukīdārs. When Śrīla Prabhupāda heard this, he became so morose he stopped translating. He even stopped eating. Although thousands of miles from Bombay, he was feeling the pain more than any of the devotees there. Many of them, in fact, were not even aware that the theft was taking place. When Brahmānanda Swami asked Prabhupāda why he wasn't eating, he replied, "How can I eat when my money is being stolen?"

Bombay

November 1

Śrīla Prabhupāda's plane from Nairobi arrived in Bombay at one A.M., yet even at such an early hour he was greeted at the temple by a gathering of intimate life members, disciples, and even some of the tenants on the land. When the group followed him to his room, he confided that he had had a serious accident, and he even showed them the scar on his knee. He said he was relieved to be back. In a letter from Bombay he wrote,

The accident was very disastrous, but still Krishna saved... Perhaps I may stay here for some time for finishing our temple construction on this land.

ISKCON Bombay was Śrīla Prabhupāda's office, and he immediately got to work. He fired the engineer, whom he held responsible for the poor, slow work and stolen building materials. At first Prabhupāda had tried to avoid hiring a construction company by having Surabhi oversee the whole project, assigning work to various subcontractors. But that wasn't working.

Śrīla Prabhupāda wanted a change, but there was no clear alternative. "We have come to Kṛṣṇa consciousness for a life of eternal bliss," he said to Surabhi. "But instead of eternal bliss, I am suffering eternal anxiety." He appealed to Surabhi, Girirāja, and the others to do something.

One day a life member, a construction engineer, visited the site and told Śrīla Prabhupāda the temple and hotel could easily be completed in six months. Prabhupāda then berated Surabhi, who said that six months' time was not enough. "Now I am nowhere," thought Surabhi. "I'm losing my service."

Then another life member, Mr. Omkar Prakash Dir, the chief engineer with E.C.C., one of India's largest, most reputable construction companies, came to the Sunday feast and examined the work. Appalled at the poor quality, he said that after two or three years it would fall apart.

Girirāja, impressed with the idea of hiring Bombay's biggest, most competent construction firm, spoke with Prabhupāda, who was also interested. At first Surabhi resented that the work was being taken out of his hands, but after meeting with Mr. Dir, he also liked the proposed change.

The contract was made with E.C.C., and Mr. Dir presented a progress chart, detailing each phase of the work and showing when it would be completed. Śrīla Prabhupāda was pleased with their professional methods, despite the higher cost. Now the work would be done as professionally and as quickly as possible, and this was what mattered most.

Prabhupāda stayed for the greater part of November, and the construction progressed quickly. There was no question of cutting corners to save a little money, Prabhupāda explained to Surabhi. The temple had to be a beautiful jewel, so that people from all over India would want to come and stay. During the Vṛndāvana construction Prabhupāda had emphasized, "Why so much? Why not just simple?" But now he was stressing, "Why not more?" The temple should be opulent and ornate, with marble everywhere. The hotel should be the finest, with beautifully furnished rooms and an elegant restaurant. And the air-conditioned theater building should be one of the best in Bombay.

"Why not marble on the floors?" asked Prabhupāda, speaking of the hotel rooms.

"It's going to be very expensive," said Surabhi.

"Don't worry about the money," Prabhupāda said. "Can we put marble on the floor? Then do it." Surabhi did it, but tried to save money by putting a cheaper stone in the hotel hallways. When Prabhupāda saw it, he was displeased. It should have been all marble, he said.

Funds for the Bombay construction came primarily from the sale of books in America, and Śrīla Prabhupāda was regularly receiving reports. On November 18, Rāmeśvara sent a telegram with some of the good news.

ONE MILLION COPIES OF BTG JUST PRINTED. DEVOTEES GONE WILD. PROMISED TO DISTRIBUTE ALL WITHIN ONE MONTH. SPANISH GITA JUST OFF THE PRESS BRINGING HUNDREDS OF MILLIONS TO YOUR LOTUS FEET. ALL POSSIBLE BY YOUR MERCY ONLY.

When the temple president from ISKCON Denver wrote asking about starting a jewelry business, Śrīla Prabhupāda wrote back, disapproving.

Why are they doing business? This creates a bad atmosphere. We shall only do one business and that is book-selling. That's all. As soon as you become karmis after business, then spiritual life becomes damaged. This business should not be encouraged anymore. Doing business and not sankirtana, that is not at all good. Sankirtana is very good, but grhasthas under condition can do other business, only if they give at least 50 percent. But sankirtana is the best business.

Prabhupāda envisioned that book distribution could not only finance Bombay construction but could also support his even more ambitious plans for Māyāpur. Book distribution was good business, and it was the best preaching. It was Prabhupāda's formula—American money combined with India's spiritual culture—and he encouraged Rāmeśvara to motivate the saṅkīrtana in the U.S.A. in accordance with this principle.

America has the money, so this is cooperation between the blind men and lame men. It will make good relations between India and America. The next chance I have for meeting with Indira Gandhi I shall inform her about how much foreign exchange we are sending. After receiving your encouraging assurance that as book distribution increases, the amount BBT sends will also increase, we are now going to attempt a Kurukshetra project and the Jagannath Puri project. For the time being we are spending in India, but eventually we will spend everywhere. This will greatly enhance the Americans' spiritual position.

Always remain dependent on Guru and Krishna and your progress will always be assured.

SPL 49: India: Unifying ISKCON

CHAPTER FORTY-NINE

India: Unifying ISKCON

During 1975 Śrīla Prabhupāda increasingly referred management problems to the G.B.C., specifically to the annual G.B.C. meeting in Māyāpur. From the beginning of ISKCON he had been saying, "It is not one man's work." He had created the Governing Body Commission to relieve himself of the staggering burden of personally managing his growing world organization. "Always remember," he had written to a G.B.C. member, "that you are one of the few leaders I have given this responsibility to... and your task is very great."

Prabhupāda saw the progress of his movement as a wonderfully successful phenomenon, proof of the direct mercy of Lord Caitanya upon his humble efforts. ISKCON was his service to his Guru Mahārāja, and now his disciples should maintain it and increase it as their service to their spiritual master. He said he wanted to see 108 flourishing temples before his departure from the world. Keeping those temples alive was to be the work of his sincere followers. He wrote to his G.B.C. representative for Australia,

All temples in Melbourne, London, Paris, Bombay, all are very nice. Everything is very bright and brilliant. The Deity is proof of the sincere service. It is the duty of the G.B.C. now to maintain this. Their duty is to enthuse them and maintain.

Problems were inevitable for a preacher of Kṛṣṇa consciousness. Many sādhus, therefore, preferred to remain in a holy place, without preaching. But Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī and the great ācāryas in the sampradāya of Lord Caitanya had been concerned with offering the Lord's devotional service to as many conditioned souls as possible.

Yet to take up this path one would have to be tolerant. Financial needs, national and local governmental restrictions, ignorant and demoniac enemies of pure devotion to the Lord, envy, personal ambition and disagreements among neophyte devotees, struggles and falldowns in the attempt to avoid illicit sex and intoxication—all these and many more problems complicated the preacher's mission. Śrīla Prabhupāda, however, knew the struggle was worth it, even to save just one soul from the cycle of birth and death.

Prabhupāda wanted his more advanced disciples to share the struggle with him. And when he saw competence and sincerity in some of his senior members, he tried to turn affairs over to them and concentrate more on his life's mission of presenting all twelve cantos of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam. Always the devotees were enthusiastically pressing Prabhupāda to translate and write more books—so that they could read them and distribute them. Śrīla Prabhupāda replied that he was trying his best, but that the task was not mechanical; great concentration and peace of mind were required. He could not write while at the same time being besieged by dozens of threatening, complicated issues.

When the G.B.C. member responsible for Gurukula wrote Śrīla Prabhupāda with a plan that all ISKCON centers should support the educational system, Prabhupāda replied, “As far as taxing the centers for the maintenance, that should be considered amongst the G.B.C.”

When a controversy arose in the Stockholm center and devotees appealed to Prabhupāda for a judgment, he replied, “This must be considered at a full meeting of the G.B.C.” And he added, “All of our students will have to become guru, but they are not qualified.”

Śrīla Prabhupāda said that sexual attraction, making unnecessary changes, and fighting among Godbrothers were all Western “diseases.” Kṛṣṇa consciousness was the path of perfection, and if his disciples stayed persistently and sincerely on the path, they could certainly succeed.

Sometimes, however, Prabhupāda saw the Western diseases overcoming his disciples, and even the G.B.C. members would seem unable to stop it. Yet unless they spared him from such headaches, how could he do the higher work? "G.B.C.," he said, "must mean that by his managing, there are not any complaints, so that I can be relieved to do the translation work."

He had expounded on this principle in the Fourth Canto of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam.

When the disciples are grown up and are able to preach, the spiritual master should retire and sit down in a solitary place to write and execute nirjana-bhajana. This means sitting silently in a solitary place and executing devotional service...

The devotees of the International Society for Krishna Consciousness now render service as preachers in various parts of the world. Now they can allow their spiritual master to retire from active preaching work. In the last stage of the spiritual master's life, the devotees of the spiritual master should take preaching activities into their own hands.

But it was like trying to control the wind. When the difficulties mounted, the devotees would run to him like children running to their father. Sometimes a disciple would simultaneously ask him to write his books and then drop a serious problem in his lap. One of the leaders in America reported to him that some devotees were not following the principles, but that Śrīla Prabhupāda should please stay in India and continue writing peacefully. Prabhupāda wrote back,

If the old habits come back, then everything is finished. If my mind becomes disturbed in this way, then how can I concentrate on book writing? It is not possible. Better not inform me anything, and let me sit in Vrindaban.

Sometimes Śrīla Prabhupāda uttered the phrase "let me sit in Vṛn dāvana," as if to give up managing the whole problematic Society. Everyone knew he would never leave ISKCON; he had already sacrificed his life to save the world by leading the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement. But when would his disciples mature? Śrīla Prabhupāda wrote, "I want that the G.B.C. relieve me of all management, which means they have to manage the way I manage." And often he would say, "Do as I am doing."

When controversies and disagreements among the G.B.C. secretaries themselves came before him, he would refer them to the G.B.C. body.

I appointed G.B.C. for peaceful management of affairs, and now you are creating disturbances among yourselves. So how can I be peaceful to translate my work? So all these things should be kept in abeyance for the time being, and when we meet in Mayapur we can discuss amongst the entire G.B.C. The Spiritual Sky questions and all other questions of this nature will simply have to wait until we discuss it in Mayapur.

Śrīla Prabhupāda continued to hold the G.B.C. responsible for settling the affairs of ISKCON. For better or worse, he wanted all his disciples to accept the G.B.C. as their authority, and he trusted that when the G.B.C. members all met together, working under his guidance, they could solve the problems. But whether they could actually spare him, allowing him to peacefully write his books, seemed doubtful.

During 1975, a controversy arose among some of the ISKCON members, including some of the G.B.C. members, as to whether gr̥hastha devotees, married men, could actually be spiritual leaders in ISKCON. Although the Kṛṣṇa consciousness philosophy clearly explained that any devotee, regardless of his āśrama, could become qualified and purified, the controversy grew.

In September a sannyāsī G.B.C. member flew from the U.S. to Vṛndāvana just to suggest to Prabhupāda that another G.B.C. member, a gr̥hastha, was not qualified to lead. Śrīla Prabhupāda, however, said the matter could be settled at the annual G.B.C. meeting. But when the next day a letter came from Rāmeśvara, supplicating Prabhupāda to continue his translating work, Prabhupāda replied that he was prepared to work at his writing but that when one leader flies ten thousand miles to lodge a complaint against another, then, "What can I do?"

If you all leaders cannot work together, then how can you expect the others to cooperate with you? Differences may be there, but still you have to cooperate together, otherwise where is the question of my being relieved of so many problems and decisions?

As the third annual international festival approached, the longstanding problems of various discontented parties awaited settlement in the court of the G.B.C. Śrīla Prabhupāda would be arriving in Māyāpur on January 17, almost two months before the G.B.C. meetings and the gathering of devotees. With perhaps a thousand devotees attending, there would be blissful kīrtanas, classes, and parikramas. And there would be problems. Prabhupāda made it clear that the proper way of settling the controversies was not by gossiping about them, not by pressing him for a ruling, but by trusting in the G.B.C. Prabhupāda himself would stand by the decisions of the G.B.C. or, if necessary, correct them, and so sincere followers should also not hesitate to follow.

At the Mayapur meeting, whatever we have decided, that is good for one year. So if anything has to be done it will be decided by majority decision of the G.B.C. I do not wish to give any decision without the GBC's verdict. My only grievance is that I appointed G.B.C. to give me relief from the management, but, on the contrary, complaints and counter-complaints are coming to me. Then how my brain can be peaceful? So best thing is that we wait for the Mayapur meeting and decide there combinedly what to do. If there are any discrepancies that will be discussed at the G.B.C. meeting in Mayapur. How can one man manage the whole world affairs?

January 17, 1976

Enroute from Calcutta to Māyāpur, Prabhupāda stopped at the mango grove and took breakfast—fruit, vaḍa, nuts, and sweets. Even before reaching Māyāpur, he was enjoying the peaceful atmosphere of the Bengal countryside. Soon he would be at the Māyāpur Chandrodāya Mandir, his special place of worshiping the Supreme Personality of Godhead.

More than fifty adult devotees and thirty young Bengali gurukula boys were waiting for Śrīla Prabhupāda at the gate. For the first time, Prabhupāda beheld the large entrance dome, recently built over the gate. A thick, twenty-foot flower garland stretched across the gateway, and before it stood Bhavānanda Goswami, holding a small silk cushion on which rested a pair of scissors. Stepping out of the car into the bright sunlight, Prabhupāda took the scissors and cut the garland, sanctifying the gate. Prabhupāda smiled. Everyone cheered as the gate swung open and Prabhupāda entered, followed by the ecstatic kīrtana party.

As Prabhupāda walked toward the temple of Rādhā-Mādhava, everywhere he looked he saw blossoming flowers. Clay pots of burning frankincense billowed fragrant smoke, and women stood on the second-floor veranda offering showers of rose petals as Prabhupāda approached. The main building was decorated beautifully. Walking beneath an orange silk umbrella amid the devotees and exuberant kīrtana of the holy name, he appeared regal and triumphant.

Inside the temple, where dozens of garlands hung from the ceiling, Prabhupāda came before the golden forms of Rādhā-Mādhava and offered prostrated obeisances. He felt he was in Vaikuṇṭha. Because of the arrangements the devotees had made, he said, Kṛṣṇa was smiling.

Later that day, as Prabhupāda was taking his massage, his servant Hari-śauri suggested that this would be a good place for retirement. "Either Vṛndāvana or Māyāpur," Prabhupāda replied. "No other place. That is sure."

In the afternoon Prabhupāda inspected the grounds and buildings. He was pleased at the spaciousness of the prasādam hall, built to seat twelve hundred, and he remarked that its size reminded him of the Bombay railway station. But when he found the steps to the kitchen dirty, he criticized strongly. One of the devotees explained that it was usually cleaned but that the devotee who always did it was chanting his japa. "You are chanting japa," said Prabhupāda, "and it has not been cleaned for three hundred years. Clean first, then japa. Under the plea of japa they are simply dozing." He said that anyone who finds a situation affected by the mode of ignorance but doesn't act to correct it is also being affected by the mode of ignorance.

Śrīla Prabhupāda walked down to the bank of the Jalāngī to see the boat the devotees were using for traveling from village to village. Onboard, he praised the simple life of traveling and preaching. He also went to the gośālā and saw the calves and cows, and he drank a cup of the first sugarcane juice of the season, from cane grown on the ISKCON land.

As Śrīla Prabhupāda walked through the fields to the proposed site of the Māyāpur city, Surabhi described where various buildings could be located. Prabhupāda suggested they present their plan to West Bengal government officials and ask them to provide the necessary land.

Śrīla Prabhupāda continued to meditate on the Māyāpur city, and a few days later he composed a letter to the chief secretary of West Bengal, asking for help in acquiring land. ISKCON should not be misunderstood as a sectarian religious institution, he informed the chief secretary. Kṛṣṇa's instructions in Bhagavad-gītā, beginning with "We are not the body," were scientific and thus did not belong to any particular religion. Prabhupāda also asserted that ISKCON programs, especially the one contemplated for Māyāpur, would solve national and international problems through spiritual education. He mentioned features that would be particularly appealing to the chief secretary, such as the investment of foreign capital in the project, the flow of tourists who would come to Māyāpur, and the hiring of thousands of local workers for constructing and maintaining the city. His description of the project was fascinating.

Centered around a cultural exposition building, the total village-communal development will unfold. This central exposition building is the first phase of a many-phased plan. It will feature the world's largest planetarium, entitled "The Temple of Understanding." This structure will be over thirty stories high and will house exhibits depicting all the levels of universal existence and all varieties of living conditions, and all the planetary systems and exact detail through lights, models, dioramas and murals. There will also be daily scheduled exhibits and tours for the public, and even a moving escalator taking the public to the upper levels of the exhibition building. The planetarium's exhibits on the various levels of existence in this world and beyond will be based on the scientific findings in the Vedic literatures, especially the Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam. This "Temple of Understanding" shall be surrounded by beautiful pathways, entrances, gardens and water reservoirs. Four-storied buildings, one thousand feet long, will stand at the perimeter of the central area on all four sides. These will be used for teaching general and specialized branches of education from primary level to post-graduate level.

In his letter Śrīla Prabhupāda referred to difficulties in purchasing land for ISKCON's projects, since all the local landowners were escalating their prices far beyond the market value. If the government could make the land available at market prices, then ISKCON could immediately start its important work, officially inaugurating it on the birthday anniversary of Lord Caitanya Mahāprabhu, March 16, 1976.

In the meantime, Prabhupāda was trying on his own to acquire enough land to begin. The Māyāpur City project would require extensive funding and many years of work to develop, but it would proclaim the glories of Lord Caitanya with unlimited potency. Māyāpur would become famous, drawing people from all over the world to see the unique, modern application of timeless Vedic wisdom.

Prabhupāda explained to his disciples that although a sannyāsī traditionally does not involve himself with money, the devotee's desire is to unite Lakṣmī (the goddess of fortune, represented by wealth) with Nārāyaṇa (God). He said there was truth to the common saying "No one listens to a poor man," and were he to advertise A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami discoursing in an empty field in Māyāpur, no one would come. Westerners especially should be able to hear about Kṛṣṇa in a comfortable, attractive setting. Prabhupāda planned, therefore, that visitors to ISKCON's transcendental city be well accommodated. Gradually, the world would be deeply affected by the dynamic demonstration of the artistic, philosophical, and humanitarian aspects of Kṛṣṇa consciousness.

Prabhupāda asked Surabhi to draw a master plan for Māyāpur City. Staying up all night, Surabhi made a preliminary architectural sketch, showing specific areas of the city for brāhmaṇas, kṣatriyas, vaiśyas, and śūdras. The sketch also showed temples, schools, streets, walkways, residential buildings, cottages, a stadium and an airport, as well as self-sufficiency features like windmills, irrigation systems, and agricultural fields.

Prabhupāda was taking his massage when Surabhi brought him the drawing. Prabhupāda's golden body was glistening with mustard oil as Hari-śauri carefully, strongly massaged his head, back, chest, and limbs. Prabhupāda was relaxed and silent, his eyes closed in meditation. But when Surabhi entered with the drawing of Māyāpur, he became animated. Prabhupāda liked the drawing and talked about it for an hour. Now Surabhi should make a formal drawing and approach professional architects and appropriate government agencies. The devotees coming to Māyāpur should also see it. As fabulous and far-reaching as it was, the Māyāpur City should now become a reality.

As the festival drew near, some of the sannyāsīs arrived, hoping to associate more intimately with Śrīla Prabhupāda before the flood of devotees began. A major topic of discussion among the sannyāsīs was the controversy over the role of gr̥hastha men in ISKCON and the influence of women and children on the sannyāsīs and brahmacārīs, those in the renounced orders. Some of the sannyāsīs were suggesting that ISKCON should be more structured, to separate the renounced orders and the preachers from the householders. They began airing their views before Śrīla Prabhupāda, who then guided them. On one morning walk, Jayapatāka Swami inquired about the standards required before a man could take sannyāsa.

"To become sannyāsī," Prabhupāda replied, "the other three processes are there—to become brahmacārī, to become gr̥hastha, and to become vānaprastha. Stage by stage. But if one is able, he can take sannyāsa. And that competency is also very simple. If you become fully Kṛṣṇa conscious, then you can immediately become competent—brahma-bhūyāya kalpate. As soon as you fully engage yourself in Kṛṣṇa consciousness, then immediately you become more than a sannyāsī."

Hari-śauri, a gr̥hastha, inquired whether artificially accepting the renounced order could actually be indulging in another form of sense gratification.

"As soon as we manufacture something," Prabhupāda replied, "that is sense gratification. When we think, 'I want to fulfill my desire, that's all,' that is sense gratification. It may be that I sit down under a tree or I sit down in a palace—the basic principle is sense gratification. The other day I was talking about hīrā-cora and kīrā-corā. Hīrā means 'diamond,' and kīrā means 'cucumber.' One is thinking, 'I shall steal one cucumber,' and another thinks, 'If I steal, I shall steal the diamond.' But the stealing propensity is there. One may think that 'I am only stealing a cucumber, and it is not very dangerous,' but in the eyes of the law both of them are criminal. So if we manufacture a concoction—"Yes, I have got a stealing propensity, but I'll not steal a diamond, I'll steal kīrā"—that is only mental concoction. But he is a thief."

Jayapatāka Swami: "So is gr̥hastha life in Kṛṣṇa consciousness allowing us to steal kīrā?"

Prabhupāda: "Yes, kīrā-corā. The prostitute hunter is hīrā-corā, and the householder is kīrā-corā. That's all."

Again Hari-śauri inquired whether artificial renunciation was sense gratification. There were different views among the disciples, and they wanted Prabhupāda to make it very clear, so that one party could not take a quote from Prabhupāda and claim it was universal.

"Renunciation is not artificial," said Prabhupāda. "It is a process. We have to give up this sense gratification. So go through a process to turn. Like sometimes in a health club there is artificial swimming, is it not? Artificial swimming is not actual swimming, but it is to practice."

Dayānanda: "But sometimes people who renounce, they become very proud. What is that?"

Prabhupāda continued to reply that renunciation had to be actually practiced. "Everyone must attend the maṅgala-ārati," he said. "One must attend this. Otherwise, no prasādam. If you are too sick, then also you should not eat. There should not be sleeping at the time of maṅgala-ārati because he says he's sick, then at the time of prasādam, voracious eating."

If the devotees were looking for Prabhupāda to make an absolute distinction between grhastha and sannyāsī, it was not there. He emphasized, rather, the actual quality and the practice of the individual devotee.

On another morning walk Hṛdayānanda Goswami told Prabhupāda of the sannyāsīs' discussions.

Hṛdayānanda: "We were thinking that it would be nice to have the city centers for the preachers. And for the women and children, it's much easier to maintain them on our farms. There they can do a little work and produce their own food."

Prabhupāda: "Yes. In the farms they can live and do some handwork."

Gurukṛpā Swami: "They won't do it, though, Śrīla Prabhupāda."

Prabhupāda: "Then you don't allow. If they do not follow the rules and regulations, then what is the use?"

Another sannyāsī said that when many householders came together in big communities, an atmosphere of laziness developed, whereas when lots of brahmacārīs were preaching together, it was more enlivening

Prabhupāda: "Anyway, everyone should be engaged. That's all. No idle life. Never encourage laziness. If we maintain some lazy men, then everything will be spoiled."

Devotee: "I heard, Śrīla Prabhupāda, that you remarked our Society is not a love-making Society, but these things are going on."

Referring to an impropriety of two of his disciples, Prabhupāda replied, "Yes, I have seen in Vṛndāvana."

Other complaints arose. One leader argued that the temple should not have to carry the burden of maintaining women with children but no husbands. Another complaint was that brahmacārīs, by selling books, were in effect supporting the householders.

Prabhupāda continued to reply in a philosophical and practical way that whatever discrepancies were present should be rectified. Sense gratification, laziness, and failure to attend the temple programs should not be tolerated. But this condemnation of malpractices in devotional service did not fall exclusively on any particular group.

Shortly after his arrival in Māyāpur, Prabhupāda had addressed a similar issue in his own correspondence. A Mr. Chatterji had written from Calcutta to say that he was preaching worship of Lord Caitanya and was eager to show Śrīla Prabhupāda some articles he had written. Mr. Chatterji stated, "My theme is we can get to see our God, Gaurāṅga, by taking sannyāsa. Those who are grhasthas reach to the Godhead through nam sankirtana." Śrīla Prabhupāda encouraged the man with a reply.

Your theme is okay. There were many devotees of Lord Chaitanya like Advaita Acharya, and even Lord Nityananda who were grihasthas. Lord Chaitanya left His grihastha life. It is a matter of understanding Krishna—that is the real qualification. Whether one is grihastha or sannyāsi, how well he knows Krishna. Śrīla Narottama das Thakur has sung "grhe va vane ta 'thake, he gaurāṅga bole dake."* Lord Chaitanya says "Kiba vipra, kiba nyasi, sudra kene naya, yei krishna tattva vetta, sei guru haya."* So please come and we shall discuss your articles.

While sitting relaxed in his room, Śrīla Prabhupāda had his temporary secretary, Dayānanda, read him some recent mail. One letter was from a temple president having difficulty managing the devotees, and Prabhupāda had Dayānanda summarize the letter's points.

"He says," said Dayānanda, "that the devotees aren't behaving, and so he's criticizing. But they're not accepting."

"Simply criticism is not our means," said Prabhupāda. "Our means is to show by example." Dayānanda made a note of it to use in typing Prabhupāda's reply.

"Now, Śrīla Prabhupāda," Dayānanda continued, "he's inquiring about his household life."

"This is not the business of the guru," said Prabhupāda "—how to increase sex life and family life. They are not happy, these Western men and women. They become married, but they are not happy. Therefore I recommend brahmācārya and sannyāsa life."

Several other devotees were also in the room with Prabhupāda, and Jagad-guru, a brahmācārī, spoke up. "Because they have no training, that's why they have so many problems."

"Whatever it may be," said Prabhupāda. "But they are not happy. Therefore I recommend brahmācārya and sannyāsa."

Śrīla Prabhupāda had already been disturbed by what he saw as a loose husband-wife situation in Vṛndāvana. Now, hearing this letter from a householder who was improperly inquiring about his family life, he again turned his attention to Vṛndāvana and asked to see his G.B.C. for Vṛndāvana, Gopāla Kṛṣṇa, who had recently arrived in Māyāpur.

"It is not a free hotel for love-making," Prabhupāda began, even before Gopāla Kṛṣṇa entered the room. "Vṛndāvana is not a joking place. They must be serious for Kṛṣṇa, and I shall give them everything. Don't worry about money, but manage. There is not scarcity of money. There is scarcity of management. Why so many children in the temple? It is not simply a place for husbandless women. Children should always be engaged, so they shouldn't create a disturbance all over."

Śrīla Prabhupāda said that if the mothers were irresponsible and only wanted to take care of their own children, then they should be sent away from Vṛndāvana. Two women could run a nursery and take care of many children, and the other women could work. "Not go to the roof and lovemaking," said Prabhupāda, "and make a plan and go away." He stressed that since all India came to Vṛndāvana, ISKCON's center should be ideal in every respect. Otherwise, people would think that his disciples were hippies, and no one would come. A good example of responsible care for children was in Māyāpur, where a gurukula had already been organized.

"Children are welcome," said Prabhupāda, "but make them jewels. Not spoiled children, varṇa-saṅkara hippies."

For the sannyāsīs in Māyāpur, Prabhupāda's heavy words about irresponsible gr̥hastha life fueled their own arguments. A few of them felt that gr̥hasthas should not even live in the temples. That evening, when the sannyāsīs gathered in Prabhupāda's room, they discussed with him the position of families and children in ISKCON.

One sannyāsī reported not being allowed to preach in certain temples, because he was against marriage and favored brahmacārī life. Others complained that expensive properties were being purchased to be used mostly as residences. The preaching was suffering, they said, and brahmacārīs were being told to get married if they felt sexually agitated.

Prabhupāda felt the heavy force of the sannyāsīs' protest, and he could perceive the antagonism between the āśramas. These things must be decided by the G.B.C., he said, and no one could go against their decisions. But he also expressed sympathy for what the sannyāsīs were saying. Families, he suggested, could serve in farm communities and live self-sufficiently in Kṛṣṇa consciousness.

"Our whole preaching program is detachment from material life," said Prabhupāda, "to stop sex life altogether. Gr̥hastha is a concession for those who cannot give it up immediately. Otherwise marriage is not required. It is simply burdensome. Legal or illegal, the after-effects of sex simply mean difficulty."

March 7

The G.B.C. members assembled. The process was to make an agenda, discuss each issue, and then pass resolutions by voting. At the end of the day they would go to Śrīla Prabhupāda in his room and read the day's resolutions for his approval or amendment. The first day they spent mostly in assigning zones and duties for each G.B.C. member. They reported these results to Śrīla Prabhupāda, and he approved them.

Prabhupāda also addressed the issue of gr̥hastha and sannyāsa life, saying that all the devotees should become attached to Kṛṣṇa's family, not to the "stool" family or "pig" family. Sannyāsa life meant rejection of the false family, but not the family of Kṛṣṇa consciousness. The Kṛṣṇa consciousness society was based on renunciation, said Prabhupāda, and therefore all sincere devotees were as good as sannyāsīs. The actual dress didn't matter, whether white or saffron,* although an ideal grhastha should eventually come to the stage of formal sannyāsa. He said that all his disciples should become gurus and each make thousands of disciples, just as he had, thus spreading Kṛṣṇa consciousness everywhere.

“Discuss in the G.B.C.,” he said, “and make a decision. Question and put to vote. But if you make brahmacārī party, grhastha party, sannyāsī party, it will be finished. Everything should be done very openly. We have to work for Kṛṣṇa. Why this pss-pss whispering? It is not very good.”

The next morning while Śrīla Prabhupāda was on his walk around the Māyāpur fields, the G.B.C. vice-chairman, Madhudviṣa Swami, asked for guidance in preparation for the G.B.C. meeting that day.

Madhudviṣa: “The subjects that we are going to be discussing today in the G.B.C. meeting are about the role of sannyāsīs and brahmacārīs and grhasthas in ISKCON. In the Eighteenth Chapter of the Bhagavad-gītā, in one of your purports, you say that a sannyāsī should never discourage a young man from getting married. But on the other hand, we understand that a sannyāsī should encourage young men to remain brahmacārī. So it seems to me like there's some kind of contradiction.”

Prabhupāda: “According to time and circumstance. Just like Kṛṣṇa says, niyataṁ kuru karma tvam: 'Always be engaged in your prescribed work.' And at last He says, sarva-dharmān parityajya mām ekam śaraṇam vraja. So now you adjust. That is not a contradiction. It is just suitable to the time and circumstance.”

Madhudviṣa: “But is there some conclusion?”

Prabhupāda: “The real aim is that you have to become the eternal servant of Kṛṣṇa. Either you go through karma or jñāna or yoga, it doesn't matter. The ultimate aim is how to reach Kṛṣṇa. Arjuna achieved the favor of Kṛṣṇa by fighting and killing. Hare Kṛṣṇa.”

Prabhupāda said no more. He had created the G.B.C. to deal with just such problems, and he had instructed his G.B.C. men personally, in letters and in his books. Now they would have to apply those instructions according to time and place.

The G.B.C. met, discussed all day, and by evening had a list of resolutions pertaining to the divisions of āśrama in ISKCON: Husbandless women with children could not live in ISKCON temples. Husband and wife could not live in ISKCON temples, even if separately. Before entering marriage, devotees should have a means of supporting themselves and not expect to “live off” ISKCON. Upon getting married, a householder would be financially responsible for his wife until such time as he took sannyāsa.

Reading the resolutions to Prabhupāda in his room usually evoked little verbal response from him. His practice was generally to nod in approval, or occasionally to comment. But when he heard the resolution that husbandless women with children could not stay in the temples, he uttered a thoughtful “Hmmm.” Then he said, “As for me, my only concern is that they shall not waste their valuable human life.” He was speaking not in the tone of the official head of the society, who could veto resolutions, but in a very personal, humble way, as a pure devotee. “After so much struggle,” he said, "they have got this human form, and I do not want that they should miss the opportunity. As for me, I cannot discriminate—man, woman, child, rich, poor, educated, or foolish. Let them all come, and let them take Kṛṣṇa consciousness, so that they will not waste their human life."

Although the G.B.C. members usually had plenty to say, after these remarks from Prabhupāda they remained silent.

Finally, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami, the elected G.B.C. chairman for the year, spoke. "Yes, Śrīla Prabhupāda," he said. "So we will strike that resolution."

Prabhupāda also disapproved the resolution that a householder would have to give financial support for his wife for the rest of his life until he took sannyāsa.

"You each be guru," he said. "As I have five thousand disciples or ten thousand, so you have ten thousand each. In this way, create branches and branches of the Caitanya tree. But you have to be spiritually strong. This means chanting your rounds and following the four rules. It is not an artificial show. It is not a material thing. Chant and follow the four rules and pray to Kṛṣṇa in helplessness. We have to have enthusiasm. If we lose our enthusiasm, everything will become slack. In old age I came out from Vṛndāvana. I had no money, nothing. But I thought, 'Let me try.' "

Bhagavān spoke out spontaneously: "You're still enthusiastic, Śrīla Prabhupāda."

"Yes." Prabhupāda smiled. "I am enthusiastic. I don't think I am an old man."

"Sometimes we think we are old," said Bhagavān.

"No one is old," said Prabhupāda. "Na hanyate hanyamāne śarīre.* Sometimes in old age one is pushed down. But I am enthusiastic."

Prabhupāda said he was pleased at most of the resolutions, because they indicated that a strong G.B.C. was now ready to relieve him so he could concentrate on his translation work. He said that the devotees would have to strictly follow for the entire year what the G.B.C. had agreed on. There should be no changes unless he approved, and at the next annual meeting they could make any changes necessary.

The G.B.C. chairman then called for a vote on an unresolved topic from the day's meeting. The topic had been discussed, but since it had not been approved, the chairman called for a vote. Everyone voted yes by raising their right hand. Then Śrīla Prabhupāda raised his hand also. His disciples immediately laughed at this endearing gesture.

"Yes," Prabhupāda said, "I am simply following the G.B.C. Whatever you say, I have to follow."

When the temple presidents heard about the G.B.C. resolutions, many objected. They knew Prabhupāda had approved them, but they thought that the actual spirit and interpretation some of the sannyāsīs might give to the resolutions would cause a split in the Society. Many of the temple presidents, being gr̥hasthas, felt discriminated against. They wanted a chance to present their side.

Prabhupāda knew of the presidents' discontent, and he brought up the subject on his next morning walk. Surrounded by sannyāsīs, G.B.C. men, temple presidents, and others, he brought out the issues, attempting to bring his spiritual family into harmony.

"I have heard," he said, "that too much stricture on the gr̥hasthas may cause some disturbance. Hmmm?"

"Yes," admitted Madhudviṣa.

"So," said Prabhupāda, "I think the gr̥hasthas themselves should form a small committee and define what they will do, instead of forcing something on them. Because in this age, nobody can follow strictly all the strictures in the śāstras."

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa objected to the idea of gr̥hasthas revising the G.B.C. resolutions. "In none of our resolutions," he argued, "do we say anything about how the gr̥hasthas should live. The resolutions simply say how our Society should be run. It doesn't say how gr̥hasthas should live. And on points of objection, Prabhupāda has already corrected us."

"I think it may be further decided," Prabhupāda continued. "Make a small committee of three or four gr̥hasthas. Then you define how you live."

Changing the subject, Prabhupāda asked when the paṇḍāl was going to be built. Today 350 devotees were expected to arrive from the West. The paṇḍāl stage was supposed to have been erected, and festivities, including theater, would begin in the evening. But the devotees, irrepressibly absorbed in the gr̥hastha-sannyāsī issue, could not refrain from pursuing it further.

"That is the distinction between the enjoying spirit and the renouncing spirit?" asked Puṣṭa Kṛṣṇa Swami, returning to the theme.

"Hmmm?" Prabhupāda asked. Although the question was pointed, he remained poised, and detached from their party divisions. His idea of what to do was definite, but his method of teaching it was careful and gradual. He already knew well the difficult task of satisfying divergent views among his strong-minded disciples. For years he had been making the ultimate decisions and teaching his disciples how to go forward in a united way. Once again, an issue was building that only he could solve—if they would listen.

Puṣṭa Kṛṣṇa: "For example, as we have been discussing, there are different tendencies between the brahmacārīs and the gr̥hasthas. The attitude of the brahmacārīs is toward renunciation. If a brahmacārī gives up his brahmacārī life to become a gr̥hastha, that means he is more inclined to the enjoying spirit. At least to some extent. So how to deal with this situation?"

Prabhupāda: "If you want to enjoy, who can stop you?"

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa: "But we cannot support it. We cannot support his enjoyment. That he should take on himself."

Prabhupāda: "According to different positions and attitudes, the four āśramas are there—brahmacārī, grhastha, vānaprastha, sannyāsa. This means that everyone is not on the equal platform. There are different platforms. But the whole idea is how to give up the propensity of enjoyment. That is wanted."

Puṣṭa Kṛṣṇa: "We find in the Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam that Śukadeva Gosvāmī would approach the householders in the morning just so long as to give them a little bit of spiritual knowledge, and he would accept the offering of some milk. So the sannyāsīs and renunciants, generally they wouldn't very much relish the association of householders because of this enjoying spirit and the association that it entails. So we are finding also within our Society that those who are inclined to remaining celibate, they are finding the association of persons even within our movement who have this enjoying spirit to be somewhat detrimental to their own spiritual life."

Prabhupāda: "Then what is your proposal? You should drive them away?"

Madhudviṣa: "Unless there is association, then they will never become purified."

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa: "No, that is not the problem, because everyone comes together for association. They come together in the temple for kīrtana, for lectures, for prasādam... These things are common activities. There's no question that we should not have common activities between all the āśramas. But for living there must be separate arrangement."

Prabhupāda: "Now, even in the temple, you are complaining that a husband and wife are talking."

Prabhupāda seemed almost coy in the way he gradually led and manipulated the issue. He was also hearing more clearly the minds and hearts of his divided disciples.

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa: "Yes, they are not talking Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam."

Prabhupāda: "That you will find everywhere."

Bhāgavata: "There's a complaint that sometimes is made that there's too much aversion on the part of the brahmacārīs. But isn't that a quality of a brahmacārī, that he should have a healthy contempt for sense gratification?"

Prabhupāda: "I do not follow."

The devotees crowded around as closely as possible. This was an important point.

Puṣṭa Kṛṣṇa: "He's saying that sometimes the brahmacārīs and even the sannyāsīs may have a strong aversion to association with women and householder life. But sometimes the grhasthas will criticize the sannyāsīs and brahmacārīs and say, 'This is fanaticism.' The grhasthas say that this is just as bad as the enjoying spirit, because a sannyāsī is meditating on the same thing, except that he's averse to it. So Bhāgavata dāsa's question is, 'Is it better to be neutral or to be averse?' "

Prabhupāda: “These are all fanaticism. Real unity is in advancing Kṛṣṇa consciousness. Kalau nāsty eva nāsty eva... In the Kali-yuga you cannot strictly follow, neither I can strictly follow. If I criticize you, if you criticize me, then we go far away from our real life of Kṛṣṇa consciousness.”

Puṣṭa Kṛṣṇa: “So is it correct to say that if we are not Kṛṣṇa conscious, then if it's not the gr̥hastha problem it would be some other problem?”

Prabhupāda: “Yes. We should always remember that either gr̥hastha or brahmacārī or sannyāsī, nobody can strictly follow all the rules and regulations. In the Kali-yuga it is not possible. If I simply find fault with you, and if you find fault with me, then it will be factional, and our real business will be hampered. Therefore Caitanya Mahāprabhu has recommended that hari-nāma, chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa mantra, should be very rigidly performed, which is common for everyone—gr̥hastha, vānapra stha, and sannyāsa. They should always chant Hare Kṛṣṇa mantra, then everything will be adjusted. Otherwise, it is impossible to advance. We shall be complicated with the details only. This is called niyamāgraha. I think I have explained it.”

Madhudvisa: “Yes, in The Nectar of Instruction.”

Prabhupāda: “Niyamāgraha is not good. Niyama means ‘regulative principles,’ and āgraha means ‘not to accept.’ Agraha means the opposite —too eager to accept the regulative principles, but no advancement spiritually. Both of them are called niyamāgraha. So the basic principle is that niyamāgraha is not recommended. If we advance in Kṛṣṇa consciousness by the simple method of chanting twenty-four hours—kīrtanīyaḥ sadā hariḥ—then things will be automatically adjusted.

“You cannot find in Kali-yuga that everything is being done very correctly to the point; that is very difficult. Just like our poet Allen Ginsberg, he was always accusing me, ‘Swamiji, you are very conservative and strict.’ Actually I told him, ‘I am never strict. Neither I am conservative. If I become conservative, then I cannot live here for a moment.’ So I am not at all conservative. I was living with one boy, Carl Yeargens. I was cooking, and I saw in the refrigerator some pieces of meat for his cat. So still I kept my food in that refrigerator. What can be done?”

They had been talking for over an hour, and Prabhupāda had given definitive instructions. But it was not over yet. It was clear, however, who was in control.

Later that morning, 350 devotees approached the precincts of Māyāpur in a caravan of buses from the Calcutta airport. For most of the arriving devotees, this would be their first visit to Māyāpur, and their excitement countered the fatigue of the long journey from the West. Free of worldly concerns, they had come to India to visit Śrīdhāma Māyāpur and to see Śrīla Prabhupāda again.

After three hours on the road, the buses had entered Māyāpur, and soon the devotees were seeing the Gaudiya Math temples, the Śrīvāsa Aṅgana, the samādhi of Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī, and the birthsite of Lord Caitanya Mahāprabhu, all appearing one after the other, as the buses, horns blaring almost incessantly, veered around the winding turns of Bhaktisiddhānta Road. Villagers on foot and in rickshas, buffalo, goats, and cows moved hurriedly aside. Local residents looked up with curiosity and surprise at the sight of hundreds of Western bhaktas arriving to celebrate Gaurā-pūrṇimā.

Then the arriving devotees saw, on the flat Māyāpur landscape, the pinkish hue and beautiful features of ISKCON's Māyāpur Chandrodaya Mandir, the place Śrīla Prabhupāda had prepared for them, the home of which they had heard so much. As the buses arrived at the gate to the ISKCON property, the devotees cheered to see the new domes and fields of flowers. And their eagerness to see Śrīla Prabhupāda increased. There would be formalities of registering and receiving a room, a few complications in locating and settling in, but nothing major. They were home now among fellow devotees. Soon they would be able to bathe in the Ganges and to hear the schedule for parikramas to the holy places.

Some devotees rested, while others met with friends from various places in the world. They shared the latest news and received experienced advice about the Ganges' swift current and about avoiding dysentery and mosquitoes. By early evening they had all moved into their rooms and taken prasādam. The śāhnāi musicians, in a small room above the entrance gate, began playing an evening rāga. The sky darkened, and devotees began gathering in the brightly-lit temple room for a gigantic kīrtana.

These devotees had been working very hard in various cities throughout the world, and coming to Māyāpur was like a reward for their austerities and patient service. Now they could relax and enjoy spiritual life, with no responsibilities other than to worship the Deities, to see and hear Śrīla Prabhupāda, to chant Hare Kṛṣṇa, and to simply be Kṛṣṇa conscious in the eternal abode of Lord Caitanya.

When Prabhupāda heard that now almost six hundred devotees were gathered in his Māyāpur place of worship, he was very pleased. He inquired whether the prasādam and accommodations were sufficient and whether there would be a full schedule of engagements for everyone. Otherwise, he said, if the devotees remained idle, they would get sick or would gossip. He said everyone should simply chant Hare Kṛṣṇa, go on parikrama and engage in kṛṣṇa-kathā.

Some of the new arrivals, especially temple presidents, were drawn into the schism regarding gr̥hasthas and sannyāsīs. Now that all the temple presidents were together, they called for a special meeting, rallying together in their discontent. They disliked the resolutions restricting the place of gr̥hasthas in ISKCON, and as they spoke and compared opinions, they found a particular focus for their grievances. Most of the objections were coming from the North American temple presidents and were aimed at the Rādhā-Dāmodara traveling saṅkīrtana party, led by Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami. The conflict had been building for at least a year, ever since Tamāla Kṛṣṇa had formed the Rādhā-Dāmodara party. Within that year, the party had grown to about 150 men traveling all over North America and distributing Śrīla Prabhupāda's books.

Prabhupāda had praised the party, which was responsible for thirty to forty percent of the total remittances to the American BBT. Men on the Rādhā-Dāmodara party lived with spiritually advanced sannyāsīs; they developed traits of austerity and detachment and had an enthusiasm for remaining celibate, without a need for marriage.

The Rādhā-Dāmodara party broke all records for book distribution and outdid all other zones and temples. An elite army of saṅkīrtana soldiers, they were the recognized world leaders of book distribution. More than eighty members of the party had arrived at the Māyāpur festival, and they were given a special reserved section in the best building for their residence.

But in their zealousness for renunciation and saṅkīrtana leadership, some of the Rādhā-Dāmodara brahmacārīs had developed a condescending attitude toward temple life and householders. This materialistic conception had reached the point where some men were judging the worth of a devotee on the basis of whether he wore white cloth (as a gr̥hastha) or saffron (as a sannyāsī or brahmacārī). Anyone in white could not be a spiritually advanced devotee. At least, this was the misconception that the temple presidents felt had developed among some of the more immature members of the Rādhā-Dāmodara party.

The greatest grievance, however, was more practical than philosophical. The presidents claimed that the Rādhā-Dāmodara party was stealing men from the temples. The temple presidents compared stories and cited numerous instances to prove that men had been lured from their services in the temples to join the Rādhā-Dāmodara party. The philosophy that sannyāsīs were superior to gr̥hasthas, the presidents said, was being used in an opportunistic way to convince men—the very best brahmacārīs—to give up their posts in Prabhupāda's temple and join the Rādhā-Dāmodara group. This often caused serious difficulties.

The temple presidents considered the preaching of the Rādhā-Dāmodara party to be unbalanced and selfishly motivated. So acute had the disagreement grown that some temples had forbidden the Rādhā-Dāmodara party to visit, and some had banned Rādhā-Dāmodara sannyāsīs from lecturing to the devotees. The Rādhā-Dāmodara men, however, saw these restrictions as further proof of the householders' small-mindedness and attachment.

Śrīla Prabhupāda bided his time on the volatile issue and went about his duties, receiving guests and supervising the management of the Māyāpur temple and the festival. He was lecturing daily in the temple and satisfying everyone. To his servants and secretaries, however, he revealed that the schism was causing him anxiety. That the temple presidents were angry disturbed him. One afternoon, he could not even take his nap because of worry.

"This is a very serious thing," he said to Hari-śauri during the massage "—this difference of sannyāsa and gr̥hastha. Everything will be spoiled."

Hari-śauri compared the present schism to the schism that had destroyed the Gaudiya Math.

Another time, when sitting in his room, Prabhupāda picked up a decorative bookmark a brahmacārīṇī had made for him. "Such nice service," he said. "How can it be refused? I have never stopped them serving simply because they are women."

Rāmeśvara came to Prabhupāda's room and showed him some of the recent BBT publications. They discussed their business, turning at last to the sannyāsī-gr̥hastha issue. As Rāmeśvara began to offer his opinion, Prabhupāda asked that other available sannyāsīs and G.B.C. men come in for the discussion.

Rāmeśvara was championing the temples' cause, relating some of the financial and practical problems the temples were experiencing due to losing men to the Rādhā-Dāmodara party. When men left, then book distribution declined in those temples. In the face of the heavy propaganda for joining the traveling bus parties, how could the loyal temple devotees remain satisfied collecting money mostly for maintaining the temples, without being able to afford to distribute books? The temple devotees also wanted to have the ecstasy of book distribution, but that was becoming increasingly difficult due to the crippling tactics of the traveling bus parties. Rāmeśvara asked Śrīla Prabhupāda to clarify the philosophical misconception that gr̥hasthas were not advanced enough to manage the brahmacārīs.

Prabhupāda mentioned the sannyāsī Choṭa Haridāsa, whom Lord Chaitanya had rejected for only slight association with a woman. Yet Lord Chaitanya had embraced a gr̥hastha, Śivānanda Sena, on learning that Śivānanda Sena's wife was pregnant. Prabhupāda said that although Lord Chaitanya's relationship with His sannyāsīs was different than His relationship with His gr̥hasthas both were transcendental. The gr̥hasthas were encouraged to perform family duties and raise Kṛṣṇa conscious children.

Addressing the sannyāsīs present, Prabhupāda said that for them to be dwelling so much on the activities of the householders was inappropriate. It meant that the sannyāsīs were thinking about sex more than the householders were. If the sannyāsīs were thinking all day long about married life, they would become contaminated.

Prabhupāda then told a story to illustrate his point. Once two brāhmaṇas were about to cross a river when a lady appeared, in need of assistance in crossing. So one of the brāhmaṇas offered to carry her on his back. The other brāhmaṇa was shocked, but refrained from saying anything. After crossing the river, the lady thanked them very much and went her way. The two brāhmaṇas continued walking, but for hours the other brāhmaṇa continued to talk about the incident. "You let that woman climb on your back and touch your body," he said, and he continued talking. Finally the other brāhmaṇa corrected him: "I carried her on my back for ten minutes, but you've been carrying her on your mind for three hours!"

The temple presidents selected Jayādvaita, a brahmacārī expert in the Kṛṣṇa consciousness philosophy, to present their case before Śrīla Prabhupāda. Some of the G.B.C. members holding the same views also went, and since much of the opposition was against the Rādhā-Dāmodara party, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami also came, to defend his party. The many members of the Rādhā-Dāmodara party, who had come to Māyāpur looking for spiritual bliss after a year of demanding saṅkīrtana service, were hearing themselves criticized and wanted to retaliate. The jubilant, spiritual atmosphere of the festival was threatened by a political rift.

Jayādvaita explained to Prabhupāda that the temple presidents felt the propaganda that gr̥hasthas were incompetent to lead brahmacārīs was actually just a device. The real issue was men and money. By telling the temple brahmacārīs not to work under gr̥hasthas, the Rādhā-Dāmodara sannyāsīs were able to lure the men from their authorized services in the temples.

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa agreed that if such false ideas were circulating, then they should be stopped, but he maintained that his party was not actually perpetrating such a philosophy.

@footnote = * “Regardless of social status, anyone who knows the science of Kṛṣṇa consciousness is qualified to become a spiritual master.” (Cc. Madhya 8.128)

Prabhupāda said that a brahmacārī generally assisted a sannyāsī, and a sannyāsī was a preacher. The gr̥hastha is also the appropriate man to take care of the temple. If a brahmacārī wanted to travel with a sannyāsī, therefore, that was all right. “But if he has a responsibility,” said Prabhupāda, “he must stay.” The real point, he said, was that the devotees should all think of themselves as servants of the six Gosvāmīs. The whole problem before them was caused by “forgetting we are servant of Kṛṣṇa.”

“It is not that a particular service is especially for a gr̥hastha or a sannyāsī,” Prabhupāda continued. “He must be kṛṣṇa-dāsa. A servant's service is judged by the results. Why this party and that party? Yei kṛṣṇa tattva-vettā, sei “guru' haya. Bhaktivinoda was a gr̥hastha. Bhaktisiddhānta was a sannyāsī. Is one better than the other? No. So there should not be threatening. We are now worldwide organization.”

Prabhupāda repeatedly quoted the verse kibā vipra, kibā nyāsī, śūdra kene naya/yei kṛṣṇa-tattva-vettā, sei “guru' haya, thus dispelling the contention that āśrama determines the quality of a devotee. Whoever knows the science of Kṛṣṇa, whoever is fully engaged in the service of Kṛṣṇa, Prabhupāda stressed, that person is a pure devotee.

A sannyāsī, Prabhupāda said, could preach, but he could also manage. A gr̥hastha could manage but could also preach. Although Prabhupāda had already brought up these points, now he was settling the issue completely. This discrimination, he said, must stop. It was not Kṛṣṇa conscious. And the G.B.C. should remove all resolutions discriminating against gr̥hasthas.

Prabhupāda emphasized that the real standard was to be kṛṣṇa-dāsa, the servant of Kṛṣṇa. In that surrendered mood, a devotee should be expert and willing to do whatever service was needed. He gave the example that some fifty years ago, when he had been the manager in Bose's laboratory in Calcutta, the workers had gone on strike. To the remaining workers he had said, “Come on, let's pack.” They had accepted the menial labor, and the strike had been ended. Similarly, whatever capacity of service was required, a devotee should do it. “We must be very stubborn servant of Kṛṣṇa,” Prabhupāda said.

Prabhupāda pointed out that he was probably the first bona fide sannyāsī to arrange for his disciples' marriages. Certainly he did not encourage disobeying the regulative principles, he said, but the real business was Kṛṣṇa's service. If that included arranging for marriages, then it should be done. “But generally the division is that the sannyāsī is fully engaged in preaching,” he said. “And the sannyāsīs' preaching should not be checked. Whoever is in charge of something, let him remain. If there is some discrepancy, try to correct it. In every rumor there is a grain of truth.”

Prabhupāda was not only defining and settling the immediate quarrels, but he was elevating all the devotees to the level of dedicated and inspired Kṛṣṇa consciousness. He was not siding with one party or watering down the philosophy to make peace. He was appealing to his disciples' intelligence. And more than that, he was entering their hearts and making them satisfied and truly desirous of working with one another.

When Śrīla Prabhupāda stopped speaking, he asked for a response. Jayādvaita said he thought the presidents would be completely satisfied with Prabhupāda's decisions. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa said that the G.B.C. would also be satisfied and that everyone, by Prabhupāda's grace, could now go forward with the right understanding.

The devotees then left Prabhupāda's room in a joyful mood, prepared to join the others and take part in an uplifting, nonpolitical Gaura-pūrṇimā festival.

The next morning Prabhupāda went for his walk on the roof of the Māyāpur building. As soon as he began circumambulating on the roof, at least two dozen devotees, mostly temple presidents and sannyāsīs, joined him.

The temple presidents felt victorious. Their positions were vindicated, and the misunderstandings of the philosophy had been straightened out. Now everything was proper. The whole affair had increased the devotees' faith in Prabhupāda and in the wisdom of following his order without false prestige.

As they walked, Pañcadraviḍa Swami, in a mood of humorous relief to the tension of the past days, began questioning Prabhupāda in an odd way.

"Śrīla Prabhupāda," he said, "there is one thing I don't understand. In the Caitanya-caritāmṛta, that story of Sākṣī-Gopāla—the Deity who came to witness for the young brāhmaṇa? So the young man was serving the old brāhmaṇa, and then the old brāhmaṇa promised the hand of his daughter in marriage, and then the Deity came to bear witness. So if he was such a pure devotee, why did he call the Deity to come such a great distance just so he could become married? Why didn't he want to remain single? And why did he make the Deity come just for his marriage?"

It was not only the words but the way Pañcadraviḍa said them, jesting in the role of an overly-critical sannyāsī. And Prabhupāda immediately entered the joking spirit: "We are not against marriage. We are against illicit sex. But because no woman would have you, now you are saying that no one should marry. Just see the psychology here."

The devotees began to laugh wildly.

"This is the sour grapes philosophy," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "Because no woman will have you, nobody wants you, therefore you are feeling this rejection and thinking that nobody should get married."

On the morning of Gaura-pūrṇimā, the appearance day of Lord Caitanya Mahāprabhu, Śrīla Prabhupāda lectured on a Bhāgavatam verse spoken by Prahlāda Mahārāja to Lord Nṛsimhadeva. The verse (Bhāg. 7.9.38) indirectly refers to Śrī Caitanya Mahāprabhu's appearance.

In this way, my Lord, You have appeared in different incarnations, as human beings, as animals, as a great saintly person, as demigods and as a fish and a tortoise. In this way you maintain the whole creation and different planetary systems and kill the demoniac principles in every age. My Lord, therefore, protect the principles of religion. In the age of Kali You do not assert Yourself as the Supreme Personality of Godhead. Therefore You are known as Tri-yuga, or the Lord who appears in three yugas.

Seated comfortably on his vyāsāsana, Śrīla Prabhupāda looked out over his reading spectacles at the long hall full of seated disciples. Two devotees fanned him with big cāmara whisks. The many glass chandeliers sparkled. At the opposite end of the hall stood the forms of Rādhā-Mādhava and Lord Caitanya.

“So here is a very specific statement about Śrī Caitanya Mahāprabhu,” said Prabhupāda. “He is avatāra. Caitanya Mahāprabhu is the same Supreme Personality of Godhead, but He is channa. Channa means covered, not directly. Because He has appeared as a devotee.”

Śrīla Prabhupāda explained why the Supreme Lord appeared in Kali-yuga as a devotee. “When Lord Kṛṣṇa appeared, He ordered everyone to ‘Surrender to Me.’ But they took it, ‘Who is this person asking like that? What right does he have? Why shall I give up?’ But God Himself, the Supreme Being, He must order. That is God. But we think otherwise: ‘Who is this man? Why is he ordering? Why shall I give up?’ ”

The whole process of Kṛṣṇa consciousness is submission, surrender to Kṛṣṇa, Śrīla Prabhupāda explained. But the way to surrender to Kṛṣṇa is to submit to His devotee, His representative.

“So Śrī Caitanya Mahāprabhu appeared this day for giving mercy to the fallen souls who are so foolish they cannot take to Kṛṣṇa consciousness. He is personally teaching them. That is this kīrtana.”

Later that morning Prabhupāda came down to the temple room again, this time to perform initiations. Fifteen devotees were receiving brahminical initiation, twenty-five were receiving first initiation, and seven men were receiving sannyāsa. Again Śrīla Prabhupāda quoted the verse that had become a theme for the festival: kibā vipra, kibā nyāsī, śūdra kene naya: “Either he is a gr̥hastha or a sannyāsī, it doesn't matter. He must become a guru. How? Yei kṛṣṇa-tattva-vettā. One who knows the principles of Kṛṣṇa consciousness, one who understands Kṛṣṇa, he can become a guru. Guru is the post given to the sannyāsīs and to the brāhmaṇas. Without becoming a brāhmaṇas nobody can become a sannyāsī, and the sannyāsī is supposed to be the guru of both all the āśramas and all the varṇas. So, for preaching work we require so many sannyāsīs. People are suffering all over the world for want of Kṛṣṇa consciousness.”

Śrīla Prabhupāda cautioned the young men to live as very strict sannyāsīs. He also stressed that all his disciples should be training to become qualified as gurus. He quoted, “Yāre dekha tāre kaha kṛṣṇa-upadeśa. Anywhere, either you are in this district or that district, it doesn't matter. Either you are at home or outside home, it doesn't matter. You become a guru—everyone. “How shall I become guru? I have no qualification.’ Caitanya Mahāprabhu said that you don't require any qualification. You simply require one qualification, that you repeat the instruction of Bhagavad-gītā, that's all. Yāre dekha tāre kaha kṛṣṇa-upadeśa. You become a guru. Don't adulterate kṛṣṇa-upadeśa like a rascal or nonsense. Present it as it is—Bhagavad-gītā. Then you can become a guru. You can become a guru in your family, you can become a guru in your society, your nation—wherever you are. And if it is possible, you go outside and preach this mission of Bhagavad-gītā. Therefore our movement's name is Kṛṣṇa consciousness. Whatever Kṛṣṇa says, you accept and preach. You become guru."

On Gaura-pūrṇimā day everyone fasted until moonrise, and most of the devotees walked down to the Ganges to bathe. Jayapatāka Swami told them that, according to śāstra, whoever bathed in the Ganges at Māyāpur during Gaura-pūrṇimā would become liberated from birth and death. In the early evening, pilgrims began arriving in great numbers. From all over West Bengal, people yearly visited the temples in Māyāpur, especially the birthsite of Lord Caitanya Mahāprabhu, and more recently ISKCON's Māyāpur Chandrodāya Mandir.

In Calcutta, people had seen the billboards advertising the ISKCON Gaura-pūrṇimā festival, and by word of mouth tens of thousands of villagers had heard about the longest building in West Bengal and the "golden" Deity of Rādhā-Mādhava. Devotees greeted the guests with prasādam and sold copies of Gītār gān, Śrīla Prabhupāda's Bengali versification of Bhagavad-gītā.

By nighttime long streams of people were flowing in and out of the front gates. The crowds raised a cloud of dust, and the air filled with sounds of ricksha bells, women singing, friends talking, and the amplified kīrtana emanating from the temple. Most of the visitors walked through the temple, visited the photo exhibit, and then stayed for a while, watching the kīrtana or the theater performance at the outdoor paṇḍāl stage. Although the number of visitors approached a hundred thousand, the scene remained peaceful, as people moved along without pushing or hurrying, observing the customary respect of visiting a holy place.

Dhruvanātha: The most ecstatic highlight of the festival was when, after greeting the Deities in the morning, Śrīla Prabhupāda would circumambulate the temple. There was a bell on either side of the Deity room, and as we circumambulated and Prabhupāda came to the bells, a devotee would hand him the rope. As the devotees chanted and danced ecstatically, Prabhupāda would pull the bell in time to the kīrtana, and at the same time he would raise his left hand to indicate that devotees should chant and dance more and more.

Ānakadundubhi: Śrīla Prabhupāda would sit on the veranda looking over all of Māyāpur. I saw him watching some boys herding their cows. He was absorbed in watching the whole place. Then someone gave him a little pair of binoculars, and he would look out across Māyāpur, with one finger up in the air. He looked like a general. He was looking across to Bhaktivinoda Ṭhākura's house, and then he spotted the birthplace of Lord Caitanya. He looked at it very closely, and then he said, "Almost no men. They have no men."

Satsvarūpa dāsa Goswami: One day Prabhupāda called in the G.B.C. members. It was in the afternoon, and we could see he was feeling very blissful. He was hearing the kīrtana in the temple. He said everyone should come to Māyāpur and chant twenty-four hours a day. He said, "There is so much room here. The morning class is so nice—Prahāda Mahārāja's instruction a million years ago. A five-year-old boy was speaking. The chanting, according to Bhaktivinoda Ṭhākura, is the only solace. It is nothing material, the chanting. Ajāmila called the name of Nārāyaṇa and was saved."

Prabhupāda said that batches of devotees should come to Māyāpur so that there should always be five hundred men present. Then a devotee said, "In America they are trying to chant more, twelve hours a day, trying to get a twenty-four-hour kīrtana schedule." "Yes, everywhere," Śrīla Prabhupāda said, "this chanting should go on. Instead of meetings, resolutions, dissolutions, revolutions, and then no solutions, there should be chanting."

Gopavṛndapāla: I had guard duty, and Prabhupāda would get up around twelve midnight or one o'clock. He would be upstairs, and I would be one floor below. He was chanting a lot, pacing back and forth on the balcony. I couldn't see him, but I could see his shaven head silhouetted. He was walking about ten steps one way and then ten steps the other way. I had a three-hour watch, and I sat there chanting my japa and watching Prabhupāda's head go back and forth. Sometimes I could hear when his chanting was louder. I was reminded of Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī, because Śrīla Prabhupāda described many times the balcony where Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī paced back and forth, envisioning and considering how to spread the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement. So Prabhupāda was also pacing and thinking how to spread Kṛṣṇa consciousness.

Ānakadundubhi: In Prabhupāda's room on the wall there was a beautiful sandalwood carving of Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa, just like on the Kṛṣṇa book cover, with Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa standing, Rādhārāṇī with Her arm around Kṛṣṇa, holding His flute, and Kṛṣṇa holding His cape around Her. When there weren't any guests for darśana, Prabhupāda would just sit and look at that picture. He loved it very much. When I would take his garland up to him, he would wear it during darśana for about an hour and a half, then after darśana he would get up and go to the bathroom after first taking the garland off. Then he would come back and give the garland to Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa. A number of times I gave him garlands made of very fragrant little white flowers that Jananivāsa would give me. Prabhupāda used to take that garland and put it on Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa in such a beautiful way. It was the perfection of Deity worship, the way he put that little garland there.

Jananivāsa: Just before Prabhupāda left, I came up and I asked him, "Frankincense, Śrīla Prabhupāda?" There was no one else in the room at the time, and he was just chanting japa sitting in his room. I started to fill up the room with smoke from the frankincense. Smoke was coming out everywhere, and Prabhupāda kept the windows closed. He looked up and said, "This creates such an atmosphere of spiritual understanding. This is so nice, so nice." Then he started chanting again.

Puṣṭa Kṛṣṇa: When Prabhupāda was finally finished conducting the Māyāpur festival, I asked him if he was tired. Prabhupāda said, "What tired? So many people are coming and hearing about Kṛṣṇa. When preaching, you feel refreshed."

CHAPTER FIFTY

The Lame Man and the Blind Man

Ever since the BBT Press marathon in the summer of 1975, the Press had continued to keep up with Śrīla Prabhupāda's writing. A sweet, transcendental competition had developed between Prabhupāda, his Press, and the book distributors. In November of 1975, Prabhupāda had written to one of the leading book distributors,

The BBT says that they are publishing at the speed of my translating and that you will distribute at the pace of publishing. That's nice. But still I am ahead in my translation work. They owe me now the sixth canto of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam. I am working already on the seventh canto.

In recent months, however, Śrīla Prabhupāda's literary output had been diminishing, mostly because of his involvement in management. His direct supervision of the construction in Bombay, his month-long managerial drive in Vṛndāvana, his struggle to heal a major ISKCON schism—such activities were not conducive to writing. In Māyāpur when the devotees had failed to control the slamming of doors, he had complained bitterly that this “heart-cracking” sound interrupted his meditative translating. He explained that he sometimes thought for two or three days about a single purport before actually writing it.

Actually, the word translating is incomplete in describing Śrīla Prabhupāda's writing. Translating involved only the verses and synonyms, but Prabhupāda's deepest meditations—what he referred to as his “personal ecstasies”—were his Bhaktivedanta purports. Composing the purports, as well as translating the verses, came best when he could think about them throughout the day, not just when he turned on his dictating machine at one A.M. He was translating the extremely grave and complex Vedic knowledge into a modern context, thus making it understandable to Western readers. And it was a great, demanding task.

To best speak to the people of the world through his Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam writings, Śrīla Prabhupāda required a very conducive situation. After the Māyāpur festival, therefore, he formulated an itinerary that, in about a month's time, would bring him to Hawaii. There he expected to find an atmosphere beneficial for his literary work. His traveling secretary, Puṣṭa Kṛṣṇa Swami, wrote ahead to Hawaii shortly after the Māyāpur festival.

Prabhupāda must do a lot of translating, so don't set up programs outside. And if there have to be guests, it must be restricted to 5 p.m. only, until about 6:30 each evening. If these things are nicely arranged, then Prabhupāda will stay some time to translate.

Since Prabhupāda's itinerary also included another U.S. tour, his secretary wrote ahead to Kīrtanānanda Swami in New Vrindaban.

Prabhupāda has revealed a bit more about things. He said that as time goes on he is less and less concerned about seeing visitors. He mentioned that Aurobindo saw visitors only once a year on his birthday. Although Prabhupāda deemed this is not possible now, I asked him where he would like to go for some time to translate. He said New Vrindaban, and he said he would go there after the Ratha-yatra in New York.

Hawaii

May 3, 1976

After brief visits in several Indian cities, as well as stops in Melbourne, Auckland, and Fiji, Śrīla Prabhupāda arrived in Hawaii on schedule. Immediately he began to increase his writing. The devotees were keenly noting the number of digits he ran up each night on his dictating machine, which for them was like a measure of the benediction for all humanity. Whereas in India he had done usually no more than a hundred digits a day, and sometimes none, in Hawaii his rate jumped to two hundred and even three hundred, day after day. Hari-śauri, who had accompanied Prabhupāda from Vṛndāvana as his servant, wrote in his diary, "Prabhupāda is translating like anything now, and he did 290 digits again last night."

The temple was in a quiet neighborhood, with several acres of gardenlike property. In the backyard stood a large, stately banyan tree, and in the front, the largest tulasī bushes anywhere in ISKCON. The devotees grew their own vegetables, and flowers, mangoes, and coconuts were so plentiful that they were available free. The weather was sunny, interspersed with occasional showers.

Prabhupāda felt ill and could not sleep more than one-and-a-half hours at night and one or two hours during the day. But being transcendental, he used this inability to sleep as another way to increase his writing time. Despite his emphasis on writing, however, he continued lecturing in the temple, going on morning walks, holding discussions on the beach, and daily answering his mail. Still, Hawaii was far from being like Vṛndāvana or Calcutta, where old friends and new admirers demanded hours of his time. Here he was mostly alone with his trained staff.

He had been in Honolulu about a week when he announced one morning, walking along Waikiki Beach, that he expected to finish that night the last purport to the Seventh Canto. When Hari-śauri expressed his happiness to hear this, Prabhupāda replied, "Oh, I can finish very quickly, but I have to present it for your understanding. It requires deep thought, very carefully, to present it for the common man."

That night around nine, Prabhupāda called for Hari-śauri and said that he would not take his evening massage; he wanted the time for finishing the Seventh Canto. Shutting the door and returning to his desk he worked all night until five in the morning. At the end of the Seventh Canto, he dictated a closing remark.

—Completed on the night of Vaiśākhī-śuklā Ekādaśī, the tenth of May, 1976, in the temple of the Pañcatattva, New Navadvīpa (Honolulu), by the mercy of śrī-kṛṣṇa-caitanya prabhu nityānanda śrī-advaita gadādhara śrī vāsādi-gaura-bhakta-vṛnda. Thus we may happily chant Hare Kṛṣṇa, Hare Kṛṣṇa, Kṛṣṇa Kṛṣṇa, Hare Hare/ Hare Rāma, Hare Rāma, Rāma Rāma, Hare Hare.

Immediately Prabhupāda turned to the Eighth Canto, beginning with a prayer: "First of all, let me offer my humble, respectful obeisances unto the lotus feet of my spiritual master, His Divine Grace Śrī Śrīmad Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī Goswami Prabhupāda." Prabhupāda explained that his spiritual master had instructed him at Rādhā-kuṇḍa in 1935 to stress book production more than temple construction. He had followed that instruction, beginning with his starting Back to Godhead magazine in 1944, and in 1958 he had begun Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam. As soon as he had published three volumes of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam in India, he had started for the U.S. in August 1965.

I am continuously trying to publish books, as suggested by my spiritual master. Now, in this year, 1976, I have completed the Seventh Canto of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, and a summary of the Tenth Canto has already been published as Kṛṣṇa, the Supreme Personality of Godhead. Still, the Eighth Canto, Ninth Canto, Tenth Canto, Eleventh Canto and Twelfth Canto are yet to be published. On this occasion, therefore, I am praying to my spiritual master to give me strength to finish this work. I am neither a great scholar nor a great devotee; I am simply a humble servant of my spiritual master, and to the best of my ability I am trying to please him by publishing these books, with the cooperation of my disciples in America. Fortunately, scholars all over the world are appreciating these publications. Let us cooperatively publish more and more volumes of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam just to please His Divine Grace Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī Ṭhākura.

Prabhupāda said he was making the Bhāgavatam understandable for the common man. This did not mean his writings were lacking in substance; they were pure substance. But in the essential spirit of the Bhāgavatam itself, Prabhupāda was omitting anything extraneous and distracting, selecting from the commentaries of the previous ācāryas whatever would best impel his readers to pure devotional service. At the beginning of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, the author, Śrīla Vyāsadeva, states that the Bhāgavatam excludes all materially motivated forms of religiosity and offers only pure devotional service. Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam is therefore called the ripened fruit of the tree of Vedic knowledge. And just as the Bhāgavatam is itself the most essential spiritual knowledge, so Śrīla Prabhupāda, in translating and commenting on the Bhāgavatam, utilized the same spirit of delivering the pure message, without any speculation or deviation.

According to Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, kṛṣṇas tu bhagavān svayam: Lord Śrī Kṛṣṇa is the Supreme Personality of Godhead, the source of all incarnations, the cause of all causes. And Prabhupāda revealed this conclusion on every page. Although some Sanskrit scholars disagreed with Prabhupāda's emphasis on Kṛṣṇa, his "Kṛṣṇa-izing" of the Sanskrit was not whimsical but followed strictly the ancient tradition of paramparā. Overwhelmingly, those university scholars who seriously read Prabhupāda's books appreciated the faithful quality of his paramparā Rendering. Reviews came from all over the world.

"...For those who have no access to the Sanskrit language, these books convey, in superb manner, the message of the Bhāgavatam." Dr. Alaka Hejib, Department of Sanskrit and Indian Studies, Harvard University.

"...It is a deeply felt, powerfully conceived, and beautifully explained work. I don't know whether to praise more this translation of the Bhagavad-gītā, its daring method of explanation, or the endless fertility of its ideas. I have never seen any other work on the Gītā with such an important voice and style... It will occupy a significant place in the intellectual and ethical life of modern man for a long time to come." Dr. Shaligram Shukla, Professor of Linguistics, Georgetown University.

"...For the first time we possess a readily accessible edition for this great religious classic that will provide opportunity for scholars in Indian literature and followers of the Kṛṣṇa consciousness tradition alike to compare the original text with a modern English translation and become acquainted with the deeper spiritual meaning of this work through the learned commentary of Śrī Bhaktivedanta.

“...Anyone who gives a close reading to the commentary will sense that here, as in his other works, Śrī Bhaktivedanta has combined a healthy mixture of the fervent devotion and aesthetic sensitivity of a devotee and the intellectual rigor of a textual scholar. At no point does the author allow the intended meaning of the text to be eclipsed by the promotion of a particular doctrinal persuasion.

“...These exquisitely wrought volumes will be a welcome addition to the libraries of all persons who are committed to the study of Indian spirituality and religious literature, whether their interests are sparked by the motivations of the scholar, the devotee, or the general reader.” Dr. J. Bruce Long, Department of Asian Studies, Cornell University.

“This English edition translated by A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami Prabhupāda is superb. It contains the original Sanskrit and Bengali verses with their English transliteration, synonyms, translations, and elaborate purports, easily bearing testimony to the author's profound knowledge of the subject.” Dr. O. B. L. Kapoor, Emeritus Chairman and Professor, Department of Philosophy, Government Postgraduate College, Gyanpur, India.

The Vedic literature mentions various spiritual paths and forms of yoga, and unless the commentator has realized the highest Vedic conclusion, he can easily miss the essential message of the Bhāgavatam. Indeed, impersonalist commentators have attempted to use the Bhāgavatam to support their speculations that the individual soul is in all respects one with the Supreme—even though this contradicts the purpose of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam. As a commentator on the Vedic literature, Śrīla Prabhupāda was distinguished, even among Vaiṣṇava scholars, because of his being in disciplic succession from Śrī Caitanya Mahāprabhu, who is glorified as patita-pāvana, the savior of the most fallen. As a follower and empowered representative of Lord Caitanya, Śrīla Prabhupāda was faithfully and perfectly carrying on the tradition of rescuing fallen souls, bringing them back to their original Kṛṣṇa consciousness.

Prabhupāda's making Bhāgavatam's message “available,” therefore, did not mean mere simplification. It meant urgently addressing the reader to give up the world of illusion and take to the eternal liberation of Kṛṣṇa consciousness. Prabhupāda was making available to the average reader spiritual truth that had been hidden and unavailable, even to austere practitioners of yoga and learned brāhmaṇas proficient in Sanskrit. “Old wine in new bottles,” Prabhupāda called it.

The Vaiṣṇava's arguments against impersonalism had been chalked out by Madhvācārya and Rāmāṇujācārya and later synthesized by Lord Caitanya into the philosophy of acintya-bhedābheda-tattva, “simultaneous oneness and difference.” These eternal truths had to be presented in every age, but in the traditional debates between the Vaiṣṇavas and the impersonalists, the authoritative basis had always been Vedic scripture.

Modern society, however, was so degraded that a preacher could no longer appeal to the authority of Vedic scripture—no one would accept it. Śrīla Prabhupāda's writings, therefore, dealt with such theories as the origin of life by chance, Darwinian evolution, and chemical evolution. And he defeated them all with strong logic, establishing that life comes from life, not from dead matter.

Prabhupāda had dedicated one of his first books, Easy Journey to Other Planets, to “the scientists of the world,” and had even adapted the Bhagavad-gītā verses quoted in that book into scientific jargon of “matter and antimatter.” Deftly he used both śāstra and logic to establish the Vedic conclusion.

Prabhupāda's writings also combatted the false teachings of bogus yogīs, gurus, and “incarnations,” who had appeared like a tidal wave of falsity in Kali-yuga, both in India and in the West. His writings criticized modern political institutions also, analyzing why monarchies fell, why democracy was also failing and how dictatorship would increasingly harass the citizens. The governments' policies of abusive taxation and their propaganda to bring people to the cities to work in the factories, abandoning simple, agrarian life, were all discussed in light of the scriptures.

In his travels, Śrīla Prabhupāda had observed the rampant degradation of human society: sexual liberation, the latest fads in intoxication, and the vicious crimes of animal slaughter and meat-eating. A Bhagavad-gītā purport dealt specifically with the threat of nuclear holocaust.

Such people are considered the enemies of the world because ultimately they will invent or create something which will bring destruction to all. Indirectly, this verse anticipates the invention of nuclear weapons, of which the world is today very proud. At any moment war may take place, and these atomic weapons may create havoc. Such things are created solely for the destruction of the world and this is indicated here. Due to godlessness, such weapons are invented in human society; they are not meant for the peace and prosperity of the world.

Prabhupāda's criticisms were strong and authoritative, befitting a true ācārya; his uncompromising spirit was appealing. He was not a timid scholar pointing out some obscure historical references. Yet underlying his writing, a humble tone of request spoke to the heart. As the servant of the servant of Kṛṣṇa, he asked everyone to please take up Kṛṣṇa consciousness and be restored to his original, constitutional position of eternity, bliss, and knowledge.

Prabhupāda was making his books practical. But to do so required care and deep meditation. He combined the thoughtfulness of a textual scholar with the practical applications of a transcendental social and political reformer. So many scholars had already presented their English editions of Bhagavad-gītā, yet not a single reader had become a devotee of Kṛṣṇa. Prabhupāda's Bhagavad-gītā As It Is, however, was creating thousands of devotees.

More than simply rendering valuable Vedic literatures, Śrīla Prabhupāda had come to the West, starting in New York City, to establish a way of life based on that Vedic literature. Consequently, he had gained firsthand experience in bringing the most materialistic persons to the standard of renunciation and devotional service. His books, therefore, reflected these practical realizations, and many times in his purports he would relate his difficulties and triumphs in trying to introduce spiritual principles within materialistic society.

In the Sixth Canto of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam he had presented the story of Dakṣa's cursing Nārada Muni, after Nārada had instructed Dakṣa's sons in pure Kṛṣṇa consciousness. The jealous father, considering Nārada his enemy, had cursed him to be always traveling, without any home. In his commentary, Śrīla Prabhupāda had written that he also had been cursed by the parents of his disciples; therefore, despite his having many centers around the world, he had to constantly travel and preach.

And in the Seventh Canto, while commenting on the demon Hiranyakaśipu's harassment of his son Prahlaḍa, Śrīla Prabhupāda had related the difficulties of the ISKCON devotees in distributing books amid the harassment of Hiranyakaśipu's modern counterparts.

Thus Prabhupāda was imbuing his literature with the thoughtfulness of his own personality, that of a pure devotee faithfully dedicating his body, mind, and words in service to the Bhāgavatam. As the word bhāgavata refers not only to narrations about the Supreme Lord but also to the Lord's devotee, Śrīla Prabhupāda was himself bhāgavata. And through his books one could gain the inspiration of service to both the book and the person bhāgavata.

After two weeks in Hawaii, Śrīla Prabhupāda was well into the Eighth Canto, averaging up to three hundred digits daily. His health improved also, although his sleeping remained minimal. "Of course," Prabhupāda said reflectively, "it is very good from the spiritual point of view if you don't sleep much."

When news came of a temple president having difficulty with his G.B.C. authority, Śrīla Prabhupāda saw it as another example of how his writing work—his most important preaching—could be hampered by disruptions. He therefore composed a letter addressed to all the Governing Body Commissioners.

My dear G.B.C. disciples,

Please accept my blessings. Over the past ten years I have given the framework, and now we have become more than the British Empire. Even the British Empire was not as expansive as we. They had only a portion of the world, and we have not completed expanding. We must expand more and more unlimitedly. But I must now remind you that I have to complete the translation of the Śrīmad Bhāgavatam. This is the greatest contribution; our books have given us a respectable position. People have no faith in this church or temple worship. Those days are gone. Of course, we have to maintain the temples as it is necessary to keep our spirits high. Simply intellectualism will not do; there must be practical purification.

So I request you to relieve me of management responsibilities more and more so that I can complete the Śrīmad Bhāgavatam translation. If I am always having to manage, then I cannot do my work on the books. It is document. I have to choose each word very soberly and if I have to think of management then I cannot do this. I cannot be like these rascals who present something mental concoction to cheat the public. So this task will not be finished without the cooperation of my appointed assistants, the G.B.C., temple presidents, and sannyasis. I have chosen my best men to be G.B.C. and I do not want that the G.B.C. should be disrespectful to the temple presidents. You can naturally consult me, but if the basic principle is weak, how will things go on? So please assist me in the management so that I can be free to finish the Śrīmad Bhāgavatam, which will be our lasting contribution to the world.

While maintaining his excellent progress on Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, Prabhupāda also got the opportunity in Hawaii to begin another book. His long-time disciple and editor Hayagrīva wrote, asking to assist Śrīla Prabhupāda in a series of interview-commentaries on the Western philosophers. This was the same project Prabhupāda had begun with his former secretary, Śyāmasundara, but when Śyāmasundara had abandoned his duties in ISKCON, he had also misplaced the tapes and transcripts of the considerable work they had done together.

Hayagrīva proposed to start again, beginning with Socrates and Plato. The process would be that Hayagrīva would present before Prabhupāda a summary of a particular Western thinker's philosophy. Prabhupāda would then respond extemporaneously, giving appreciation and criticism of the philosopher according to the Vedic viewpoint.

Prabhupāda and his disciples had been enthusiastic about the interviews done in former years, and Prabhupāda had even titled the series—"Dialectical Spiritualism." But when Śyāmasundara had misplaced the tapes, the project had dissipated. Now Hayagrīva, the former college English professor and original editor for Back to Godhead in America, asked to be allowed to come to Hawaii for reviving the philosophy book and for spending time with Prabhupāda.

Like various other disciples, Hayagrīva had given up strictly following the regulative principles. Śrīla Prabhupāda had come to tolerate the reality that some disciples, even after taking vows of initiation, would be unable to resist the strong pull of the senses and would give up the path of active devotional service in ISKCON. In the early years, he and his followers had reacted with great shock whenever a devotee had gone away; but with time, as the unfortunate event had continued to occur, sometimes even striking down leading, trusted disciples, Prabhupāda had grown to live with it. But he never stopped feeling bereaved over a lost son or daughter, especially if that disciple had rendered him significant service. And he never withheld his affection from them or his open, loving invitation for them to return.

Such a case was Hayagrīva, a dear son who had come to Śrīla Prabhupāda during the summer of 1966 in New York. He had given valuable service, but had eventually been unable to follow the simple but strict principles of Kṛṣṇa consciousness. Now, after suffering the vicissitudes of material life, he had gathered his resolve to come back to his beloved spiritual master.

Hayagrīva entered Prabhupāda's room. "It's your old Hayagrīva, Prabhupāda," he said, and he fell to the floor, sobbing.

Prabhupāda gave him a garland and asked him how he and his family were doing. Then in the presence of the other devotees, Prabhupāda related how Hayagrīva had been sent by Kṛṣṇa to help him spread the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement all over the world.

When Hayagrīva said he had never forgotten Prabhupāda, even for a day, Prabhupāda replied, "And I also never forgot you. I was thinking, 'Has Hayagrīva gone away?' I was thinking like that." Prabhupāda's voice broke, his eyes filled with tears, and he could not speak. Finally he asked everyone to leave the room.

Prabhupāda and Hayagrīva began meeting daily, sometimes for as long as two or three hours. Dialectical Spiritualism was again underway, moving side by side with the Eighth Canto of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, and Hayagrīva was again in his original position, at Śrīla Prabhupāda's lotus feet.

Although Prabhupāda had written to the G.B.C. requesting them to solve ISKCON's problems, he continued to keep informed of the problems as his assistants reluctantly reported to him the bad news. One day a telegram arrived from Madhudviṣa Swami, a dynamic G.B.C. man in charge of ISKCON in one region of the U.S. Madhudviṣa was having serious difficulty remaining strong in Kṛṣṇa consciousness. In most cases, the difficulties of Prabhupāda's disciples were urges toward sensuality. Almost never did disciples turn against Prabhupāda, nor did they often reject the philosophical conclusions of Kṛṣṇa consciousness. They simply fell victim to māyā's allurements.

Madhudviṣa's telegram was a resignation from the G.B.C. Although he wanted to continue in devotional service, he felt forced to resign due to spiritual weakness. The telegram gave no details, but Prabhupāda heard rumors that Madhudviṣa had had an affair and had left the temple. Prabhupāda said that this was his Godbrothers' main argument against Westerners' taking sannyāsa: they would not be able to maintain the strict vows. He said that a German Godbrother of his had also caused disruption by his intimate dealings with women.

"What can I do?" Prabhupāda said sadly. "I am working with all third-class men—fools and rascals. Things are going on simply by Kṛṣṇa's mercy." Prabhupāda sent a telegram back, asking Madhudviṣa to come and speak with him. Although he restrained his emotions, the devotees could see that he was distracted. It was another case of a strong affectionate bond for a son who had rendered wonderful service, a disciple whom he had patiently trained over the years. Again the possibility of Prabhupāda's retiring from active management looked doubtful.

Śrīla Prabhupāda said he was trying to engage fools, rascals—anyone—to spread Kṛṣṇa consciousness. He was unable to find strict followers, but what could be done? If someone fell from sannyāsa, he said, then that person could become a gr̥hastha. But no one should go away. Hari-śauri mentioned the Caitanya-caritāmṛta story of Lord Caitanya and Choṭa Haridāsa. From that story, said Hari-śauri, it appeared to be very difficult for a fallen sannyāsī to regain the mercy of Lord Caitanya.

"One who falls from sannyāsa," Prabhupāda replied, "is called vantāśī, one who vomits and then eats it."

"So if they become gr̥hasthas again, then how can they get Lord Caitanya's mercy?" asked Hari-śauri.

"If the spiritual master gives that facility and makes that arrangement," said Prabhupāda, "then Kṛṣṇa will accept the arrangement. And later he can again become sannyāsa." It had happened before, and Prabhupāda mentioned a few cases where he had asked fallen sannyāsīs to get married and stay in their service. "Of course, it is a shameful position," he said, "but what can be done? My Godbrothers and sannyāsīs in India criticize me for giving brāhmaṇa and sannyāsa initiation and installing Deities in the West and allowing women to stay in the temples. But for all that, I am expanding Kṛṣṇa consciousness. And for all their strictness, they are doing nothing. If I discriminate, then I will again be one alone, as I was in Vṛndāvana, and “again become a mouse.”

“It seems,” said Hari-śauri, “that it will take several generations before we can become purified.”

“If one is sincere,” Prabhupāda replied, “he can become purified even within one generation.”

That same evening, as Prabhupāda prepared to stay up all night translating, he was still thinking of Madhudviṣa. Nevertheless, he turned to translating the texts in the chapter called “The Elephant Gajendra's Crisis.” The chapter told about the king of elephants, Gajendra, who lived on the heavenly planets. One day Gajendra was bathing in the river along with his wives, when suddenly a crocodile attacked. The crocodile fastened his jaws on Gajendra's leg, and although the elephant was very powerful, he could not release himself from the strong grip of the crocodile while in the water.

“Thereafter,” Śrīla Prabhupāda dictated, “because of being pulled into the water and fighting for many long years, the elephant became diminished in his mental, physical, and sensual strength. The crocodile, on the contrary, being an animal of the water, increased in enthusiasm, physical strength, and sensual power.”

“I can do it very quickly,” Prabhupāda had said, “but I have to meditate, how to prepare it for the common man.” How could he convey the significance of this event, which happened millions of years ago between two animals on a heavenly planet? How to make it clear and understandable, and capture the essence of the significant Sanskrit words and the paramparā comments of ācāryas like Viśvanātha Cakravartī, Sanātana Gosvāmī, and Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī? In the quiet solitude of his room, Śrīla Prabhupāda began speaking his purport.

“In the fighting between the elephant and the crocodile, the difference was that although the elephant was extremely powerful, he was in a foreign place, in the water. During one thousand years of fighting, he could not get any food, and under the circumstances his bodily strength diminished, and because his bodily strength diminished, his mind also became weak and his senses less powerful. The crocodile, however, being an animal of the water, had no difficulties. He was getting food and was therefore getting mental strength and sensual encouragement. Thus while the elephant became reduced in strength, the crocodile became more and more powerful.

“Now, from this we may take the lesson that in our fight with māyā we should not be in a position in which our strength, enthusiasm and senses will be unable to fight vigorously. Our Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement has actually declared war against the illusory energy, in which all the living entities are rotting in a false understanding of civilization. The soldiers in this Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement must always possess physical strength, enthusiasm and sensual power. To keep themselves fit, they must therefore place themselves in a normal condition of life.

“What constitutes a normal condition will not be the same for everyone,” Prabhupāda continued, “and therefore there are divisions of varṇāśrama—brāhmaṇa, kṣatriya, vaiśya, śūdra, brahmacarya, gr̥hastha, vānaprastha, and sannyāsa. Especially in this age, Kali-yuga, it is advised that no one take sannyāsa....

“From this we can understand that in this age the sannyāsa-āśrama is forbidden because people are not strong. Śrī Caitanya Mahāprabhu showed us an example in taking sannyāsa at the age of twenty-four years, but even Sārvabhauma Bhaṭṭācārya advised Śrī Caitanya Mahāprabhu to be extremely careful because He had taken sannyāsa at an early age. For preaching we give young boys sannyāsa, but actually it is being experienced that they are not fit for sannyāsa.

“There is no harm, however, if one thinks that he is unfit for sannyāsa; if he is very much agitated sexually, he should go to the āśrama where sex is allowed, namely the gr̥hastha-āśrama. That one has been found to be very weak in one place does not mean that he should stop fighting the crocodile of māyā. One should take shelter of the lotus feet of Kṛṣṇa, as we shall see Gajendra do, and at the same time one can be a gr̥hastha if he is satisfied with sexual indulgence.

“There is no need to give up the fight. Śrī Caitanya Mahāprabhu therefore recommended, sthāne sthitāḥ śruti-gatām tanu-vān-manobhiḥ. One may stay in whichever āśrama is suitable for him; it is not essential that one take sannyāsa. If one is sexually agitated, he can enter the gr̥hastha-āśrama. But one must continue fighting. For one who is not in a transcendental position, to take sannyāsa artificially is not a very great credit. If sannyāsa is not suitable, one may enter the gr̥hastha-āśrama and fight māyā with great strength. But one should not give up the fighting and go away.”

From out of his direct confrontation with the forces of illusion, Śrīla Prabhupāda presented his realizations. He had taken the case of Madhudviṣa, refined it of its temporal aspects, and immortalized it into an instruction for persons everywhere.

Prabhupāda's job was to strengthen his disciples so they would not fall. Even if they took to the gr̥hastha-āśrama, the crocodile of sense gratification was still very strong. And illicit sex was the “permanent disease” of the Western people. They were raised on it and addicted to it, and their society promoted it. To change this mentality would be very difficult. Therefore, in addition to writing, Prabhupāda would have to continue traveling and preaching to sustain his disciples and make them strong preachers.

As Prabhupāda had originally left his writing at the Rādhā-Dāmodara temple in Vṛndāvana to preach in the West, so he could leave his writing retreat in Hawaii for preaching. In any case, he was prepared to continue writing wherever he went. All along he had planned to stay in Hawaii only for a month, not permanently. His disciples needed to see him for strength and inspiration, and as long as he had life and breath, this was his purpose.

Prabhupāda wanted to first visit his Los Angeles center, now a large, thriving community of devotees. He would see their new temple room, with its marble arches and gallery of gorgeous transcendental paintings, and observe the opulent worship of the Deities Rukmiṇī-Dvārakādhīśa. He would see the latest technological applications of Kṛṣṇa consciousness at Golden Avatara recording studios and at the FATE museum, which utilized multimedia dioramas to depict the teachings of the Bhagavad-gītā. He would sit in his garden and hear Kṛṣṇa book and walk on Venice Beach discussing scientific theories with Dr. Svarūpa Dāmodara. And, of course, he would increase the already swelling waves of book distribution. One day in the car he had said, "My books will be the lawbooks for human society for the next ten thousand years."

Then in Detroit he would stay for a few days in the mansion he had purchased over a year ago, to see how the devotees were taking care of the fabulous gift Kṛṣṇa had given them and to advise them on how to use it as a showpiece of Kṛṣṇa consciousness. For himself, Prabhupāda was not interested in living in a mansion, and constant traveling proved difficult regardless of where he stayed. The mansions, the opulence, the American money and expertise were all for Kṛṣṇa's pleasure.

From Detroit Prabhupāda would go to Toronto, where a year ago he had encouraged the devotees and the Indian community to purchase a big church in the city. Now in recent months they had actually purchased it, and they were awaiting Prabhupāda's arrival.

He would also travel to New Vrindaban, where for two years the devotees had been anxiously awaiting his return. They wanted him to sit on the grand new vyāsāsana they had carved for him, to behold the Deities of Rādhā-Vṛndāvanacandra, and to grace the palace they were building for him. And they wanted to see him again with his dear disciple Kīrtanānanda Swami. He would drink the milk of the New Vrindaban cows and teach about varṇāśrama-dharma. He would praise the simple life and blast away at the follies of urbanized, industrialized civilization.

For the fourth of July, 1976, the bicentennial anniversary of the United States' independence, Śrīla Prabhupāda would be at the ISKCON temple in Washington, D.C., where he would hold kīrtana at the monuments before millions of people; and on July 6 in Washington he would observe the tenth anniversary of the formation of ISKCON.

Then he would go to New York for that city's first full-scale Ratha-yātrā. He would stay in the newly acquired ISKCON "skyscraper," the twelve-story building in mid-town Manhattan.

Śrīla Prabhupāda had sometimes said his greatest fear was that his disciples would fight with one another, causing serious splits in his movement. Therefore he traveled, using his great influence to unite all elements. He had seen how even those to whom he had given great responsibility could again become victims of sense gratification. But he had also seen how his being with his disciples strengthened them.

He was declaring humanity's dependence on God, Kṛṣṇa, the Supreme Personality of Godhead, and making a forceful revolution against the prevailing decadence of the day. Although America, in her two-hundredth anniversary, was abandoning her God consciousness, Śrīla Prabhupāda's ISKCON was fresh and vital, instilling pure God consciousness in America and everywhere. The cover of the latest issue of Back to Godhead, which Prabhupāda liked, depicted a devotee singing Hare Kṛṣṇa in front of a red, white, and blue bicentennial exhibit. The cover caption read, "Declaring Our Dependence on God."

Prabhupāda had complete confidence in the eventual victory of Lord Caitanya's saṅkīrtana movement. Although now eighty years old, he was the leader, the strongest devotee. Wherever he traveled he brought life and strength, and so he continued.

New York City

July 9, 1976

Jayānanda was driving the car. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami and Rāmeśvara Swami were also there. They had picked up Śrīla Prabhupāda and Hari-śauri at La Guardia Airport, and as they proceeded toward Manhattan, Prabhupāda asked, "Things are going on here nicely?"

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa replied that everything had really just begun. "You will see that all of the work is just in progress," he said.

"Yes," said Śrīla Prabhupāda, "manage nicely. Kṛṣṇa is giving us everything. There is no scarcity. If we simply sincerely work, Kṛṣṇa will give us intelligence—everything. By His mercy everything is available. That is Kṛṣṇa. He can give you anything."

As their car approached the colossal Brooklyn Bridge, Śrīla Prabhupāda inquired, "That is Brooklyn Bridge, I think? Sometimes I was coming here and sitting down near the bridge."

"Near the water?" asked Tamāla Kṛṣṇa. They were fascinated to hear of Śrīla Prabhupāda's early activities alone in New York. "You were sitting near the water?"

"Yes, that river," said Prabhupāda. "Because I was on that Bowery Street. It is not very far away. So I was coming, walking there, and sitting under that bridge and thinking, 'When I shall return to India?'" He laughed. He asked about other places, almost like inquiring about old friends—the Fulton Street subway station and Chambers Street.

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa told Prabhupāda that the ISKCON center was not far from the Empire State Building and that he would be able to get a nice view of it from his room on the eleventh floor. "Our building," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, "is right in the midst of the theater, restaurant, and entertainment section of the city."

"In New York," said Prabhupāda, "I feel a little at home, because first I came here. I was loitering on the street here and there. From 1965 September to July 1967, continually I stayed in New York."

"Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Mahārāja gave a class this morning," said Rāmeśvara Swami. "He was explaining that we cannot understand the good fortune of this city, that you have come here."

"Yes, when I decided that I shall go to a foreign country," said Prabhupāda, "I never thought of going to London; I thought of coming here. Generally they go to London, but I thought, 'No, I shall go to New York.' "

"Very progressive," Tamāla Kṛṣṇa commented.

"I do not know," Prabhupāda laughed. "It is Kṛṣṇa's dictation. I could have gone. London was nearer. But I thought, 'No, I shall go to New York.' Sometimes I was even dreaming that I had gone to New York."

As they passed through various neighborhoods, Śrīla Prabhupāda recalled the old days. He mentioned Dr. Misra's yoga studio and his room at 100 Seventy-second Street, where his tape recorder and typewriter had been stolen; the West End Superette, where he would buy fruit.

"Sometimes I think I was coming to this part," said Prabhupāda, looking out the window, "—aimlessly. Yes, sometimes walking on Second Avenue."

Acknowledging his senior disciple who was steadily and silently driving the car, Prabhupāda said, "Our Jayānanda was driving a taxi and chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa, and one day he brought me five thousand dollars. It was given for the publishing of Bhagavad-gītā, but I think Macmillan took it."

"Then you put him in charge to sell all the Teachings of Lord Chaitanya," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa. "I remember."

"Didn't sell too many books, though," said Jayānanda. Prabhupāda laughed, while Jayānanda remained silent, intent on the task of driving through the city.

"I thought he was the best, most appropriate person to drive you," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa.

"He was chanting and driving," said Prabhupāda. "Very good boy." As they weaved through Manhattan traffic, a taxi driver shouted at them.

"What does he say?" asked Prabhupāda.

"He said you have a nice car," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa. "That's good—they like the car."

Prabhupāda laughed. "Ask him, 'Why don't you come here? Why are you driving a taxi? Come join us.' "

"This car is the Ford company's version of a Cadillac," said Rāmeśvara. "They cannot understand, because we say we are not after material opulence for ourselves. They cannot understand why we drive in these cars."

"They think that we unnecessarily criticize," said Prabhupāda. "But we require everything. Just like a man—when he is alive, his decoration, his nice dress, everything is good. But if he is dead, then it is useless. Similarly, without spiritual consciousness we are dead, because the body is dead. Only because the spirit soul is there, therefore it is moving. The important point is the spirit soul. So if you are simply taking care of the body nicely, that means you are decorating the dead body. What is the value of it? Is it clear?"

"The body is important because the soul is there. So long the life is there, if you decorate the body everyone will appreciate. But if you decorate the dead body, everyone will say, 'What a fool he is!'"

Similarly, without spiritual knowledge, this dead civilization simply on the bodily concept of life, it is ludicrous. That we have to condemn. Take Kṛṣṇa consciousness, then everything has value. Just like one—if there is zero, then it becomes ten. Add another zero and it becomes a hundred. But without that one, it is simply zero. It is only useless."

"That 'one' is Kṛṣṇa," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa.

"And Kṛṣṇa's representative," added Rāmeśvara.

As they drove down Fifty-fifth Street, the devotees pointed out to Prabhupāda the ISKCON building, with the words Hare Krishna written in gold letters down the side. A large yellow banner showing a devotee of Lord Caitanya performing saṅkīrtana flew from the front of the building, and a stylish awning, emblazoned "Hare Krishna Center," extended onto the sidewalk. At the sight of Prabhupāda's car, hundreds of devotees at the entrance began to cheer and chant his name.

It was the largest gathering of ISKCON devotees since the Māyāpur festival. Many had come from distant places to be with Śrīla Prabhupāda, and more than six hundred devotees were staying in the building. The kīrtana was tumultuous. Standing before the Deities of Rādhā-Govinda, Prabhupāda appeared pleased. A picture of Lord Jagannātha, Balarāma, and Subhadra was on the third altar, and Prabhupāda said he was anxious to see them on Ratha-yātrā day.

As Prabhupāda sat on the large green vyāsāsana, he was at first too moved with emotion to speak. "First of all I must thank you all for bringing me in the new temple," he began. "Because when I first came, my ambition was to start a temple here in New York, and I was seeking the opportunity." He described some of his first, almost helpless, attempts to buy a twenty-five-by-one-hundred-foot space in Manhattan; but he had been unable to get any money.

"I had no place," he said. "What to speak of a temple, I had no residential place even. So in that condition I was thinking of returning to India. Practically every week I was going to the shipping company. So it is a long history, that I came here with determination to start a temple in New York first. But at that time, ten years before, in 1965, it was not possible. But by the grace of Kṛṣṇa and by the grace of my Guru Mahārāja, you have got this place. So I must thank you very much for organizing this temple.

Later in his lecture Prabhupāda stressed how guru and Kṛṣṇa were saving the conditioned souls from eternal suffering in the material world. "Don't lose this opportunity," he said. "Don't be foolish, misled by so-called scientists, philosophers, or politicians. Take to Kṛṣṇa consciousness. And that is possible only by guru-kṛṣṇa-kṛpaya. By the mercy of guru and by the mercy of Kṛṣṇa you can achieve all success. This is the secret.

yasya deve parā bhaktir

yathā deve tathā gurau

tasyaite kathitā hy arthāḥ

prakāśante mahātmanaḥ*

So this guru-pūjā we are doing, it is not self-aggrandizement. It is real teaching. You sing daily, guru-mukha-vākya cittete kariyā aikya.* I tell you frankly, whatever little success is there in this Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement, I simply believed what was spoken by my Guru Mahārāja. You also continue that. Then every success will come. Thank you very much."

Śrīla Prabhupāda then toured the entire twelve-story building. He spoke little but approved of almost everything he saw. His disciples seemed to be managing things properly on his behalf. His quarters were well appointed, with separate rooms for sitting and resting.

"So I shall again stay in New York?" he asked as he sat at his desk.

Ādi-keśava Swami, the temple president, said, "This is your triumphant return, Śrīla Prabhupāda."

"Yes," Prabhupāda replied, "that is my sentiment."

Devotees were eager to point out the features of the rooms, the view from the window, and the relative quiet.

"It's very peaceful for translating work," said Rāmeśvara Swami.

"Oh, yes," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "When my Guru Mahārāja left, I was alone. So he has sent so many gurus to take care of me. You are my Guru Mahārāja's representatives."

"We are guru-dāsa," a devotee said.

"So you are taking care," said Prabhupāda, "and I am very much obliged to you. I sometimes think of my childhood. I was very, very pet son of my father. I had admitted that in the book. My father was not very rich man, but still, whatever I wanted he would give me. He never chastised me, but full love. Then of course I got friends, and I was married. So by Kṛṣṇa's grace everyone loved me. And I came to this foreign country without any acquaintance. So Kṛṣṇa sent me many fathers to love me. In that way I am fortunate. At the last stage, if I live peacefully, that is the great mercy of Kṛṣṇa. By Kṛṣṇa's mercy everything is possible. So we shall stick to Kṛṣṇa's lotus feet. Then everything is possible."

During Prabhupāda's ten-day stay in New York, the devotees remained in a triumphant, euphoric mood. For the Ratha-yātrā the devotees had permission from the City to have the parade down Fifth Avenue. Prabhupāda had said that New York was the most important city in the world and that a skyscraper would be a beacon of Kṛṣṇa consciousness for the world. So now ISKCON had its skyscraper in Manhattan, its Ratha-yātrā parade down Fifth Avenue, and Prabhupāda's personal presence.

One morning Prabhupāda went to where the carts were being built, and Jayānanda and his men showed him the improved construction of the giant wheels. Jayānanda, who was terminally ill with leukemia, was absorbing himself in the service that had made him dear to Prabhupāda and to all the devotees: organizing Ratha-yātrā and overseeing the construction of the carts.

Prabhupāda would ride to Central Park to take his morning walks. Passing through familiar neighborhoods, he recalled the old days of 1965 and 1966. One morning Kīrtanānanda Swami rode with him in the car.

"My best memories are those early days," said Kīrtanānanda. "Especially the morning classes, Śrīla Prabhupāda, when you'd be sitting behind the desk. The sun would just be coming in, and you would talk for an hour."

"Yes," said Prabhupāda, "only Hayagrīva and you and..." Prabhupāda and Kīrtanānanda recalled some of the other early devotees: Umāpati, Carl Yeagers, Jim Greene, Rāya Rāma, Satsvarūpa, Brahmānanda.

"At that time," said Prabhupāda, "Kīrtanānanda Mahārāja was taking one capātī."

"Nothing else?" asked Tamāla Kṛṣṇa.

"I would offer," said Prabhupāda, "but he would take one or two, that's all. Later on, one dozen. And that boy Stryadhīśa, he would take at least twenty capātīs. I would say, 'Stryadhīśa, can I offer you?' He would say, 'Yes.' I gave four. Again finished. Again four."

"Originally," said Kīrtanānanda, "we all ate from Prabhupāda's plate. There was one plate of prasādam. And Prabhupāda would just give a little for everybody, and everybody would be satisfied."

"I used to keep some prasādam," said Prabhupāda. "Anyone would come, I would give."

"After class," recalled Kīrtanānanda, "you always distributed some prasādam. After kīrtana and class."

"Yes," said Prabhupāda. "I was clapping my hands. In the meeting, I used to collect not less than six dollars, not more than twenty dollars. Three times a week."

Although Śrīla Prabhupāda's triumph was that the early days of struggle were over, when he recalled them, he was immersed in a very special, sweet remembrance. He changed from one mood to another, and sometimes mixed them—the days of his helpless, utter dependence on Kṛṣṇa when no one else was present, and his present satisfaction, surrounded by hundreds of faithful disciples. While remembering the old days, he was now realizing his original goals for ISKCON New York, "the beacon-light for our worldwide propaganda."

In the late afternoon as the sun was setting, Śrīla Prabhupāda liked to sit on the roof of his skyscraper, and his disciples would sit with him. Although the building was in Midtown, being situated on the West Side afforded it a feeling of distance from the intensity of mid-Manhattan.

Prabhupāda would look out at the Manhattan skyline, and a breeze from the Hudson would ease the July heat.

One evening, some of the devotees described to Śrīla Prabhupāda some of the abominable activities going on in the city. They told him of prostitution and pornography, of acts of rampant criminal violence, and of the strange fetishes and fads of the flesh-eaters, including the eating of human fetuses.

"This means," said Prabhupāda, "that we are actually preaching to animals."

One night on the roof, Rāmeśvara Swami asked Śrīla Prabhupāda to reveal his plan for conquering the world with Kṛṣṇa consciousness. Prabhupāda was silent. Finally he said, "No. Because if I tell you my plans, then they may be spoiled." He had a plan, he said, but they were not ready for it.

The Ratha-yātrā procession, with its three fifty-foot-tall carts, began at Grand Army Plaza on Fifth Avenue and proceeded downtown. Young men, girls in sārīs, Indians, New Yorkers—hundreds—tugged at the ropes, pulling the gigantic chariots. With silken towers billowing yellow, green, red, and blue in the wind, slowly and majestically, the carts sailed south. The parade was complete with beautiful weather, hundreds of chanting and dancing devotees, and thousands of onlookers. And the route was some fifty blocks down Fifth Avenue, "the most important street in the world," to Washington Square Park.

At Thirty-fourth Street Prabhupāda joined the procession. As he came forward to board the chariot of Subhadra, the devotees converged around him, amazing the policemen and other onlookers with their spontaneous adoration of Kṛṣṇa's representative. Although the inner meaning of Ratha-yātrā is the gopīs' desire for Kṛṣṇa to return to Vṛndāvana, these devotees were more absorbed in Śrīla Prabhupāda's return to New York.

It was a gorgeous, appropriate climax to Prabhupāda's ten years of preaching in New York City. When he had first come he had had no money, no place of his own to live, and no place for people to congregate and hear about Kṛṣṇa. Now he was riding in splendor down Fifth Avenue at the Ratha-yātrā festival, and his Rādhā-Govinda Deities had a skyscraper. In 1965 he had been alone on the street, but now he was accompanied by six hundred disciples, loudly singing the holy names and benefiting millions of conditioned souls.

In front of Subhadra's cart walked Jayānanda, holding the steering tongue, keeping the cart on course. As Prabhupāda sat comfortably on the cart he fondly glanced at Jayānanda from time to time. Jayānanda, steering with his left hand, would hold his right hand upraised, cheering Prabhupāda's Ratha-yātrā and rallying the others to pull the ropes and chant Hare Kṛṣṇa.

When the procession arrived, Washington Square Park was crowded with people. A temporary stage had been erected, and Śrīla Prabhupāda and the Deities took their places. Kirtanānanda Swami introduced Prabhupāda before the crowd, and Prabhupāda stood up to speak.

Beginning by explaining the significance of Ratha-yātrā, Śrīla Prabhupāda told the story of how the Jagannātha Deities were carved at the request of the king of Orissa over two thousand years ago.

When the king had disturbed the sculptor before the Deities were completed, the sculptor had left. "But the king decided, 'I shall worship this unfinished Deity, never mind.'

"So the devotee is offering," Prabhupāda continued, "and Kṛṣṇa accepts... if it is offered with love and affection. He says in the Bhagavad-gītā, patraṁ puṣpaṁ phalaṁ toyam/ yo me bhaktyā prayacchati. Kṛṣṇa says anyone who offers Him a little flower, a little water, a little fruit with love and affection, 'I eat them, I accept them.'

"That means that even the poorest man in the world can worship God. There is no hindrance—ahaitukī apratihātā—devotional service cannot be checked by any material condition. There is no restriction of caste or creed or country, nation. Anyone can worship the Supreme Personality of Godhead, according to his means.

"And our Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement is a propagation to teach people how to worship the Supreme Personality of Godhead. This is our mission, because without relationship with God, without reviving our eternal affinity with God, we cannot be happy."

All living entities, Prabhupāda explained, are children of the supreme father, Kṛṣṇa, or God. But only in the human form of life can one understand his relationship with God. If one misuses his life and doesn't understand his duty to Kṛṣṇa, then his life is spoiled.

"So please do not take this Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement as any sectarian movement. It is the science of God. Try to understand the science of God. Either you accept it directly, or you try to understand through philosophy and science. We have got so many books. Kindly take advantage of this movement, why we are distributing so many literatures. Soberly and with calm head, try to understand this movement. This is our only mission. Thank you very much."

As Śrīla Prabhupāda left to return to the temple, prasādam distribution began and the dramatic actors prepared to go onstage with their rendition of "Kali and His Consort, Sin."

In the evening the parade and festival received good coverage on all major TV stations, and the next morning, pictures and articles appeared in the newspapers. Prabhupāda particularly liked the New York Daily News centerspread, where several photos bore a large caption: "Fifth Avenue, Where East Meets West."

"Send this cutting to many places," Prabhupāda said. "Send it to Indira Gandhi. This title is very nice. This is the point. 'East meets West.' As I always say, the lame man meets the blind man. Together they do wonderful, and apart they cannot do anything. He is lame, and he is blind. But if they join together—Indian culture and American money—they will save the whole world."

Śrīla Prabhupāda heard from the New York Times article, which stressed how the parade included hundreds of Indians "who were pleased to see they could keep faith even in New York City." The article quoted "an Indian immigrant" as saying, "We love New York City, America. It's the most beautiful place in the world. No other country will give such freedom for our own ceremony."

"That's a fact," Prabhupāda said. "That I always say. The Times first published about my activities when I was in Tompkins Square Park." At the festival site, prasādam had been served to seven thousand people. And even when the devotees had walked back uptown with the carts late at night, hundreds of people had followed and chanted. The devotees were already talking about how to improve the festival for next year. They could have a press box, and Prabhupāda suggested they rent a small building downtown and call it Guṇḍicā.* Lord Jagannātha could stay there for one week. Then the devotees should have another procession and festival with Lord Jagannātha returning to the temple on Fifty-fifth Street.

"Last night," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami, "all night we were cleaning up the grounds at the park. So one woman who lives next to the park said, 'In all my years of living here I've never seen such a wonderful festival held.' And on CBS television, the official who's in charge of the park said, 'We are very proud to be able to say that this park was founded hundreds of years ago when America was religious and that spiritual life is still present in Washington Square Park.' "

"So why not ask the mayor to construct a temple there?" said Śrīla Prabhupāda. The devotees all laughed. But Prabhupāda thought such things were certainly possible.

Śrīla Prabhupāda's health was worsening, as often happened when he traveled extensively. Particularly in New York his health began to suffer. His itinerary was to continue on to London, Paris, Tehran, Bombay, and then to Hyderabad, where he would conduct the opening ceremony of a new ISKCON temple. Senior devotees entreated him to rest awhile before going to England and India. He had spent a very pleasant day at the ISKCON farm in Pennsylvania, and the devotees suggested he go there for two or three months to rest, recover his health, and write. Every day they would beg him to please stay. When he heard that the G.B.C. members in New York had unanimously recommended he not immediately travel, he said, "All right. I will not travel."

But he could not be bound by the G.B.C., however—only by Kṛṣṇa. He already had his plane tickets, and he remained set on traveling.

On the morning of Prabhupāda's departure, a few devotees came to his room to make a last attempt, begging him not to travel. He said nothing, though he was obviously set on leaving. His servants were packing his bags and everything was ready to go. Nevertheless, even as he left his room and got on the elevator, a few men followed, still suggesting he not go.

"Prabhupāda, please reconsider," said Rāmeśvara Swami. Śrīla Prabhupāda had remained jolly so far, despite his physical weakness, and despite his disciples' pleading. But now his face changed.

"Don't travel," one devotee said. And another added, "Just stay. Sit down and rest."

Prabhupāda turned, and his eyes were very deep. More than ever he seemed not of this material world. "I want the benediction to go on fighting for Kṛṣṇa," he said, "just like Arjuna."

Everyone remained silent, and the important instruction burned into their memories. The elevator opened on the main floor and hundreds of waiting devotees chanted and cheered as Śrīla Prabhupāda walked to his car.

On the way to the airport the devotees again began talking about how degraded Kali-yuga was. "But you have to go on preaching," Prabhupāda advised them. "You have to go and try to save these people."

As Śrīla Prabhupāda left America, the devotees knew he would remain with them as long as they followed his instructions. Besides, even if he was leaving them, he would return. He was coming from India to New York, then going back to India, then coming to the West. He was always traveling between East and West, tugging the two cultures together, the lame man and the blind. Like Arjuna he was fighting, and like Nārada Muni he was always traveling, glorifying the Supreme Personality of Godhead, Kṛṣṇa. He would never stop, and those who sincerely followed would be with him.

SPL 51: Chant Hare Kṛṣṇa and Fight

CHAPTER FIFTY-ONE

Chant Hare Kṛṣṇa

and Fight

= Bombay

January 9, 1977

Śrīla Prabhupāda started his morning walk before dawn. He and the devotees knew their way well through Hare Krishna Land to the public road, and once off the property, they turned left then right and began walking down the block leading to the beach. The sky began to lighten. At first they could not visibly distinguish land from sea from sky. But gradually subtle nuances of color revealed the horizon, and they could see the vast plain of the Arabian Sea stretching to meet the even greater sea of sky, where last stars twinkled and faded. As Prabhupāda and his small group walked along the broad beach, they were flanked on their left by a line of leaning palms and on their right by a rumbling surf.

Śrīla Prabhupāda wore a gray woolen cādar around his shoulders, a saffron silk kurtā and dhotī, and peach-colored canvas shoes. He used a cane, leaning not heavily on it, but lightly. With each brisk step he would point the cane ahead, poking it into the sand and lifting it again, rhythmically marking the pace. He walked erectly and held his head high.

A long line of Bombayites, many of them wealthy Juhu residents on their morning stroll, appeared, and a few coconut-wālās set up their carts, cutting off the tops of choice coconuts in anticipation of their first customers. Śrīla Prabhupāda liked to walk at this time of morning, and weather permitting, he would do so no matter where he was in the world. Juhu Beach, however, was one of his favorite places to walk.

Along the way, he and his disciples were joined by Dr. Patel, in white shirt and pants, and several of his friends, mostly doctors and lawyers. Śrīla Prabhupāda had been silent, but now he began to speak.

"How everything is nice," Śrīla Prabhupāda commented, gesturing toward the beach before him. "See the sky, how clear and how nice by Kṛṣṇa. Pūrṇam idam." With his cane he indicated the tall, graceful palm trees. "The tree is called vṛkṣa," he said. "The vṛkṣa-yoni, or birth as a tree, is condemned. By Kṛṣṇa's arrangement, however, the vṛkṣas are also so nicely set up, it becomes beautiful."

"They are all representatives of Kṛṣṇa," said Dr. Patel. "This is perfect."

"Pūrṇam," said Śrīla Prabhupāda, quoting Īsopaniṣad. "Pūrṇam idam, pūrṇam adaḥ." Just as the rising sun illumines everything, Śrīla Prabhupāda discoursed, speaking against the atheistic notion that the complex material creation has no creator. "God's creation," said Prabhupāda, "is perfect and complete because it comes from Him who is pūrṇam, perfect and complete. Aṇḍāntara-stha paramāṇu cayāntara-sthaṁ/ govindam ādi-puruṣaṁ tam ahaṁ bhajāmi. Paramāṇu means smaller than the atom. Six paramāṇus make one anu. That is atomic dimension—you combine six paramāṇus. So in that paramāṇu also the Lord is there."

"He made it," said Dr. Patel, "and then He entered into it. That is what the Veda says."

"Yes," said Prabhupāda, "the Paramātmā is there. The whole human life is meant for understanding all this and glorifying the Lord. And they are wasting their lives by imitating the hog."

Prabhupāda again fell silent, except for softly uttering the Hare Kṛṣṇa mantra. Now the beach was light, and many people, out on their morning walks or runs, greeted Śrīla Prabhupāda as they passed. The greetings were always words of respect, or at least "Good morning," and Śrīla Prabhupāda's response was usually "Hare Kṛṣṇa."

Suddenly Prabhupāda again began to speak: "There's a very big conspiracy against us."

"By the church?" guessed Dr. Patel.

"Not by the church," said Prabhupāda.

"By the society?"

Prabhupāda uttered a thoughtful "Hmmm," then added, "Now they are determined to cut down this movement." He didn't give any details, and neither Dr. Patel nor the others could fully draw out what was on his mind. Whatever it was, said Dr. Patel, no conspiracy against Kṛṣṇa consciousness could take place in India.

"I wanted to start this movement in India," Prabhupāda replied. "I requested so many friends, 'Give me just one son.' But nobody agreed. They said, 'Swamiji, what will be the benefit by this if I make my son a Vaiṣṇava or a brāhmaṇa?' They do not give much importance to the movement. They are planning how to stop this movement in so many ways."

Always a faithful Indophile, Dr. Patel replied, "The Americans are like that, always making propaganda."

"There is good and bad in every place," said Prabhupāda. "Kṛṣṇa says, manuṣyānāṁ sahasreṣu. Out of thousands of persons hardly anyone is interested in perfecting his life. This is Kali-yuga."

They walked on, and Śrīla Prabhupāda said no more about it, speaking instead of materialistic household life, in which the chief pleasure is sex. Beyond this abominable sex pleasure, he said, was the full satisfaction of spiritual life.

Prabhupāda walked for half an hour and then turned around and began walking back, wanting to return to the temple by seven, just in time to greet the Deities. Some of the others were flagging from the brisk pace, but Śrīla Prabhupāda strode on, his golden-hued face triumphant in self-realization.

Prabhupāda began talking about the importance of sat-saṅga, association with devotees, and Dr. Patel quipped, "Instead of doing sat-saṅga, people go to Kumbha-melā!" He laughed, as if it were a good joke.

But Prabhupāda corrected him. "No," he said, "Kumbha-melā is sat-saṅga. If you go to Kumbha-melā to find a man of knowledge, then your Kumbha-melā is right. Otherwise, yat-tīrtha-buddhiḥ salile na karhicit, sa eva go-khara. If one thinks that this salila, the water, that just to take bath in the water is Kumbha-melā, then he's a go-khara, a cow or an ass. But if he thinks, 'Now there is an assembly of so many saintly persons, let me take advantage of their knowledge,' then he is intelligent."

Ever since Śrīla Prabhupāda had arrived in Bombay, he had been questioned about the upcoming Kumbha-melā at Allahabad. The Māgh-melā occurred every year, but according to astrological calculations, a more auspicious occasion came every twelfth year: Kumbha-melā. And every twelfth Kumbha-melā (an event that occurred only once in 144 years) was especially auspicious. This year, 1977, was to be such a Melā, and the government was predicting an attendance of twelve million at the confluence of the holy rivers near Allahabad. Śrīla Prabhupāda had said he would go.

"So, sir," said Dr. Patel, "you are going by train to Kumbha-melā?" Śrīla Prabhupāda replied that he liked the train, but Dr. Patel said it was not good for health and that it would be a very long ordeal. He also warned Prabhupāda that Allahabad would be very cold. And if Prabhupāda wanted to leave the Melā early, he would find it very difficult because of the crowds. "I'll get one of my friends to get me some water from Allahabad on that day," laughed Dr. Patel. "I'll take my bath here." Dr. Patel's friends also mentioned the difficulties of extreme weather and crowds at Allahabad during the Melā. Śrīla Prabhupāda, however, was not swayed. He was well acquainted with Allahabad, having lived there with his family from 1923 to 1936.

"In 1925," said Prabhupāda, "I went to the Melā. I remember, I was touching the water, and it was so pinching that it was cutting your body. But as soon as you actually get a dip—one... two... three—then you immediately come out, and it is all right."

Prabhupāda mentioned the 1928 Melā, when he was carrying his young child. "I was in the midst of the crowd," he recalled. "It was so big that I was afraid that if there was any rush this child may be finished. But, by the grace of Kṛṣṇa, nothing happened."

"What is the reason for the Melā?" asked Prabhupāda's servant, Hari-śauri. "Is it something about some drops of nectar from the Mohiṇī-mūrti?"

"It is actually a religious conference," Prabhupāda replied. "All the different groups gather in that holy place, and they propagate their philosophy there. India is a country of religion. They know spiritual life is more important than this material life—that is India. Now they are diverting their attention to the material. Otherwise, the whole of India is for spiritual life."

About five minutes before seven, Śrīla Prabhupāda left the beach and walked back to Hare Krishna Land. As he approached, he saw the massive two-story towers of the ISKCON hotel and the even taller and grander temple domes. The buildings, however, were unfinished. The temple domes had to be covered with marble, and all the buildings needed numerous finishing touches. Prabhupāda was anxiously anticipating the opening, but Surabhi Mahārāja spoke of delays. The opening date, therefore, remained indefinite.

Delays had been routine ever since Prabhupāda had first tried to purchase the Juhu land from Mr. N. in 1971, and obstacles had plagued all his attempts to build. Now the triumph of installing the Deities of Rādhā-Rāsavihārī in one of the most gorgeous temples in India was near. Rādhā-Rāsavihārī were still being worshiped in the temporary shelter the devotees had erected in 1971, but as Prabhupāda approached, he could see the magnificent temple structure looming behind that humble shed, proclaiming that soon Rāsavihārī would move into His palace. Kṛṣṇa was blessing the faithful work of Śrīla Prabhupāda and his disciples in Bombay. Although Śrīla Prabhupāda was always traveling, pushing his movement ahead on all fronts, he would regularly return to Bombay. He, more clearly than his disciples, could see when the workers were delaying or even cheating. This time, as before, he would stay for a while, give advice, and then move on.

On returning to the ISKCON property, Śrīla Prabhupāda came before the Deities and beheld once again the charming beauty that made him sometimes indicate that of all Deities, these were the dearest to him. His promise to Rādhā-Rāsavihārī that he would build Them a beautiful temple was soon to become a living reality, but he sometimes expressed doubt as to whether he would live to see it. He was now eighty-one and was bothered by certain persistent illnesses.

Of course, the warnings of death were nothing new to Śrīla Prabhupāda, as he had had serious bouts with illness from the beginning of his preaching in the West in 1965. Yet despite his frequent remarks about retiring, his disciples found it difficult to imagine. Yes, they should by all means complete the work as soon as possible and open the Bombay temple, and yes, they should assure Prabhupāda that he could retire and eventually complete his Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam. But of course, Kṛṣṇa would allow him to remain with them and see the completion of at least these two projects.

Each month, one of Śrīla Prabhupāda's G.B.C. men stayed with him to serve as his secretary and to receive direct training and personal association. The secretary for January 1977 was Rāmeśvara Swami. Prabhupāda was genuinely pleased and enlivened when, early in the morning, Rāmeśvara entered his room, having flown straight from Los Angeles to Bombay. Prabhupāda considered Rāmeśvara an expert ISKCON manager, especially in printing and distributing Kṛṣṇa conscious literature, which was Prabhupāda's priority in preaching.

Rāmeśvara Swami inquired as a humble servant before his spiritual master. "Śrīla Prabhupāda," he said, "you look well. Are you feeling well?"

Śrīla Prabhupāda laughed. "At the present moment I am feeling well, because you are here."

Within moments they were discussing ISKCON preaching and management, and Prabhupāda advised Rāmeśvara that the best policy was to use money for printing more books. As soon as money accumulated, Prabhupāda warned, it would be taxed and would cause headaches. Better to immediately spend it for printing books.

"Print books and sell and spend," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "Follow this policy and distribute these books. That is our main preaching. Somehow or other we must take our books door to door and distribute. Then our preaching is successful. Anyone who will read will get some benefit, that is sure. Because no other such literature is available throughout the whole world. It is a new revolution to the people in general."

When Śrīla Prabhupāda asked for news of ISKCON's activities in the West, Rāmeśvara gave the latest details of how the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement in America was being attacked in the courts and press as a psychologically dangerous, brainwashing cult. Śrīla Prabhupāda was already aware of this; it was, in fact, the "conspiracy" he had referred to on his morning walk. An anticult movement was now aggressively active and lumping the Hare Kṛṣṇa movement in with other new movements. Śrīla Prabhupāda was well aware of the "deprogrammers'" kidnapping of devotees and intensively coercing them, and he had shown that he was not intimidated by the attack. He assured the devotees that Kṛṣṇa would protect them and that the outcome would ultimately be in their favor.

The most significant battle, one that had concerned Śrīla Prabhupāda for several months, was a legal case in New York where the temple president, Ādi-keśava Swami, was being charged with employing mind control to keep the devotees in the temple. The parents of two adult devotees had pressed charges after hired deprogrammers had failed to break the two devotees' determination for Kṛṣṇa consciousness. In a spirit of anticult crusade, an assistant attorney general was prosecuting, using all legal and governmental facilities at his disposal. Although civil libertarians were outraged and assured the devotees that the opposition could never win, the implications of the case were fearful nevertheless. The case challenged the very right of the Hare Kṛṣṇa movement to exist as a bona fide religion and challenged the right of adult devotees to remain in the movement against the wishes of their parents. Also at issue was whether members of the Hare Kṛṣṇa movement were members by their own choosing or were being kept in the movement by psychological manipulation, "brainwashing." When Śrīla Prabhupāda had first heard of this case, his reply in a letter from Vṛndāvana had been like a clarion call to battle against the forces of illusion.

Regarding the point about whether our movement is bona fide, you can use the following arguments. Bhagavad-gītā has got so many editions. Our books are older than the Bible. In India there are millions of Kṛṣṇa temples. Let the judges and juries read our books and take the opinion of learned scholars and professors. Regarding the second point about the parents' jurisdiction over their children, here are some suggestions. Do the parents like that their children become hippies? Why don't they stop it? Do the parents like their children to become involved in prostitution and intoxication? Why don't they stop this?

They are now feeling the weight of this movement. Formerly they thought, "These people come and go," but now they see we are staying. Now we have set fire. It will go on. It cannot be stopped. You can bring big, big fire brigades but the fire will act. The brain-wash books are already there. Even if they stop externally, internally it will go on. Our first-class campaign is book distribution. Go house to house. The real fighting is now. Kṛṣṇa will give you all protection. So, chant Hare Kṛṣṇa and fight.

Sitting with Śrīla Prabhupāda in Bombay, Rāmeśvara Swami informed him that a nationwide committee of professors and theologians had come to the defense of Kṛṣṇa consciousness in the New York case and that many lawyers and psychologists were sympathetic.

"It is so much mercy from Kṛṣṇa," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "Kṛṣṇa wanted all these things to happen. Kṛṣṇa Himself became important when He killed so many demons, not simply by lying down in the lap of mother Yaśodā. When He was on the lap of mother Yaśodā, from that day He began to kill. Therefore Kṛṣṇa established that He was the Supreme Personality of Godhead. So even Kṛṣṇa was not exempted, what to speak of us. Prahlāda Mahārāja was not exempted. As soon as you speak of God, this opposition will come. Jesus Christ was crucified. They are so kind they have not crucified me or my men. But you have to expect all these things. Nityānanda Prabhu was personally injured. Haridāsa Ṭhākura was beaten in twenty-two bazaars. This task is like that."

"They are getting everyone in America to ask the question, 'What is Hare Kṛṣṇa?'" said Rāmeśvara.

"That is our gain," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "They are chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa."

"We still have to work very hard to defeat them," Rāmeśvara added. "Oh, yes," said Prabhupāda. "That is necessary. You don't sleep. Never did Kṛṣṇa say to Arjuna, 'I am your friend. I am God. You sleep here. I'll do everything.' No! You must fight! That is wanted. Kṛṣṇa said, 'You fight, and remember Me. Then I'll do everything.' This is an opportunity of remembering Kṛṣṇa always."

Prabhupāda explained that the greatest shock for the materialists was that the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement strongly opposed illicit sex, meat-eating, and intoxication. To them, for a person to give up these things was so shocking that they could not accept it was happening because of a genuine spiritual experience. Referring to a previous case, Prabhupāda said, "In Germany they also accused that the old man is sitting in Los Angeles, and he has engaged all these boys in collecting money for him. They are thinking that way, that I have some mind control power, and I have engaged these men—they are getting the money and I am enjoying."

Śrīla Prabhupāda recalled how, as early as 1969, when his temple in Los Angeles had purchased a few cars and the number of devotees had begun increasing, the neighbors had become envious. Prabhupāda said that he had invited them to also come and live in the Kṛṣṇa consciousness community, but that their reply had always been no. Prabhupāda said that the more the opposition created turmoil, the more Kṛṣṇa consciousness would become famous. He also reasoned that people were reacting to his very strong preaching.

"I condemn everyone," he said, "that they are all dogs and hogs. And the United Nations I called a pack of barking dogs. It's a fact. And in Chicago I said, 'All women, you cannot have freedom.' So I became a subject of great criticism."

Śrīla Prabhupāda concluded his meeting with Rāmeśvara by saying that the devotees should be very alert and intelligently defend the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement; but they should also understand that a higher principle was operating. This opposition indicated the genuineness of ISKCON. Even Kṛṣṇa Himself was sometimes the center of calamitous activities, such as when He fought with Kālīya and other enemies or when, as an infant, He fell into the Yamunā river.

"This is the beauty of Vṛndāvana," said Prabhupāda. "When Kṛṣṇa entered the Yamunā to fight with Kālīya it was not at all good news for mother Yaśodā, Nanda, the friends and family. Not at all. Their life was lost. But still Kṛṣṇa was the center. This is Vṛndāvana. In everything Kṛṣṇa is in the center. So our situation is just like that. They are making bad propaganda against Kṛṣṇa—this is the opposition—but I am happy that Kṛṣṇa is the center. That's all. This is the beauty of this movement. Although we are put into some difficulty, yet the center is Kṛṣṇa."

Śrīla Prabhupāda wanted to travel with a group of his disciples by train to Allahabad. But when a devotee went to buy tickets, he discovered that all seats had long been purchased; there was no chance of making reservations for Allahabad so close to Kumbha-melā. One of Śrīla Prabhupāda's Bombay friends, however, a Mr. Gupta, held a high position with the Central Railway of India and, at Prabhupāda's request, arranged for a special, private car on a train to Allahabad, exclusively for Prabhupāda and his disciples.

Early on the morning of January 11 Śrīla Prabhupāda embarked on the twenty-four-hour-plus train ride from Bombay to Allahabad. He was sharing his first-class compartment with Rāmeśvara Swami, Jagadīśa, and Hari-śauri, and even as the train pulled out of the station, Prabhupāda was preaching.

Rameśvara mentioned a radio show he had recently been on in California, where a Lutheran minister had said Kṛṣṇa was a sex symbol because He had so many wives and gopīs.

"Even taking it that Kṛṣṇa is after sex," said Prabhupāda, "then if sex is bad, why are they after sex?"

"He says that sex is not for God," Rāmeśvara replied. Śrīla Prabhupāda was sitting on one side of the compartment, and his disciples sat facing him. The loud rattling of the train cars on the rails made conversation sometimes difficult.

"If sex is not there in God," said Prabhupāda, "then how has it come? God created everything. So God did not create sex?" Śrīla Prabhupāda explained that sex exists both in the material world and in the spiritual, material sex enjoyment being a perversion of the original, pure sex that exists in the Supreme. Kṛṣṇa's sexual enjoyment, therefore, is not at all like material sex; it is the exact opposite, in fact, inasmuch as the reality is the opposite of its reflection.

"You do not understand how to face the opposing party," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. He was in an animated, argumentative mood, enthusiastic to show his disciples how to defeat the opposition. He had sometimes described his own spiritual master as simha ("lion")-guru, and they now saw him in a similar fighting spirit. "The more opposition there will be," he said, "the more we have to defend."

"Śrīla Prabhupāda," Rāmeśvara asked, "should we be thinking in our minds that one day the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement will have to manage the cities and the nations of the world?"

"Oh, yes," Prabhupāda replied.

Rāmeśvara asked how the devotees could accomplish such a huge, ambitious project. The management would be simplified, Prabhupāda explained, since the citizens would live a pure, natural life. Thus the burdensome, sinful aspects of godless government would become unnecessary, and so many complex problems would be solved. He gave the example of self-sufficient agrarian communities where men earn their livelihood locally. But only by education and by experiencing the higher taste of Kṛṣṇa conscious pleasure, he said, could the masses become satisfied with simple living.

Rāmeśvara asked if America would become Kṛṣṇa conscious by a minority of Kṛṣṇa conscious persons becoming powerful in government, while the masses remained as karmīs.

"No," Prabhupāda replied. "You can introduce Kṛṣṇa consciousness in such a way that they will become devotees. Suppose in big, big factories we shall introduce this prasādam distribution and chanting. They will immediately become devotees. Their hearts will be cleansed: ceto-darpaṇa-mārjanam."

"But will it be like Russia," pursued Rāmeśvara, "where there is only a small group of people who are in control?"

"No, it is not like that. The quality of the people will be changed."

"So that means only when the whole mass of population becomes Kṛṣṇa conscious," Rāmeśvara suggested, "then there will be Kṛṣṇa conscious government..."

"No," Prabhupāda corrected. "You can have government when you are in minority. But the mass of people, on account of this quality, they have to see the example."

In one sense these were not immediate concerns—how the devotees would manage the whole world—since the devotees' political influence was at present insignificant. But by answering these questions, Prabhupāda was establishing future goals and tactics for the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement. Rāmeśvara Swami, as both a practical manager and a visionary, wanted to know exactly how Śrīla Prabhupāda saw the Kṛṣṇa conscious world of the future.

Śrīla Prabhupāda had the answers, but he indicated that social or political management would be done not by any new formalities but by pure Kṛṣṇa consciousness, by changing the hearts of the people through chanting, hearing, studying scripture—and then organizing things on the basic principles of Kṛṣṇa consciousness.

As the train passed beyond the heavily populated Bombay area and entered the countryside, Śrīla Prabhupāda looked out the window, appreciating the scenery. "We have come to the open field," he said. "How it is nice. And as long as we were passing through the congested areas—hellish, simply hellish. Now here is open space, how it is nice."

"Entering into a city is so imposing on your consciousness," said Hari-śauri.

"Yes," Prabhupāda said, "at that point it is simply rubbish. All papers thrown here and there, and people living in hellish conditions. Now see here how it is open and pleasing. So organize these farm projects."

When Rāmeśvara pointed out that beginning a farm community required a great deal of capital, Prabhupāda simply replied that the devotees should show the example and that others would automatically follow the successful pattern. Rāmeśvara mentioned that in America, although the ISKCON temple presidents were eager to get as many people to join as possible, they found that most people were unable to come up to the required standard.

"Therefore farm," Prabhupāda said.

"They have to be encouraged to have a little bit of Kṛṣṇa consciousness in their own home," Rāmeśvara suggested, "—make their home a temple."

Prabhupāda disagreed. "No. Let them go to the farm, New Vrindaban." If the people were disinclined to austerity, he said, then let them come to the farm with their wife and children and live comfortably in their own house. And on the farms they would find plenty of employment. More and more, Prabhupāda said, people would become jobless and would be obliged to take shelter of a Kṛṣṇa conscious farm community.

"So we can expect," said Hari-śauri, "that material conditions are going to become very much worse than at present?"

"They may come or not," said Prabhupāda. "We don't care. Let us establish an ideal society."

Although Prabhupāda had left Bombay without taking breakfast, he continued speaking for four hours and then asked Hari-śauri to serve lunch. The other devotees left the compartment.

Hari-śauri carried all Prabhupāda's personal effects in two small shoulder bags, one with three changes of clothing, the other with Prabhupāda's plate, bowl, spoon, tiffin, tilaka, and mirror. With just these two bags, Prabhupāda was traveling all over the world. Although he was the head of a wealthy, international movement, he kept nothing for himself and traveled light. Whatever donations he collected, whatever profits came from the sale of his books, whatever properties he owned—everything was in the name of ISKCON. And yet when it came time to eat in the middle of that dusty train ride, his servant was able to produce silver bowls and a tray and an elegant vegetarian feast. Although Prabhupāda kept nothing for himself, by Kṛṣṇa's arrangement he was well provided for.

Śrīla Prabhupāda sat cross-legged on the train seat and pointed to what he wanted from the stainless steel tiffin compartments his servant placed before him. There were sabjīs, purīs, fruits, and sweets. After Śrīla Prabhupāda chose what he wanted and began to eat, he insisted that Hari-śauri also take prasādam. When they finished, Hari-śauri distributed the remnants of Prabhupāda's meal to the other devotees, and Prabhupāda lay down to rest.

In the afternoon, more devotees gathered in Prabhupāda's small compartment, and he continued preaching, mostly in reply to points Rāmeśvara Swami raised.

"In regard to brainwashing," said Rāmeśvara, "they claim that our lifestyle tends to take the devotee and isolate him from the world."

"Yes," said Prabhupāda, "we hate to mix with you. No gentleman tries to mix with loafers. Crows will not like to live with the ducks and white swans, and white swans will not like to live with the crows. That is natural division. Birds of the same feather flock together."

Rāmeśvara: "They have a list of five or six conditions, and they say if all these conditions are present, then it is a suitable atmosphere for brainwashing. They say we are imposing those conditions on our members."

Prabhupāda: "Yes. We are brainwashing from bad to good. That is our business. We are washing the brain from all rascaldom. Your brain is filled up with all rubbish things—meat-eating, illicit sex, gambling. So we are washing them. Ceto-darpaṇa-mārjanam. Śṛṇvatām sva-kathāḥ kṛṣṇaḥ puṇya-śravaṇa kīrtanaḥ hṛdy antaḥ-stho hy Abhadrāṇi. Abhadrā ṇi means "bad things." So the bad things should be washed. Don't you cleanse your home? Don't you cleanse your room? Is that brainwashing? So if you wash your room very clean, who blames you? But you are so rascal that you charge us, "Why are you washing away this garbage?" We are washing out the garbage, and you are protesting. This is your intelligence. But intelligent men wash away the garbage. That is the law of civilization, to cleanse. That we are doing.

"According to Vedic civilization you are actually untouchable. Now we have come to touch you. Therefore wash—first you must wash. According to Indian civilization the dog is untouchable, but he is your best friend. So you are untouchable. Therefore, we have to wash your brain. Unless your brain is washed, you cannot understand Kṛṣṇa. Man is known by his company. You sleep with dog, you eat with dog, your best friend is dog, so what you are? You must be washed, scrubbed."

Rāmeśvara: "But this is their argument, that the standard in America is that you become learned in different fields—science, music, art, and literature. This standard of culture and education is coming from the idea of the Renaissance in Europe. But in our Hare Kṛṣṇa movement we are isolating ourselves from these things and simply reading one set of literature—Kṛṣṇa."

Prabhupāda: "This other is not culture. As soon as you change, that means it is not culture. It is mano-dharma, mental concoction. Yes, we want to stop your nonsense. That is our mission. Those who are intelligent, they have taken. And you also take."

Rāmeśvara raised the objection that Kṛṣṇa conscious children are not prepared to go to public schools and universities, and Śrīla Prabhupāda replied that they were being saved.

"But what if they want to change later in their life?" asked Rāmeśvara.

"They have become Kṛṣṇa conscious from the very beginning," Prabhupāda replied. "That is the perfection of life. They are perfect from the very beginning of their life. And you are going to school in the college, but you are becoming most uncivilized—like cats and dogs, becoming naked and having sex on the street. So what is the value of that education? Stop all these colleges and universities. As soon as they are stopped, it is better for human beings."

Rāmeśvara: "They say that if we claim our members are gentlemen, they why is it that they go to the airport and bother so many people?"

Prabhupāda: "They are not bothering. They are educating. When a thief is advised, 'Kindly do not become a thief,' he takes it as botheration. But it is good advice."

Rāmeśvara: "They say it is invasion of privacy. Every man has the right to think the way he wants."

Prabhupāda: "Yes. Therefore I have got the right to think like this and sell books."

Rāmeśvara: "So if I do not want to hear your philosophy, why do you impose it?"

Prabhupāda: "It is not imposing. It is good philosophy. We are canvassing: 'Take it. You will be benefited.' And they are being benefited. Those who are reading, they are being benefited. And why are you advertising—big, big signboards: 'Please come and purchase'? Hmm? Why are you imposing your so-called goodness on us? Why you are doing?"

Back and forth the battle went, hour after hour, Rāmeśvara unleashing all the arguments against the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement, and Śrīla Prabhupāda defeating them. Prabhupāda called the arguments "childish" and "foolish," and he strongly criticized the materialistic demeanor from which they sprang. By śāstra and logic he proved that the nondevotee has no good qualities and is less than an animal because of his lack of God consciousness. Such a person, he said, was in no position to criticize, and such criticisms only showed ignorance of the real purpose of human life.

The train stopped in Manmad, Jalgaon, and Khandwa, as well as other small towns and junctions, and for Prabhupāda and his disciples the day passed quickly in discussion. Prabhupāda was absorbed in defending the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement. He relished fighting on behalf of Lord Caitanya. He was speaking, of course, mainly for the benefit of his disciples, but beyond that, he was expressing his compassion for all beings and his dedication to the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement.

"They are spending so much for military strength," Prabhupāda continued. "They are not performing yajña, so how will there be rainfall? There will be warfare, devastation. It is a most rubbish civilization. They are misleading everyone—soul killing. It is the blind leading the blind. Even when there is difficulty, we have to do this as Kṛṣṇa's business. Let the dogs bark on. We don't care. If we remain sincere to Kṛṣṇa, that is our victory. The external result is not so important. We have to act according to the direction of Kṛṣṇa.

"Of course, we want to see good results, but even if there is no good result, we don't mind. We must be sincere to Kṛṣṇa, that we have done our best without cheating. That is our duty. As servants, we shall not cheat the master—result or no result. The devotee is not sorry if there is no result: 'Never mind.' Caitanya Mahāprabhu says, 'I have brought to Benares the hari-nāma, but here they are all Māyāvādīs. So if it is not accepted, all right. I shall take it back.' But we must do our best canvassing work: 'Please take it.' That is our mission. Hare Kṛṣṇa, Hare Kṛṣṇa, Kṛṣṇa Kṛṣṇa, Hare Hare..." Śrīla Prabhupāda's speaking trailed off into chanting japa. He would chant for a while and then bring up another point.

Rāmeśvara Swami continued to stir the controversies, anxious to fortify his own convictions and preaching ability by hearing directly from Śrīla Prabhupāda.

"Very often," Rāmeśvara said, "they will say, 'It is not religion that we are concerned with, but it is brainwashing and mind control. You are chanting so many hours a day... ' "

"What is it to you!" Prabhupāda interrupted sharply. "That is my business. Why do you bother yourself?"

Rāmeśvara: "But you are not giving these young people a chance to think when they chant for so many hours."

Prabhupāda: "You are thieves. You are coming to kidnap. Why shall I give you a chance? They are chanting, but you are charging brainwash. You ask them don't chant—that is your business. But that you cannot do."

Rāmeśvara: "But they say that takes away freedom to think."

Prabhupāda: "That is controversy. But you want to take his freedom, and still you are accusing us."

Prabhupāda said that first there should be a test of what is genuine religion. "We say," said Prabhupāda, "that the law given by God is religion. And it does not matter what name is given to God. If we say 'Kṛṣṇa,' that does not mean that He is not God. So before there is a challenge to Kṛṣṇa consciousness, there should be an assembly discussion and decision as to what is genuine religion. We say that God is one, and whatever He has given as law, that is religion."

Rāmeśvara: "But the Christians say that according to the Bible, if God wanted us to believe in Kṛṣṇa He would have told us on Mount Sinai, and He would have told us through Jesus Christ. Jesus said, 'I am the only way.' "

Prabhupāda: "That's all right. But Jesus Christ did not explain more to you because you are rascals. You cannot follow even his one instruction, 'Thou shalt not kill.' It is not the foolishness of Jesus Christ. But because you are so rascal, you cannot understand him. Therefore he avoided you rascals. Because whatever he said, you cannot follow. So what you will understand? Therefore he stopped speaking."

Rāmeśvara: "They also say that you are ruining family life."

Prabhupāda: "That's all right. We are entering Kṛṣṇa's family."

Hari-śauri: "But if you are actually followers of God, why are you breaking up the families? Shouldn't you have love for everyone?"

Rāmeśvara: "One of the commandments is that one shall honor thy father and mother."

Prabhupāda replied that a devotee loves his mother and father by teaching them Kṛṣṇa consciousness.

Hari-śauri: "My mother testified to that. When I was at home she said I was impossible to live with. When she saw me afterwards, I was very nice."

Prabhupāda: "Many. Hayagrīva's father and mother also."

Rāmeśvara: "My parents think like that too. I could have no relationship with them before, but now that I am a devotee, I actually want to help them."

Prabhupāda: "There are so many fathers and mothers who appreciate. None of our disciples are disrespectful to mother and father. Why? I never said you become disrespectful to your father and mother. At Brahmānanda's initiation, his mother was standing there and I instructed Brahmānanda, 'Take the dust of your mother's feet first, then you offer me obeisances.' So first of all he offered his obeisances to his mother. I told him, 'You have got good mother. Otherwise, how she has got a son like you?' I always say like that. I never say disrespect. In a particular case, if the father and mother are demons, he must give up their association. But we never said break up the family."

Rāmeśvara: "I think we've used up all our arguments."

Prabhupāda (still eager to argue): "First of all you said that we are depriving of food. Where is this?"

Rāmeśvara: "Yes, this is their argument, that we only let devotees eat twice a day. And there is no meat and very little protein."

Prabhupāda: "That depends on him. If he likes to eat that kind of food, you have no right to force. Then you are turning to force. There are different persons, and they like different types of food. If he likes twice a day, why do you insist thrice? That is his choice."

Rāmeśvara: "And sleeping only four or five hours—very little."

Prabhupāda: "Yes, because it is a waste of time."

Rameśvara: "But this makes his mind very weak."

Prabhupāda: "You rascal! You have nothing to do—you sleep! Napoleon used to sleep for one hour, two hours—he was such a busy man. So they are so busy in Kṛṣṇa consciousness. Every great man does not sleep very much. Sleeping is simply a waste of time. If he does not sleep more, it is a sign of greatness."

When Rāmeśvara Swami argued that the opposition has psychologists to testify against us, Prabhupāda replied, "We have got our psychologists."

After talking all afternoon and into the night, Prabhupāda told the devotees to rest. At ten P.M. he lay down, and Hari-śauri massaged his legs. "Actually," Śrīla Prabhupāda concluded, "their arguments are not very sound. Therefore it is simply a plan of Kṛṣṇa's to help give us some prominence. It will make us more well known." Opposition, he said, was just an opportunity to preach. But to deal properly with the legal cases and other serious opposition, the devotees would have to know how to preach. And they would have to be spiritually strong. He was readying his men, speaking to them day and night on the twenty-four-hour train ride to Allahabad.

Allahabad

They arrived at nine A.M., and half a dozen of Śrīla Prabhupāda's sannyāsī disciples, along with a kīrtana party of about fifty devotees, were there to greet him. They had brought Prabhupāda's car down from Delhi, and he rode the short distance from the station to the Melā site. Thousands of pilgrims, on foot and in rickshas, crowded the streets, making Prabhupāda's progress by car slow. Finally the road ended, but the traffic continued onto the sandy flats surrounding the Trivenī (confluence of the rivers Sarasvatī, Gaṅgā, and Yamunā). Here, within a few days, a city of tents had sprung up. Two million had camped already, with millions more arriving daily. Every spiritual group in India had its bamboo-fenced compound of tents.

As the car inched along, Prabhupāda smiled to see a group of his disciples strolling among the camps and performing hari-nāma kīrtana. But not until he passed through the congested main area of camps to the far end of the Trivenī did he reach the ISKCON camp. The ISKCON tents, most of which had been erected about half an hour before Śrīla Prabhupāda's arrival, were located near a railway bridge on an island called Gaṅgādvīpa; and the Trivenī bathing area was a twenty-minute walk away. The festival organizers had provided simple outdoor toilets, water taps, and a "kitchen," consisting of a cloth partition, a hole in the ground, and some bricks.

It was, as Śrīla Prabhupāda had expected, the usual Kumbha-melā austerity, but he was displeased with the camp's remote location. And when he heard that the electric lines did not reach their area, he became even more displeased. How could people come to the program in the evening if there were no lights? He called for Bhāgavata and Guru dāsa, who were in charge of organizing the ISKCON camp.

"Who got this land?" he yelled.

"When I got here," said Bhāgavata, "it was an empty field. They told me, 'We are putting you on this island. The governor is there, Kalapatri Mahārāja is there, Maharishi Mahesh Yogi is there.' I thought you were there with all the leading personalities."

Śrīla Prabhupāda laughed. "You are inexperienced, so they cheated you. All right, you did not know."

But later, when he heard that Bhāgavata and Guru dāsa had not obtained enough food for mass distribution, he became angry. Again he called for Bhāgavata.

"Why is there no prasādam distribution tonight?" he demanded.

"Well, Prabhupāda," Bhāgavata stuttered, "I don't know. They didn't buy any food."

"Why have they not bought?" Prabhupāda was angry. "What is the matter with you? You Americans are big spenders—simply wasting money. You have no stock of food. Why you did not stock rice, dāl, and wheat? Why you have no stock? What is the matter with you? You have no brain. You spend five rupees' cab fare going, five rupees' cab fare coming back, and you buy one rupee of rice. This is your mentality. You are nonsense! Every time you need something you go to the store and buy it. You don't know how to buy sufficiently one time and then use it. You cannot think like that. And why have you made this location under the elevated train? Why have you done this wrong? The train is making noise. This paṇḍāl is a failure. Food is not being distributed." After twenty minutes of reprimanding, Prabhupāda dismissed Bhāgavata.

A little later Prabhupāda called for Bhāgavata again. "Bhāgavata Mahārāja," he began, although Bhāgavata was not a sannyāsī, "if you can just get the lights on, then you will be doing good. Can you do that?" Bhāgavata said he could, and by that night the ISKCON camp had lights, although, as at all the other camps, the power was frequently shut off.

Only a few people visited the ISKCON paṇḍāl the first night; the weather was cold, damp, and windy. Śrīla Prabhupāda chose to sit up all night at his desk rather than lie in the cold bed. Wearing all his clothes—sweaters, a hooded coat, a cādar, and gloves—he sat at his desk in the darkness. A kerosene heater did little to drive the chill from the tent. Rāmeśvara Swami sat up much of the night too, relighting the heater's pilot light, which blew out every few minutes as the wind swept through the tent.

By morning, Śrīla Prabhupāda had a bad cold with runny nose and eyes. He did not go to the river for bathing but used the icy water from the pump next to his tent. His hands and feet were swollen, something that had happened to him before during illness. When the devotees suggested he not stay at the camp, Prabhupāda insisted; he wanted to preach. People were beginning to discover his location and come to see him, so he wanted to stay and preach. Kumbha-melā, he said, was an opportunity for the devotees to preach, not merely to bathe in the Gaṅgā.

The devotees crowded into Śrīla Prabhupāda's tent for guru-pūjā and Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam class. They had no garland for him, but he said nothing about it. By the time he had ended his short lecture, the sun had risen. He asked Hari-śauri to put the cot outdoors, where he rested and later took massage in the sunshine.

During his massage, Prabhupāda looked over at the railroad bridge and said that he remembered this bridge from his former days in Allahabad. He said that his father had been cremated under the bridge on the same island of Gaṅgādvīpa in 1930.

That afternoon, a group of devotees arrived from Māyāpur, and some of them immediately complained to Prabhupāda about how poorly managed the ISKCON paṇḍāl seemed to be. Prabhupāda asked them to try to salvage the program by distributing as many books as possible, so the devotees began distributing Hindi editions of Prabhupāda's books.

The devotees took their chanting and book distributing down the main road, where they came upon the camps of different Śaivites, who sat around their fires wearing only kaupīnas (loincloths). Many of them, their hair matted, their bodies covered with ashes, were puffing heavily on hashish in chilam pipes. Nearby, on the other side of the road, were the camps of Vaiṣṇavas from the Rāmānuja sampradāya. Though they were also tyāgīs (renunciates), and their appearance was similar to the Śaivites', they were more friendly; they were glad to see the devotees and shouted out, "Hare Kṛṣṇa, Hare Rāma."

The devotees were amazed by the piety of the millions of pilgrims. On seeing the kīrtana party approach, many people offered prostrated obeisances. Others rolled on the ground, or picked up dust where the devotees had walked and put it in their mouths. And although many of the pilgrims were poor, they came forward and dropped at least a few paisa into the pot carried by one of the devotees. Anyone who gave a rupee would receive a book, and the books became so popular that people would come and ask for them by name. Some people threw money, and the sannyāsīs would catch it in their topcloths, which they would hold out like aprons. By the end of the day, the devotees had distributed about seven thousand pieces of literature.

On the second night, Śrīla Prabhupāda again sat up, while Rāmeśvara Swami tried futilely to keep the heater going. Hari-śauri had placed Śrīla Prabhupāda's dictating equipment on the desk, but Prabhupāda did not touch it.

January 14, Śrīla Prabhupāda's third day in Allahabad, was the first day of Kumbha-melā bathing and would be a special opportunity for book distribution. An ISKCON chanting party of about fifty men and several Indian gurukula boys was very well received as they traveled throughout the Melā area. At one-thirty P.M., the time of auspicious bathing, the kīrtana party made its way to the Trivenī. As they approached, the police cleared a path for them all the way to the water. By evening they had distributed eight thousand books, and for the first time since they had arrived, Prabhupāda expressed his pleasure at their success. He ordered some of the sannyāsīs to stay at the Melā until all the books were distributed.

The next morning, despite ill health, Prabhupāda took a walk. Surrounded by about twenty-five disciples, he walked slowly. Although he was a small figure surrounded by tall sannyāsīs, the Kumbha-melā pilgrims were able to easily recognize his preeminent position, and they would break through the ranks of devotees and offer daṇḍavats before him. When Prabhupāda saw people approaching, he would stop walking and let them touch his feet, despite the objections of his disciples. He was already sick, and he had explained in his books that a devotee can become ill if sinful people touch his feet. Still, he did not object.

Śrīla Prabhupāda was scheduled to stay at the Melā through January 21, but his disciples pressed him to go to a place more suitable for his health. Rarely had any of them seen him so sick, and they worried. "But my only ambition," said Prabhupāda, "is that so many people can become enlightened."

Word was beginning to circulate that Śrīla Prabhupāda, the guru of the Hare Kṛṣṇa movement, was staying in a camp on Gaṅgādvīpa, and more people were starting to come to see him. He said that the people coming to the Kumbha-melā were expecting all the holy men and spiritual teachers of India to be there, so he felt obligated to stay until the 21st.

Rāmeśvara Swami tried to advise Prabhupāda. "Śrīla Prabhupāda," he said, "there is something much more important than your giving darśana to these people, and that is your writing of your books. Only a few thousand people are going to see you here, but if you go on writing, we will distribute your books by the millions. Then millions of people will have your darśana. There is no facility for writing here. The climate is too cold, and your health is weak. Let's go on to Bhubaneswar, where it's warm and they have healthy water."

Śrīla Prabhupāda had previously mentioned Bhubaneswar because of the water of Bindu-sarovara, which was supposed to have special medicinal properties. And he liked the argument that his writing was more important than his remaining in Allahabad to benefit a few thousand pilgrims. For the devotees on his personal staff—his secretary, servant, and cook—to see Prabhupāda going through such austerities while suffering ill health was very painful.

Finally Prabhupāda agreed to go. He called in Guru dāsa and Bhāgavata and gave them a final verbal chastising for the mismanaged paṇḍāl. Then, on the afternoon of the 15th, he prepared to leave.

Rāmeśvara Swami and Guru dāsa went to the train station to purchase tickets, but they found that no seats would be available for weeks. Seeking special consideration, they visited the local railway office, a lavishly appointed remodeled railway car. There they happened to meet their friend from Bombay, Mr. Gupta, and they told him of Prabhupāda's illness and of his desire to leave at once for Calcutta.

Mr. Gupta phoned Bombay and arranged for a first-class coach to be added to a train coming from Bombay to Allahabad. The devotees profusely thanked Mr. Gupta, who began proposing that Śrīla Prabhupāda travel throughout India in a royal car like the one they were in. The devotees discussed with him about how they might buy or lease such a car, and it seemed an interesting possibility. But the immediate miracle had been arranged: a coach to take Prabhupāda out of the crowded throngs of Kumbha-melā to Calcutta.

After a difficult car ride, inching along through the crowds from the Trivenī to the train station, Prabhupāda and his party finally arrived at the railway station, where government men helped him and his disciples with their luggage and saw to their comfort. From the devotees' point of view, this was the proper respect for a pure devotee of the Lord, the most important person in the world; yet such treatment was rare. Śrīla Prabhupāda was pleased, and he asked his secretary to type a letter, thanking Mr. Gupta, who was caring for Prabhupāda "just like a father looking after a son." He invited Mr. Gupta and his family to attend the upcoming Gaura-pūrṇimā festival in Māyāpur.

During the train ride to Calcutta, Śrīla Prabhupāda reiterated his displeasure with the mismanaged ISKCON paṇḍāl at Kumbha-melā. Thousands of guests were coming to the Hare Kṛṣṇa paṇḍāl without receiving prasādam. Determined that the bad example not be repeated, he dictated a letter, "To All ISKCON Temple Presidents."

Please accept my blessings. Now you must arrange in each temple there must be sufficient stock of prasadam for distribution. You can keep first-class cooks, two or three, and they should be always engaged. Whenever any guest comes, he must get prasād. This arrangement must be made, that the cooks prepare ten-twenty servings at a time, of puris and sabji, and then you can add halavah and pakoras and the visitors may be supplied immediately. Whenever a gentleman comes, he must be served. As the twenty servings are being distributed, immediately the cooks prepare another twenty servings and store it. At the end of the day if no one comes, our own men will take, so there is no loss. You cannot say, "It is finished," "It is not cooked yet," "There is no supply for cooking," etc. This must be enforced rigidly.

The temple is managed by Srimati Radharani, Laksmiji; so why should there be want? Our philosophy is, if anyone comes, let him take prasād, chant Hare Kṛṣṇa, and be happy. Everything is being supplied by Kṛṣṇa. Kṛṣṇa is not poor, so why should we deny them? This should be done at any cost. There is no difficulty. It simply requires nice management. At the end of the day you may sell or give away. If we believe that Kṛṣṇa is providing for and maintaining everyone, then why should we be misers? This means losing faith in Kṛṣṇa and thinking that we are the doers and suppliers. We are confident Kṛṣṇa will supply! Let the whole world come. We can feed them. So please do this nicely. Begin at once.

Śrīla Prabhupāda asked to hear the reviews of his books, as published in The Krishna Consciousness Movement Is Authorized. His secretary read one review after another—professors praising Prabhupāda's work and requesting him to go on producing such valuable books. After hearing the reviews, Prabhupāda lay down to rest. "The pen is mightier than the sword!" Rāmeśvara Swami declared.

"Yes," Śrīla Prabhupāda answered. "It is a revolution. That is what I thought as I wrote on and on. The Communists have changed the lives of people throughout the world by their empty literature and false promises. Why not a revolution started on the basis of the absolute knowledge?"

January 18, 1977

After the intense cold of Kumbha-melā, Prabhupāda had recuperated a couple of days in Calcutta. His head cold had gone away, but the swelling in his hands and feet persisted, as did other maladies. Externally, he was diabetic and suffered from poor digestion, as well as from the general dwindling of physical powers common to an eighty-one-year-old body. His condition was not suited for continual travel, hard work, frequent lectures, and taxing management.

Yet Prabhupāda was transcendental to his apparent material condition. Although sometimes he would inquire about cures, mostly he was callous toward his poor health. Even after receiving a doctor's advice or concluding himself what was good for his health, he would often ignore it in favor of what he thought was best for spreading Kṛṣṇa consciousness. Previously, in Vṛndāvana he had felt better by drinking the fresh well water, so he thought he might also get relief by drinking the water of the famous Bindu-sarovara near Bhubaneswar. Besides, ISKCON had recently acquired a small donated plot of land outside the city, and Śrīla Prabhupāda's Oriyan disciple Gaura-govinda Swami had gone there, constructed two simple dwellings, and was making plans to build a temple.

The train journey from Calcutta to Bhubaneswar was twelve hours, another opportunity for Rāmeśvara Swami to probe. His thirty-day assignment as Prabhupāda's secretary was almost over, and then he would return to Los Angeles and his American BBT duties. He had come to India set on inquiring from Prabhupāda about whether there would be world war and, if so, how book distribution would continue and how in the future a new world order of Kṛṣṇa consciousness would be introduced. Prabhupāda had answered many of his questions, but there were always more.

The Puri Express left Calcutta around ten P.M. After taking a massage, Śrīla Prabhupāda stretched out on the lower bunk to rest, and Hari-śauri and Rāmeśvara took the two bunks opposite him. Around midnight Prabhupāda turned on his light, sat up, and began chanting softly on his beads. Within a few minutes, Rāmeśvara awoke and, seeing his spiritual master sitting up, paid obeisances and also sat up, waiting expectantly. Immediately Prabhupāda began to speak about the inevitability of war between Russia and America. Even if America took to Kṛṣṇa consciousness, the war would be inevitable—the only way to stop the godlessness of Communism. When Rāmeśvara asked if that war would be within his lifetime, Prabhupāda said it was difficult to say. It depended, he said, on the devotees' distribution of books and Back to Godhead magazines. Although in Russia the government tried to strictly control all literature, Kṛṣṇa conscious books were entering nonetheless and were immediately becoming popular. The Communist leaders were becoming fearful, but they also had some respect for Indian culture. Prabhupāda said that by increasing book distribution, America, and thereafter the whole world, would become Kṛṣṇa conscious.

"So you have to push on more and more," he said. "This opposition, brainwashing charges, means they are recognizing this as a culture. They may like it or not, but they recognize it as something permanent."

Prabhupāda said he had no political aim, but he knew that Indian culture coupled with American money could save the world. "You must think in terms of the whole world," he said. "Not just one nation. That is our preaching. That is the duty of the G.B.C."

The talk went on for more than two hours, and Rāmeśvara felt completely satisfied by the intimate instructions. Although he had once before asked some of the same questions about book distribution and the war, Prabhupāda had chosen not to answer. But now he revealed some of his thoughts, just as a father instructing a trustworthy son.

Conditions on the ISKCON land in Bhubaneswar were primitive: two small mud-walled huts with thatched roof. Śrīla Prabhupāda occupied one eight-by-twelve room in one of the cottages, and his servant and secretary stayed just on the other side of the wall. Electricity had been installed on the land a few days before, so Hari-śauri had placed an electric lamp and the dictating machine on Prabhupāda's desk.

The second small building, about twenty-five feet from Prabhupāda's hut, was a tiny temporary temple room. A shabby canvas roof spanned the open area between the two buildings, and Prabhupāda's vyāsāsana was beneath this, arranged so he could lecture at outdoor gatherings. Two rented tents also stood on the land, to accommodate visiting devotees during Prabhupāda's stay. Prabhupāda's outdoor toilet facilities, about twenty-five feet behind his hut, consisted of a latrine and a separate area for bathing.

Śrīla Prabhupāda did not mind the primitive facilities; in fact, he liked them. Although he was ill and for personal comfort could have been residing in his choice of comfortable buildings in the West—a manor in London, a castle in Paris, a penthouse apartment in New York City—he felt perfectly at home and happy living in a primitive mud-and-thatched hut on a secluded patch of land in the dust of Orissa.

Sitting on the outdoor vyāsāsana, Prabhupāda spoke to a small gathering of devotees and some local villagers. Śrī Caitanya Mahāprabhu, he said, had two favorite places: Bengal and Orissa. And in Orissa (Jagannātha Purī) He spent the last eighteen years of His life. He went to Vṛndāvana and South India but then returned here to stay with His personal associates, Śrī Rāmānanda Rāya, Sārvabhauma Bhaṭṭācārya, and Śikhī Māhiti. Prabhupāda quoted a scriptural reference indicating that the spiritual movement for this age will begin from Utkala, or Orissa. Śrīla Prabhupāda said Orissa was very special to the Gauḍīya Vaiṣṇavas, and his own Guru Mahārāja was also born here, at Purī. "Now we have got a little place here," he said. "It doesn't matter if it takes time, but slowly but surely we can develop this center. Especially since Bhubaneswar is going to be the capital of Orissa. In the future many tourists will come to see other attractions of Orissa. Now it is up to the Oriyans to develop this idea."

Prabhupāda spoke with Gaura-govinda Swami and told him to begin advertising—private meetings in the afternoon and a regular lecture-kīrtana-prasādam program at night. That evening very few visitors came. ISKCON had done little preaching in Orissa, and Prabhupāda was not as well known. Mostly local farmers, villagers, and poor children came—for the free prasādam. Prabhupāda told the audience that he could speak in three languages—English, Bengali, and Hindi—but not Oṛiyā. He therefore decided to speak in English and have Gaura-govinda translate. He would speak a few sentences and then pause while Gaura-govinda gave the Oṛiyā.

"In this material world," said Prabhupāda during his evening lecture, "always the attempt is to defy the supremacy of the Supreme Personality of Godhead. At the present moment the so-called scientists' only business is how to defy the supremacy of God. Naturally this movement has to face many impediments, because at the present moment the whole world is practically godless. Even in our country, in India, where Bhagavad-gītā was spoken by the Supreme Personality of Godhead, Kṛṣṇa—even here the same attempt is going on. Big, big scholars, big, big politicians, they take Bhagavad-gītā in their hand to show that they are great authorities in Bhagavad-gītā. But they are presenting commentation just to defy Kṛṣṇa." Prabhupāda spoke for about ten minutes. There were no questions.

Bhubaneswar's hot days and cool nights just suited Prabhupāda. After resting for a few hours, he rose and began translating Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam. It was the first time he had done so since leaving Bombay for Kumbha-melā. He was nearing the end of the Ninth Canto.

Gaura-govinda Mahārāja had scheduled a cornerstone-laying ceremony for a new temple on February 2, the appearance day of Lord Nityānanda. Prabhupāda agreed to stay until then and leave the next morning.

Śrīla Prabhupāda's failing health prevented him from eating fried foods. His expert cooks in Bhubaneswar, Pālikā-devī dāsī and Śrutirūpā-devī dāsī, carefully prepared meals that were nutritious and tasty but without ghee. Sometimes, however, he specifically requested certain fried foods but would later complain that they didn't agree with him.

Rāmeśvara Swami, Gargamuni Swami, and Bhavānanda Goswami were sitting with Śrīla Prabhupāda in his hut discussing deprogramming cases with him. They were saying that these enemies of ISKCON were so fanatical that for Śrīla Prabhupāda to go to America would be dangerous. Śrīla Prabhupāda interrupted, however, changing the subject. "Our immediate problem," he said, "is toward my health. I am not digesting food. Therefore there is some swelling in the hands and the legs."

"Is it affecting your translation work?" asked Rāmeśvara Swami.

"That it has not affected," said Prabhupāda. "It is going on. I have translated seventeen volumes. That may not be affected." He reached over and turned on the dictating machine, and they heard a few seconds of his most recent dictation from the twenty-fourth chapter of the Ninth Canto.

"We know you have a very low opinion of doctors," said Rāmeśvara Swami.

"I wish to die without a doctor," Prabhupāda said. "I may be seriously ill, but don't call a doctor. Chant Hare Kṛṣṇa. Don't be disturbed. Everyone has to die. Let us die peacefully, without doctor. All this medicine, injections, and prohibitions, this, that. Chant Hare Kṛṣṇa and depend on Kṛṣṇa. Nārtasya cāgadam udanvati... that is Prahlāda Mahārāja's verse. Find out this—Seventh Canto." Hari-śauri reached to Prabhupāda's bookcase for the Seventh Canto, Volume Two, of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam. Within a few moments he found the verse and read aloud:

"My Lord Nṛsiṃhadeva, O Supreme, because of a bodily conception of life, embodied souls neglected and not cared for by You cannot do anything for their betterment. Whatever remedies they accept, although perhaps temporarily beneficial, are certainly impermanent. For example, a father and mother cannot protect their child, a physician and medicine cannot relieve a suffering patient, and a boat on the ocean cannot protect a drowning man."

"These are facts," said Prabhupāda.

"That's ultimately, " said Gargamuni Swami. "But maybe we could give you some temporary relief. Because when you are ill, we feel—"

"Yes," Prabhupāda conceded. "But no severe treatment should be accepted. Better not to take. Better to chant Hare Kṛṣṇa."

"Śrīla Prabhupāda," said Bhavānanda. "In the past, when your health was not good, they have begun chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa in all the temples around the world—a special additional kīrtana. Perhaps we could institute that."

"No," said Prabhupāda, "not for my health. You do your kīrtana ordinary. That first stroke on Second Avenue, that was almost fatal. You were present, I think?" Prabhupāda turned to Gargamuni, and they reminisced about the stroke in 1967.

Hari-śauri said a homeopathic doctor had just prescribed some special medicine, and Prabhupāda agreed to try it. Gargamuni said that his father used to have a similar swelling, but his had been due to diabetes. "I have diabetes," said Prabhupāda. Gargamuni Swami said his father used to give himself an insulin injection every morning. "There are many gentlemen who take insulin at least once a day," said Prabhupāda, although he obviously had no intentions of doing so.

Prabhupāda's main health program was his diet, but even in that he was not very strict. An Indian cook named Shantilal was present in Bhubaneswar, and he used a lot of spices and ghee in cooking for Gargamuni Swami and his men. Sometimes Prabhupāda would ask for some of what Shantilal had cooked, and this greatly disturbed Prabhupāda's servants and cooks, although they could do nothing about it. Gargamuni had also been ill recently, and when Prabhupāda first saw him with his cook Shantilal, he had said, "I thought you were sick."

"Yes," Gargamuni had replied, "but still I have to eat. Śrīla Prabhupāda, you are eating very simply. You are not eating spiced food?"

"Sometimes I also have to have spices," Prabhupāda replied. "Otherwise there is no taste. And without that taste, what is the use of life?" Then in a joking spirit Prabhupāda and Gargamuni Swami commiserated, saying they were not going to stop eating tasty prasādam.

"We'd rather die," laughed Gargamuni Swami, and Prabhupāda also laughed.

On his last day as Śrīla Prabhupāda's secretary in India, Rāmeśvara Swami entered Prabhupāda's hut and inquired again about war in the future.

"You have mentioned several times," he began, "that there is a conflict which is inevitable between Russia and America."

"No," said Prabhupāda. "If they understand Kṛṣṇa consciousness, both of them, then there will be no conflict. Now we are publishing in Russian."

When Rāmeśvara asked what would happen if many cities were bombed, Prabhupāda said that people would come to their senses and adopt a simpler, agrarian life, just as the ISKCON farm communities were demonstrating. "That will be a good lesson for them," said Prabhupāda.

"So is this conflict part of the spreading of Kṛṣṇa consciousness?"

"Oh, yes. Paritrāṇāya sādhūnām vināśāya ca duṣkṛtām.* To conflict means to finish their sinful activities—finished. Stop it."

"So after the conflict there will be an opportunity to influence people?"

"We shall take every opportunity," said Prabhupāda. "We are the best opportunists. Anukūlyena kṛṣṇa. This is anukūla—favorable for spreading Kṛṣṇa consciousness—and we shall immediately accept it. It doesn't matter what it is. We do not depend on the public opinion, that this is good or this is bad. Good means if it is favorable for spreading Kṛṣṇa consciousness."

Rāmeśvara said that it seemed the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement would have to grow much more before it could actually be as influential as Prabhupāda was indicating

"It will grow," said Prabhupāda. "It is growing. Simply our workers should be very sincere and strict, and it will grow. Nobody can object. That's a fact. Simply we have to be very strict and sincere, and nobody can check."

"We will be the only ones who have any vision of what to do after the war," said Rāmeśvara.

"Yes," said Prabhupāda. "We have got clear vision. We are not putting any theory. We are always presenting fact, and that is materializing. Just like we started our farm communities. It is materializing gradually. It is not yet fully organized. Still there is hope that it will give peace to the people. There is sufficient hope."

After a few days, more of the people of Bhubaneswar began to visit Śrīla Prabhupāda. One evening he was in his room speaking with several men when one of them asked, "Well, Swamiji, actually what is God?"

Śrīla Prabhupāda opened his eyes widely in disbelief. "What is this?" he said. "You are from India, and you do not know what is God? This is the degradation of Kali-yuga." Śrīla Prabhupāda continued his sharp criticism and then explained that Indians have the special benefit of Vedic literature and culture; therefore, every Indian should know God.

Prabhupāda gave his first public lecture the next evening, and about 150 people attended. He began his lecture, "Last night some gentleman questioned, 'What is God?' " Śrīla Prabhupāda explained that Śrī Bhagavān personally appears in "our country," Bhārata-varṣa, and leaves His instructions, which have been accepted by the ācāryas. India, Prabhupāda explained, is especially favored, since God personally incarnates there and imparts His instructions. "But at the present moment," Prabhupāda continued, "our young men are inquiring, 'What is God?' So why has this happened? It has happened because we are making progress toward animal civilization".

Anyone with a bodily conception of the self, Prabhupāda said—anyone thinking of his identity in relation to family, country, or race—was no better than a cow or an ass, according to Vedic śāstra. He repeatedly warned that Indians should be careful of sinking to the position of having to ask what is God. Unfortunately, when he called for questions after his lecture, it was the same thing.

"I want to know the meaning of the word Kṛṣṇa," a man asked.

"You do not know what is the meaning of Kṛṣṇa?" Prabhupāda retorted. "You do not know?"

The man said something in Oriya and then said in English, "The etymological meaning."

"Kṛṣṇa," said Prabhupāda, "means all-attractive. Kṛṣ, karṣati. Yes, Kṛṣṇa means the attractive, all-attractive. And besides that, you do not know Kṛṣṇa? That is the difficulty, that our people have become so degraded that they are asking what is God, what is Kṛṣṇa. Someone has studied the Seventh Canto of Rāmāyaṇa, but now he is asking, 'Whose father is Sītā?' So this is the position. We are born in the country where Kṛṣṇa spoke everything, and now we are asking, 'What is the meaning of Kṛṣṇa? What is God?' This is the position, very degraded position."

While Prabhupāda rode in his car to the park for his morning walk, he saw billboards and banners announcing that Sanjay Gandhi was coming to town. Sanjay Gandhi's particular political platform was that everyone should become literate. Looking out the window at the poor, barren land, Prabhupāda said, "What is the benefit of literacy when the people are poor and starving?" He said that the local people were coming to the ISKCON evening program just to get a little kicharī—not because it was prasādam, but because they were hungry. So if after many years of education they learned to read but still earned little money and had the same employment, then what was the benefit? Life was not for such education. Prabhupāda lamented that so much land was lying uncultivated.

Seeing several men jogging, Prabhupāda commented that most people were hungry and poor while a few were living in big houses, overeating, and running to lose fat. "So he will educate the people," Śrīla Prabhupāda said, "and after some time they will join the Naxalite movement and kill the rich man. No. Everyone should be engaged in working the land." Prabhupāda said his ISKCON men should also work, because unless they were properly engaged they would gossip and fall victim to sex desire.

Since arriving in Bhubaneswar, Śrīla Prabhupāda had several times talked about going to Jagannātha Purī, about an hour away. Since he had hopes of one day building a big center in Purī, he wanted to see some plots of land for sale. He hadn't been to Purī, he said, since 1958. Since his Western disciples were not allowed to enter the Jagannātha temple, Prabhupāda said he would not enter either. But he would go to Purī to see what land was available.

Early one morning Prabhupāda set out in his car for Purī, on the Bay of Bengal. He looked at several properties there, but either their locations were poor or the buildings were deteriorated, or both. Prabhupāda walked along the beach with his men, and the surf was pounding. "I was jumping here," he laughed. "In 1920 or '21 I came here. At that time I was married. I was married in 1918. I came after appearing for my B.A. examination. And because I was jubilant, I was jumping. When the waves came I was jumping. Now it is fifty-seven years after. They say we do not change bodies, but where is that body? Now I am walking with stick. Then I was jumping. I am still here. I remember. But the body has changed. What is the difficulty to understand? I am the same. Otherwise, how I am remembering all these things? But that body is now lost. Tathā dehāntara-prāptiḥ. Why this simple philosophy these rascals cannot understand?"

Śrīla Prabhupāda stayed a day at the beachside Tourist Bungalow, and one of his Godbrothers, Śyāmasundara Brahmācārī, from the local Purusottama Gaudiya Math visited. After he left, Sri Sevasiva Rath, a member of the pūjārī committee of the Jagannātha temple, also came to visit. Prabhupāda spoke to him about the possibility of ISKCON devotees entering the Jagannātha temple. To bar the Western Vaiṣṇavas from entering the temple was prejudiced and ignorant. Since the members of the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement were fully engaged in spiritual life, they should not be considered unfit simply because of their birth status or race. Sevasiva Rath was friendly and agreed with Śrīla Prabhupāda; he promised he would do what he could to help. He also told Prabhupāda about a book he had just published and invited him to attend a small paṇḍāl meeting the next evening, at which the book would be inaugurated. Prabhupāda agreed.

Later, Prabhupāda was sitting on the veranda outside his room at the Tourist Bungalow. As he sat watching Shantilal preparing lunch in the back of Gargamuni's van, he could smell the aromatic spices cooking in the ghee. He called to Gargamuni Swami and asked that a plate of Shantilal's cooking be brought to him. Soon Prabhupāda was enjoying a meal of rice, dāl, purīs, spicy sabjīs, and chutney. He said that Shantilal cooked wonderfully and that all devotees in ISKCON should learn this art. If the meat-eaters could take such prasādam, he said, they would give up their sinful habit.

As Prabhupāda sat in his hotel room that evening with a few disciples at his feet, he reminisced about how he had come to America in 1965 and had suffered two heart attacks at sea. “They say that anyone who gets a third heart attack,” said Prabhupāda, “they must expire. I had two attacks on the ship, and then in New York a third one—paralyzed. Left side was paralyzed. I do not know how I was saved. And one girl, that captain's wife, she studied astrology. She said, “Swami, if you can survive your seventieth year, then you will live for one hundred years.' ”

Śrīla Prabhupāda and his disciples laughed.

“So,” Prabhupāda continued, “somehow or other I have survived my seventieth year. I do not know whether... They say I will live for a hundred years. But seventieth year was severe. Three heart attacks and paralysis. And I was without any family. At that time none of you were with me. I was alone. I wasn't dependent on anyone. But on the ship I saw that Kṛṣṇa was going to save me. I was going for His mission.”

Devotees were regularly bringing up the topics of brainwashing and deprogramming. That evening, one of the devotees mentioned that sometimes the opposition was taking the testimony of an exdisciple of Prabhupāda's, who would speak against the movement.

“Because he is a rascal,” Prabhupāda explained, “therefore he is ex communicated. My Guru Mahārāja kicked him out. So what is the value of his testimony? That is natural that someone will go out and speak against us. These things will happen in preaching. You cannot expect very smooth path.” The devotees agreed, and someone added that one of Jesus' closest disciples had betrayed him.

Śrīla Prabhupāda compared the present trouble to the troubles he had encountered when he first came to America. He reminisced further about his near fatal illness in 1967 and his return to India, where he had recuperated. But even after returning to America, he commented, he had not been able to sleep at night because of a sound in his ear.

“As long as the body will be there,” Prabhupāda said, “there will be so many troubles. Kṛṣṇa has advised that they will come and go. Don't care for it. Āgamāpāyino 'nityās tāms titikṣasva bhārata. So bodily troubles, mental troubles, and enemies—so many impediments will come. What can be done? We have to tolerate. That is the material world. We cannot expect smooth, very happy. That is not possible. Kṛṣṇa was advising that to Arjuna, what to speak of us. Kṛṣṇa never says, “I have made some magic. You will have nothing to suffer.’ He never gave Arjuna any tablet. So we have to follow that. The modern gurus say, “I will give you some magic ash. There will be no trouble.’ But Kṛṣṇa, what did He say? He said, “No, tolerate.’ He did not say, “You are ass. I will give you some ash.’ Neither did Arjuna ask, “Why do You ask me to fight? Give me some ash. I'll throw it.’ He was not such a fool that he asked some magic from Kṛṣṇa to kill his enemies. Actually he fought. This is Bhagavad-gītā. So face things as they are, and depend on Kṛṣṇa. That is our duty. Don't expect any ash, miracle, magic.”

The next morning, from the porch, Śrīla Prabhupāda was watching the devotees swimming in the Bay of Bengal. Calling Hari-śauri over, he said he would like to bathe in the ocean and asked him what he thought about it. Hari-śauri and the other devotees present all thought it was a good idea. Sea water was supposed to be very good for health, they said. Prabhupāda said he would try it and after taking his morning massage walked down to the seashore, wearing his gamchā and carrying a towel. The ocean shore was about a hundred yards from the hotel, and by the time Prabhupāda reached the water, all the devotees were running after him in their gamchās.

Some of the devotees were already in the ocean, and when Prabhupāda reached the water's edge, they all gathered around him. As the waves glided in and swirled around Prabhupāda's feet, Hari-śauri scooped palmfuls of water and began to bathe Prabhupāda's body—his arms, chest, and head—washing away the mustard seed oil he had applied during the massage. Soon other devotees began reverently splashing handfuls of water onto Prabhupāda's body. Standing almost up to his knees in water, the bright sunshine illuminating his golden-hued body, Prabhupāda laughed as the devotees joined in.

The devotees realized that this pastime was just like an abhiṣeka, or bathing of the Deity, and when Guru-kṛpā Swami began to sing the prayers for bathing the Deity—cintāmaṇi-prakara-sadmasu—the other devotees joined in, singing and taking part in the abhiṣeka by the sea. Śrīla Prabhupāda enjoyed it, sometimes putting his head forward to indicate that he wanted water poured on his head, then closing his eyes as the devotees poured the water. When Prabhupāda lost his balance for a moment, Hari-śauri grabbed him. Prabhupāda's feet had been sinking into the sand, and when he held one foot out it was muddy. As he wriggled his toes, a devotee poured water on the foot, washing it clean. Prabhupāda then bent over, put ocean water in his mouth, and spat it out. Only Guru-kṛpā Swami was quick enough to catch some of the water and drink it.

As Prabhupāda allowed the devotees to participate in bathing and gently massaging him, the devotees were carried away by ecstatic feelings. After about ten minutes, Prabhupāda came out of the water, changed his clothes, and walked back to the hotel, where two devotees escorted him to a comfortable chair, sat him down, and carried him up to his room for his afternoon rest.

In the afternoon, Sevasiva Rath came again to see Prabhupāda, accompanied this time by another Purī brāhmaṇa. They gave Prabhupāda some Jagannātha prasādam and sang the Jagannāthāṣṭakam. In silent appreciation Prabhupāda listened as the brāhmaṇas sang the famous prayers with each verse ending jagannāthaḥ svāmī nayana-patha-gāmī bhavatu me ("O Lord of the universe, kindly be visible unto me.") When the two brāhmaṇas finished singing, Prabhupāda said, "So these European and American Vaiṣṇavas, they are hankering after jagannāthaḥ svāmī nayana-patha-gāmī bhavatu me. Now it is through your intervention that they may be able to see Jagannātha Svāmī. They are hankering like that—jagannāthaḥ svāmī nayana-patha-gāmī."

Sevasiva Rath again expressed his sympathy about the devotees' not entering Jagannātha's temple. He also told Prabhupāda more about the book he had published, a compilation of select verses from Jagannātha dāsa's translation of the Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam into Oriya. Sevasiva had also written some commentary, and his book was to be inaugurated at a function that evening. Prabhupāda again promised to attend and address Purī's brāhmaṇas and religionists.

That evening, Śrīla Prabhupāda was guest of honor at the outdoor paṇḍāl on the beach, and his disciples accompanied him to the stage with a rousing kīrtana. Prabhupāda took his seat. After the kīrtana ended, one of the managers of the Jagannātha temple came forward and garlanded Śrīla Prabhupāda. Sevasiva then announced, "We thank A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami Prabhupāda, who has been kind enough to grace this occasion wherein we have assembled this evening to pay our respectful homage to His Holiness Jagannātha dāsa Gosvāmī, who was a contemporary of Lord Caitanya." Suddenly, about five brāhmaṇas sitting on a platform rose and walked off the stage to join a kīrtana party in front of an altar in a nearby field. It seemed strange to the devotees that these men had to leave just when Śrīla Prabhupāda was going to speak.

"I thank you very much," Śrīla Prabhupāda began, but then the sound system failed. Śrīla Prabhupāda paused, while one of his own disciples, an electrician, corrected the problem. Śrīla Prabhupāda resumed speaking, his voice amplified above the distraction of the nearby kīrtanas.

"So in our humble way," Prabhupāda was saying, "we are trying to introduce Jagannātha Svāmī's culture. Jagannāthaḥ svāmī nayana-patha-gāmī bhavatu me." Sevasiva had invited Prabhupāda explicitly to speak about his new book, and Prabhupāda had already mentioned privately to his disciples that these people were inviting him to serve their own purpose. But now Prabhupāda took the occasion to speak about Lord Jagannātha, rather than about the Oriyan Jagannātha dāsa. He had a special message in mind.

"You will be very much pleased to know," he continued, "that in the year 1967 I introduced Ratha-yātrā in San Francisco, and it has been going on continually for the last nine or ten years. And the government, they have fixed up a holiday for Ratha-yārā. We have the twentieth of July as a government-fixed-up holiday for Ratha-yātrā. And people take part in the Ratha-yātrā. Not only my devotees, but even outsiders. Ten to twelve thousand people attend, and we distribute prasādam to all of them. They feel very much obliged. And the newspaper writes that people in general never felt such ecstasy as they are feeling in the Ratha-yātrā festival. The police say that the crowds in the Western countries, as soon as there is a big crowd, they create disturbance. But the police were surprised that this crowd is not a window-breaking crowd.

"Next we introduced Ratha-yātrā in London. And in London, Trafalgar Square—it is the most famous square within the city—there is a big column called Nelson's Column. Our ratha was so high that The Guardian newspaper criticized this Ratha-yātrā as a rival to Nelson's Column. Next we introduced Ratha-yātrā in Philadelphia. And last year we introduced Ratha-yātrā in New York. And we also have Ratha-yātrā in Melbourne and Sydney and in Paris.

"So in the Western countries Ratha-yātrā is being introduced one after another, and Jagannātha Svāmī is attracting the attention of the Western people." Suddenly some of the men on the stage began talking loudly among themselves in Oṛiyā. Prabhupāda stopped, turned, and said, "What is that?" The talking subsided, and he continued.

"So people will come in your Jagannātha Purī now from all parts of the world. That is beneficial from various points of view. From the point of view of the tourist program, the government will benefit. When people are attracted to see Jagannātha Purī, Jagannātha Svāmī, that is good. But unfortunately you do not allow these foreigners to enter the temple. How it can be adjusted? This stumbling block should be dissolved, that you want Jagannātha Svāmī to be compact within your home and you do not expand the mercy of Jagannātha.

“He is Jagannātha.* He is not only just Purīnātha or Oriyānātha. He is Jagannātha. Kṛṣṇa declares in the Bhagavad-gītā, bhoktāraṁ yajña-tapasāṁ sarva-loka-maheśvaram. That is the definition of jagannātha—sarva-loka-maheśvaram.* So why you should deny the inhabitants of sarva-loka the darśana of Jagannātha? Śrī Caitanya Mahāprabhu never approved such things. Śrī Caitanya Mahāprabhu said prthivīte ache yata nagarādi grāma/ sarvatra pracāra haibe mora nāma. When the thing is being done and when they are eager to come here, why you should restrain? What is the cause? This is not very good.”

Śrīla Prabhupāda continued to argue that foreigners who had taken to Vaiṣṇavism should be allowed to enter the temple of Lord Jagannātha. Offenses to the Vaiṣṇavas, he said, were condemned by Lord Caitanya. Therefore, Prabhupāda declared, he had come to Purī specifically to request the leaders to remove this offensive restriction and be friendly to the foreign devotees. He invited Purī's leaders to come and see the Jagannātha and Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa temples all over the world and see how the foreigners had actually become pure Vaiṣṇavas, strictly avoiding sinful life. “No illicit sex, no meat-eating, no fish-eating, no egg-eating, no intoxication, no gambling,” said Prabhupāda.

“Why you should not receive them as Vaiṣṇava and give them proper reception? That is my request. I hope there are many learned scholars and devotees present here. They should endeavor to remove this restriction of shortsightedness, and let us combinedly work with Jagannātha to preach the bhakti cult for the benefit of the whole world.”

As Prabhupāda finished his lecture, Hari-śauri leaned forward and asked Prabhupāda if he wanted to answer questions. But Sevasiva came quickly to Prabhupāda's side and said, “No, don't put their questions.” Sevasiva picked up the small paperback volume which was supposed to have been the topic of the evening's presentation. “The Bhāgavata of Jagannātha,” said Sevasiva, and he handed it to Śrīla Prabhupāda, requesting him to now speak, as expected, about the merit of the book and its inauguration. Śrīla Prabhupāda looked indifferently at the small book in his hand. Speaking over the microphone he said, “So what shall I do? Of course, I do not know the Oriya language, but it is said that it is Bhāgavata of Jagannātha. So it is inaugurated today.” Prabhupāda placed the book down and stood up to leave. The audience applauded.

Śrīla Prabhupāda then walked off across the sands in the dark, followed by his disciples, and entered a nearby Gaudiya Math temple, where the devotees held kīrtana. They then went to another Gaudiya Math temple, Purusottama Math, and again held kīrtana.

During the chanting at Purusottama Math, Prabhupāda sat in a chair. When he was ready to leave, he began to stand, using his cane as a support, but suddenly, as he was about halfway up, he dropped down again onto the chair. Hari-śauri had to lift him to his feet by holding him under the arms. Prabhupāda said nothing, but walked slowly out of the hall and got into the car. Not everyone had noticed Prabhupāda's momentary collapse, but Hari-śauri, on returning to his room, anxiously wrote of it in a letter to a Godbrother as “yet another sign that Śrīla Prabhupāda's health is very quickly dwindling away.” Certainly none of the Purī paṇḍitas had noticed any dwindling from Śrīla Prabhupāda's presentation on behalf of Lord Jagannātha, Lord of the universe.

In Bhubaneswar, just before three A.M. on the morning of January 30, Śrīla Prabhupāda began dictating the Tenth Canto of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam. One of his servants in the next room heard through the wall and became so excited that he awakened the other devotees. The dividing wall between the two rooms was about six feet high, with an opening above the wall up to the thatched roof. Light from Śrīla Prabhupāda's room shone into the next room through that opening, and his voice, although faint, could be clearly heard. He was dictating a short description of each chapter of the Tenth Canto.

"The first chapter, which has sixty-nine verses," he began, "describes Mahārāja Parīkṣit's eagerness to learn about the incarnation of Lord Kṛṣṇa, and it also tells us how Kāṁsa killed the six sons of Devakī because of his fear of being killed by her eighth child. The Second Chapter contains forty-two verses,..." Prabhupāda's patient description of each of the ninety chapters was the epitome of faithful rendering of paramparā knowledge—without concoction, interpretation, addition, or subtraction. Therefore, he spoke with the same full faith that the original speaker of the Bhāgavatam, Śukadeva Gosvāmī, had spoken with five thousand years ago to Mahārāja Parīkṣit.

"Simply by chanting or repeating kṛṣṇa-kathā," Prabhupāda was saying, "one is liberated from the contamination of Kali-yuga. This is the mission of Kṛṣṇa consciousness: to hear about Kṛṣṇa and thus be liberated from material bondage." Sitting up on their blankets, the devotees listened; they would not return to sleep. It was an important, historic moment.

The Tenth Canto begins five thousand years ago, when the entire world was oppressed by demonic rulers, and Prabhupāda was comparing the situation then to the present situation. His words were faint, but not weak. He was unhesitating, sure. "Without reference to the supreme power of the Personality of Godhead," Prabhupāda dictated, "demons assert themselves to be independent kings and presidents, and thus they create a disturbance by increasing their military power. When such disturbances are very prominent, Kṛṣṇa appears. At present also, various demonic states all over the world are increasing their military power in many ways, and the whole situation has become distressful. Therefore Kṛṣṇa has appeared by His name in the Hare Kṛṣṇa movement, which will certainly diminish the burden of the world. Philosophers, religionists, and people in general must take to this movement very seriously, for man-made plans and devices will not help bring peace on earth."

Śrīla Prabhupāda was like a field general in his tent, and his disciples were like his infantry men. They knew they were hearing his battle strategies even before the information was disseminated through the chain of command. They were thrilled. With faith they heard that just as Kṛṣṇa had defeated the demonic rulers, so the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement would counteract the demonic culture of the present age.

Later, on the morning walk, one of the devotees mentioned to Prabhupāda that they were planning to put his name on a sign on the door, saying that on January 30 at 2:50 A.M., Śrīla Prabhupāda began the Tenth Canto. Prabhupāda was pleasantly surprised that they had heard him.

"Kṛṣṇa's flute can be heard in the Tenth Canto," said Prabhupāda, "and the chapters Twenty-nine through Thirty-four are the smiling face of Kṛṣṇa."

Another of Śrīla Prabhupāda's G.B.C. men, Satsvarūpa dāsa Goswami, had recently replaced Rāmeśvara Swami as Prabhupāda's secretary for the month. "Śrīla Prabhupāda," Satsvarūpa asked one evening while sitting with Prabhupāda in his quarters, "when I first came here Rāmeśvara Mahārāja said that you had been speaking of how Kṛṣṇa consciousness would rise to power in the United States, and I find it hard to have that vision, since now it is just the opposite."

"It is true," said Śrīla Prabhupāda, "but now it has only taken its roots. You have to water and protect it, then you will get fruit. You have to give it protection. People must hear about us by our books, and we have to talk about the books."

"So it is not that it will happen overnight?"

"No," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "Gradually it will grow. The seed is there. Now protect it by introducing more and more books in every house."

Again, Prabhupāda referred to the upcoming New York court case. "At least tell them to read our books," he said. "This is our statement. Our defense is that you first of all read these books and then give your statement. Finish this, and then give your judgment. Give them all these eighty-four books!"

Śrīla Prabhupāda became excited by the thought of the judges and lawyers reading all his books. He was completely serious, and he insisted the devotees get the authorities to read the books as legal evidences. Śrīla Prabhupāda continued, "Kṛṣṇa says, sarva-dharmān parityajya, 'Surrender to Me and give up all other religion.' Now the question may arise, 'Why we shall surrender?' Then you can argue and go on for three years. The whole thing will come out: What is God? What is creation? What is your position? Why you should surrender? And so on, and so on, so on. What do you think?"

"Yes, we should introduce the books as much as possible," said Satsvarūpa. "I'll write a letter to New York and tell them to emphasize this."

"Bring all these books in the court," Prabhupāda said. "One time in Calcutta there was a big lawyer named Mr. Ghosh. So on one case he brought so many books for argument. The judges were friends, so they very mildly criticized him, 'Oh, Mr. Ghosh, you have brought the whole library?' 'Yes, my lord,' said Mr. Ghosh, 'just to teach you law.'" Śrīla Prabhupāda laughed and repeated, "Yes, my lord, just to teach you law."

Prabhupāda wanted his disciples to apply the same logic in the New York case. If the judge objected and said, "Why have you brought so many books to bother me?" the devotees should reply, "You have to hear. It may take twelve years to hear, but you have to hear. This is the law." It sounded difficult, but the devotees knew they would have to try. This was Śrīla Prabhupāda's specific instruction for handling the case.

"We have to say," said Prabhupāda, "we never tried to brainwash. We have done exactly according to sāstra, authority. Here is the evidence. We have not manufactured anything. So they must read all the books. I think you should take defense in that way."

"Our defense statement is already written in your books," said Hari-śauri. "Certain sections?" asked Satsvarūpa. "Or should we say that they have to read all the books?"

Prabhupāda shouted, "All! Line to line. Our defense is eighty-four volumes."

"But they'll say," said Guru-krpā Swami, " "If we read all these books, we'll become brainwashed too.'"

"That is my duty," said Prabhupāda, "—you are trying to brainwash me, and I am trying to brainwash you. This is going on. That is the tussle. It is wrestling. You are trying your strength. I am trying my strength. Otherwise, where is there fight? You have got right to not agree with me. I have got right to not agree with you. Now let us settle."

In Bhubaneswar on February 2, the appearance day of Lord Nityā nanda, Śrīla Prabhupāda held the cornerstone-laying ceremony. About a thousand people came during the day to take prasādam. Sevasiva Rath attended and spoke. Prabhupāda's disciple Svarūpa Dāmodara also spoke, as did Prabhupāda himself. Later, Prabhupāda discussed with his disciples about how to manage the Bhubaneswar center. Some of the sannyāsīs admitted to Prabhupāda that they did not see much potential there.

"Why not?" questioned Prabhupāda. "This is the capital of Orissa. People are coming here. We have to have centers in every town. Even if it is not a big center, some have to work and stay here. Even if the people are coming every night only to eat the kicharī, that is also preaching."

One of the devotees said that it was too far from town and that Orissa was too poor. A better idea might be to try to build a big temple in Jagannātha Purī. Śrīla Prabhupāda replied that to build in Jagannātha Purī was all right, but that Bhubaneswar was also important. Prabhupāda's Oriyan disciple, Gaura-govinda Swami, told Prabhupāda that as soon as the annual India pilgrimage was over, all the devotees would leave, and he would be left alone with one or two brahmācārīs. He was particularly suited to translating Prabhupāda's books into Oriya, so he asked Prabhupāda to give him someone to help manage the center.

"Where is the fat one?" asked Prabhupāda. "Bring him here." And a devotee ran out to fetch Bhāgavata. At the time the devotee found him, Bhāgavata was sitting in the visitors' tent, telling the other devotees about his plan to go to New York. When he heard Śrīla Prabhupāda wanted to see him, he assumed it was in connection with the cornerstone-laying ceremony, since he was in charge. But as soon as he entered Prabhupāda's room he sensed something heavy was about to happen.

Śrīla Prabhupāda smiled and asked Bhāgavata how he was.

"I'm fine, Śrīla Prabhupāda."

"How would you like to stay here and manage this place?"

"Well, Śrīla Prabhupāda, I don't really think I can stay here. It's too hard."

"Couldn't you stay here and build this building?"

"I could. But it is very difficult. And I was all set to go to New York." Bhāgavata began excitedly telling Prabhupāda about a telegram from Ādi-keśava Swami in New York inviting him to come and head an important preaching department in the temple.

"New York?" said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "They have too many men in New York already. You don't have to go to New York. You should stay here."

Bhāgavata objected; he couldn't work with Gargamuni Swami, the G.B.C. man for this area of India. Prabhupāda replied that he was sending Gargamuni to Bangladesh; he wouldn't be in charge of ISKCON in Orissa any more. Prabhupāda would personally supervise Bhāgavata.

Bhāgavata dāsa's next objection was that his health was not good, and he had to sleep a lot.

"This is a very healthy place," Prabhupāda countered. "You simply go out in the field to pass stool, then wash with your loṭa, and afterwards clean the loṭa with the mud. And you can bathe with the same loṭa. In this way you will stay clean and healthy."

Bhāgavata then raised his ultimate objection. "Śrīla Prabhupāda," he said, "to tell you the truth, I'm not chanting my rounds. I think I'd better go to New York, because there is good association there, and I can become strong in my regulations."

"That's all right," Prabhupāda replied. "You are working very hard. So if sometimes you aren't chanting your rounds, that's all right. As long as you are working hard, you can do your rounds at another time."

"Well, Śrīla Prabhupāda," said Bhāgavata dāsa, "according to the Gurvaṣṭakam, I can understand that whenever you please the spiritual master you please Kṛṣṇa."

Prabhupāda smiled. "Yes."

"So if you want me to stay here, then I should stay."

"Yes, I want you to stay here—make life members, build this building, and help manage the place." Although Prabhupāda had laid a cornerstone for a temple, the center had no funds or donors in sight and no established congregation. All the devotees had was faith in Śrīla Prabhupāda.

Śrīla Prabhupāda's train was to leave at 11 o'clock the next night, and Prabhupāda sat in his little hut talking with his disciples until it was time to go. The conversation ranged from World War II politics to the Tenth Canto of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam. At one point, Śrīla Prabhupāda was saying how man cannot change the laws of nature. Man should not claim that he knows something or can do something unless he can stop the miseries of birth, death, disease, and old age. "My position means my karma," Prabhupāda explained. "If I am in the plush Bhaktivedanta Manor, I have the same suffering as I do in this hut. If I think, "Now I am in the Manor. I am happy," that is foolishness. But that is how they think. Then why are they dying? They should stop that. Can you, my disciples, help me in old age? You may try your best, but you should admit it is beyond your power. But as soon as you go back home, back to Godhead, everything is solved."

He spoke about diets. Ghee was not good for him, but to eat only boiled food was like starving. He said he was capable of fasting. "If you give me nothing to eat for three days, I can do it." Gargamuni told Śrīla Prabhupāda of a man he knew in Calcutta who was healthy at ninety and who attributed his health and longevity to his strict diet of only fruits. Gargamuni suggested Prabhupāda try that diet, and Prabhupāda agreed.

Prabhupāda mentioned the diet of his spiritual master. Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī, he said, ate very little, but not only fruits. He liked to eat salty things, and his favorite preparation was made from chick pea flour and peanuts fried in ghee.

After the talk, when devotees were commenting about Prabhupāda's proposed fruit diet, Hari-śauri remarked affectionately, "He has said that before, but he will never do it."

On the overnight train ride to Calcutta, Prabhupāda could not rest because of two drunken men in the next compartment. Throughout the night they were howling and addressing each other, "Oh, Dr. Mukerjee!" "Oh, Mr. Chatterjee!" Prabhupāda remarked with disgust that these were the names of Bengali brāhmaṇa families, but that now they had become drunkards. Jagannātha Purī, he said, had been a holy place for thousands of years, but within a few years it would be so no longer. People were using Purī as a seaside resort for recreation—people like Dr. Mukerjee and Mr. Chatterjee, who had no understanding of spiritual life.

As the train pulled into Howrah Station, Prabhupāda sat for a few minutes before disembarking. The vendors' loud cries of "Chay! Chay!"* punctuated the overall din of humanity and machines.

"This modern society!" Prabhupāda sighed. "It is very painful to even see their faces—they are fallen so much. By seeing their faces you become polluted. Last night they disturbed so much. And they think they are happy, they are enjoying life."

"But we have to take the risk," said Satsvarūpa, "to go and preach?"

"Yes," said Prabhupāda. "If you are engaged in preaching, you are not affected. Sometimes yogīs go to the Himalayas just to avoid seeing the face of the vicious persons. They practice yoga in a sacred and solitary place. Otherwise, what is this? Simply "Chay, chay, chay," and cigarette, bidi, talking nonsense, drinking? Yet the Vedic system is still in India. In the morning they take bath in the villages. In the cities also, at least those who come from the village. You will find in Bombay, many poor men are taking bath early in the morning. You have seen? They will wash their floor, take bath."

With fond thoughts of the pure life in the Vedic village, Śrīla Prabhupāda left the station, passing through the crowds and the noise. He knew Calcutta well, better than any of his disciples. The poverty, chaos, and political slogans did not phase him. It was his hometown. But he had no mundane connections there. He was coming only for a few days—to preach. Then on to Māyāpur.

Māyāpur

February 7, 1977

More than eighty Bengali gurukula boys, along with some one hundred other devotees, greeted Prabhupāda with a kīrtana at the front gate of the Māyāpur Chandrodaya Mandir. The entire ISKCON land seemed to be blooming with flowers, and the freshly painted temple building shone like the first reddish rays of dawn. The new building, a long residential building, was almost completed. “Back to home, back to Godhead,” Prabhupāda said softly, as his car entered the gate and slowly proceeded toward the temple.

He was arriving three weeks before hundreds of devotees from all over the world were scheduled to come and be with him for the celebration of Gaura-pūrṇimā, the appearance day of Lord Caitanya. Bhavānanda Goswami and Jayapatāka Swami, Śrīla Prabhupāda's leaders of ISKCON Māyāpur, ushered him through the crowd of gurukula boys and devotees up to the Deity room, where he beheld and bowed before the shining, golden forms of Śrī Śrī Rādhā-Mādhava.

Later, while sitting in his room on the second floor, Śrīla Prabhupāda complimented the devotees for making the grounds so beautiful and clean. Hundreds of flowers decorated his room like a gorgeous garden. “These flowers are your first success,” said Prabhupāda. He sat back, relaxed with the special pleasure and satisfaction he felt when in the atmosphere of his beloved Māyāpur. “For Kṛṣṇa's service,” he said, “you submit some plan, and He's very glad. We want some flower for Kṛṣṇa's service, and Kṛṣṇa is supplying. Everything we want for Kṛṣṇa, not for our sense gratification. For Kṛṣṇa we can endeavor multifariously—that is the contribution of Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī.”

Śrīla Prabhupāda said that prior to Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī, the Vaiṣṇavas used to live retired lives in Vṛndāvana—no preaching. Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī was the first to demonstrate how pure devotees can preach in sophisticated ways, even living in big buildings and utilizing automobiles in the service of Kṛṣṇa.

“People may be envious that these devotees are living in palatial buildings,” said Prabhupāda, “but Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī Ṭhākura said only the devotees shall live in palatial buildings. Only devotees. Just like government servants are given the best places to live in. Similarly, those who are devotees, they should be given all facilities. Not extravagancy, not luxury, but nice food, nice place, nice facilities—and chant Hare Kṛṣṇa. This is our mission. This is not dry. Especially you coming from America and Europe, you are not accustomed to the hardships of Indian people. You must have the bare necessities of comfort, and serve Kṛṣṇa. This I am trying to do and utilize.”

Prabhupāda thanked the devotees present for working in Kṛṣṇa consciousness, and he reiterated his familiar formula that American brains and American money combined with Indian culture could turn the whole world into a heaven.

Later, Śrīla Prabhupāda went to oversee the new building, the longest building in West Bengal, Jayapatāka Swami said—more than seven hundred feet. Śrīla Prabhupāda said it looked like a train. He inspected all the rooms one by one and emphasized that they must be ready in time for the festival. Walking along the veranda he remarked, “Oh, it is just like Fifth Avenue.”

The next few days were quiet. Prabhupāda would sit taking his massage in the late morning on the roof amid hundreds of potted plants. Leaning on the rail of the veranda outside his room one day, he looked down onto the lawn where one of the women was picking flowers for the Deities. “This is temple,” he said, “—always something going on. And with each flower picked, she advances in spiritual life a little more.” Prabhupāda particularly liked that the Māyāpur Chandrodaya Mandir was always being expanded and improved. He liked to look out from the veranda and see guests arriving, devotees working, and new plans manifesting.

But Prabhupāda's ill health persisted—an imbalance of pitta and vāyu (bile and air), he said. One morning when his servant asked him how he felt, he replied, “Very bad.” But sometimes after a “very bad” morning, he would feel much better.

The devotees did not think of Prabhupāda's illness in a material way, but it caused them anxiety. Over the years he had gone through various health crises, and the devotees knew these illnesses were transcendental, directly controlled by Kṛṣṇa. In 1974, when he had been very ill in Vṛndāvana, he had said that the cause was his disciples' not strictly following the rules and principles of Kṛṣṇa consciousness. His disciples knew they had to strictly follow his orders if they actually cared for his health. He would go on taking risks—accepting more disciples, traveling and preaching—but his disciples had to avoid acting in ways that would disturb his health. Mostly the devotees preferred to think that Prabhupāda's health would soon improve. And Śrīla Prabhupāda himself did not dwell on the subject; he was too absorbed in spreading the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement.

A few days after his arrival, Śrīla Prabhupāda journeyed by car and ferry to Navadvīpa to visit the āśrama of his Godbrother Bhaktirakṣaka Śrīdhara Mahārāja. But while walking up the steep stone steps, Prabhupāda's legs suddenly gave way, and he collapsed. Fortunately, Hari-śauri was close enough to catch him. It was the second time Prabhupāda had collapsed in less than two weeks. Both times he had been actively preaching, and both times he had continued on his way with no mention of what had happened.

In Bhubaneswar, Śrīla Prabhupāda had promised Svarūpa Dāmodara he would go to Manipur with him after the Māyāpur festival. Manipur, an independent country north of India, was mentioned in the Vedic literature, Prabhupāda said. Arjuna's wife Citrāṅgadā had come from Manipur, and it had been ruled by Kṛṣṇa conscious kṣatriyas. Now Śrīla Prabhupāda, encouraged by Svarūpa Dāmodara, who was born and raised in Manipur, was eager to go and try to revive a Kṛṣṇa conscious state there. But with his weakening health, he questioned whether he should travel.

Hari-śauri, who had been with Prabhupāda continually for eighteen months, felt that Prabhupāda's health was not likely to improve. And in one sense, the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement was spreading so widely under Prabhupāda's direction that it was perhaps not so necessary for Prabhupāda to travel, at least not with the extraordinary expenditure of energy and strength that he had been displaying for the last ten years. Maybe he could retire from traveling. Even during the previous summer, when he had been traveling in the United States, he had once remarked that he simply wanted to go there to become encouraged by how well his devotees were managing everything by themselves. He used to say that he had laid the foundation and erected the framework for the building of the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement; now his followers simply had to fill it in. He would often say he had injected medicine into the system of materialistic society; now it would spread and act. He also said he had ignited the fire that would now rage around the world. Therefore, although he was always anxious for his movement, he had confidence.

One morning just after breakfast, Prabhupāda was on his veranda looking out across the land of Māyāpur. Turning to Hari-śauri, he said, "Actually it does not matter even if I die immediately. I have given the basis for everything, and now if they simply manage things nicely and follow whatever programs I have begun, then everything will be successful." Hari-śauri was disturbed to hear such statements, and he remained speechless. Then Prabhupāda added, "But still I would like to finish this Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam."

Śrīla Prabhupāda's stay at ISKCON Māyāpur had been quiet, but as the G.B.C. men began arriving from the West, he heard the latest news of the fierce opposition to Kṛṣṇa consciousness in America. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami and Brahmānanda Swami, coming from New York, reported that the case in which Ādi-keśava Swami was being charged with mind control would be heard later in March and that the judge had given Ādi-keśava permission to come and see Śrīla Prabhupāda. They also told Prabhupāda that several other devotees had been kidnapped and that, in some cases, parents had secured legal conservatorship through judges to abduct the devotees.

"What is the complaint of the opposing party?" asked Prabhupāda. Again, as when he had argued with Rāmeśvara Swami, he defended the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement while his disciples fired materialistic arguments at him. It was not just an exercise; he was training his disciples. He had to answer any arguments that had discouraged or weakened them. And beyond that, he was actually the ultimate defender of Kṛṣṇa consciousness.

"They say we are zombies," said Brahmānanda.

"Zombies?" Prabhupāda asked. "What is that?"

"Zombies," said Hari-sauri. "Like a robot. We have no brain. We are like machines. They say we have no freedom of choice."

"Children have got also the same thing," replied Prabhupāda. "But the father stops. Children want to play; they do not like to go to school. Father does not like it. Is that father's attempt to check the child's freedom? Every father is doing that. The government is doing that. Why the government is checking criminals?"

Prabhupāda was interested to hear other news, and Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami reported on the new ISKCON farm in Pennsylvania and on the restaurant in New York City. Brahmānanda Swami talked about their new farm in Africa, and both he and Tamāla Kṛṣṇa gave their impression of things at Hare Krishna Land in Bombay and reported on Gopāla Kṛṣṇa's progress in printing Prabhupāda's books in various Indian languages.

"So this is the thing that is starting to happen now," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa. "They are lobbying in the Congress of the United States to pass laws that if someone is abnormal then the parents should have the right to commit him to psychological treatments. Even though the child may be fifty years old and the parents seventy years old, if the parents think that the child is not sane, then they have the right to have the child committed."

"This is very dangerous," said Prabhupāda.

They told Prabhupāda of a devotee who had been kidnapped while distributing books at an airport. The court had given the girl's parents legal authority to have her confined for thirty days in a special center in Arizona run by deprogrammers. They also told him that among the lobbyists advocating kidnapping were powerful groups of Christians and Jews, who had become active because they saw that other movements, not only the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement, were taking young people away from the religion of their parents. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa suggested that a probable result of ISKCON's court case in New York would be to establish ISKCON as bona fide. Defenders of civil rights in America were alarmed at the threat to constitutional liberties, and therefore the court case was generating great interest. It was a test of freedom of religion. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa told Prabhupāda it was the biggest test case of the decade, and that the American Civil Liberties Union had taken it as one of their main priorities.

"Two states have passed laws making this deprogramming legal," said Brahmānanda Swami. "And they also give tax exemption. That means the government is giving support."

"Yes," said Prabhupāda. "They are afraid that these Kṛṣṇa conscious men may capture the government."

"Yes," agreed Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami, "some of them are saying that the Kṛṣṇa conscious organization is very powerful and that our ambition is to take over the world."

Śrīla Prabhupāda laughed. "That's a fact. Well, let us see. It is a fight between Kṛṣṇa and demon. Let us do our duty and chant Hare Kṛṣṇa; everything will be all right. There were so many demons. Prahlāda Mahārāja was five-years-old boy and his father was such a big demon. But still Prahlāda Mahārāja was victorious. Similarly, you are all like Prahlāda Mahārāja. The fight is there. Chant Hare Kṛṣṇa. Depend on Kṛṣṇa. You will come out victorious. Nṛsiṃhadeva will come. So the 'poison' of Kṛṣṇa consciousness is acting now. That is good. If we come out victorious, that will be a great victory."

As they spoke, the electricity went off, and Prabhupāda's room, as well as the rest of the building, was in darkness. Within a few moments a devotee entered with a kerosene lantern. Prabhupāda began to reminisce, saying that electricity had been introduced in India when he was a young boy. At first not every house could afford electricity, he said, and if a man had a good gas light in his house, he was considered rich. He said the street lamps were carbon arc, and the man who changed the carbon rods would throw the used ones in the street. "When the carbon would be changed," said Prabhupāda, "they would throw, and we children would collect them."

"What would you do with them?" asked Tamāla Kṛṣṇa.

Śrīla Prabhupāda laughed and said, "Play—"We have collected something.' So electricity was introduced in our life when we were ten or twelve."

"But still you were able to read," said Brahmānanda.

"Yes," said Prabhupāda, "with this lantern." He recalled that his father would purchase kerosene for the lanterns. His father was not rich, but by buying and stocking things in quantity, he used to amply provide for his family. Life was simple then, Prabhupāda concluded, but civilized.

The sannyāsīs began telling Prabhupāda about how a military dictatorship had taken over in Argentina and had officially banned the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement. Twenty thousand dollars' worth of books had been seized, and devotees had been arrested. Many other persons were being regularly arrested or shot in the streets.

"Things are deteriorating everywhere," said Prabhupāda.

"Very quickly," added Brahmānanda.

Śrīla Prabhupāda: "So this will give impetus to Kṛṣṇa consciousness—yadā yadā hi dharmasya glāniḥ. [Bg. 4.7] Don't be disappointed. Kṛṣṇa will act through His movement and kill them, these demons. How it will be done, that you cannot know now, but it will be done. Let us remain true soldiers. That's all. And suppose you die in the fight? Fight means with vow, with determination either to gain victory or die. Because it is a fight against māyā. Why you shall be afraid of being killed? When there is a fight, one must know that, 'Either I'm going to be killed or gain victory.' Jīva vā mara vā. Those who are devotees, either they live or they die, it's the same thing. While they live they are serving Kṛṣṇa. When they die they will serve Kṛṣṇa. Jīva vā mara vā. Tyaktvā dehaṁ punar janma naiti mām eti. [Bg. 4.9] He goes to Kṛṣṇa. So what is the loss? We are working for Kṛṣṇa, and if we die we go to Kṛṣṇa. What is the loss?"

A few days later Ādi-keśava Swami arrived in Māyāpur to see Śrīla Prabhupāda. Ādi-keśava was only twenty-three years old, and all these things were creating a great strain upon him. Against his lawyer's advice, he had come to India in desperation, to see Śrīla Prabhupāda. For the preliminary hearings he had worn a business suit and a regular haircut, but now he appeared before Śrīla Prabhupāda with shaven head and saffron robes. Other sannyāsīs had also arrived, and they all gathered in Prabhupāda's room, eager to get his direction.

"This movement is not brainwashing," Prabhupāda began, "we are brain-giving. First of all you must have brain. Then there is a question of washing. But you have no brain. You do not know what is this life. You cannot explain what is the difference between a dead man and a living man. You have got so many big, big scientists and philosophers, but you do not know. So where is your brain? First of all prove your brain. Then there can be a question of washing. It is not brainwashing. It is brain-giving movement. Unfortunately, you have no brain. Therefore you misunderstand. On this point the Bhagavad-gītā will explain. What do you think? Brainwashing or brain-giving?"

"Yes," said Ādi-keśava, "this is good." Prabhupāda said the devotees should consult among themselves, write an essay, and send it to the court. His main point was that most people could not understand the simple truth of the soul. They are in need of knowledge, and the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement is giving essential knowledge of the soul. Therefore it is a brain-giving movement.

Ādi-keśava took the role of the antagonists. "Well," he said, "I have a brain, and it is functioning. Otherwise, how could I be speaking to you now? How could I even answer you?"

"But that speaking and the dog's barking are the same thing," said Prabhupāda. "The dog is barking. What is the difference? He is speaking in a different language, that's all. The dog is barking, and you are speaking. What is the difference?"

Ādi-keśava: "But they say, 'We have art. We have science.'"

"Whatever you may have," Prabhupāda replied, "you cannot answer the ultimate question."

Arguments flew back and forth, as other devotees in the room challenged Prabhupāda's logic. But Prabhupāda stuck to his main point. If a man doesn't know the difference between a dead man and a living man, if he doesn't know the soul, then he has no brain. When the devotees mentioned faith in scripture, Prabhupāda said that he was not arguing on the basis of scripture, but on logic. Whatever arguments they raised, Prabhupāda strongly defeated. There was no trace of illness or weakness in Prabhupāda's demeanor as he drilled his men on how to defend by aggressive argument.

"They say that this discussion is beyond our intelligence," said Ādikeśava.

"If you say beyond your intelligence," said Śrīla Prabhupāda, "that means you have no brain."

In Prabhupāda's association, Ādi-keśava gained strength and conviction. "They complain," said Ādi-keśava, "that if one becomes a devotee, he suffers from loss of identity. But actually, they don't know who they are. So we will challenge them like that, 'What is this loss of identity? You don't even know who you are. So you have nothing to lose.'"

"Yes," said Prabhupāda, with great spirit. "What is your identification? That you do not know. We are teaching that by identifying yourself with this body, you have lost your identity."

"Most of their charges," said Ādi-keśava, "are based on misconceptions about our movement. For instance, they say that we do not eat enough or sleep enough. Yet we have studies from their own scientists that say our diet is good."

Śrīla Prabhupāda: "How we are living if our diet is not good? Ten years we are eating insufficiently? Then how we are living? You do not know what is good food, but the result you have to know. A cow eats so much grass, and a human being eats a small plateful. If the cow says, 'You are not eating sufficient like me,' is that logic?"

"No," said Ādi-keśava, "it is not logic."

Prabhupāda: "So you are just like cows and asses. You eat voraciously. Does it mean I have to eat voraciously?"

"But what proof is there?" asked Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami. "They may argue for proof of the soul."

"This is proof," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "Now if the real active principle has left, if you can understand it, then replace it. Replace life. If you cannot, then you have no brain." Prabhupāda argued that at death, although the parts of a body remained, something was missing.

"But you have not seen that something," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa.

"See it or not," said Prabhupāda, "I can see. Why this man is dead? Something is missing."

"Well," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, "it's just like a machine."

Śrīla Prabhupāda became fiery. "A machine you can replace! Why don't you bring a new body and replace the dead one? Therefore you have no brain! It is a completely different thing!"

Prabhupāda said this philosophy of the soul should be presented in court. "It will be very interesting," he said. "The case will prolong, and we can disclose our whole philosophy. Is it not? Think deeply, over and over, and fight. Tell them, 'What is your seeing? You cannot see beyond this wall. Does it mean there is nothing? Why depend on your seeing, rascal? You are being brainless.' I take it as a good opportunity for describing our whole philosophy. Don't take it as otherwise. Rather, prove yourself sufficient in this subject matter. This is a trial examination."

The devotees told Prabhupāda how critics were examining the Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam and trying to find fault with the devotees on the basis of their philosophy. They were challenged in court about Prabhupāda's statement that man had not gone to the moon.

"I personally did not go with you," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "So how shall I believe? From the practical point of view, I did not go. It is just some news, so why should I accept it? They believe some paper, that's all. So why shall we not believe the Vedic literatures? Vedic literature is so authoritative. It has been accepted by the ācāryas."

Next the devotees began talking about how the parents and deprogrammers justified their use of force. "This clouds the issue in the courtroom," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami, "because everyone naturally feels very sympathetic toward the fathers and mothers."

"Why don't you quote from our śāstra," replied Śrīla Prabhupāda, "that he is not father—pitā na sa syāt. Find this verse."

Pradyumna had the book off the shelf and his finger on the verse within a few seconds. He read, gurur na sa syāt sva-jano na sa syāt, pitā na sa syāj janani na sā syāt/ daivam na tat syān na patiś ca sa syān, na mocayed yaḥ samupeta-mṛtyum. "One who cannot deliver his dependents from the path of repeated birth and death should never become a spiritual master, a father, husband, mother, or worshipable demigod."

"So how is he the father?" asked Prabhupāda. "What is the purport?"

Ādi-keśava Swami: "They argue sometimes that—

"You will argue your point," interrupted Prabhupāda, "but our point is there. We shall argue from our point of view. Unless the father releases the son from the cycle of birth and death, he is not father."

Śrīla Prabhupāda never let up, and finally he concluded, "If you try to advise a rascal, he will be angry. So this is the position. Still, we have to do our business. What can be done? Difficult task. Therefore, if you want to please Kṛṣṇa very quickly, struggle for preaching: ya idam paramam guhyam mad-bhakteṣv abhidhāsyati. So we have got our business, to please Kṛṣṇa. That is our mission. So despite so many inconveniences, we have to do this business. Mūḍho 'yam nābhijānāti loko mām ajam avyayam. [Bg. 7.25] They are all mūḍhas. So we have been engaged to teach them some lesson."

Later, Śrīla Prabhupāda spoke privately and in more detail with Ādi-keśava Swami. "They told me that you had grown your hair," said Prabhupāda. Ādi-keśava admitted it was so but that he couldn't do it any more. He said he wanted to go to court proudly and say that he was Prabhupāda's son and proud of being a devotee. Prabhupāda said that was also his desire, that Ādi-keśava go into court in sannyāsa dress and carrying his sannyāsa-daṇḍa. He should have tilaka and a shaved head, and he should preach. Śrīla Prabhupāda told how people had advised him to wear Western dress when he had first come to America. Ādi-keśava had received recent letters from Prabhupāda, but now Prabhupāda told him face to face to bring all of the books into court and introduce them as evidence. He should boldly preach.

Ādi-keśava mentioned that an official in the Indian Embassy had said that the Indian government would give him asylum if necessary. Śrīla Prabhupāda was pleased to hear this. When Ādi-keśava admitted that he was sometimes discouraged and alone in the prolonged legal struggle, Prabhupāda said he could take other men with him to help. But the main backing Ādi-keśava required was from Śrīla Prabhupāda; he wanted Prabhupāda's mercy. And Prabhupāda, like a father, gave solace and courage to his young, rather frail-looking son who was going into battle. Don't be afraid, Prabhupāda said. Repeatedly he would call Ādi-keśava to his room to give him more mercy: another logical argument, an instruction on how he should act in court. Prabhupāda's essential advice, of which Ādi-keśava was now aware and convinced, was that he should preach; Kṛṣṇa would protect him.

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa replaced Satsvarūpa as Prabhupāda's secretary. Early in the morning, on Satsvarūpa's last day of duty, Śrīla Prabhupāda called him in just after dictating his Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam verses and purports and told him that for breakfast he wanted cucumber, soaked mung dāl and fruits. He said he had just dictated some verses and purports dealing with transmigration, and he rewound the tape and played back the dictation: philosophical arguments of Kṛṣṇa's father, Vasudeva, trying to convince Kamsa about the eternality of the soul. Vasudeva argued that at death the soul changes from one body to another, just as a man walking down the street places one foot in front of the other. And Prabhupāda, while listening, demonstrated by “walking” with two fingers across the dictating machine.

At the present moment there is great opposition to the Hare Kṛṣṇa movement, which is being called a “brainwashing” movement. But actually the so-called scientists, philosophers, and other leaders in the Western countries have no brains at all. The Hare Kṛṣṇa movement is trying to elevate such foolish persons by enlightening their intelligence so that they will take advantage of the human body. Unfortunately, because of gross ignorance they regard the Hare Kṛṣṇa movement as a brainwashing movement. They do not know that without God consciousness one is forced to continue transmigrating from one body to another.

Now the very same arguments that Prabhupāda had spoken to the sannyāsīs were immortalized in the Bhaktivedanta purports. In the future, after the court case had been finished and mostly forgotten, Prabhupāda's true assessment of the situation would prevail.

On February 22, three hundred fifty devotees arrived on a Boeing 747 Air-India jet at Dum Dum Airport in Calcutta. The special flight, all devotees, had flown from Los Angeles to New York to London, picking up more devotees at each stop. As it was the first landing of a 747 in Calcutta, the mayor, local militia, leading Air-India dignitaries, and media people were on hand to greet the historic flight. One of the devotees told a reporter that the Boeing 747's coming from the West to Calcutta was the mercy of Lord Caitanya and Śrīla Prabhupāda. Ten busloads of devotees then rode to Māyāpur.

Soon the Māyāpur Chandrodaya Mandir was teeming with transcendental activity; the Gaurapūrṇimā festival was in full swing. The Vaikunṭha Players of New York staged an evening theater performance of the Rāmāyaṇa, and Śrīla Prabhupāda attended. The audience watched and appreciated Śrīla Prabhupāda almost as much as they did the play.

On the opening night of the paṇḍāl, a government minister attended to officially inaugurate the festivities. He cut a ribbon to open the new building, and he and Śrīla Prabhupāda walked together down the long first-floor corridor and viewed a photo display of ISKCON centers around the world. Halfway down the corridor Śrīla Prabhupāda stopped, shook his head, and said, “It is all inconceivable.” The minister was also amazed at the scale on which Śrīla Prabhupāda was propagating Gauḍīya Vaiṣṇavism. Then Śrīla Prabhupāda and his guest went onto the stage. The minister gave an introductory speech, glorifying a well-known impersonalist svāmī, referring to him as a divine incarnation. He also slighted the name of Lord Caitanya by saying that although he didn't know whether Caitanya Mahāprabhu was an incarnation, he knew He had certainly done good in the world.

Śrīla Prabhupāda spoke next, using scriptural evidence to correct the erroneous opinions the minister had given in his talk. Śrīla Prabhupāda spoke in Bengali, and most of his disciples could not understand, but they could appreciate the gist. Later, when Śrīla Prabhupāda was sitting in his room with a few devotees, he began laughing. Smacking his fist into his left palm, he said, "I have smashed him."

With Gaura-pūrṇimā only about a week away, thousands of Bengali pilgrims were attending the ISKCON center each night. They streamed into the temple room for kīrtana and darśana of Rādhā-Mādhava and then went to see the ISKCON photo exhibit. It was the biggest and best organized Māyāpur festival ever. Despite the opposition in America, Lord Caitanya's movement was flooding the world with the waves of saṅkīrtana, and this gathering of more than five hundred devotees from every continent was a powerful testimony to the good health of the growing Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement.

Rāmeśvara Swami returned with the latest figures of Prabhupāda's book production. In the English language alone Śrīla Prabhupāda had published 43,450,500 pieces of literature. And the total production of Prabhupāda's books in twenty-three languages, including Russian, was 55,314,000, more than ninety percent of which had already been distributed. Rāmeśvara also presented Śrīla Prabhupāda with a new book just off the press, the Ninth Canto, Part One, of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam. Rādhāvallabha reported that the next printing of Bhagavad-gītā As It Is would be so large that the paper required to print it would have to be carried on seventy-six train cars. Prabhupāda and the devotees laughed at the astounding figures.

Prabhupāda thanked the devotees for their hard work. "This is the blessing of my Guru Mahārāja," he said. "He wanted it. And because we are trying to do this, he is giving us all blessings."

Śrīla Prabhupāda continued to be very active: encouraging devotees, writing, preaching. Soon after the busloads of devotees arrived, however, he became very ill again. His busy schedule became a strain, but he continued.

The G.B.C. men began their annual three days of meetings, and each evening they would meet with Prabhupāda. He heard their proposals and, after making some corrections, approved them. The final item on the G.B.C.'s list of resolutions was that all ISKCON temples hold twenty-four-hour kīrtana, in view of Prabhupāda's sickness. The devotees had also done this in 1974 when Prabhupāda had been ill. "Yes," Prabhupāda said when he heard the resolution, "chanting is the only cure for all diseases."

On Gaura-pūrṇimā, Śrīla Prabhupāda accepted more than two hundred disciples for first initiation, and he awarded second initiation to one hundred disciples. Huge crowds poured through the front gate all day; and from four P.M. until late at night, the roads would be packed and the kīrtanas would attract large receptive audiences.

In the afternoon Śrīla Prabhupāda received Tarun Kanti Ghosh, the home minister for Bengal, also in charge of the state police force. Prabhupāda spoke with Mr. Ghosh in his room and found him very favorable toward ISKCON and the Kṛṣṇa consciousness philosophy.

Śrīla Prabhupāda had decided to stay on in Māyāpur instead of accompanying the devotees to Vṛndāvana for the second half of the festival, so some of the leaders came to his room to pay their respects before departing. When Harikeśa Swami and Ādi-keśava Swami entered together, Prabhupāda told Harikeśa that because the people in the Communist countries were suffering so much, he should give them books without making them pay. Turning to Ādi-keśava, he said he had placed much responsibility on Ādi-keśava's thin shoulders but that he should be victorious. "So you are Harikeśa and Ādi-keśava," he said, "the Keśa brothers. So go and preach. Be successful." Śrīla Prabhupāda similarly spoke lovingly with other G.B.C. men as they departed for their assigned areas around the world.

Within a few days, Māyāpur was again quiet, with very few visiting devotees remaining.

Almost two weeks later, while Śrīla Prabhupāda was still in Māyāpur, the news of the New York court decision appeared on the front page of The Times of India. On receiving it, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami immediately brought a copy to Prabhupāda in his room and, at Prabhupāda's request, read it out loud.

HARE KRISHNA MOVEMENT IS BONA FIDE RELIGION

Washington, March 18

The Hare Krishna movement was called a "bona fide religion" yesterday by the New York High Court Justice who threw out two charges against the officials of the movement of "illegal imprisonment" and "attempted extortion." The charge had been preferred by an angry parent that his son, as well as another disciple, had been held by the movement illegally and that they had been brainwashed. "The entire and basic issue before the court," said the Justice in dismissing the charges, "is whether the two alleged victims in this case and the defendants will be allowed to practice the religion of their choice and this must be answered with a resounding affirmative." Said Mr. Justice John Leahy, "the Hare Krishna movement is a bona fide religion with roots in India that go back thousands of years. It behooved Merrill Kreshower and Edward Shapiro to follow the tenets of that faith and their inalienable right to do so will not be trampled upon. The separation of church and state must be maintained. We must remain a nation of laws, not of man. The presentment and indictment by the Grand Jury was in direct and blatant violation of the defendant's constitutional rights." The Justice said that it appeared to the court, "The people rest their case on an erroneous minor premise to arrive at a fallacious conclusion. The record is devoid of one specific allegation of a misrepresentation or any act of deception on the part of any defendant." The Justice said, "The freedom of religion is not to be abridged because it is unconventional in beliefs and practices or because it is approved or disapproved by the mainstream of society or more conventional religions. Without this proliferation and freedom to follow the dictates of one's own conscience in this search of approach to God, the freedom of religion will be a meaningless right as provided for in the constitution. In the attempt, be it direct, well intentioned or not, presents a clear and present danger to this most fundamental basis and eternally needed right of our citizens—freedom of religion." The Hare Krishna movement has been under pressure from various groups and this judgment is expected to stop some of the harassment in which it has been subjected in recent months.

"My mission is now successful," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "In 1965 I went there. This is now recognized after twelve years. I was loitering in the street alone, carrying the books. Nobody cared."

Svarūpa Dāmodara was present, and he spoke with Prabhupāda about the Bhaktivedanta Institute and about preaching in Manipur. And other matters came before Prabhupāda's attention. But he kept coming back to the news from New York. "Our most auspicious sign is this," said Prabhupāda, "—"Hare Krishna Movement Is Bona Fide Religion.' "

Śrīla Prabhupāda's plans were to move to Bombay. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami said a lot of senior devotees were gathering in Bombay. They had gone there from Vṛndāvana and were waiting for Prabhupāda. "I am, therefore, going," said Prabhupāda, "in spite of my so much inconveniences. I am going there."

"You want to stay in Bombay?" asked Tamāla Kṛṣṇa. "How long?"

"I don't want to stay anywhere," said Prabhupāda. "I want to work. Staying—I have stayed in big, big palaces, big, big cities. I have no other desire but to work."

"How long do you want to work in Bombay?" asked Tamāla Kṛṣṇa.

"So long as there is work," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "There is no end of it. Our Bombay should be organized. Work is our life. There is no question of how long. As long as possible. Kṛṣṇa is giving us good opportunities. Now we should take it seriously. It is not a joke—"Hare Krishna Movement Is Bona Fide Religion.' "

The devotees discussed before Prabhupāda the significance of the court decision. They also appreciated the judge and said that he was a senior man in the courts and was considered conservative. Śrīla Prabhupāda said that he should be sent a letter of congratulations: "May God bless you for such right judgment. Live long life to serve God."

"Honest and sincere people normally appreciate our movement," said Svarūpa Dāmodara. "Only those who are envious—

"Envious we don't care about," Prabhupāda interjected. "We don't care, never care about. I didn't care—many times, even my Godbrothers. Neither do I care just now. I'll go on with my work. Why care? We are doing our duty, that's all—under the higher authoritative order. Have no fear. It is not personal gratification. So arrange for Manipur. We shall go."

Svarūpa Dāmodara said he would go to Delhi and try to arrange permits for entry, but that it would be hard, since most foreigners were not allowed to enter Manipur. He said that after doing his business, he would come to Bombay and see Śrīla Prabhupāda.

"Now work very strenuously," said Prabhupāda. "You are all young men. And somehow or other, to a dead horse you have given life. The last fortnight I was thinking I was dead. I was thinking like that—now life is finished. I can be finished at any time—that is not amazing. To live, that is amazing. My life is finished—that is not amazing. No one will lament. "Oh, he was old man, eighty-two years old.' But if I can live for some days more, that is wonderful. If I die that is not wonderful."

"Kṛṣṇa is wonderful," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami.

"Kṛṣṇa is wonderful always," said Prabhupāda.

"And you are wonderful," said Bhavānanda Goswami.

"I am wonderful," said Śrīla Prabhupāda, "as long as I serve Kṛṣṇa. Otherwise, useless, no value. If I can serve Kṛṣṇa, then I am wonderful, certainly."

Śrīla Prabhupāda continued declaring that Kṛṣṇa was the most wonderful and could do anything. That he was alive and still active, he said, attested to Kṛṣṇa's being wonderful. "If Kṛṣṇa is not wonderful," he said, "is it possible for me to do all these things? Who am I? We don't want to become cheaply wonderful. We want to become really wonderful, by serving Kṛṣṇa. That is our mission. Kṛṣṇa is wonderful undoubtedly. Who can become more wonderful than Kṛṣṇa? Mataḥ parataram nānyat. Always remember, Kṛṣṇa is wonderful. Don't take Kṛṣṇa very slightly, like one of you. That is foolishness. Kṛṣṇa is wonderful always. He is the most wonderful person, and He can do anything wonderful."

Śrīla Prabhupāda continued to make appreciative remarks about the judge's decision. He said he had feared the case might have taken fourteen years, and yet it had not even taken fourteen hours. Kṛṣṇa was so wonderful.

March 22

The senior devotees in Māyāpur felt Śrīla Prabhupāda was too ill to travel and that he should remain there and recuperate. Besides, reports from Bombay were conflicting. Surabhi Swami, knowing that Prabhupāda's quarters weren't finished, wanted more time, so he wired Prabhupāda, requesting him not to come. But Girirāja and others had been arranging a lecture program for Śrīla Prabhupāda at a paṇḍāl in Azad Maidan in Bombay, and Girirāja had written inviting Prabhupāda. Prabhupāda considered the opportunities for preaching and decided to go. He had his secretary send a telegram from Māyāpur to Bombay.

PRABHUPĀDA ARRIVING TUESDAY AT 1350 HAVE ROOMS READY IN WHATEVER CONDITION.

But on Prabhupāda's arrival in Bombay, he was so weak that he could not walk down the steep stairs from the airplane, and airline personnel arranged for him to be lowered to the ground by hydraulic lift. Once he was on the ground, several devotees assisted him in walking. Although he appeared frail, he smiled brightly when he saw the devotees waiting for him at the airport.

In the car Śrīla Prabhupāda inquired about the Bombay temple, and Hari-śauri informed him that his quarters were not yet ready, with no toilet, no running water, no doors or windows, and the workmen polishing the floors. Prabhupāda dismissed these objections and said he would move in anyway. The devotees who knew the state of the building became extremely anxious. It didn't seem possible that anyone could live there. But Prabhupāda said he would.

Hari-śauri said he was surprised Prabhupāda had decided to travel, and Prabhupāda replied, "Yes, even up to last night, there was no chance of my coming. But still, somehow or other, we are here." Prabhupāda was traveling and preaching because that was his life. For more than thirty years he had been spreading the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement—first in India and then in America and throughout the world. As long as Kṛṣṇa gave him even a little strength, he would continue. He wanted to hold the public lectures in the city, and he wanted to observe the progress of the construction at Hare Krishna Land, his grandest temple. Even though the temple was not completed, he would move in and show the devotees how to use it.

As they drove up to the entrance to Hare Krishna Land, Prabhupāda could see the tall towers of the ISKCON hotel and the incomplete but massive domes of the temple. These huge structures dwarfed the little shed that was the temporary residence of Śrī Śrī Rādhā-Rāsavihārī. The Deities had been in that shed since 1971, when Prabhupāda had moved Them there, with a promise that he would build Them a beautiful temple. And now, after much difficulty and struggle, that promise was soon to be fulfilled. Rādhā-Rāsavihārī would soon move into one of the most gorgeous and opulent temples in India.

Hare Krishna Land was intense with activity as some two hundred workers plied their various skills in constructing the temple-hotel complex, under the direction of Surabhi Swami and his assistants. A dozen men were cutting redstone slabs to cover the concrete superstructure of the hotel; almost fifty marble workers were chipping away with hammers, making decorative columns and arches in the temple; and masons and interior finishers were working on the theater building. Much of the work was completed, yet everything still appeared bare, like bones without flesh. The hotel had no windows or doors and, of course, no furniture or curtains, and the temple was mostly an unfinished structure.

The work crews were moving quickly, concentrating especially on Śrīla Prabhupāda's quarters on the top floor of one of the hotel towers. But even that was not ready, so Citrakāra, as ordered by Surabhi Swami and Girirāja, drove Prabhupāda's car past the hotel to the rear of the property, to where Prabhupāda usually stayed, in an apartment in one of the old tenement buildings.

Devotees were waiting at Śrīla Prabhupāda's tenement room in happy anticipation. They were prepared with paraphernalia to perform a foot-bathing ceremony and āratī, and they had spent most of the day cleaning the rooms, which were decorated with lily garlands and scented with incense. A group of devotees stood outside the building with mṛdaṅgas and karatālas holding kīrtana, and some of the brahmacāriṇīs were poised, ready to throw flower petals before Śrīla Prabhupāda when he walked from his car and up the stairs. But Śrīla Prabhupāda was in a different mood. "I will never again go into this apartment," he said. "Take me to my new quarters." Citrakāra repeated what Śrīla Prabhupāda had already heard: "Your quarters aren't ready yet, Śrīla Prabhupāda. It will take a few more days to finish."

"Call Surabhi Mahārāja," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. He was adamant. The devotees in the apartment and in front of the tenement wondered why Śrīla Prabhupāda wasn't getting out of his car. As Citrakāra was driving Prabhupāda back to the hotel, Surabhi came running up behind.

"Why are my quarters not ready?" Prabhupāda asked from the car window. Running to catch up, Surabhi explained that he needed a few more days and that Śrīla Prabhupāda could please stay at his old apartment in the meantime.

"You do what I say!" shouted Prabhupāda. The car stopped. "If I don't go there now," Prabhupāda said, still speaking loudly, "it will never be finished. I want to go now!"

"Yes, Śrīla Prabhupāda." And Surabhi ran off to see if he could get the elevator to work. Meanwhile, the assembled devotees, having heard the news, also ran to be with Prabhupāda as he entered his new quarters.

Śrīla Prabhupāda felt his time was limited, and if he was not insistent, his disciples would delay more and more. He had already been delayed for years by the landowner and the government. Even after he had purchased the land, the police commissioner had remarked that the kīrtana was "a nuisance" and had delayed construction for months by denying the No Objection Certificate. But despite so many delays, Prabhupāda had persisted and won. No, he wouldn't go back to the old place. Now the new Bombay temple should come to life—now that he had come.

The elevator didn't work. The devotees, therefore, carried Prabhupāda in a palanquin up the stairs to his fifth-floor apartment. The place was cluttered, and the floor was covered with a thick, greasy marble polish the workers were using. The dozen workers present were confused—why was their work being interrupted? The devotees rushed in with drums, karatālas, and āratī paraphernalia, but just stood around, not knowing what to do. The room was bare, with no furniture, desk, or sitting place.

Śrīla Prabhupāda, however, looked around at the chaotic scene and said, "I am going to sit down here." A devotee took off a woolen cādar and placed it on the floor in an isolated dry part of the room, and Śrīla Prabhupāda sat down. "Now you can do what you like," he said.

While some of the devotees began washing the floor, others ran to find serviceable pieces of furniture to provide Śrīla Prabhupāda with a desk, seat, and bed. Surabhi Swami nervously bathed Prabhupāda's feet and then offered āratī, while devotees sang śrī-guru-caraṇa-padma and tried not to slip on the greasy floor. Surveying the scene with a satisfied look, Śrīla Prabhupāda smiled broadly and said, "Thank you very much."

When the welcoming function was complete, Śrīla Prabhupāda was left alone with his secretaries. He said his quarters were to his liking. He spent the night there, but the next day agreed to move for a week to the home of Mr. Kartikeya Mahadevia. For a week he would attend the Bombay paṇḍāl program, which was near Mr. Mahādevia's home, and this would give Surabhi Swami enough time to get the quarters ready.

Śrīla Prabhupāda could not stand and walk without assistance. From Mr. Mahādevia's house the devotees would carry him on a palanquin to the car, from the car they would carry him to the room behind the paṇḍāl lecture platform, and from there onto the stage, where Bhavānanda Goswami would help him onto the vyāsāsana.

Compared to former paṇḍāl festivals, where sometimes thirty thousand people had gathered in one evening, this one was small, with only about a thousand attending nightly. The main reason for such a small turnout was that India had just held an election, and the people were absorbed in politics. On March 22, after the Congress party had been defeated in the House of Parliament, Prime Minister Indira Gandhi had resigned. Within a day or two, a new prime minister would be selected from the Janata party. Many Bombayites who might otherwise have attended the paṇḍāl lecture were caught up in hearing the news, attending rallies, or talking about national politics and the fall of Indira Gandhi. But the small crowd that attended was very interested. Prabhupāda was not disappointed.

Śrīla Prabhupāda spoke, and his faint voice was amplified over the sound system. "Bhavānanda Swami will recite two or three verses from Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam," he said, "which is the theme of our Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement. The first verse begins with taravaḥ kiṁ na jīvanti."

"Do the trees not live?" Bhavānanda recited loudly. "Do the bellows of the blacksmith not breathe? All around us do the beasts not eat and discharge semen?" He read Śrīla Prabhupāda's purport and then read the next verse: "Men who are like dogs, hogs, camels, and asses praise those men who never listen to the transcendental pastimes of Lord Śrī Kṛṣṇa, the deliverer from evils." After Bhavānanda finished reading the long purport to that verse, Śrīla Prabhupāda began his lecture. He explained how the spirit soul changes bodies, life after life, but admitted that people are generally unaware of this simple fact. "But at least in India," he said, "this condition should now be changed." Not everyone would be able to realize this spiritual knowledge, but at least there should be an ideal institution. And that, he said, was the purpose of the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement, to create ideal brāhmaṇas who could guide and instruct the rest of the society.

"Not from so-called politicians," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "This is Indian civilization. Formerly even Lord Rāmacandra, who was the king—He is God Himself—still He used to consult the learned brāhmaṇas, sages, and saintly persons for governmental duties. The divisions of society must be there. There are so many things to be done in the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement. Don't take that it is simply chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa. Hare Kṛṣṇa chanting is the prime factor, because if you chant Hare Kṛṣṇa mahā-mantra, then gradually everything will be clear in your mind."

Prabhupāda told how he had overcome opposition in America and how the people there were taking Kṛṣṇa consciousness seriously. When he stated his plan for a combination of American money and Indian culture, the people applauded. "The real thing is knowledge," Śrīla Prabhupāda concluded. "So don't keep this knowledge locked up in your books, but spread it. My only request is that the leaders of India should now come forward and join this movement and take this advantage of doing good to the whole world. Thank you very much." The audience's applause swelled into a sustained ovation.

Prabhupāda's voice had been weak, his body almost motionless, but he had projected a power that had overcome those bodily limitations. His presence was, in fact, more commanding than ever. His energy was obviously the pure energy of the soul, transcendental to the bodily condition. Girirāja Swami called for questions, inviting people to come up and speak into a microphone in front of the stage.

Woman: "Isn't spiritual life very taxing?"

Prabhupāda: "Do you think that you are not being taxed? Why should you not be taxed for the proper gain? You are being taxed for so many nonsense things. Why not be taxed for the proper thing? That is intelligence."

As Prabhupāda answered the questions, he became more and more forceful, although he remained very still, not even moving his hand. His answers were not as lengthy as usual—he seemed to be saving his energy—but he delivered each answer with intense emphasis and conviction.

A well-dressed, middle-aged Indian man stepped forward and asked, "Swamiji, what is the importance of health in life, and how do you advise people to maintain health? And how does it connect to your mission?"

Prabhupāda: "What is health? First of all you have to understand that however healthy you may be, you must die. So what problem will you have solved? Janma-mṛtyu-jarā-vyādhi duḥkha-doṣānudarśanam, Kṛṣṇa says. It is not my manufacturing. Although you may try to remain very healthy, nature's law is that you must die. How can you help yourself? After all, you have to meet death. So long as you have got this material body, there is no question of health. You must suffer. You may be a very great scientist, but nature's law must act. Prakṛteḥ kriyamāṇāni. Foolish persons bewildered by false egotism think, "I am improving my health, I am improving this... ' He is improving nothing. He's completely under the clutches of material nature. He can't act anything independently. That is the law of nature."

Another man asked if Prabhupāda could solve political problems "with this religious basis."

"Yes," Prabhupāda replied. "All problems will be solved when we become Kṛṣṇa conscious."

"What is the simple solution to understand the soul?" another man asked. "I would like to understand the soul."

"This is very simple," Śrīla Prabhupāda replied, "but you are educated so foolishly that you cannot understand." Śrīla Prabhupāda explained briefly that the body is made of material elements but that there is a superior element. "Anyone can understand," he said. "Everything is explained in the Bhagavad-gītā. But people are not serious to understand."

The morning after the first paṇḍāl lecture, Śrīla Prabhupāda sat with Kartikeya Mahadevia, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami, and Bhavānanda Go swami. Ever since Prabhupāda's extreme weakness of health had occurred in Māyāpur, he would often sit for hours alone and silent. When he spoke, his voice was often hoarse or faint, but otherwise his conversation was as it had always been: completely Kṛṣṇa conscious.

In fact, Śrīla Prabhupāda was becoming increasingly strong in his uncompromising criticism of all mūḍhas who do not accept Kṛṣṇa as the Supreme Personality of Godhead. He was condemning materialistic civilization, calling it a dog civilization or an anthill civilization. A dog runs on four legs, and a human being runs on four wheels; but if he doesn't know the meaning of life, then he is no better than the dog. Both humans and ants build tall edifices, but if a man doesn't know of the soul and of Kṛṣṇa, then despite his proud skyscrapers, his civilization is no more than a glorified anthill.

"If more visitors come," Prabhupāda said, "I shall describe all this anthill civilization. Health—nonsense. What health? He'll be kicked out immediately." Śrīla Prabhupāda was referring to the man's question from the paṇḍāl. "Who is healthy if he is going to die?" Prabhupāda asked. "'I am so healthy that I am going to die tomorrow.' This is their health."

"Almost every one of those questions," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami, "was about the body."

Prabhupāda: "Kṛṣṇa says, na hanyate hanyamāne śarīre. That is healthy. When you do not die although the body is destroyed, that is healthy life. What is this healthy life? The body is finished—and everything. Actually, everything is not finished, but people are kept in that ignorance. They think the body is finished and then everything is finished, but that is not the fact. Kṛṣṇa very clearly said, na jāyate mriyate vā kadacin. [Bg. 2.20] If you do not question, then how is it possible? But that is the most important question."

Prabhupāda mentioned that despite the United Nations World Health Organization, still everyone was going to die. "Where is health?" he asked. "Such foolish things are going on all over the world. So organize. Introduce reality to them and spread it, slow but sure."

"So we shouldn't be impatient and compromise," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami, "just to be popular."

"There's no question of becoming impatient," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "You have got a diamond. If there is no buyer of the diamond, that does not mean you have to throw it away. You must know that 'Here is a diamond. If I want it, I must pay the proper price.' That I want to establish. Why India's culture should be lost in this way? I am not a cheap patriot. I want to give Indian culture to the whole world. I am not going to cheat people, taking Bhagavad-gītā and speaking all nonsense. I want to present Bhagavad-gītā as it is. That is my mission. Why should I cheat you?"

"We will try to follow your message properly," said Mr. Mahadevia.

"Why should India's big culture be lost for the matter of these rascal leaders?" said Prabhupāda. "They should be stopped. Kṛṣṇa consciousness is all-inclusive. Just like the economic question: annād bhavanti bhūtāni. Kṛṣṇa says grow food. It is practical. But when I was travelling, I saw millions of clerks coming to get education. And who is growing the food? Then these clerks have to be provided in these pigeonholes and depend on ration. Is that civilization? Throngs of people are coming. They are coming like ants. And when you go to the village, it is all vacant. No one is interested to produce food. Everyone is interested to live in the city in these pigeonholes and go to the cinema, the brothel, go to the club, learn how to drink, how to become "gentlemen." Is that civilization? The human aim of life is lost. You do not know why you are going to the office, why you are eating. They are keeping humanity in an animal mentality, a doggish mentality. University education is a doggish mentality. The dog wags his tail as soon as you give him some food."

"Oh, yes," said Mr. Mahadevia. "For application for a job, there are five jobs, and five dozen people apply."

"Is that education?" said Prabhupāda. "Better not to be educated. Those who are not educated, they can purchase five rupees' worth of potatoes and sit down anywhere. After spending so much money, living at the cost of fathers and mothers, they have no job and no food. Then they plan some political party—Naxalite or this or that party—and join a political movement and help Indira Gandhi. You are paid to make propaganda."

"But all that has vanished now," said Mr. Mahadevia. "That plan has failed completely." Like many other Indians, Mr. Mahadevia was hopeful that with a new election, conditions would be improving.

"No," said Prabhupāda, "another one will come. This unemployment is there. When I was a child, we were purchasing mustard oil for three annas, and now it is selling for thirteen rupees per kilo. Will a change of government bring this thirteen rupees to three annas? Then what is the benefit? Stool is stool, whether you take it from the top side or the bottom side."

A few devotees entered the room and sat, while Prabhupāda encouraged them all in preaching. He said that people could not get relief through government but through Kṛṣṇa consciousness. Kṛṣṇa and His devotees were for everyone, not for a particular nation or person.

"The people are in darkness," said Prabhupāda. "And the politicians are keeping them like dogs, hogs, and camels, taking a vote from them and becoming a leader. Nobody protested last night, however, that I called all men dogs, hogs, and camels. No one came forward and said, 'You are using very strong words.' Because it is all a fact."

"They especially liked your idea," said Hṛdayānanda Goswami, "of American money and Indian culture. They applauded for that."

"Yes, that is my mission," said Prabhupāda. "I am doing that. I am bringing money from America. Nobody is paying me. It is not a joke. Ten lakhs of rupees. Who else brings?"

"Even big export companies don't bring so much," said Gopāla Kṛṣṇa.

"And they will be glad," said Prabhupāda. "They have got money, and they are getting culture. I am trying for united nations. That is the real attempt, not this United Nations, all rogues and thieves and cheaters, barking dogs. I am trying for real United Nations. Let us cooperate together."

Śrīla Prabhupāda's disciples rallied to hear him speak like this, and they resolved to somehow counteract the forces of ignorance through Kṛṣṇa consciousness. He said they should proceed slowly but surely, just as he had done. He had begun humbly, "loitering" on the streets of New York, and before that he had been living alone in the Rādhā-Dāmodara temple. But now there was the Bombay temple, a palace that would be crowded with thousands of guests to see the Deity and attend cultural programs.

"Do it enthusiastically," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "You are all young men."

"Our enthusiasm is coming from you, Śrīla Prabhupāda," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa.

"I am old man," said Prabhupāda faintly. But the devotees didn't accept that; Śrīla Prabhupāda was nava-yauvana, spiritually ever fresh.

Each night Śrīla Prabhupāda had a different devotee read a verse and purport. Leading disciples like Hṛdayānanda Goswami and Girirāja would lecture, and Prabhupāda would speak afterward. He continued stressing India's real message to the world and the misfortune that occurs when people, especially the Indians, neglect it. Based on his bold statements, some devotees had made a big sign and posted it outside the paṇḍāl: "The Modern Civilization Is A Failure. The Only Solution Is Kṛṣṇa Consciousness."

In his evening lectures Śrīla Prabhupāda advised his hearers against identifying with any political party. One day someone is a prime minister, he said, and the next day that person is finished. Although Prabhupāda had begun his lecture series by apologizing to the audience, saying he could not speak much because of his poor health, each night he very strongly argued that Kṛṣṇa consciousness is the only solution. And during the question and answer period that followed his lecture, he was often explosive.

"When chanting," a man asked through the microphone at the front of the stage, "you chant the name of Rāma as well as Kṛṣṇa. But I do not see any photograph of Rāma here. What is the reason?"

"You do not see, but can you hear?" Prabhupāda asked.

"I do not see!" the man insisted.

Śrīla Prabhupāda exploded, "But you do not hear!" And he went on to explain that hearing is the best way of understanding that which you cannot see.

Another man asked how a religious-minded person could move in the material world. Prabhupāda replied, "Therefore you have to understand your spiritual identification. But because you are fools and rascals you are thinking, 'I am this body.'" He said that to realize this knowledge one must be trained by a spiritual master.

Śrīla Prabhupāda was aware that most of the questioners had no serious intentions of following him, so sometimes he reprimanded them, like an older brother, for their foolishness. Even their asking philosophical questions with no intention of following was itself foolishness. But Śrīla Prabhupāda continued to offer the diamond of Kṛṣṇa consciousness, even when the inquirer didn't possess the purchase price of sincerity. He offered it nonetheless, and at great expense to his own physical condition.

When a man rhetorically asked Prabhupāda to kindly enlighten him about the soul, Śrīla Prabhupāda replied, "That is already explained, that you are a soul within the body." Śrīla Prabhupāda elaborated on how the senses are superior to dull matter, the mind is higher than the senses, intelligence is higher than the mind, and the soul is highest of all. "So it requires study," he said. "It requires education. The education is there, the books are there, the teachers are there. Unfortunately, you are not interested to take this spiritual education. You are now interested in technology—how to hammer. That's all."

Each evening a prominent guest would appear at the paṇḍāl and introduce the program. One night, after J. M. Gandhi, a justice of the high court of Bombay, spoke, Bhavānanda Goswami read aloud the first two verses, along with Śrīla Prabhupāda's commentary, from the teachings of Lord Rṣabhadeva in the Fifth Canto of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam. Śrīla Prabhupāda spoke briefly and agreed to take questions.

"If God is everywhere," a man asked, "why His presence is not felt by everybody?"

"Everybody is not intelligent," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "Mostly they are rascals. Manuṣyānāṁ sahasreṣu. This is the statement by God that, 'Out of millions of persons, one tries to become perfect. And out of many millions of perfect persons, one can understand God.' So God understanding is not so easy. But if we want to understand, God will help us. That is the point."

The next man said he had several questions. "My first question is, I don't think God is opposed to sex. Seriously. I have heard many a lecture, and it is always stressed as if the God is opposed to sex. But I don't think that's so."

"God is never opposed to sex," replied Śrīla Prabhupāda. "Who said? God said, dharmāviruddho kāmō 'smi: 'Sex which is not against the regulative principles of religious life, that I am.' God never says, 'Stop sex.' Otherwise, why is there grhastha āśrama? Āśrama means that there is Kṛṣṇa consciousness. But make it āśrama, and follow the rules and regulations of āśrama. Then it is all right. Otherwise, you are bound up by the laws of nature."

The same man then referred to Prabhupāda's purport which Bhavānanda Goswami had read, in which Prabhupāda had criticized the life of the hoglike man who lives only for sense gratification. "One of your principal statements," the man said, "was that a man goes on the motor tram, stands there for two hours, reaches his place of business and works there from nine o'clock in the morning to five o'clock in the evening, returns back, has his food and sex and all that. I found many people who have worked very hard, raised children very nicely, have sex, but lead a good life. I don't think there is anything wrong with that."

"Yes, if there is no wrong," said Prabhupāda, "it is all right. But this sort of life is not very palatable."

The man continued, "Because I find even the dog—

Śrīla Prabhupāda interrupted, but his reply was soft and humble. "If you like that life, if you feel it is good, then that is up to you. But I don't think this is a very nice way of life, to work so hard simply for bread."

"No," the man said, "I agree there."

Śrīla Prabhupāda then raised his voice more strongly. "Then agreed, agreed. Then why disagree? That's all right, no more." The man had more questions, but Tamāla Kṛṣṇa called on someone else.

"Would you agree that God is just a concept? If you do not, please give a logical reason for that."

Prabhupāda: "Why shall I agree that God is only a concept?"

"Because I want it logically."

"You do not know logic. You have to learn logic."

"But I still would like you to explain it logically."

"Yes, but you have to learn how to know it. There is master. Just like you cannot prove logically that without father, there is a child." Śrīla Prabhupāda explained that everything we see is growing out of the earth, and the earth is described in the Vedas as the mother. But there cannot be a child without a father; where there is mother and child, there must be father. God, therefore, is the father of everything.

Śrīla Prabhupāda's disciples were urging him not to exert himself, so when Svarūpa Dāmodara arrived, Śrīla Prabhupāda asked him to give the evening lecture. Prabhupāda was very impressed with Svarūpa Dāmodara's scientific presentation of Kṛṣṇa consciousness. One of the devotees remarked that Svarūpa Dāmodara's talk seemed too technical for the audience, but another devotee replied that even if no one else had appreciated the speech, Śrīla Prabhupāda had, and so it was a success. Following Svarūpa Dāmodara's lecture, Śrīla Prabhupāda spoke for about five minutes and left, without taking any questions.

The following night Prabhupāda did not speak at all, but he sat onstage while two of India's leading cardiologists, Dr. Kesharrao Datey and Dr. Sharma, spoke. Śrīla Prabhupāda had been garlanded by Dr. Datey, and he sat patiently and silently on the vyāsāsana, satisfied that prominent Bombayites were honoring the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement. Dr. Datey spoke about heart disease and said it could be eliminated by controlling anxiety. He then praised Śrīla Prabhupāda and his movement. After the doctors' brief talks, Svarūpa Dāmodara gave another scientific lecture and showed slides. Śrīla Prabhupāda later told Svarūpa Dāmodara and others, "This scientific program is giving me extra strength to preach Kṛṣṇa consciousness."

"It seems like you are giving more stress to science in recent years than previously," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami.

"That is required for convincing the modernized man," said Prabhupāda. "Perhaps I am the first man who protested against these unauthorized scientists."

"Oh, yes," said Svarūpa Dāmodara. "Everybody is afraid of them except Śrīla Prabhupāda. Frankly speaking, I never knew that the problem was this serious before I met Śrīla Prabhupāda. I never thought about this."

"Therefore I took it so seriously," said Prabhupāda. "Every morning walk I would look for you and ask, 'Where is the scientist?' I thought, 'Here I have got an opportunity to impress a scientist, and that will fructify.' That was my aim. Therefore I was bothering you in so many ways."

"It is your incredible mercy, Prabhupāda," said Svarūpa Dāmodara.

"Because I cannot use the technical words," Prabhupāda said, "and he can do that. So I wanted that he should be trained up."

Girirāja arranged that one of the newly elected Janata party members of Parliament come and see Śrīla Prabhupāda. The gentleman, Mr. Ratan Singh Rajda, was eager to meet the leader of the Hare Kṛṣṇa movement. So while Mr. Rajda had been attending a political rally at Sivaji Park, Girirāja had come to arrange the meeting.

"When I went there," Girirāja told Prabhupāda later, "he asked me to sit with them on a dais. So I did. But was that wrong?"

"Why not?" said Prabhupāda. "He is honoring you."

Girirāja said that Mr. Rajda had asked to be the first speaker at the rally, so that he could be free to come and meet with Śrīla Prabhupāda before leaving the next day for a meeting with the central government in Delhi. Girirāja explained that Mr. Rajda was a member of Parliament from Bombay South, which was the most prestigious district, and that he had formerly helped ISKCON in their case against the attempted demolition of the temple.

Mr. Rajda entered the room and made a respectful gesture of obeisance to Śrīla Prabhupāda. He said he had met Śrīla Prabhupāda once, but since then he had been in jail for nineteen months. Śrīla Prabhupāda seemed surprised. "Jail?" he asked.

Mr. Rajda explained that he had been jailed during Indira Gandhi's political emergency. More than 150,000 "patriotic people" had been imprisoned, he said, including J. K. Prakash and the present prime minister, Morarji Desai.

"When Girirāja told me that you were here," said Mr. Rajda, "I told him definitely I would like to ask for darśana."

"This attempt at material adjustment..." Prabhupāda began, speaking slowly. "Just like we felt a little danger under the regime of Indira Gandhi. Now we have another feeling This is material adjustment. Material adjustment may be temporarily beneficial, but that is not permanently beneficial."

Mr. Rajda replied, "Unless there is adhyātmika adjustment, there cannot be lasting benefit." Mr. Rajda was obviously acquainted with the Sanskrit Vedic knowledge, and he was also aware of the value of going to see a saintly person.

Prabhupāda persisted, however, in making the point that people do not really understand spiritual life. He described that the material body is made of different elements, and yet the living being is different than these elements. "Unless we understand this fact," he said, "which is very nicely explained in the Bhagavad-gītā, this material adjustment will never make us happy."

Mr. Rajda followed Prabhupāda's point but asserted that a great change had taken place since the elections. "The basic difference," he said, "is that formerly there was no moral code observed by the rulers." He was entirely agreeable—or wanted to be—with Śrīla Prabhupāda, yet they were speaking on different levels. Both asserted that spirituality was needed in government, but Mr. Rajda's political conclusion was that such spiritual reform was now present in his political party.

Śrīla Prabhupāda, however, continued to speak of people who talk of God yet don't even know the identity of the soul. He didn't specify whether this criticism applied to the former or to the present political party, although his remarks seemed to include both. Whoever was not in transcendental knowledge, whoever tried to work in the material field without knowing the difference between spirit and matter, would come to the same inglorious end.

"No," said Mr. Rajda, "the last rulers, most of them were Communists. They said religion is opium. They didn't believe in religion at all."

"Therefore," Prabhupāda said, "they say something, we say some thing, he says something, you manufacture something. But nobody knows what is reality. That is the difficulty. Unless you know the reality, to suggest and say, 'I suggest it,' does not mean that it is a solution. This is going on all over the world. Na te viduḥ svārtha-gatiṁ hi viṣṇuṁ. [S.B. 7.5.21] The external features, these material features—they are concerned with that. Earth, water, fire, air, ether, mind, intelligence. But they do not know that beyond this, there is another element. Unless you come to that knowledge, there is no question of welfare activities. That knowledge is available in India."

Śrīla Prabhupāda accepted Mr. Rajda's visit as sincere and serious, and so he wanted to convince him to fully accept Kṛṣṇa consciousness if he was really serious about introducing principles of dharma and morality into government. Real dharma had to start with an acceptance of self-realization as the all-important goal of life. It could not succeed just by rubber-stamping the government as religious.

"Now we have got good government," Śrīla Prabhupāda conceded. "Very nice. Now you should take advantage of the privileges which are there in India. The Bhagavad-gītā is there. If you take directions from Bhagavad-gītā, then the whole human society will be benefited. That you do not know. That is the defect. Even big, big leaders, they profess to be students of Bhagavad-gītā, but they do not know anything, although it is clearly stated. Who is the leader in India who does not know Bhagavad-gītā? Everyone knows. Even Morarji Desai, when he was to be arrested by the leaders of government, he said, "Wait, let me finish my reading of Bhagavad-gītā.' Is it not?"

"Yes," replied Mr. Rajda.

Śrīla Prabhupāda: "“Let me finish my Bhagavad-gītā, then you can harass me.”"

Mr. Rajda added that Mr. Desai was also studying the Bhagavad-gītā very minutely while he was in jail.

"But now," said Prabhupāda, "he says that "Janata is my God.' Did he not say this recently?" Mr. Rajda admitted that Morarji Desai had stated that, but that he had later clarified it.

"It is the government's responsibility to make people God conscious," Śrīla Prabhupāda argued. "It is a very simple thing. God personally is explaining how to become God conscious. It is a very simple thing: mān-manā bhava mad-bhaktaḥ. [Bg. 9.34] Even a child can do it, so why not leaders? Then their example should be followed. Why don't they do this, this God consciousness? Do it seriously. Then everything will be all right. They are defying the existence of God and reading Bhagavad-gītā. This is their position."

Śrīla Prabhupāda explained to Mr. Rajda how he had been propagating the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement virtually alone. For years he had worked in the West, and now he was bringing his movement to India. "Cooperate with us," he said. "You are so kind; you have come to see me. You have got desire. So let us take it seriously."

Mr Rajda seemed very moved, and replied, "Yes, sir. Yes, sir. Correct."

"It is serious," said Prabhupāda, "but nobody has taken it seriously. Bhagavad-gītā is popular book. Everyone takes the Bhagavad-gītā and says, "I am a student of Bhagavad-gītā." But if the leaders of a society really set the example, others will follow."

"That's correct," said Mr. Rajda. "A serious effort should be made. Only lip service will not help. That is correct." Mr. Rajda reminded Prabhupāda how he had supported the Juhu temple at the time of the attempted demolition.

"So you have given a great service," said Prabhupāda. "Now it is not only not demolished, but it is standing there."

"It is standing," affirmed Mr. Rajda, "and a very nice temple."

Mr. Rajda mentioned the possibility of a meeting between Śrīla Prabhupāda and Morarji Desai. He said it could be arranged if it was convenient for Prabhupāda.

"My life is dedicated for this purpose," said Prabhupāda. "It is convenient for me at any time. I am not keeping good health at the moment, yet still I have come. I am just trying, even up to the last moment of my life. If I can deliver some good to these people—that is my determination. What is this life? Life will end today or tomorrow or day after. But if you live just to the point, that is the idea. Otherwise, trees are also living—thousands of years. What is the benefit?"

Mr. Rajda confirmed that the meeting could definitely be arranged. He would see the prime minister and fix up a time.

"So," said Śrīla Prabhupāda, "there's some Kṛṣṇa's purpose that you were elected."

"It is through His blessings," said Mr. Rajda.

"Take advantage of His blessings," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "Do some service."

On the last scheduled evening of the paṇḍāl, the chief minister of Maharashtra gave the introductory speech. Śrīla Prabhupāda, however, did not attend. When the devotees asked to extend the paṇḍāl another week, Prabhupāda agreed, but said he would move to his now-ready quarters at Hare Krishna Land.

Before leaving, Śrīla Prabhupāda spoke with Mr. and Mrs. Mahadevia. Prabhupāda had one of the devotees purchase a nice sārī and he presented it to Mrs. Mahadevia. "I stayed with you, and this is just my remembrance of thanks, so don't refuse." He gave a tape recorder to Mr. Mahadevia, a sārī to the Mahādevias' daughter Priti, and money to their servants. Mrs. Mahadevia was very pleased but she protested, saying it was a traditional duty and a pleasure for them to receive Prabhupāda in their home. Previously Śrīla Prabhupāda had been playing the tape recorder in Mr. Mahadevia's presence, and Mr. Mahadevia had admired the sound reproduction. Now, when Śrīla Prabhupāda gave him the tape recorder, he protested. "No, Prabhupāda, I was not telling you that you should give me that tape recorder. I was just telling you that it's a good piece."

"No, no," Prabhupāda insisted, "this is for you. You must keep it."

As Śrīla Prabhupāda entered his beautiful quarters at Hare Krishna Land, he remarked that no one could outdo Surabhi Swami. "I think I haven't such a place to live anywhere in the world," he said. "Los Angeles and New York are big, big cities, and London, Paris—but nobody can present such luxurious royal palace."

Seeing how the one large room was arranged to facilitate his different activities, Śrīla Prabhupāda said, "This is like my room at the Rādhā-Dāmodara temple. In one corner I am writing, in another corner I am sitting, in another corner I am taking prasādam." The comparison was odd, since the Rādhā-Dāmodara place was a tiny cell, yet Śrīla Prabhupāda saw them as related: the beginning in Vṛndāvana and the apex in Bombay. In either place, he was the same person, humbly taking a little prasādam, writing his books, and ambitiously planning for spreading Kṛṣṇa consciousness.

Śrīla Prabhupāda discussed with several of his disciples and Dr. Sharma about his daily routine in Bombay. He said he would come down for darśana of the Deity and would lecture once a week on Sunday. On special occasions he would see a visitor in his quarters, but rarely. "Generally," he said, "people come to visit and say, 'How are you? How are you feeling?' And he takes a half hour even. So what is the use of wasting time like that, 'How are you?' Everyone knows that I am not feeling well."

"So they can come to the temple room in the morning," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami.

"Yes," said Prabhupāda. "If they actually want to see me, I am going there. They can see me for a half hour. And for talking, there is no need of talking, 'How are you? How are you feeling?' This is not talking."

"Instead," said Gargamuni Swami, "they can buy some of your books downstairs."

"Yes," said Prabhupāda, nodding approvingly. "This is a waste of time. I want to stop this, to answer all these things, 'How are you?' " By saving his time and energy, he said, he could work on his book writing. Devotees assured him that everyone would appreciate this schedule and would be happy that he was working on the Tenth Canto.

"I think I shall be able to work from today," Prabhupāda declared. "Now I have got very nice place, full freedom. So there will be no difficulty."

That Prabhupāda would not take any morning walks went without saying. Everyone closely involved with Śrīla Prabhupāda had come to accept a new way of living, with no morning walks and very few classes. Someone suggested that Prabhupāda might like to walk on the roof, but even that seemed to be too difficult.

"No, one story I can go," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "Not now, but I can go. So you are trying so much for my comfort, I do not know whether I shall be able to repay you. But I shall try my best. It is not possible to repay your debt, you are so kind. So I can simply pray to Kṛṣṇa to give His blessings to you, so that you may remain very steady in devotional service and preach His message all over the world. Otherwise, I have no other means. Without your help, I could not do anything. So you are very kind. Kindly continue your cooperation. This is the movement for para-upakāra [doing good for others]. I have got report from our other temples all over the world—they are doing very nice. Is it not? Other temples outside India, they are doing very nice." Svarūpa Dāmodara, who had recently come from the West, told about the successful standard of devotional service in the temples there.

Prabhupāda said he wanted silence so he could do his work, and he told a little story about a woman whose tinkling bracelets disturbed her husband. The husband took one bangle away, but still he was disturbed by the "tink-tink-tink." He took away another bangle and another, until there was only one left. Then there was no more "tink-tink-tink." Prabhupāda specifically asked his secretaries not to gather and talk in the outer room. "Remain always one," said Śrīla Prabhupāda, "and read books. Then there will be no noise. And as soon as you become two— 'tink-tink-tink.' That I don't want."

"It won't happen," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa. "If anyone comes to see me, I will go out of the apartment."

"Yes," said Śrīla Prabhupāda, "in this way arrange. It should remain always quiet and serene."

"These are your quarters," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa. "No one else should come."

"And we shall arrange for seeing our own men at a time," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "But the principle should be silence. That will be all right. I will be free to work."

Prabhupāda continued to appreciate his new situation. The rooms were well ventilated, with plenty of sunlight. Other ISKCON buildings, like the Bhaktivedanta Manor in London, were very good, he said, but in most seasons he couldn't open the doors or windows, because of the cold. "You have to remain packed up," he said. "In Detroit and London, you cannot open a window." But here in Bombay the temperature was ideal, and the area outside Prabhupāda's window was verdant.

Days went by, and most devotees in Bombay never got to see Prabhupāda. They were all used to having him come down in the morning and walking with them for an hour on Juhu Beach. And they were used to having him come to greet the Deities, give classes, and give darśana in the afternoon. He had always been open, especially in India, allowing anyone to see him at almost any time. He had always received them warmly and listened to their problems or questions with great sympathy. So for them not to be able to see him, even while he was living in their midst, was traumatic. Only two or three secretaries stayed with him, and whenever other devotees came into his rooms to see him, they would feel that they were taxing him and would leave at the first opportunity.

Unexpectedly one morning Śrīla Prabhupāda appeared in the temple room, and the few devotees removed Prabhupāda's picture from the vyāsāsana so he could sit down. He hadn't given any warning that he was coming, and many of the devotees were absent. But the word spread that Prabhupāda was there, and the devotees came running.

After the guru-pūjā āratī, Śrīla Prabhupāda spoke to the assembly of devotees. He said he was sorry that he couldn't come down more often and that he wanted to cook for all the devotees and serve them. On Sunday, he said, he would cook a feast and invite all the devotees up to his quarters. "I shall come daily to the temple," he said, "and I shall remain up to eight for our darśana and talks, if there is any comment. Generally every day it will be done. And on Sunday you can fix up some time. I will speak in the evening. And then Kṛṣṇa's desire, as He likes. But for the time being, this arrangement."

Prabhupāda's humility and his exactly reading the minds of the devotees made them feel ecstatic love for him. Some of them had even been thinking that Prabhupāda had forgotten them and that other things had become more important for him. But now he was reassuring them. Although he appeared to be incapacitated, he was fully reciprocating with his disciples. He was telling them that as they were controlled by him, so he was also controlled by their loving service.

Śrīla Prabhupāda then explained the significance of guru-pūjā, analyzing some of the words in the song the devotees sang each morning during the ceremony. "So the necessity is prema-bhakti," he said. "Prema bhakti jāhā hoite avidyā vināśa jāte, divya-jñāna. So what is that divya-jñāna?"

Prabhupāda explained that it was the duty of the guru to awaken divya-jñāna, or superior knowledge of the self. Because the guru reveals divya-jñāna, he is worshiped. For the nondevotee, divya-jñāna is never manifest, and one thinks of himself in terms of his body—as American, Hindu, or Muslim.

“So we worship the guru,” said Prabhupāda, “because he gives us superior knowledge. Not this knowledge of how to eat, how to sleep, how to have sex life and defend. Generally, the political leaders, the social leaders, they give this knowledge: how to eat, how to sleep, how to have sex, how to defend. The guru has no business with these things. He has divya-jñāna, superior knowledge. That is required. This human form of life is an opportunity to awaken that: divya-jñāna hr̥de prokāśito. And if he is kept in darkness about that divya-jñāna, then life will be lost. Remember this. It is a very risky life to be once again thrown into the waves of birth and death. We do not know where we will go. It is very serious. Kṛṣṇa consciousness is divya-jñāna. It is not ordinary knowledge.

“So you should always remember these words, divya-jñāna hr̥de prokāśito. And because the spiritual master enlightens with divya-jñāna, one feels obliged to him. Yasya prasādād bhagavat-prasādo/ yasya prasādān na gatiḥ kuto 'pi.* So this guru-pūjā is essential, just as the Deity worship is essential. It is not cheap adoration. It is the process of enlightenment, of divya-jñāna. Thank you very much.”

Not only was Prabhupāda reminding his disciples that he hadn't forgotten them, but he was also reminding them that they should not be absent from the guru-pūjā and worshipful thoughts of the spiritual master, even if he was not able to personally come before them.

Śrīla Prabhupāda mostly stayed alone in his room, and during the day he would move from one desk to another, either to dictate the Bhāgavatam, to take prasādam, or to speak to guests. He was especially prolific at his writing. Rising at one or two in the morning, he would dictate ninety, a hundred, and occasionally almost two hundred digits on his dictating machine. This was more than he had done in months.

But he had little appetite. He could not eat anything heavy, and sometimes he had no appetite even for a cup of milk. Pālikā dāsī and sometimes Kṣīracorā-gopīnātha, a Bengali devotee, were the cooks. Śrīla Prabhupāda liked Kṣīracorā-gopīnātha's śukta, made from nīm leaves, eggplant, bitter melon, potato, sweet potato, and yogurt.

One morning Śrīla Prabhupāda asked for orange juice, but there were no oranges in the kitchen. Gopīnātha ran to get them, but when he returned, Śrīla Prabhupāda was ringing his bell. Gopīnātha rushed in and told him, “I am just coming. It takes time to make the juice.” After a few minutes, when the juice did not come, Śrīla Prabhupāda began repeatedly ringing his bell. As Gopīnātha at last entered with the juice, Prabhupāda spoke out angrily, “I am sick with no appetite, and when I have a little hunger, then you take hours!” He said he didn't want the juice, but Gopīnātha put it on the table anyway.

Śrīla Prabhupāda picked the glass up and drank. “You are serving me so nicely,” he said quietly. “I am always chastising you. When one gets old, he becomes short-tempered.” Gopīnātha had not felt bad about the reprimand, but on these humble words from Śrīla Prabhupāda he felt terrible. Gopīnātha became so emotional that he could hardly speak. Yet he managed, in a choked voice, to say, "Please, Śrīla Prabhupāda, don't speak like that. I make mistakes, and if you don't correct them, then who will?"

There were many little personal exchanges like this between Śrīla Prabhupāda and his assistants, but sometimes he would be more silent and inward than they had ever seen him before. He would spend time chanting and reading, and only on special occasions would he see a guest.

Śrīla Prabhupāda agreed to an interview with Mr. Koshi, assistant editor for The Current magazine. Mr. Koshi's approach was not reverent but provocative, in search of a lively interview. Prabhupāda was interested in speaking to many people through a magazine article, but he had no interest in flattering the editor or in compromising. Especially of late, as at the Bombay paṇḍāl, Prabhupāda was speaking in the most plain, direct words. Whoever approached him he informed about Kṛṣṇa and their illusion in not accepting Kṛṣṇa. Mr. Koshi asked Prabhupāda why he had been recognized first in countries other than India.

"Because they [Indians] are so poor that they cannot purchase diamond," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "But diamond must be there. They are so poor-hearted, their education has been so poorly given, that they cannot understand."

"Poorly given?" asked Mr. Koshi.

"Yes," replied Prabhupāda. "They are teaching, 'You are this body. Jump like cats and dogs.' That's all. That is nationalism? It is, 'You are this body. Jump like cats and dogs.' A group, as a group of crows gather together—caw, caw, caw. That has been taught. Make a group and crow. But you don't find this word nationalism in the Bhagavad-gītā. These are all borrowed words."

"So what is your alternative?" asked Mr. Koshi.

"We are preaching internationalism," said Prabhupāda. "Everyone welcome. Come to Kṛṣṇa consciousness. Here is Christian, Hindu. Here is African, Muhammadan—everything. That is real United Nations. If they were thinking that 'I am American,' then why are they after a poor Indian man? Indians are known outside India as poverty-stricken, and that's a fact. But actually we are not poverty-stricken. If we cultivate our own standard of knowledge, Bhagavad-gītā, then we are the richest. We can give the whole world these gifts."

Prabhupāda said it was regrettable that scholars and politicians pretend to be students of Bhagavad-gītā without even knowing the difference between the body and the owner of the body. They do not even know the first lessons of Bhagavad-gītā.

"So what is the solution?" asked Mr. Koshi.

"Solution!" Prabhupāda shouted. "You learn it!"

"But they don't want to do it," said Mr. Koshi.

"Then they will go to hell," said Prabhupāda. "What can be done? If you want to cut your own throat, you can do it. Who can save you? But our duty is to say, 'Don't commit suicide.' "

Mr. Koshi made a case for drinking tea and coffee; he could not see how such things were sinful. Prabhupāda explained that they were intoxicants.

"But there are several million like me," said Mr. Koshi.

"Millions of zeros does not mean one," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "Zero is zero. If there are seven million zeros added together, you cannot make one."

Mr. Koshi also wanted to ask why Prabhupāda paid so much attention only to Kṛṣṇa, since there were hundreds of gods in the pantheon, but Prabhupāda stopped him short.

Mr. Koshi asked about the brainwashing controversy.

"There are so many accusations," said Prabhupāda, "but now it is in the court."

"But you don't require recognition of any court, do you?" asked Mr. Koshi.

"You require," replied Prabhupāda laughing. "I don't require. You require."

"Yes, until then," said Mr. Koshi, "there is doubt."

"Because you are after the court," said Prabhupāda, "after the judges. We are not after anyone. We are after one—Kṛṣṇa. That's all. We know what our duty is."

Śrīla Prabhupāda further explained that opposition was coming in America because so many young people were taking to Kṛṣṇa consciousness. "Young men are taking it," said Prabhupāda. "They are preaching. They have sacrificed their lives. So they are intelligent persons. They can understand that they should not die. Kṛṣṇa consciousness is not an old man's recreation."

"No," said Mr. Koshi, "but you are responsible for it."

"I am not," said Prabhupāda. "Kṛṣṇa is responsible. I am just distributing. My duty is to distribute. That's all."

Mr. Koshi asked Prabhupāda if he was happy with the way his movement had spread, and Prabhupāda replied, "Why shall I not be happy? I am not manufacturing anything. That is not my business."

Jumping from one topic to another in search of readable magazine copy, Mr. Koshi asked Prabhupāda, "How is your health now?"

"Not good," Prabhupāda replied. "Health or no health, it is the outward machine. That doesn't matter. But if it is a good machine, then it helps. That's all. Otherwise machine good or bad, it doesn't matter."

"What happens when the machine stops?"

"If your machine has stopped," Prabhupāda said, "you take another machine. That's all. Why shall I be overwhelmed, 'Oh, machine is going, machine is going'? Therefore, Kṛṣṇa says, 'You are lamenting for the machine, you nonsense. That is not the paṇḍita's business.'"

Mr. Koshi: "What is your typical day like? What time do you get up, and how do you spend your day?"

"How can I say?" replied Prabhupāda. "I have got so many things."

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, sensing that the interview had gone about as far as it could profitably go, spoke up. "Śrīla Prabhupāda," he said, "I want to suggest that if he has some further questions, we could try to answer them, and then if there are still unanswered ones..."

"No," said Śrīla Prabhupāda, "he has no answer on this spiritual matter. He will ask me some political questions. We have no function in politics."

Mr. Koshi disregarded the signal from Prabhupāda's secretary and went on with his questions. "You see," he said, "when I see a group of young people like these boys here dancing in the street, it is something jarring to my eyes. What is the necessity for the chant?"

"One man's food is another man's poison," Prabhupāda replied laconically.

"No, no," said Mr. Koshi, "there must be a purpose behind it."

"Yes," said Prabhupāda, "that is the way to spiritual understanding in this age."

Mr. Koshi asked about illicit sex, and Prabhupāda replied that sex should be used only within marriage, for begetting children.

"Don't you think that the children should be given freedom to choose voluntarily?"

"Do you want to give freedom to your children?" asked Prabhupāda.

"I am asking you," said Mr. Koshi.

"No, no," said Prabhupāda, "what is the use of giving freedom to a child with a razor? He will cut his throat, that's all."

"But at a later age perhaps."

"Later age, yes," said Prabhupāda. "That is enjoined. When a child is sixteen years old he can do as he likes. Not before that."

Now Mr. Koshi was ready to wrap it up. "What is your message to the world?" he asked Prabhupāda.

Prabhupāda and the devotees laughed. "Again you ask me," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "After reading Rāmāyaṇa, you are asking me whose father is Sītā. I have explained already."

Before Mr. Koshi left the room, Prabhupāda requested, "Write nice article."

"Don't worry about that," Mr. Koshi replied. "It is my job."

Śrīla Prabhupāda made sure Mr. Koshi took prasādam before leaving.

Disciples continued to come to Bombay in hopes of getting direct instructions from Śrīla Prabhupāda. Much could be done through his secretary, avoiding "How are you feeling?" conversations, yet sometimes Prabhupāda did meet directly with certain disciples. He was still involved, at least through his secretary, in most of the important dealings of his movement and its leaders. By mail he heard Ātreya Rṣi's plans for introducing Kṛṣṇa consciousness in Karachi, Pakistan, and he said the plans were intelligent. He saw and approved a new film by Yadubara. He met with Haṁsadūta Swami and requested him to develop the preaching in Śrī Lanka. He heartily approved Prabhaviṣṇu's going to preach in Dacca, Bangladesh. He heard of the need for strong preachers in Hyderabad, and when Śrīla Prabhupāda's disciple, Śrīdhara Swami, came to see him, he asked him to go there. He saw Lokanātha Swami and encouraged him in his program of traveling by bullock cart and preaching in the Indian villages. Lokanātha had brought Śrīla Prabhupāda a Marathi translation of The Perfection of Yoga, and Śrīla Prabhupāda sat for some time listening to Lokanātha Mahārāja read aloud, although Prabhupāda said he didn't know the Marathi language. When an ISKCON Bombay pūjārī wanted to know if some śālagrāma-śilās were bona fide, Śrīla Prabhupāda agreed to see Them, confirmed that They were genuine, and advised how They should be worshiped.

Certain managerial affairs Prabhupāda would try to avoid, although often to no avail, such as concerning the delays in completing the construction work at Bombay. He could hear the sounds of the work, and sometimes it was noisy, but it was the slowness that perturbed him. Sometimes he would sit silently for hours and then remark to his servant or secretary that he was very upset by the construction delays. "You are sincere workers," Prabhupāda told the devotees in charge, "but no intelligence. I can see that this construction work is not going on. Am I to close my eyes? I can do that, but I am a sensible man. How can I close my eyes? They are all giving their excuses."

Śrīla Prabhupāda analyzed the different leaders and, on finding defects in each of them, concluded that they were incompetent to speed up the construction. When Tamāla Kṛṣṇa suggested that maybe they should consult a life member who was expert in construction, Prabhupāda approved. So Mr. Mohatta, an engineer and life member, was brought to see Śrīla Prabhupāda.

At that time, the construction company was demanding that all past bills be paid before they would go on with the work. But Śrīla Prabhupāda said he wouldn't pay any more bills until the work was completed; then all bills would be paid in full. Although some of the devotees were more inclined to pay the company right away, at least partially, so that the work would go on smoothly, Mr. Mohatta at once appreciated Prabhupāda's reasoning and began dealing with the construction company on that basis. He got results, and Prabhupāda was relieved. Thus, although Prabhupāda was eager to retire fully, he did not feel he could remove himself from ISKCON management yet.

Śrīla Prabhupāda had no regular doctor. From time to time a kaviṛāja* might show up to give a diagnosis and some medicine. But Prabhupāda wouldn't take it very seriously. He didn't consider these kaviṛājas very qualified, and if the medicine tasted bitter or produced any bad effect, he would stop taking it. Everything was up to Kṛṣṇa, and a doctor couldn't change that. Prabhupāda mentioned the relative merits of Āyur Vedic and homeopathic medicines, but like any other mundane topic, medicine was something he showed little interest in.

He began having the newspapers read to him. Much of the news dealt with the downfall of the Congress party and the reform promises of the Janata party. From time to time Prabhupāda would comment, "These rascals, wherever they go, they create trouble." One time he commented, "Mandaḥ sumanda-matayaḥ—they have got a conception which is very, very bad. Their religious, social, and political conceptions are all condemned." Prabhupāda's conclusion: "What the fools and rascals are doing—that is the newspapers."

Prabhupāda directed Tamāla Kṛṣṇa and others to write letters and articles replying to some of the news stories. In one news editorial, the writer criticized formal education as corrupting the minds of children. "Educationists and researchers," the writer urged, "should look into the question and suggest remedies."

Śrīla Prabhupāda: "That means the rascals do not know that godlessness and godless education will be like that. The teachers who are suggesting, they are themselves bad, and they are leading. They do not know what is the defect. You can write to them, 'You leaders, you do not know what is the cause. This is the cause—harāv abhaktasya kuto mahad-guṇā/ manorathenāsati dhāvato bahih. Without God consciousness, there cannot be any education, there cannot be any good qualities. You do not know this, and you are simply crying in the wilderness. All the education and its propaganda is to make the world godless, although the most scientific knowledge of God is there in the Bhagavad-gītā.' Write him. Give him a slap: 'You do not know.'"

Another article, "One Hundred Million Harijans Pick a New Messiah," observed the death anniversary of Dr. Amritsar, the former champion of human rights for the untouchable caste. The writer lamented that the untouchables, termed "harijans" by Mahātmā Gandhi, were so downtrodden and presented such a baffling problem to the leaders and people of India. Śrīla Prabhupāda asked Tamāla Kṛṣṇa to write to the editor, explaining how Kṛṣṇa consciousness uplifts the most fallen. "We shall elevate them to go back to Godhead, whatever they may be," said Prabhupāda. "The defect was that Gandhi started this harijan movement—keeping them where they are and at the same time changing their name by rubber stamp to harijan. That must be failure. Just by artificially giving him money or stamping approval, it won't change anything. You have to change him. And they have no plan for that. We should not misuse this word harijan, which means the personal associate of God."

Prabhupāda said that some of the senior devotees should regularly write on topics which he would suggest. More and more they should take up the management, write essays, and give lectures transmitting the arguments he would give them.

"Now you try to manage the whole world organization, all G.B.C. men," said Prabhupāda. "Suppose I am not there. Manage very nicely. But not independently to create havoc, but really manage. I am still present, so I will give you direction. Don't spoil it. We are in a very good, prestigious position. So much hard labor. I started with a very humble condition, and now it has come such an exalted position. You don't spoil it. That is my request. Increase. That will depend on your character, behavior, and preaching. Everyone was astonished how I started this without any help. My only asset was I was sincere. Everyone knows it. Otherwise, how is it possible?"

The days went by peacefully, with mild, pleasant breezes always passing through Śrīla Prabhupāda's room. His intelligence was ever sharp and alert, and yet his health did not improve. Bhavānanda Goswami had come from Māyāpur and had been intimately serving Śrīla Prabhupāda, but he had to return to Bengal for important preaching duties. Śrīla Prabhupāda said there was no doubt that Bhavānanda was the best at giving massage and taking personal care of his spiritual master. But the personal servant's duties were not as important as preaching.

Upendra, who had come to be Śrīla Prabhupāda's personal servant, was surprised to see how Prabhupāda's diet had changed. He could no longer cook the kicharī which Prabhupāda had previously liked. Often Prabhupāda would not even speak when he wanted something, but would indicate an idea or a desire with a nod of the head, a glance, a flick of the finger, or a sound like "Hmm."

From his room Prabhupāda heard the routine sounds of the day: the call of the cuckoos and the crows, the hammering of the marble workers, and the more distant car engines, horns, bicycle bells. He could also hear the pūjārī's bell and the conchshell at each āratī, as well as the kīrtanas and bhajanas in the temple room.

One morning while Prabhupāda was talking to Tamāla Kṛṣṇa and Girirāja, the recording of the "Govinda" song began, signifying, as it did in all the ISKCON temples, that the Deity was now giving morning darśana. "Kṛṣṇa consciousness is such a nice thing," said Prabhupāda. "Alone in this world I am struggling, and the so-called intelligent persons, they will not come. They have business. Why? If it is actually beneficial to the human society, why I should try alone? I will go on trying as long as I live. There will be no checking. But what kind of intelligent persons there are? We shall go on playing govindam ādi-puruṣam tam aham bhajāmi. People may hear or not hear. We don't mind."

Girirāja had been temple president in Bombay during the years of struggle, and he had long looked forward to the time when Prabhupāda would be living in his majestic quarters and receiving the world leaders. Now that the gorgeous ISKCON center was becoming a reality, Girirāja couldn't stand the idea of Prabhupāda remaining in solitude. So when he had asked Prabhupāda if he could bring him important guests, Prabhupāda had agreed.

Girirāja had arranged the meeting with Mr. Rajda, and now he had another member of Parliament, Mr. Ram Jethmalani, ready to meet with Śrīla Prabhupāda. Mr. Jethmalani had many doubts, however, and he had admitted to Girirāja that he didn't know whether Kṛṣṇa really existed or was imaginary. His main interest was in improving the slums. But he was willing to see Śrīla Prabhupāda—who was, after all, the guru of a worldwide movement—for a customary social visit. He would see him and then go on to a “thanksgiving tour” among the members of the Bombay constituency who had voted for him in the recent elections.

Śrīla Prabhupāda's desire was to enlighten the political leaders according to the instructions of Bhagavad-gītā. If that was not possible, then he wanted to elicit their help, such as in arranging special visas for foreign devotees and mediating local problems between the Bombay temple and the municipal bureaucracy.

Girirāja introduced Śrīla Prabhupāda to Mr. Jethmalani, and when Prabhupāda heard of the man's interest in improving slum conditions, he replied, “So we can uplift the position of the harijans very easily by this process of Caitanya Mahāprabhu.” He described Lord Caitanya and Lord Nityānanda as the originators of the Hare Kṛṣṇa movement. And the purpose of Their movement, he said, was to alleviate the suffering of all the sinful people by giving them the Hare Kṛṣṇa mantra. But for such a claim, Prabhupāda said, there must be evidence. “You are a lawyer,” he nodded congenially to his guest. “So you want witness and evidence.”

“You don't blame me,” agreed Mr. Jethmalani.

“No, it is not blaming,” said Śrīla Prabhupāda. “It is a fact. Without evidence, without proof, how can a law be established?” Prabhupāda cited his evidence in a song by Narottama dāsa Ṭhākura, which told of two great sinners, Jagāi and Madhāi, who had been saved by the Hare Kṛṣṇa movement. That was five hundred years ago, Prabhupāda said, but today one could see practically in the Hare Kṛṣṇa movement how drunkards and illicit sex hunters had become saintly. “Kṛṣṇa consciousness is so nice,” he said. “Everyone can be elevated. So what is this harijan? We can uplift them.” Mr. Jethmalani asked why there was no emphasis in the Bhagavad-gītā on public and social service.

“There is no need,” said Prabhupāda. “This is animal conception of life. The dogs also combine together and make a sound, ba-ba-ba-ba. A human being can also do like that. But then what is the difference between animals and human beings?”

“But I don't know that animals, on the contrary, serve each other,” said Mr. Jethmalani. “It is men who do.”

“But what is the use of serving?” Prabhupāda asked. “What you can do? What service you have done? You cannot do anything beyond the laws of nature. Now Indira is in difficulty. What can you do? In one day, everything is finished. The law of nature is so strict. You cannot do anything. You are falsely proud that you want to help, but it is not possible. Prakṛteḥ kriyamāṇāni. [Bg. 3.27] You can only do this service of understanding you are not this body but you are spirit soul. Your business is this. This is dharma."

Mr. Jethmalani protested that nevertheless there was so much physical suffering around. Prabhupāda agreed that it was good to be sympathetic, but one had to actually do something to rectify the suffering. "So you must know first of all how suffering can be stopped," said Prabhupāda. "Then you do this, the needful. Otherwise, what is the use if you do not know the method? Duḥkhālayam aśāśvatam. [Bg. 8.15] I think you have read the Bhagavad-gītā?"

Mr. Jethmalani said he had. He could not understand yet exactly how the Bhagavad-gītā could be so practical, but he was listening respectfully to Śrīla Prabhupāda and appreciating his staunch conviction. But after a few minutes, he prepared to leave. "Anyway," he said, "I will be in touch with your Girirāja."

Prabhupāda continued preaching and simultaneously asked that prasādam be brought for Mr. Jethmalani.

"Sir," said Mr. Jethmalani, "I will take leave of you, and with your blessings. I hope we shall soon be—

"We are preaching Kṛṣṇa consciousness without any sectarian motive," said Prabhupāda. "This is unity on the spiritual platform. Try to understand." Mr. Jethmalani said he hoped that he could be of some use to Prabhupāda's movement.

"Yes," said Śrīla Prabhupāda, "that is required—that you want to cooperate."

"Whatever you order at any time," said Mr. Jethmalani.

"So inform him," said Śrīla Prabhupāda, "and bring prasādam."

At first Mr. Jethmalani said he would prefer that the prasādam be brought down to his car so that he could hurry and get to the public meeting on time. But Prabhupāda insisted; that was no way to honor the Lord's prasādam. "Kindly wait," he asked. Mr. Jethmalani said he did not want to eat in Prabhupāda's presence, but Prabhupāda insisted and explained that this was an exchange of love. Finally, when the full plates of prasādam were brought in, Mr. Jethmalani was very appreciative. He had been so busy that he had not eaten all day, and he found the prasādam very tasteful.

"This is the real human service," said Prabhupāda, watching with pleasure as his guest began to eat, "—to give them knowledge." Mr. Jethmalani became more relaxed and friendly, inquiring about Prabhupāda's daily routine and about different aspects of how Westerners had taken to Kṛṣṇa consciousness.

Girirāja mentioned that earlier Mr. Jethmalani had been questioning whether Kṛṣṇa had an actual existence or whether He was imaginary.

"Why imaginary?" said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "He's in the history, Mahābhārata." Prabhupāda continued to give historical evidence of Kṛṣṇa from the śāstras, and Mr. Jethmalani listened submissively while continuing to eat. In due course, sweets were brought.

"In Northern India," said Prabhupāda, "first of all they give sweets. So they eat sweets to the heart's content."

"The best way to destroy your appetite is to eat sweets first," said Mr. Jethmalani.

"Yes," said Prabhupāda, and they both laughed.

"So I am very glad that you have taken the prasādam," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "I am pleased. Therefore, I wanted that you eat before me. It is a great pleasure."

On the best of terms, Prabhupāda and his guest parted, with Mr. Jethmalani promising he would confer with Girirāja about any problems. Girirāja was ecstatic. His dream of Prabhupāda at the Bombay temple, transforming lionlike politicians into gentle devotees, was being fulfilled.

Śrīla Prabhupāda would repeatedly mention that the ISKCON leaders should prepare to carry on without his direct management. One day he was recalling some of the incidents of his first year in New York City, when suddenly he began speaking of the future. "Don't spoil it," he said. "Now it is up to you, my senior men. I can part away from you. My health is not good. I am old man. It is not surprising. Now you G.B.C., young boys, you are American, expert. You have all intelligence. So you don't spoil it. Let the movement go forward more. You have a lot of nice places. Don't be anxious for... And even if I go, where is the harm? I have given my ideas and direction in my books. Just you have to see it. I think I have done my part. Is it not? Do you think so or not?"

"Yes, you have done everything. Still, we want the whole Bhāgavatam, Śrīla Prabhupāda."

"That will be done," said Prabhupāda. "Even it is not full, there is no loss. You are competent. You can take charge. Now you can take charge of all the money, and let me remain free from management. My only request is, don't spoil it. I have sometimes chastised so that it may not be spoiled."

Prabhupāda said that for him to see that things were going on nicely under his ISKCON leaders would make him happy. "And I will go on writing books. That will be all right?" He said there was no need for him to eat any more. Since he was not physically active, there was no purpose in taking a lunch of capātis and rice.

Girirāja expressed that it was the pleasure of Prabhupāda's devotees to see him eat and relish prasādam. But Śrīla Prabhupāda disregarded this and said the brain could be kept active just by a little fruit or milk.

These moods—Prabhupāda speaking of retirement and fasting, even hinting of passing away—were only occasional moods. They were very real, practical, and sober, but he would soon turn to other things, promising his continual involvement with his disciples, his movement, and the world. After a brief spell of such talking, he would again be commenting fiercely on the follies of the scientists and politicians.

Śrīla Prabhupāda said that if a man could not accept the simple logic that there must be God, then he was obstinate and not even sane. "But these animals," he said, "they are passing on as big scientists, philosophers, theologians, and so on and so forth. We have to stop them. Na māṁ duṣkṛtino mūḍhāḥ prapadyante narādhamāḥ. This is the qualification of the person who does not accept God. He is either duṣkṛtinaḥ, narādhamā, mūḍha, or māyāpahrta-jñāna. Māyāpahrta-jñāna means those who are highly educated but have no knowledge. Āsuram bhāvam āśrityāḥ means they do not believe that God exists. So as Kṛṣṇa conscious leaders, you have to chastise these rascals."

Girirāja said, "It's actually relishable to chastise them."

"Yes," Prabhupāda laughed. "It is a pleasure sport." As they spoke, Kṣīracorā Gopīnātha entered with the daily newspaper. "What is the news?" Prabhupāda asked. "What are all these rascals saying? Newspaper means all the statements of rascals."

Gopīnātha read the headlines aloud: "Honest Plea to Congress Chief Minister... Mischief Calls for Assembly Election."

"Again elections," said Prabhupāda. "As if election will change their quality. Let them remain rascals and simply by election replace one rascal with another rascal. Let them remain rascal but get votes. That is described in Bhāgavatam: śvavid-varāhoṣṭra kharaiḥ samstutaḥ.* The population is śvavid-varāhoṣṭra, and they are giving vote, another big paśu [animal]. Yes, this is democracy. The voters are paśus, or beasts, and they are selecting another big paśu. This is going on. The rascals do not know that if instead of a tiger we select a lion, then what is the difference? Simply names. The tiger was president. Now the lion is president. And both of them are animals. Where is the man, the human being? This is going on. And because they are paśu, they say, 'Oh, now there is lion. Now the tiger is driven away. Now there is lion.' This is going on. Am I right?"

Śrīla Prabhupāda continued his sharp, critical interest in his movement. When he received a report that devotees working with the BBT in Los Angeles were receiving salaries, he became disturbed. He enunciated his policy and asked his secretary to make it known. "Kṛṣṇa consciousness means vairāgya-vidyā, renunciation, and knowledge," he said. "They are taking advantage of the temple facilities for their sense gratification. Do you understand?"

Prabhupāda said that temple living was for brahmacārīs and sannyāsīs. If a gṛhastha was rendering essential service, the temple could provide an apartment for him. "But why salary?" asked Prabhupāda. "Where is the question of salary? Where is vairāgya, renunciation? Salary project should be stopped. If they want salary, they can work outside. In the name of Vaiṣṇava, he is drawing salary, living comfortably, having sense enjoyment. So all you, my officers, should think it over and do the needful."

Prabhupāda told how Lord Caitanya was living in the perfect situation in family life with His wife and mother, and yet He left it all to practice vairāgya. And thus He was praised by Sārvabhauma

Bhaṭṭācārya, “You are the Supreme Person, appearing as Śrī Kṛṣṇa Caitanya, and You are teaching renunciation and devotional service.”

For weeks, Girirāja and his political acquaintance, Mr. Rajda, had spoken about arranging a meeting between Śrīla Prabhupāda and India's new prime minister, Morarji Desai. When it was brought before Śrīla Prabhupāda, the crucial question was whether Śrīla Prabhupāda would consider going to see the prime minister somewhere in the city.

“But that is not respectful,” said Prabhupāda. “Then he does not know how to honor a saintly person. Useless to meet. If he has no respect for a saintly person, if he thinks he is greater than a saintly person, then the visit is useless.”

“Yes, then the meeting will start on the wrong foot,” said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa. “He has to come see you, Śrīla Prabhupāda. There are so many examples in the śāstra of big personalities coming to see saintly persons.”

“Even Caitanya Mahāprabhu refused to see the king of Orissa,” said Prabhupāda, “what to speak of going there.” Prabhupāda explained that he did not require anything from the prime minister, but for the benefit of the human society he could suggest some things to him. He said that it was a fact that sometimes, when in difficulty, a saintly person could approach a king. He gave the example of Lord Caitanya's devotee Gopīnātha Paṭṭanāyaka, and how the devotees asked Lord Caitanya to intervene to save him. But Lord Caitanya showed that it was a difficult job to approach such royal persons. With these guidelines in mind, Girirāja pursued the idea of a meeting

On the evening of May 5 at about midnight, Girirāja received a phone call from Mr. Rajda; the meeting with Morarji Desai was fixed for seven-thirty the next morning. The prime minister was only going to be in Bombay for one or two days and would be staying at his son's flat on Marine Drive. Although Girirāja knew that Prabhupāda had said he would not go to Mr. Desai, Girirāja wanted to consult Prabhupāda to see if certain leading disciples should go. Not wanting to disturb Prabhupāda, he tiptoed into Prabhupāda's hallway and peeked into the room. Prabhupāda was awake, sitting at his translating table, working. He looked up, saw Girirāja, and motioned him to come forward.

“Śrīla Prabhupāda,” said Girirāja, “I am very sorry to disturb you at this hour, but I just received a phone call from Ratan Singh Rajda.” Girirāja related that Morarji Desai was ready to meet them at his residence the next morning. Śrīla Prabhupāda explained that he wanted to see if Morarji Desai would have been willing to come and meet him at Hare Krishna Land. “It's not that I'm proud,” he said, “that I can't go meet him at his place. But unless his mood is respectful, there is no use.” Prabhupāda said that this was the test of whether the prime minister had a proper attitude. He agreed that Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami and Girirāja should go ahead and meet the prime minister.

Girirāja: This meeting with Śrīla Prabhupāda was one of the most intense and unique that I ever had, although I was able to be in his presence so many times. We were alone together, at midnight. Everyone else was asleep. All the lights were out, and it was just the two of us in this big room. He was sitting behind his marble translating desk, and I was sitting on the floor at his feet.

I said, "Prabhupāda, I am sorry that I had to disturb you like this in the middle of the night." Śrīla Prabhupāda said, "That's all right. Actually, with this sickness I cannot sleep at night. Even if I want to, I cannot sleep. Due to this illness, I cannot eat also. I am such an old man. There is no question of sex life and there is no question of defense either, so I guess I am liberated."

Of course, I knew that Śrīla Prabhupāda was liberated, not because of bodily circumstances, as he was humbly saying, but because he was in transcendental consciousness. He was always up at night, translating, not because he was sick and couldn't sleep, but out of devotion to his Guru Mahārāja and to Lord Kṛṣṇa. But it was a very wry, humorous remark, and I felt very charmed by the whole meeting and offered my obeisances and went back to sleep.

The next morning, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami and Girirāja were prepared well in advance for their meeting with the prime minister. Before leaving, they asked Prabhupāda what books they should give him. Prabhupāda replied, "Bhagavad-gītā, Kṛṣṇa book, and Teachings of Lord Caitanya."

"In Hindi?" asked Girirāja.

Prabhupāda frowned. "No, English."

The devotees went in their car to pick up Mr. Rajda at his flat; from there they would go to the apartment on Marine Drive where Prime Minister Desai was staying. After Girirāja had been ringing the front doorbell for about twenty minutes, Mr. Rajda finally appeared. He said that they had to wait just five more minutes, while he continued dressing and eating. Unfortunately, by the time they reached the apartment on Marine Drive, it was eight o'clock. They were thirty minutes late! As soon as they entered, the prime minister said, "You are very late." He was already meeting with some other people and said that he would see the devotees for a few minutes. He repeated that he had been waiting since 7:25. The devotees remained silent, not knowing what to say. They apologized and gave him Prabhupāda's books. Mr. Desai didn't say much and quickly excused himself, going back to his meeting with the others.

When the devotees returned to the temple, Prabhupāda eagerly asked what happened. He was very upset to hear that they had been late. "Very bad," he said. He remarked that Morarji Desai was known for his punctuality. They had missed a good opportunity, he said, by their misbehavior. When the devotees explained that Mr. Rajda had made them late, Prabhupāda asked for a more detailed report. The devotees said the main thing Morarji Desai wanted to know was why they were late.

"Did you tell him that Ratan Singh Rajda made you late?" asked Prabhupāda.

Girirāja and Tamāla Kṛṣṇa shook their heads. Prabhupāda became disgusted and said, "Why did you not say that he made you late? That you were on time, but he made you late? I know you are thinking that he is our friend and you didn't want to embarrass him in front of the prime minister, but now the whole thing is spoiled." Feeling very foolish and ashamed, the devotees sat silently before Prabhupāda. Śrīla Prabhu pāda reflected for a moment. "Anyway," he said, "these men will never change their views."

Śrīla Prabhupāda occasionally talked of traveling to a place better for his health. It was May, and Bombay was hot. Soon the monsoons would come. He had considered going to Kashmir, because the air and water were reputedly good for health; but no suitable accommodations could be found there, and the weather was too cool. Then one day he received a visit from Śrīmān Narayan, the former governor of Gujarat.

"You should take care of your health," said Śrīmān Narayan. "I hope you get better."

"Oh, this is just an old machine," Prabhupāda laughed. "The more you cure it, the more it gets worse. But my work never stops. That keeps on going. My main work is to write these books, and that is going on." Several other Indian guests were present, and they at once began recommending good places for health: Srinagar, Kashmir, Dehradun, Masouri, Simla, Hardwar.

"Yes, the water in Hardwar is good," said Śrīmān Narayan, "but better than that would be in Hrsikesha, where the Ganges flows: Whatever places are on the bank of the Ganges, the water will be very good. Pure Ganges water."

Śrīla Prabhupāda took these remarks seriously and turned to his disciples. "Yes, then we can go to Hrsikesha. This time is very good. Let us arrange for that."

From that moment, going to Hrsikesha became a definite plan, and Prabhupāda prepared to leave Bombay within a week.

SPL 52: "I Have Done My Part"

CHAPTER FIFTY-TWO

"I Have Done My Part"

The first week in Hrsikesha was idyllic, heavenly, with perfect weather and hopes of Prabhupāda eating and recovering. But on the eighth night, a violent storm hit, and with the storm came a drastic turn in Prabhupāda's health. He said the end was near, and he asked to go immediately to Vṛndāvana, in case Kṛṣṇa wanted him to depart from the world very soon.

The devotees in Hrsikesha had been in high spirits, and so had Śrīla Prabhupāda. While crossing the Ganges by boat, Prabhupāda had requested drinking water to be fetched from the center of the river. He had liked the lodge provided by his host, and he had even gone into the kitchen to show his disciples how to cook. Word had spread through the pilgrimage-tourist town that A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami was present, and Prabhupāda had agreed to hold a darśana from five to six P.M. daily. The room had always been crowded at that hour with forty to fifty people, including Western hippies and seekers as well as Indians on pilgrimage or vacation. Although Śrīla Prabhupāda's voice had been extremely faint, he had spoken with force, stressing Bhagavad-gītā as it is.

When an American hippie had questioned him skeptically, Prabhupāda had replied, "You cannot understand, because you are crazy." And when a lady had put forward materialistic welfare work as the highest good, Prabhupāda had replied, “Your compassion is as valuable as blowing on a boil to heal it.”

Only a few disciples were with Prabhupāda in Hrsikeshā, and they had deemed it a wonderful treat. Not only had Prabhupāda directed the cooking, but he had told stories while cooking. He had said that only a lazy man couldn't cook, and then he told a Bengali story—the story of a lazy man—to illustrate. There was a king who decided that all lazy men in his kingdom could come to the charity house and be fed. So many men came, all claiming, “I am a lazy man.” The king then told his minister to set fire to the charity house, and all but two men ran out of the burning building. One of the two said, “My back is becoming very hot from the fire.” And the other advised, “Just turn over to the other side.” The king then said, “These are actually lazy men. Feed them.”

But on the evening of May 15, Śrīla Prabhupāda could neither sleep nor work at his dictation. The storm, a harbinger of the monsoon season, knocked out all electric power in Hrsikeshā. Since the fans were not running and the window shutters had to be closed because of the wind, the room became very hot.

At five in the morning Śrīla Prabhupāda called for Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami and said he was feeling weak. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa massaged Prabhupāda for an hour. Even at dawn the wind did not let up, and sand was blowing.

The storm and power failure continued the next night. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa asked Prabhupāda about the swelling in his hands and feet, and Prabhupāda replied, annoyed, “Why you are bothering? It is my body, and I am not disturbed.” But then he added, “From the material point of view, it is not good. Please consider how everything may be turned over to the G.B.C., so that in my absence everything will go on. You may make a will, and I will sign it.” He was talking definitely about things that before he had only alluded to.

Suddenly, at one-thirty A.M., Prabhupāda rang his bell, and Tamāla Kṛṣṇa and Kṣīracorā-gopīnātha responded. From beneath his mosquito net, he said, “As I was telling you, the symptoms are not good. I want to leave immediately for Vṛndāvana.” If it was time for him to pass away, he said, then let it be in Vṛndāvana. Since he wanted to leave immediately, the devotees stayed up all night, packing and preparing to leave. Train reservations were not available, however, so they decided to go by car.

Śrīla Prabhupāda rode in the back seat of the small Ambassador, sometimes stretching out on the seat. Upendra sat at his feet on the floor, while Tamāla Kṛṣṇa sat in the front next to Dāmodara Paṇḍita, an experienced driver who drove fast but with utmost care. Often Dāmodara Paṇḍita would glance into the rear-view mirror and meet Śrīla Prabhupāda's attentive gaze. At one point, when Prabhupāda saw a man selling cucumbers, he asked Dāmodara to stop the car. Cucumbers, he said, were good for quenching thirst.

After four and a half hours they reached Delhi and stopped at the ISKCON center in Lajpat Nagar. It was very hot. The devotees watered down the roof, and Śrīla Prabhupāda rested there on a cot.

By five the next morning they were ready to set out for Vṛndāvana. At the Delhi temple, the devotees had given Prabhupāda a large plate of the Deities' prasādam, but he had only taken a few tastes. "Eating is finished," he had said. "I prayed to Kṛṣṇa to be freed from eating and sleeping, and it is happening. I have already given up mating and defending. Now all these material activities are finished with."

As they drove out of the city and into the countryside, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa noticed that Śrīla Prabhupāda seemed more peaceful. "You look very happy to be going to Vṛndāvana," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa.

"Yes," Prabhupāda replied, "Vṛndāvana is my home, and Bombay is my office."

As they turned off the Delhi–Agra Road, Śrīla Prabhupāda saw for the first time the stone marker, "Bhaktivedanta Swami Marg." They soon met up with Guṇārṇava, who was waiting on a motorcycle and who joyfully sped ahead to tell the devotees at the Krishna-Balaram Mandir that Śrīla Prabhupāda was here. At the gate of the temple a big kīrtana party, including all the gurukula children, was gathered to greet Prabhupāda with chanting and dancing. Four devotees carried Prabhupāda on a palanquin to the temple hall, where he offered his respects to the two Lords, Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma. After the āratī ceremony honoring Śrīla Prabhupāda, Prabhupāda spoke briefly to the assembled devotees.

"If death takes place," he said, "let it take place here." Seeing his demeanor and hearing him speak these unexpected words, some of the devotees in the room began to cry. "So," he continued, "there is nothing to be said new. Whatever I have to say, I have spoken in my books. Now, try to understand it and continue your endeavors. Whether I am present or not present, it doesn't matter. As Kṛṣṇa is living eternally, similarly, the living being also lives eternally, but kīrtir yasya sa jīvati. One who has done service to the Lord lives forever. So, you have been taught to serve Kṛṣṇa. So with Kṛṣṇa, our life is eternal. The temporary disappearance of this body—it doesn't matter. The body is meant for disappearance. So live forever by serving Kṛṣṇa."

Despite the finality of these words, Śrīla Prabhupāda continued to converse in his room with a few guests who remained after most of the devotees had left. A retired family man, a Mr. Bose, was present and told Prabhupāda how he was now living alone in the Krishna-Balaram Mandir. Prabhupāda said, "You will not be able to adjust to this way of life." But when Mr. Bose expressed his determination, Prabhupāda added, "You have a very good family, so it is hopeful."

Śrīla Prabhupāda went on to recall some of his activities at Hrsikesha, and he spoke of how his movement was growing stronger around the world and how in New York the judge had made a very favorable decision.

A little later, the conversation turned to ghosts, and Prabhupāda told about the haunted house of Lokanath Mullik in Calcutta. Prabhupāda had also rented a "ghost house" in Lucknow. "I am not afraid of ghosts," he said. "I am ghostproof. In England there are also many ghosts. They are generally evil, and sometimes they even kill. They can be seen sometimes entering a latrine or sitting on a pillar. By offering piṇḍa one can free his forefathers from ghostly bodies. In Māyāpur there were Muhammadan ghosts, but not any more. By our chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa ghosts are driven away."

Prabhupāda began a routine. In the morning he would ride in the car at least a short distance down Bhaktivedanta Swami Marg. Although even riding was difficult for him, the morning air would be fresh and cool compared to the heat of the day, and the road, lined with nīm trees and shrubs, was pleasant. Each morning he would come back and faithfully, lovingly behold Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma. Then he would sit or rest in his main room and later move upstairs, where a desk and a chair as well as bed were set up on the outdoor veranda of his house. Here, also, the devotees had thrown water on the floors for cooling. His main room downstairs had an air-cooler.

Śrīla Prabhupāda was still prone to become involved in management, and he asked his secretary to report to him on the various ISKCON activities. "You become my eyes," he said. But to think that the Bombay project was not yet completed disturbed him very much. "I have worked so far to get done whatever is accomplished," he told Tamāla Kṛṣṇa. "Now if the Deities are not properly installed in my presence, it will be a great shock." But ISKCON management was too much botheration, and Prabhupāda told Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, "You must give me complete relief from management."

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa mentioned that Prabhupāda would sometimes become upset if he was not informed about ISKCON management, but Prabhupāda said better not to inform him. "Now take it that I am dead," he said. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa took this remark to mean that the leaders of ISKCON should manage all problems just as if Prabhupāda were no longer present. They should relieve him so he would be free to think of Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma. And Prabhupāda confirmed that this was the right idea. "Give me that chance," he said.

After one day in Vṛndāvana, Śrīla Prabhupāda wrote,

I was staying in Hrsikesha hoping to improve my health, but instead I have become a little weaker. Now I have come back to my home, Vrindavan. If anything should go wrong, at least I will be here in Vrindavan.

Śrīla Prabhupāda called for Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami. "There are two things," he said, "—trying to survive and to prepare for death. It is better to plan for the worse. Arrange to always have three or four men with me. Have kīrtana and read Bhāgavatam all the time. Now I am trying to take little food. Parīkṣit Mahārāja would not even take water."

Seeing Śrīla Prabhupāda's mood, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa mentioned the need for a will, and Prabhupāda agreed. A will, he said, was simple enough. Whatever he spoke, several men could sign as witnesses. He recalled how his spiritual master, just before a hernia operation, had made a very simple will on a scrap of paper. Although he never underwent that operation, years later the same will was presented in court and was accepted as evidence against the plots of some of the disciples.

"He was the original founder," said Prabhupāda, "so whatever he wills, that is accepted." When Tamāla Kṛṣṇa asked why Prabhupāda's Guru Mahārāja had not undergone the operation, Prabhupāda replied, "Everyone has their sentiment. He thought that the doctor was paid to kill him."

"Yes," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, "because sometimes people were actually paid off to kill him. Actually, Śrīla Prabhupāda, you and your Guru Mahārāja were the greatest enemies of modern civilization in this century."

Śrīla Prabhupāda explained, "This is Caitanya Mahāprabhu's mission. Bhārata-bhūmite haila... This is India's culture. The whole world is in darkness, and they are risking their life in the transmigration of one body to another. He does not know that he is eternal and that in a few years this fragment is passing away, this life is just a passing flash. This is the Vaiṣṇava's concern. What these rascals are doing? They are jumping like monkeys, wasting time. That is the Vaiṣṇava's compassion, para-duḥkha-duḥkhī."

When some other devotees gathered in Śrīla Prabhupāda's room, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa explained Prabhupāda's recent decision. "So Śrīla Prabhupāda has decided that the best medicine would be Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam and kīrtana, and no need of any doctors who have promised to help save the life. We shouldn't bring them. And no outsiders."

"No medicine for the body?" asked a devotee.

"Oh, whatever medicine I am taking," said Śrīla Prabhupāda, "Yogendra Ras."

"He has tried so many medicines," Tamāla Kṛṣṇa said. "Every doctor has come, and they have each given their medicine. And he has tried them. This medicine always works: Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam and kīrtana."

"Bhavausadhāc chotra-mano-'bhirāmāt," quoted Śrīla Prabhupāda. (He had been quoting it again and again.) "It pleases the ear and the mind, bhavausadhāc chotra-mano-'bhirāmāt, ka uttama-śloka-guṇānuvādāt. Make glorification of Bhagavān, and everyone will appreciate it—except the animal."

At Śrīla Prabhupāda's request, kīrtanas by a group of no more than four or five devotees and Bhāgavatam readings went on constantly, whether he was in his room, on the veranda, or on the roof. In the morning from five to ten and in the evenings from three to nine he would sit with his eyes closed, absorbed in the kīrtana, "the medicine for the disease of material existence, which gives pleasure to the mind and ear."

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa promised to Prabhupāda he would read him no letters and bring him no visitors. Prabhupāda had long wanted this, and now it at least would come to pass.

The writing of the will would not be done with the attitude that the end had come, but in the spirit of "preparing for the worst." It also meant finishing things so they would not have to be done at the last minute. Prabhupāda was concerned that his movement continue securely, with all ISKCON properties in the possession of his disciples within the institution and all his instructions made clear for the future. These matters should be dispatched now in a will, and the G.B.C. men should gather in Vṛndāvana to make these last arrangements and to be with him. Once these things were settled, Prabhupāda would be free to continue writing his books with no worries.

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa later asked Śrīla Prabhupāda whether his new decisions indicated that he was losing his desire to fight to live. Śrīla Prabhupāda indirectly admitted it was so. "Therefore," he said, "I do not wish to leave Vṛndāvana. If, by Kṛṣṇa's desire, I survive, then we shall see later on. Otherwise..."

Even though his secretary did not read him letters or bring him news, Prabhupāda went on thinking. "What about the Rādhā-Dāmodara temple?" he asked. He had been renting his rooms there for years, and the temple proprietors had often challenged his rights. This was just another of his multifarious worries in maintaining his preaching around the world. Prabhupāda advised that his disciples always live in the Rādhā-Dāmodara rooms; that would prevent the landlord from trying to use them for something else. Even while lying quietly, resting, Prabhupāda would turn over such problems in his mind.

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa wanted to double check to see that Prabhupāda actually wanted all the G.B.C. men from all over the world to come. It would be costly and demanding, so he wanted to be sure that Prabhupāda really wanted it. When Śrīla Prabhupāda assured him that he did, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, who saw his service as responding to whatever Śrīla Prabhupāda desired, also spoke in favor of the idea.

"Because they love you," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, "I am sure they will all want to come and be with you."

"Your love for me," said Śrīla Prabhupāda, "will be shown by how much you cooperate to keep this institution together after I am gone."

The room was fully decorated with rose and jasmine garlands. The kīrtana party was singing sweetly and softly. Śrīla Prabhupāda would go for hours without speaking, and when he did speak, he was usually brief. Yet he covered the same range of topics as always, and in the same pure Kṛṣṇa consciousness. Recalling the contractor's cheating in Bombay, he said, "It is not only a sin to cheat, but it is sinful to allow yourself to be cheated. With so much effort and difficulty, both from my part and my disciples', the money has been collected, and now it becomes spoiled. I cannot allow this."

Śrīla Prabhupāda would usually make comments such as this while lying in bed. As soon as he would speak, some of the devotees attending him would come close to catch his words, and sometimes the kīrtana would stop.

The parts of Prabhupāda's daily schedule that remained the same as before were his rising in the middle of the night to translate Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, his morning massage and bathing, and his hearing news through his secretary. He had all but stopped his morning car ride, as well as his darśana of the Deities. Eating was almost nil. He asked to be moved from his bed downstairs to the one upstairs, and sometimes he would sit at his desk.

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa read Prabhupāda a letter from Girirāja, more like a loving prayer than a letter. Girirāja had quoted a verse by Prahāda Mahārāja from Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam:

My dear Lord, O Supreme Personality of Godhead, because of my association with material desires, one after another, I was gradually falling into a blind well full of snakes, following the general populace. But Your servant Nārada Muni kindly accepted me as his disciple and instructed me how to achieve this transcendental position. Therefore, my first duty is to serve him. How could I leave his service?

Śrīla Prabhupāda was very affectionate toward Girirāja for his faithful, fearless service, and he listened with great appreciation, closing his eyes and drinking in every word of the prayer.

That same evening, Śrīla Prabhupāda sat up to receive a member of Parliament, Sri Sitaram Singh. Although he was appreciative that a highly placed man was visiting, he spoke on the absolute plane, exposing material illusions. Immediately, he attacked the narrow-mindedness of politicians with their party politics. He also exposed the rascaldom of politicians who claimed to support nonviolence on the basis of the Bhagavad-gītā. At times like this, the devotees with Śrīla Prabhupāda would almost forget that he was making preparations for the end of life. Later that night, after Mr. Singh had left, Prabhupāda said, "I can speak some more, or if Kṛṣṇa desires, then whatever I have given already, that is all."

Śrīla Prabhupāda was unlimitedly willing to speak about Kṛṣṇa and to help give Kṛṣṇa consciousness to others. But how much longer he would stay, how much more he would give, was up to Kṛṣṇa. With more time, he would carry on Kṛṣṇa's will in the material world. But if Kṛṣṇa's desire was that he should leave, then he would also accept that willingly. Even if he had to soon depart from this world, he could not simply shut off his burning compassion, his preaching spirit. Most of all, he desired that what he had started—a worldwide movement to save suffering souls—should continue.

The word was sent to all G.B.C. secretaries worldwide. Śrīla Prabhupāda might depart very soon, and he wanted them to be with him in Vṛndāvana. As soon as possible, the G.B.C. men left their duties and came to him. The last time most of them had been with him was in February, during the annual meeting in Māyāpur. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa informed them of Śrīla Prabhupāda's recent turns—how he had been preaching in Bombay but not eating, how he had gone to Hrsikesh and gotten worse, and how he had come to Vṛndāvana, sensing that the end was soon. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa had explained that Śrīla Prabhupāda had asked that he simply be administered the medicine of the holy name continually, that the G.B.C. and sannyāsīs be gathered to chant with him, and that a will be made securing ISKCON properties and insuring the continuation of the ISKCON institution. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa also mentioned that Prabhupāda had said that their love for him would be shown by their cooperation in keeping ISKCON together after his departure.

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami confided to his Godbrothers that his own feelings were mixed. It was a time of sorrow, and yet Śrīla Prabhupāda seemed relieved now that he had decided not to struggle to survive. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa said he couldn't but feel happy at Śrīla Prabhupāda's relief from all concerns. Bhavānanda Goswami, one of the first G.B.C. men to arrive, told the others how he had said to Prabhupāda that on the one hand he felt sad that Prabhupāda was departing, but also joyful that he would be able to leave this nasty material world and rejoin Kṛṣṇa. Prabhupāda had approved the sentiment, adding that although his Guru Mahārāja had become disgusted at the end of his life due to the misbehavior of his leading disciples, he did not feel that; rather, he liked the company of his disciples and felt they were doing their best in carrying out his order. But he also warned them not to spoil ISKCON and become another Gaudiya Math by splitting up.

The ISKCON leaders formed small groups and took turns in being with Prabhupāda and chanting and reading to him. He would often be sitting up in bed in his main room downstairs, and the high-ceilinged room with its black stone floor would be very dimly lit, though decorated with flowers and framed pictures of ISKCON Deities. His room was comfortable, despite the oppressive heat, because of the air cooler and overhead fans.

Sometimes Prabhupāda would clap his hands softly to the kīrtana, and he was always ready to hear and evaluate reports of his disciples' preaching. The main difference about Prabhupāda was his physical appearance. As one G.B.C. man put it, he looked like one of the great ascetics depicted in the Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, grown extremely thin like Dhruva Mahārāja or Rantideva, who performed great austerities while rapt in meditation on the Absolute Truth.

Śrīla Prabhupāda would alternately sit up in bed or lie down while hearing kīrtana or Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam. Now he was always surrounded by concerned disciples and he seemed happier. Some of the devotees who had been with him in Vṛndāvana just before all the G.B.C. secretaries had arrived could see that he felt more encouraged; perhaps by the sincere prayers of all the devotees a dramatic change might come.

Bhavānanda Goswami and Jayapatāka Swami brought reports from Śrīla Prabhupāda's beloved Māyāpur project. Bhavānanda said the temple was filled with transcendental activity, and the gurukula boys would chant Hare Kṛṣṇa even while sweeping the roads. Work was just beginning on a new residence for Śrīla Prabhupāda; it would be surrounded by fountains, a terrace, and a big pond.

"It has not yet begun?" Śrīla Prabhupāda asked. Jayapatāka Swami replied that the plans had been drawn and that the architects said it would be no problem. They could build right through the rainy season.

"How long will it take?" Tamāla Kṛṣṇa asked on Śrīla Prabhupāda's behalf.

"Six months."

"Śrīla Prabhupāda," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, "I think you are tied to this planet by the love of your devotees."

Śrīla Prabhupāda uttered a thoughtful "Hmmm. All right."

Although Śrīla Prabhupāda had indicated a will to live by saying, "All right," to Bhavānanda he said, "There is no hope of life. Therefore I have called the G.B.C. If I can die in Vṛndāvana... Kṛṣṇa can accomplish any thing, but from the physical condition there is no hope."

"But Kṛṣṇa is Parameśvara," Bhavānanda said.

Prabhupāda laughed. "That is another thing." If Kṛṣṇa liked, then he would live. But Prabhupāda wanted his disciples to understand the critical state of his health. "The brain is working," he said, "but the body is not allowing. Don't worry. Everyone will die today or tomorrow. I am also an old man. There is nothing to be regretted. It is up to Kṛṣṇa."

Dropping his reassuring stance and pleading as a helpless student, Bhavānanda asked, "What can we do, Śrīla Prabhupāda?"

"You can pray to Kṛṣṇa," Prabhupāda replied. "Kṛṣṇa is all-powerful. And one of the most important things is that when I am gone, don't spoil it. Keep it, Māyāpur."

Jayapatāka Swami gave glowing accounts of his recent preaching to both Hindus and Muslims in Dacca. "There have been no sādhus in Bangladesh for years," said Jayapatāka, speaking strongly and victoriously, though sitting like a child at the foot of Śrīla Prabhupāda's bed. "People are eager to hear about Kṛṣṇa consciousness. Ten thousand people gathered. It was the biggest function in the history of the colony, either Hindu or Muhammadan. The Muhammadans are also interested. They don't know anything about Lord Caitanya. Many ask if we have any books on the life of Lord Caitanya. They like to read."

"That book Teachings of Lord Caitanya," Śrīla Prabhupāda interjected in a voice hoarse but full of life and interest.

Jayapatāka said they had prospects of getting a temple there. "Many young men are coming and asking very intelligent questions," he said. "They ask questions about our Deity worship, about guru, about hari-nāma. Very intelligent questions. There is no CIA rumor. There is no type of any bad talk about us. No envy at all. And because they are a little oppressed, they are always being challenged about believing in Kṛṣṇa—so that is why they are eager to understand."

"What about the Muhammadans?" asked Śrīla Prabhupāda.

"At one place," said Jayapatāka, "when Prabhaviṣṇu lectured in Dacca, a Muhammadan heard and came to him and said, 'What you are preaching is very applicable to the modern day. In my district there is nearly a majority of Hindus, but when they have their sādhus come and preach there, I find it very old-fashioned and very unacceptable. But your preaching we find enthusing.' So he arranged a program. Ultimately every Muhammadan that I have met has become interested, just because it was presented in a way that was acceptable to them. They say, 'You are Hindu?' We say, 'No, we are Vaiṣṇava. Vaiṣṇava means we believe in only one God. There is no one equal to Him. So you believe in the same thing.'"

"That is a fact," said Prabhupāda. "Asamordhva. There cannot be anyone equal to God or greater than Him."

"Many young men, both Hindu and Muhammadan, will join," said Jayapatāka Swami. "I am sure. But right now we are getting the society registered and getting our place."

"You did not get that yet?" Prabhupāda asked. "Get the place and get the society registered." Prabhupāda added that Jayapatāka should do everything very seriously. "It is increasing," he added approvingly.

When Rāmeśvara Swami came into the room for his kīrtana, he brought Śrīla Prabhupāda the newest editions of the Kṛṣṇa book trilogies and reported on how the various books were selling.

"Keep your health very nice," Śrīla Prabhupāda said. "Live as many years as possible. Be Kṛṣṇa conscious. Then next life you go back to home—permanent life. There is no cheating, no politics, no personal ambition to fulfill. There is not any tinge of any personal salvation. Now can anyone point out that here is personal sense gratification? Can anyone? Can you say, 'Here is my personal sense gratification'? There is no such thing in Kṛṣṇa consciousness. This is our desire—that we live with devotees and execute the mission of our predecessors. This is our ambition. Without ambition no one can live. Our real self-interest is to execute Kṛṣṇa's desire. So do it very carefully, and if one fourth of the Americans become Vaiṣṇavas, then the whole world will change... "

"In America now," Rāmeśvara said enthusiastically, "the book selling has surpassed last year. We are trying to double. We have not yet doubled, but it has gone beyond last year."

"It is going to double," said Śrīla Prabhupāda.

"By your mercy," Rāmeśvara added.

"Yes," said Prabhupāda. "Be doubly blessed." At these words the devotees laughed happily.

Śrīla Prabhupāda then turned to Kīrtanānanda Swami. "So New Vrindaban is developing. Be happy."

"We can't be happy if you are not there," Kīrtanānanda said.

"I am always there," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "When I see that everything is going nicely, then I am happy. Even with this body. Body is body. We'll have next body."

"Wasn't it Puru who gave his father his youth?" asked Kīrtanānanda.

Śrīla Prabhupāda nodded. "King Yayāti traded his old age."

"And you can do that," said Kīrtanānanda.

"No, why?" said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "You are my body. Then you can do it. There is no difference. Just like I am working, so my Guru Mahārāja is there, Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī. Physically he may not be, but in every action we do."

"In the Bhāgavatam," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, "you say that for whoever follows the guru, the guru lives with him eternally."

"So I am not going to die," said Prabhupāda. "Kīrtir yvya sa jīvati. One who does something substantial, he lives forever. He doesn't die. One has to accept another body according to his karma, but for a devotee there is no such thing. He always accepts a body for serving Kṛṣṇa, so there is no problem."

Rāmeśvara Swami informed Prabhupāda that the last volume of the Ninth Canto was at the printer, and the first volume of the Tenth Canto would follow in two weeks. Śrīla Prabhupāda inquired about whether it was more economical to print the Hindi books in India or America, and they discussed.

"Internationally all conditioned people are suffering," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "But you devotees are above all dangers. Kīrtanānanda Mahārāja knows that very well. He has no danger, sticking to that New Vrindaban program. There is always improvement. They eat first-class nutritious food. And what is that place in Pennsylvania?"

It was like old times, with Śrīla Prabhupāda hearing reports and correcting and inspiring his leaders to do more and more, assuring them that Kṛṣṇa would help them.

Rāmeśvara Swami described for Śrīla Prabhupāda's pleasure the great volume of Kṛṣṇa conscious literature being distributed. "At the end of this year," he said, "we will have sold at least sixty-five million books on Kṛṣṇa. Every year we are selling at least fifteen to twenty million books now."

"Yes," said Prabhupāda. "They ask, 'Why are you stressing so much on Kṛṣṇa?' But that is the only message. It will increase more. People will be inquisitive."

Śrīla Prabhupāda continued to talk, but with occasional reflections on his present condition. "What is the problem?" he asked. "We are talking about Kṛṣṇa. So if all of a sudden I collapse, then what is the problem? Kṛṣṇa tvadīya-pada-paṅkaja...^{*} Ordinary dying is kapha-vāta-pitta, choking. But if in the kīrtana you die, oh, it is so successful. Not the injection and operation—that atmosphere. But in kṛṣṇa-kīrtana. That is glorious. Not oxygen, gas, dying, and so much trouble. Chant Hare Kṛṣṇa—bas. And let me die, Kṛṣṇa. Never be disturbed. chant Hare Kṛṣṇa. For chanting you have got so much material. Now read something from this book."

Śrīla Prabhupāda reached over and opened Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam and handed it to Rāmeśvara, who began to read.

One after another the G.B.C men arrived. Atreya Ṛṣi brought pomegranates and sweet lemons from Iran, as well as good news of the ISKCON restaurant there. Śrīla Prabhupāda listened with intense interest to Atreya Ṛṣi's report and then spoke for a while about the Middle East and how to best present Kṛṣṇa consciousness there. Kīrtanānanda Swami had brought milk products from New Vrindaban, and a sannyāsī came from Thailand with fruits and flowers.

When Ādi-keśava Swami came in, Prabhupāda beamed. He heard with great pleasure Ādi-keśava's report of the impact of the New York court decision on Indians around the world. When Svarūpa Dāmodara arrived he showed Prabhupāda the manuscripts for three pamphlets proving scientifically and mathematically that Kṛṣṇa consciousness is the Absolute Truth. After each report and greeting, Śrīla Prabhupāda would ask that the kīrtana be continued, and he would become silent, as the devotees sang softly, hour after hour: Hare Kṛṣṇa, Hare Kṛṣṇa, Kṛṣṇa Kṛṣṇa, Hare Hare/ Hare Rāma, Hare Rāma, Rāma Rāma, Hare Hare. A very small pair of karatālas, the only instrument, produced a soft, pleasant ringing. The voices of the chanters were subdued, but their minds were firmly fixed in devotion to Śrīla Prabhupāda and the holy name, concerned that Prabhupāda could hear the mahā-mantra without interruption.

The devotees who were chanting experienced their own realizations while intimately associating with Śrīla Prabhupāda in this way. They could understand this was a most important connection with Śrīla Prabhupāda, to come into his presence and chant Hare Kṛṣṇa and jaya śrī-kṛṣṇa-caitanya and read to him from Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam. Śrīla Prabhu pāda wanted to hear the transcendental sound, yet he was simultaneously teaching his disciples. After his departure, they would retain the deep impression of the significance of the Hare Kṛṣṇa mantra and Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, and they would go on giving the mercy to others. He was teaching them how to become pure devotees. He was sharing himself with them by having them chant very simply and read his books without speculation, so that later, when preaching Kṛṣṇa consciousness, they would remember. Śrīla Prabhupāda would always be with them as they went on chanting simply and preaching without speculation. Whether he would depart now or later, he was preparing them.

Sometimes during the chanting Śrīla Prabhupāda would communicate unspoken feelings with his disciples. He might simply glance at one of the devotees, but that devotee would feel a surge of loving emotion and realization. Suddenly he would understand better how pure and compassionate Śrīla Prabhupāda was. And the devotee might recall how Śrīla Prabhupāda had come and saved him, bringing him to Kṛṣṇa consciousness. Thus the G.B.C. men, while chanting and becoming purified, were rededicating themselves, hoping that Kṛṣṇa would accept them as surrendered souls. They asked that Kṛṣṇa bless them and make them fit for whatever happened.

"Do not leave me," Prabhupāda said at one point.

"Are you feeling better?" Tamāla Kṛṣṇa asked.

"Yes, I am feeling a little better. Go on administering this medicine." At Śrīla Prabhupāda's request, the devotees staying with him between 1:30 A.M. and 3:30 A.M. read to him from Kṛṣṇa, the Supreme Personality of Godhead. He would usually be on the roof then, sitting up in bed. A few bare bulbs would light the darkness, and all would be quiet and still except for the sound of the devotee reading. After one such reading, Śrīla Prabhupāda asked Rūpānuga about the preaching in Washington, D.C. Rūpānuga replied briefly, and then he and Balavanta began talking about deprogramming. Then Rūpānuga said he had written "A Prayer to The Higher Authorities," and asked if he could read it to Śrīla Prabhupāda.

O superior Vaiṣṇavas!

O compassionate Ācāryas of the Holy Name!

O supreme authorities,

Masters of our fate!

Have mercy upon us!

(We are not able to make any prayers, but this is an emergency!)

Śāstra teaches that because of disciples' bad behavior, or to allow some personal service, or to exhibit ecstatic symptoms, the spiritual master may display bad health (although he so kindly says it is simply due to old age and personal neglect of his health—meaning that he has worked too hard to save us).

But we may not speculate upon the mind of the Ācāryas.

Please hear our petition! We pray for the kindness of our Grandfather, Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī Ṭhākura, who is by nature merciful upon his spiritual grandchildren.

We pray for the continued compassion of the Six Gosvāmīs, who are already famous in all the three worlds for saving conditioned souls. We pray for the benediction of Lord Caitanya Mahāprabhu, the most magnanimous Supreme Personality of Godhead.

We pray to Rādhārāṇī, Queen of Vṛndāvana, protector of our neophyte bhakti.

And we pray to Lord Kṛṣṇa Himself, whom we cannot even approach without the guidance of our Śrīla Prabhupāda.

We, the fallen servants of His Divine Grace, beseech all of our Masters—Please give Śrīla Prabhupāda more time! Time to insure the strength of this movement. Time to finish the Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam. And a little more time for us to spend at the lotus feet of His Divine Grace—that we may become pure devotees by his mercy.

We implore you—these ten years have passed so quickly, and we are caught far too short of perfection (You know that actually only ten milliseconds have passed in eternal time).

Therefore kindly extend his stay, lest we fall from the spiritual path.

O Vaiṣṇava saints!

O Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī Ṭhākura,

Our eternal grandfather,

O Six Gosvāmīs of Vṛndāvana,

O Rādhārāṇī, Mother of bhakti,

O Lord Caitanya Mahāprabhu,

the Master of all,

O Lord Kṛṣṇa, the final repose of our love,

O Vaiṣṇava Ācāryas—

Kindly have mercy on us:

Please don't yet take Śrīla Prabhupāda away!

Kindly grant this emergency prayer...

"Either way," said Prabhupāda, "I have no objection—to stay or leave." He said there was a Bengali saying that if a ḍhenki (a wheat-threshing machine) goes to heaven, what will it do there? It will thresh wheat. Because the thresher is constituted in a particular way, it will thresh wherever it goes. Similarly, the pure devotee, whether he is in the material world or the spiritual world, will serve Kṛṣṇa. In this way Śrīla Prabhupāda was indicating that he had no personal anxiety. But he had also indicated that although everything was dependent on Kṛṣṇa, the prayers of the devotees might influence Kṛṣṇa. Śrīla Prabhupāda's disciples, humbly considering themselves neophyte devotees, took it as a sign of Prabhupāda's protective mercy that he said their prayers could keep him with them and that he, although an eternal, exalted associate of Kṛṣṇa, liked to be with his tiny disciples. "My Guru Mahārāja was disgusted," he had said, "but I like your company."

A sannyāsī disciple read aloud a prayer he had written, petitioning the Supreme Lord for Prabhupāda to live for a hundred years. On hearing this, Śrīla Prabhupāda opened his eyes wide and smiled. But again he pointed out that he was not afraid of death. Wherever he was, he said, he was in Vaikuṇṭha. Especially being in Vṛndāvana and being surrounded by the kīrtana of his disciples was Vaikuṇṭha.

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami told Prabhupāda that he had offered a prayer in the temple that morning while standing before Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma. Kṛṣṇa has done so many miracles, he said, so it would not be very amazing if He kept Prabhupāda alive. And Balarāma, who was supporting all creation, would not be weakened if He gave Śrīla Prabhupāda a little strength. "In this way," Tamāla Kṛṣṇa said, "we may all pray to Kṛṣṇa-Balarāma to save you. We are not very important, but still They may hear."

"No," Prabhupāda said. "You are all pure devotees with no other motives."

Śrīla Prabhupāda regarded the petitions of his disciples as expressions of sincere affection, not at all improper spiritually. But he pointed out that it was ultimately up to Kṛṣṇa. He had His plan. In any case, Prabhupāda said that he would be all right. He told the story of a sage who blessed different persons in different ways. The sage blessed a prince to live a long life, since after death he would be punished for his sensual life. The sage also blessed an ascetic to die at once, so as to be relieved of the suffering of his austerities and receive his pious rewards. But when asked to bless a pure devotee, the sage said that because the devotee had already obtained the lotus feet of Kṛṣṇa, his condition would be the same, whether he lived or died.

Prabhupāda knew, even better than his disciples, that there was much he could do if he remained in the world, but he simply wanted to see what Kṛṣṇa desired. He saw strong evidence, however, that his life was about to end, at least according to the condition of his physical body, and this in itself indicated that Kṛṣṇa's desire was that he soon leave this world.

The G.B.C. men met and decided that aside from Prabhupāda's will, which would secure the ISKCON properties, and aside from making all the bank accounts within ISKCON secure, there were also a few questions which they should put before Prabhupāda before it was too late. These questions, such as how future disciples would be initiated, would have to be answered; otherwise they would become a source of speculation and havoc after Śrīla Prabhupāda's departure.

A selected committee from the G.B.C. came before Śrīla Prabhupāda as he sat up in bed in the main room downstairs. Satsvarūpa dāsa Goswami was to be the spokesman, but he felt shy and uneasy. To come directly before Śrīla Prabhupāda and ask about what should be done after his passing away might seem impertinent.

But it was necessary. Śrīla Prabhupāda himself had requested that the G.B.C. come to Vṛndāvana to take care of exactly this kind of business. Besides, for a disciple to feel foolish and awkward before Śrīla Prabhupāda was normal. And certainly the mission of Śrīla Prabhupāda's disciples continuing his movement was so grave that its importance transcended the awkwardness of the moment. Nevertheless, Śrīla Prabhupāda was Śrīla Prabhupāda, and even though apparently invalid, he was as awesome as ever. If he were displeased with the questions, then it would be frightening

"Śrīla Prabhupāda," said Satsvarūpa, "we were all asked by the rest of the G.B.C. to come to ask some questions. These are the members of the original G.B.C. as you first made it out. Our first question is about the G.B.C. members. We want to know how long should they remain in office?"

Śrīla Prabhupāda spoke slowly and deeply. "They should remain for good. Selected men are chosen, so that they cannot be changed. Rather, if some competent men are found, they should be added." Śrīla Prabhupāda took the opportunity to recommend that Vasudeva become a G.B.C. member representing Fiji. "Add him," said Prabhupāda. "But the G.B.C. is not to be changed."

Satsvarūpa asked what to do if a G.B.C. member gave up his post, and Prabhupāda said that the G.B.C. body should elect another man.

"Our next question," Satsvarūpa proceeded, "concerns initiation in the future, particularly at that time when you are no longer with us. We want to know how a first and second initiation would be conducted."

"Yes," said Prabhupāda, "I shall recommend some of you. After this is settled up, I shall recommend some of you to act as officiating ācārya."

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa interjected, "Is that called ṛtvik ācārya?"

"Yes," Prabhupāda said, "ṛtvik."

"Then what is the relationship of that person who gives the initiation?" asked Satsvarūpa.

"He is guru," said Prabhupāda.

"But he does it on your behalf," said Satsvarūpa.

"Yes, that is formality. Because in my presence one should not become guru. So on my behalf, on my order—āmāra ajñāya guru. He is actually guru, but on my order."

"So they may also be considered your disciples," said Satsvarūpa, referring to those persons initiated on Prabhupāda's behalf by the ṛtvik ācārya.

"They are their disciples," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. Now he was speaking of initiations after his passing away. "They are the disciples of the one who is initiating. And they are my granddisciples. When I order you to become guru, you become regular guru, that's all. And they become the disciples of my disciple."

The G.B.C. members present were satisfied that Śrīla Prabhupāda's reply to the intricate inquiry was clear and conclusive. Later, he would select "some of you," and whoever he selected could become an initiating guru. What he had already described many times throughout his Bhaktivedanta purports was now being implemented: his disciples would become gurus and accept disciples of their own.

Satsvarūpa next asked about the BBT. "At present," he said, "no translated works are to be published without your seeing and approving them. So the question is, is there any system for publishing works in the future, works that you may not see?"

"That we have to examine expertly," Prabhupāda replied. He accepted the principle that future works could be translated from Sanskrit, but he cautioned, "But amongst my disciples, I don't think there are many who can translate properly."

"Therefore, Śrīla Prabhupāda," said Kīrtanānanda Swami, "we think that you cannot leave us very soon."

"I don't want to," said Prabhupāda, "but I am obliged. What can I do?"

"If you don't want, then Kṛṣṇa won't want," said Kīrtanānanda.

Śrīla Prabhupāda went on to describe the special qualifications for translating Sanskrit Vaiṣṇava literature. It would take a realized soul, he said. "Otherwise, simply by imitating, A-B-C-D, it will not help. My purports are liked by people because it is presented as practical experience. It cannot be done unless one is realized."

"It is not a matter of scholarship," added Bhagavān.

"Lord Caitanya says," said Śrīla Prabhupāda, "āmāra ājñāya guru. One who can understand the order of Caitanya Mahāprabhu, he can become guru. Or one who understands his guru's order in paramparā, he can become guru. And therefore I shall select some of you."

By repeating himself, Prabhupāda emphasized his point—he would select who would be guru. And he also repeated his other point: "So there is no question of changing G.B.C. Rather, one who is competent, he can be selected to add by the vote of G.B.C."

"Of course, if someone falls away," Tamāla Kṛṣṇa proposed, "just like in the past G.B.C. men have fallen down... "

"They should be replaced," said Prabhupāda. "They must be all ideal ācārya. In the beginning we have done for working. But now we should be very cautious. Anyone who is deviating, he can be replaced."

Their few questions answered, the G.B.C. men sat silently before Śrīla Prabhupāda, awaiting any further instructions but anxious not to tire him with their presence.

"So, Śrīla Prabhupāda," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, "there is a chanting party ready to do some kīrtana. Maybe they can come in?"

Śrīla Prabhupāda had already given the outline for his will to Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami: The G.B.C. would be the ultimate governing authority in ISKCON. Three trustees would be assigned to each ISKCON property. The money in Prabhupāda's name in various banks would become ISKCON's property. A small pension would be allowed for his ex-wife and sons.

Even while the G.B.C. was gathered to make a thorough draft and make the will legal, Śrīla Prabhupāda received a visit that made him anxious over his ISKCON society. One of the Gosvāmīs of a Vṛndāvana temple visited and praised Śrīla Prabhupāda. But in the course of the conversation, the man asked, "After you, who will take charge of the property?" As soon as the gentleman left, Śrīla Prabhupāda called for Gopāla Kṛṣṇa. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa and Bhavānanda also gathered.

"In India you can understand there is an undercurrent," said Śrīla Prabhupāda.

"Undercurrent," Tamāla Kṛṣṇa repeated.

"An undercurrent is going on," said Prabhupāda, "that after my demise it may be taken away from your hands."

"Whew! You understood that from this discussion?" asked Tamāla Kṛṣṇa.

"I understood it long ago," said Prabhupāda. "How are you going to guard yourselves?" Once again, it was Prabhupāda who had to make them aware of worldly wisdom.

"You ordered that we form a trust property with life-long trustees," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa. "Actually this property is the envy of all India. They are the best properties."

"They envy our prestige," said Śrīla Prabhupāda, "our position—everything. Everywhere we are first class."

For Śrīla Prabhupāda, a will meant protection for his ISKCON. As Śrīla Prabhupāda had explained, a devotee has not a tinge of self-interest —everything is for Kṛṣṇa. But in his purity he must not be naive. ISKCON was a large, growing organization of properties and monies intended one hundred percent for use in the devotional service of Kṛṣṇa. Śrīla Prabhupāda called on the G.B.C. to be vigilant.

While his G.B.C. men discussed privately the details of the will, Śrīla Prabhupāda lay in bed, anxiously concerned about ISKCON's properties. He didn't attempt to eat, and Upendra had to massage his chest. Later that day, while surrounded by a sweetly chanting group of devotees, he again brought up the threat. "There is a big plot going on," he began. "They are very troublesome."

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, who knew what Prabhupāda was talking about, said, "This should be done immediately—make a trust property."

"This shall be done," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "Very nice." What Prabhupāda was asking was not unusual. But it had to be done soundly, expertly. And that meant Śrīla Prabhupāda would have to do it himself. He wanted no more management, but could his disciples assure him on this point of greatest anxiety, that the institution's properties and monies would be protected?

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa spoke up to assure Prabhupāda of the G.B.C.'s competence to deal with this. "This shall be done for all the properties," he said, "but especially here in India."

"Śrīla Prabhupāda," said Bhavānanda Goswami, "the trustees should be designated."

"Trustee without designation," Prabhupāda replied. "Where is trustee? I have already made one draft of trustees—for the Book Trust. In that style make it."

"Yes," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa. "So we will make up a draft on that style. And after the draft is approved, you can tell us which trustees you want."

"Oh, you can select among yourselves," said Prabhupāda. "Why you are taxing me?"

When Tamāla Kṛṣṇa mentioned that the three places in India—Bombay, Vṛndāvana, and Māyāpur—were the most important, Śrīla Prabhupāda replied, "Everywhere." Then he added, "Among yourselves there is no strong man. That is the difficulty."

"That is a fact," admitted Tamāla Kṛṣṇa.

"All my child," said Śrīla Prabhupāda—a statement of love but not of relief. "And it requires a very strong man. That is lacking. In every minor detail I have to open my mouth. Anyway, whatever you have got, sit down and select trustees, and that format is there. Make it a trust. Among you Rāmeśvara is a little intelligent. Anyway, do your best. Otherwise, there is a very, very big undercurrent. They are waiting for your program."

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa assured Prabhupāda that they would immediately have a meeting—"We will discuss these points."

"Oh, discussion I have already given you," said Prabhupāda. "Do it."

"What I meant," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, "is we will execute it."

"All right," said Prabhupāda. "Don't delay."

At times like this, it became especially clear that the day was approaching when Prabhupāda's children would have to grow up and lead, manage, protect, and expand his society on their own. These might well be their last chances to learn directly from him and to be close with him for chanting the holy name and dedicating themselves utterly to carrying out his desires for ISKCON. Śrīla Prabhupāda seemed to be doubting whether his children would rise to the occasion, and that expressed doubt impelled them not to discouragement but to determined action to prove themselves loyal and competent.

That evening a G.B.C. committee reported back to Śrīla Prabhupāda that the will had been drafted, with provisions for the protection of all ISKCON properties through specified trustees. Rāmeśvara read the will before Prabhupāda, who made only a few comments.

"This will make it impossible for anyone to cheat," said Rāmeśvara.

"Yes," Prabhupāda agreed, "as far as I can see." Even regarding matters of utmost concern to him, he sometimes remained quiet. He had directed his G.B.C. men as far as possible, now he mostly wanted the medicine of the holy name. But what they had done was all right, and he was satisfied. As the committee was leaving his room, he softly exclaimed, "Jaya future directors of ISKCON!" And later, when alone with his servants, he shed tears and said he could now leave peacefully.

A few days later the final version of the "Declaration of Will" was notarized in the presence of a lawyer. The document began, "The Governing Body Commission (G.B.C.) will be the ultimate managing authority of the entire International Society for Krishna Consciousness," and went on to cover all the points of concern regarding ISKCON properties and management. Most of the twenty-three-member G.B.C. body was still gathered in Vṛndāvana, but their immediate business was completed.

Śrīla Prabhupāda's health appeared to be slightly improved, a blessing the devotees and Prabhupāda attributed to the constant chanting. Śrīla Prabhupāda even ate (and digested) some fried food. He also spoke of attempting to resume his early morning translating work. The G.B.C. men, each of whom had pressing leadership and administrative duties within their respective zones, began to feel the need to return to their posts. Aside from their chanting shifts in Śrīla Prabhupāda's room, usually for three hours twice a day, they had no other service in Vṛndāvana. The weather was also unbearably hot, up to 120 degrees. When some of them expressed their plans to return to their areas of work, Prabhupāda gave his permission. They had been together for a week, and now, one by one, they began to disperse. Within another week most of them had left Vṛndāvana. Śrīla Prabhupāda and his small staff remained, and the constant chanting continued, performed by the devotees of the Krishna-Balaram temple.

As June came in Vṛndāvana, the weather remained very hot. The sky, which had been a clear blue, turned hazy as the first moisture arrived. Between noon and four P.M., the ground was too hot for bare feet, and the residents of Vṛndāvana would stay home, confining most of their activity to either the morning or the late afternoon and evening. Even eating was excluded from the midday, since the heat killed the appetite. The Yamunā was shallow and hot, giving little relief. The cows were gaunt from lack of grass and feed, and occasional hot, searing winds raised dust clouds. Flies and mosquitoes died in the air. One of the few pleasant features of summer was the fragrance of bel flowers that climbed along the walls around Prabhupāda's garden, somehow thriving in the dry heat.

In the first days of June, Śrīla Prabhupāda experienced some hope of recovery. He asked to resume his morning rides, and when being brought down to the car, he said, "Soon I will get down and walk myself." His old friend from Allahabad, Mr. Ghosh, came and diagnosed his disease as anxiety for the devotees and the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement. Śrīla Prabhupāda agreed. But he didn't follow the doctor's orders, since they included having his blood pressure checked regularly, and taking various medicines and special treatments. But by receiving massages from his servants, he felt he was improving. At this rate, he said, he would be all right after a month and a half. But he stressed, "I am not leaving Vṛndāvana until I am well."

One morning Śrīla Prabhupāda asked to go and see the Deities, and his men promptly moved him in his rocking chair before Kṛṣṇa-Balarāma. Sitting in his chair beneath the tamāla tree, Prabhupāda looked up at the transcendental brothers, while many tears glided down his cheeks. "They are dressed very nicely," he said. While he basked in the presence of Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma, he enjoyed the soothing shade of the tamāla tree. "The contractor wanted this tree cut down," he said, "but I would not allow. There are not many tamāla trees left. These worldly men do not know."

Śrīla Prabhupāda started coming down regularly each morning to see the Deities, an event that gradually grew to become a daily temple function involving ISKCON devotees and guests alike. Prabhupāda would sit in his rocking chair under the tamāla tree, and a devotee would lead kīrtana, while Prabhupāda and all the other devotees chanted responsively. For Prabhupāda's disciples, chanting with him in the courtyard of his temple in Ramaṇa-reti, Vṛndāvana, was the essence of the spiritual world.

Although Prabhupāda's body was apparently sick, he was still as alert as ever, and every morning he would notice who was there and who was not. The devotees grew to love this special opportunity to associate with Prabhupāda as he sat in his rocking chair, gazing at Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma. Vṛndāvana residents and pilgrims would also gather around Prabhupāda, often offering money, which they would place at Prabhupāda's feet. While the energetic young gurukula boys danced before Prabhupāda, and the pilgrims continuously flowed in and out, offering obeisances and rupees at his feet, and while one of his secretaries fanned him with a large cāmara whisk, Śrīla Prabhupāda sat gravely yet simply, with his attention fixed on Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma.

Sometimes he would go sit in the private garden adjacent to his main room. A devotee had built a plaster fountain there in the shape of a large pink lotus, and while Prabhupāda sat in the little alcove, surrounded by flowering vines, the splashing of the fountain pleased and soothed. An occasional monkey would come over the wall into the garden, looking for something to steal, and Prabhupāda would have it chased away. Otherwise he sat silently, conversing only occasionally with one or two disciples.

One day in the garden Śrīla Prabhupāda was recalling the simple but civilized life he had known as a child. He mentioned the various ceremonies his mother had observed during pregnancy to allay the dangers connected with childbirth. Though his voice was soft and weak, he was still inclined to speak. "So much care was taken for the children," he said. "Now these rascals are killing children. Most uncivilized life. Two-legged animals. Even in these days, in India in the interior villages, their life can be peaceful. They have enough grains, enough milk to live peacefully and chant Hare Kṛṣṇa. And they are going there to give this sterilization." (Śrīla Prabhupāda was referring to Indira Gandhi's policy of compulsory sterilization.)

One of the devotees present had just come from West Bengal, where he had been traveling on a boat down the Ganges, preaching and distributing prasādam in the villages. Śrīla Prabhupāda began describing to him how in the villages they make a simple bread ball from attar (whole wheat flour) and bake it beside an open fire. "The same fire. It is called khāndi fire, using cow dung chips," Śrīla Prabhupāda said. "They put one pot upon this fire and use it for dāl. Then after some time, you see if it is boiled—very nice. Then this ball should be cooked in ghee. It will be first class."

While the fountain splashed gently and the pigeons and green parrots fluttered and chattered, Prabhupāda continued to talk freely. He recalled his horoscope at birth: "After seventy years this man will go outside India and establish so many temples." He said he hadn't understood at first that he would actually have to go, but when he had finally gone to the U.S., he had had no intention of ever returning. Except for the stroke he suffered in the United States in 1967, he said, he would not have come back. "That means Kṛṣṇa desired," he said. "Otherwise, I had no plan to come back. Therefore I took this permanent residency."

"Do you regret having come back to India?" asked Tamāla Kṛṣṇa Goswami.

"No," said Prabhupāda. "My plan was like that, to stay. But Kṛṣṇa's plan was different. When I was coming back [in 1970] I was speaking to Dvārakādhiśa [the Kṛṣṇa Deity in ISKCON's Los Angeles temple], "I came here to preach. I don't know why You are dragging me back.' That was when I was leaving Los Angeles. I was not happy. But He had His plan."

"Pretty nice plan," commented Tamāla Kṛṣṇa.

Śrīla Prabhupāda continued, "Kṛṣṇa said, 'Come, I'll give you a better place in Vṛndāvana. You were retired in Vṛndāvana, and I asked you to leave. Now you have to come back. But I will give you a better place.' So He has given me a temple a hundred times better than any other place. Is it not so?"

An article entitled "Śrīla Prabhupāda Seriously Ill" appeared on the front page of The Times of India. On hearing the article, Śrīla Prabhu pāda commented, "Unless they think Bhaktivedanta Swami is important, they wouldn't print this." Girirāja wrote to Śrīla Prabhupāda that many sympathizers had phoned the Bombay temple asking for more information. One of the devotees had issued a statement which The Times of India carried a few days later on page three, under the heading "Śrīla Prabhupāda Now Better."

So was Śrīla Prabhupāda "seriously ill" or "better"? "I may live or die," he said, "in either case I am with Kṛṣṇa." But he confided, "I asked Kṛṣṇa to give me enthusiasm to continue up to death. A soldier should die fighting on the battlefield."

At Śrīla Prabhupāda's request, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa was replying to all correspondence and signing his own name as secretary. As he wrote in one letter,

Under the circumstances, it is not possible for me to read letters to Śrīla Prabhupāda. I simply inform him of any good news which comes, and so I have told him of your successful town hall meeting as well as your other preaching activities.

These letters were almost as valuable as Śrīla Prabhupāda's, since they were often filled with direct quotes from Śrīla Prabhupāda.

One evening Śrīla Prabhupāda called for all the available sannyāsīs. He said he was feeling tired, but like a father happy to have his children with him, he said, "You should all come to be with me like this, and I feel better."

One day while sitting with Śrīla Prabhupāda, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa began to describe the pastimes of Kṛṣṇa as depicted in the painting hanging to the right of Śrīla Prabhupāda's prasādam table. The painting showed Kṛṣṇa and His cowherd friends eating lunch. Śrīla Prabhupāda looked at the painting and then, closing his eyes and thinking of the līlā, said, "This is the highest perfection of life. I have concluded that whatever is done without Kṛṣṇa is simply a waste of time. What will they think of this?"

Prabhupāda's moods moved and varied within the realm of transcendental emotions and attitudes. To some of the disciples attending him, he said, "I am thinking, 'I am a worthless person, taking so much service. There is no way I can repay you. I am poor in every respect, financially and spiritually.' "

“Śrīla Prabhupāda," Tamāla Kṛṣṇa protested, “our only desire is to serve you."

"I know," Prabhupāda replied, “and it is the only reason I am living. All over the world things are going on by your sincere service."

But occasionally Prabhupāda would still reprimand an errant disciple. When, in dressing Prabhupāda, Upendra gave him a luṅgī that was too small, Prabhupāda called him “a fool and a rascal." And when Tamāla Kṛṣṇa did not attend Prabhupāda one morning, due to having a cold, Prabhupāda was critical. “I was never neglectful about my duty in any field of activity," he said, “even business. Dr. Bose loved me very much. He was giving me checks to sign for forty thousand rupees. I was never lazy or neglectful in duty. I would do it honestly and try to make it perfect. Only I was neglectful when I was involved with my young wife. Then I neglected my studies. That was due to circumstances. And then later I neglected my wife. My father said I was fortunate not to like my family. Kṛṣṇa saved me through so many circumstances. This material life is checkered."

Early one morning Śrīla Prabhupāda awoke suddenly. “I had a dream," he said to the devotees attending him. “There was a big assembly of drunkards and chanters. The drunkards were madmen. Some of the drunkards were becoming chanters. They cannot stop fighting. The drunkards were so crazy."

“Were you there also?" asked Tamāla Kṛṣṇa.

“Yes, I was standing there also."

“Were some of the chanters becoming drunkards?"

“Chanters cannot fall down," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. “Their names are listed—back to home, back to Godhead. They are in Kṛṣṇa's family."

After the G.B.C. assembly in Vṛndāvana, Svarūpa Dāmodara had traveled to Manipur and Calcutta and was now returning to Vṛndāvana to see Śrīla Prabhupāda. As soon as Prabhupāda heard Svarūpa Dāmodara had arrived he asked to see him. As usual, Śrīla Prabhupāda treated him very specially and gave him much time and attention. From Prabhupāda's first meeting with Svarūpa Dāmodara when Svarūpa Dāmodara had been Thoudam Singh, a Ph.D. candidate in organic chemistry at UCLA, Prabhupāda had taken great care to cultivate their relationship.

Thoudam had grown up in Manipur but after graduating from high school had come to America to continue his education at the University of California. He had been attracted by the devotees chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa on the streets of Los Angeles and had visited the temple. When he met Śrīla Prabhupāda, he became convinced that he had met a genuine spiritual leader. At first Thoudam had maintained his stance as a representative of the world of empirical scientific knowledge, and Śrīla Prabhupāda had invited him for morning walks on Venice Beach.

Day after day, Śrīla Prabhupāda would draw Thoudam into arguments about the origin of life. When Śrīla Prabhupāda was ready to argue, he would glance around and ask, “Where is the scientist?" And on catching sight of Thoudam, he would ask, "So, what do they say?" Thoudam would then argue that life had arisen by chance through chemical evolution, and Śrīla Prabhupāda would smash the argument with a stunning display of logic and common sense.

Thoudam, by regularly associating with Śrīla Prabhupāda and by reading the Bhagavad-gītā As It Is, had become more inclined to Kṛṣṇa consciousness than to material science, and eventually he had become Prabhupāda's initiated disciple, Svarūpa Dāmodara dāsa. With Śrīla Prabhupāda's encouragement, Svarūpa Dāmodara had soon received his Ph.D. and pledged to serve Śrīla Prabhupāda through scientific lectures and writings against the theories of modern, atheistic science.

Śrīla Prabhupāda was well aware of the powerful sway science held over people everywhere, and he was out to combat their godless propaganda. He knew that Bhagavad-gītā was the highest science, and he saw how outrageously prejudiced many modern scientific assumptions were. For all their high technical jargon and faith in the scientific method, the scientists were actually ignorant of the origin and purpose of life.

Svarūpa Dāmodara and a few other devotees holding graduate degrees had formed the Bhaktivedanta Institute and were working within academic circles to establish the scientific basis of Kṛṣṇa consciousness. Śrīla Prabhupāda had been especially pleased when at a large meeting of scientists Svarūpa Dāmodara had challenged a Nobel Prize-winning scientist who held that life was a phenomenon that occurred at a certain level of chemical complexity. "If I give you the required chemicals," Svarūpa Dāmodara had asked him, "will you be able to produce life?" And the embarrassed scientist had replied, "I don't know." Repeatedly Śrīla Prabhupāda had referred to that incident in his conversations and lectures.

Śrīla Prabhupāda often praised the work of Svarūpa Dāmodara and the Bhaktivedanta Institute and assured them that the BBT would provide funds for their printing, research, and building projects. He had given them the arguments, and they were developing them with scientific language.

Now Svarūpa Dāmodara had come for more association with Śrīla Prabhupāda, and after offering obeisances, he presented Śrīla Prabhupāda with several pink lotus flowers. Śrīla Prabhupāda took one in his hand and opened the petals; the others he gave to his secretary for presenting to the Deities. Svarūpa Dāmodara had also brought several ripe pineapples, and Prabhupāda immediately asked for a glass of fresh pineapple juice.

Svarūpa Dāmodara was arranging for a conference of scientists in Vṛndāvana to discuss "The Origin of Life." He had been meeting with various scientists and professors, many of whom had shown interest in Svarūpa Dāmodara's approach and in participating in the conference. Svarūpa Dāmodara read Prabhupāda the prospectus he had prepared announcing the upcoming conference. Prabhupāda listened silently and at the end said, "All glories to Svarūpa Dāmodara!" Later in the afternoon they spoke again. It seemed that Prabhupāda was never too tired or too indisposed to speak with Svarūpa Dāmodara about defeating materialistic science.

Svarūpa Dāmodara was getting hope from his conversations with scientists. He told Prabhupāda, “I think they're interested in the program we are making. Otherwise they wouldn't take time to discuss. Some of them feel our approach is unique.”

“There is no other such proposal,” said Śrīla Prabhupāda. “They have taken God as something mystical. Especially this rascal Darwin's theory. They have become like animals, and they are seeing everyone as animals. This rascal has convinced them, ‘Your grandfather was a monkey.’ How could they become the son of a monkey? But this is going on. A grand rascal, this Darwin. And his theory is taken as the greatest principle of anthropology in the whole world. So scientists by combined meeting should speak out against this Darwin's theory.”

On the day of Svarūpa Dāmodara's arrival in Vṛndāvana, the first rains also arrived, indicating the end of summer and the start of the monsoons. Heavy rains beat down while Prabhupāda and Svarūpa Dāmodara continued talking. Prabhupāda said that the Vedic evolutionary theory had been presented in the Padma Purāṇa thousands of years before Darwin.

“If we can get some big scientists on our side,” said Svarūpa Dāmodara, “at least a few, that will be enough.”

“That I am asking,” said Prabhupāda.

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa figured that Śrīla Prabhupāda would be tired after two hours of talking, so he interrupted, “Would you like a kīrtana party now, Śrīla Prabhupāda?”

But Prabhupāda corrected him. “This is kīrtana now going on. People have to understand what is kīrtana. Any topics on Kṛṣṇa, that is kīrtana. Śukadeva Gosvāmī became perfect by kīrtana, but what kind of kīrtana did he do?”

“He was speaking the Bhāgavatam,” answered Tamāla Kṛṣṇa.

“Yes,” said Prabhupāda. “You are simply thinking drums and karatālas is kīrtana. But anything we do here is kīrtana. There is no material connection here. We are not talking how to increase our business and enjoy women and wine. That is not our aim. Ka uttamaśloka-guṇyanuvādāt. We are trying to establish Kṛṣṇa—that is kīrtana. Śravaṇam kīrtanam viṣṇoḥ. Do you know this?”

Taking this remark as his cue, Svarūpa Dāmodara went on to speak about scientists he had met who were interested in the proposed “Origin of Life” conference. “I am thinking of the title of our conference,” he said, “as a Bhaktivedanta Vijñāna Conference in Vṛndāvana.”

“No,” said Śrīla Prabhupāda. “They will take it otherwise, thinking that Bhaktivedanta is not a jñānī. They will take it lightly because Bhaktivedanta Swami is not a scientist.” One of the devotees said that “Bhaktivedanta” actually indicated the highest science, and Śrīla Prabhupāda agreed. But to understand bhakti, he said, was very difficult for the ordinary man.

“Why not ‘Life Comes From Life?’” asked Prabhupāda. And Svarūpa Dāmodara immediately agreed.

"Make something extraordinary," said Prabhupāda. "We are not just some magicians like the other yogīs. There is money, intelligence, and I can give you inspiration."

Śrīla Prabhupāda's comments often implied that his bodily condition was of no importance, either to himself or to his followers. And this was, in fact, an important instruction regarding the guru's body (vapuḥ) and his instructions (vāṇī). The spiritual master would not always be physically present, but in the form of his instructions he was eternally available for the sincere disciple. And that association was as real and personal as physical association. In fact, the ecstasy of service in separation was greater. The śāstras state that the body of the pure devotee is spiritual but that his physical presence in the material world is temporary. As Śrīla Prabhupāda had said of Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī, his passing away meant he had gone to serve Kṛṣṇa in another place. Śrīla Prabhupāda had instructed his disciples regarding the body of the spiritual master in his book The Nectar of Instruction.

Being situated in his original Kṛṣṇa conscious position, a pure devotee does not identify with the body. Such a devotee should not be seen from a materialistic point of view. Indeed, one should overlook a devotee's having a body born in a low family, a body with a bad complexion, a deformed body, or a diseased or infirm body. According to ordinary vision, such imperfections may seem prominent in the body of a pure devotee, but despite such seeming defects, the body of a pure devotee cannot be polluted. It is exactly like the waters of the Ganges, which sometimes during the rainy season are full of bubbles, foam and mud. The Ganges waters do not become polluted. Those who are advanced in spiritual understanding will bathe in the Ganges without considering the condition of the water.

The devotees working closely with Śrīla Prabhupāda did not think he was deteriorating; no matter how he appeared, he was just giving them another opportunity to serve him. If he wanted to eat or didn't want to eat, if he was pleased or displeased, if he appeared well or ill, they would respond accordingly, out of duty and love. This mood was becoming increasingly prominent as Śrīla Prabhupāda more and more depended on his disciples to help him carry out all his functions. He had said he was remaining in the world only to satisfy his disciples' sincere desires to serve him. Yet he continued to emphasize that their service to his physical form was not as important as their following his instructions.

When two of Prabhupāda's sannyāsīs were taking leave of him, he smiled pleasingly and said, "I may stay or go, but in my books I will live forever." When he heard that forty thousand hardbound books had been distributed in one week, he said, "If book distribution increases, I will never die. I will be living for centuries." Tamāla Kṛṣṇa remarked that the book distribution reports were one kind of news that didn't give Prabhupāda a headache, and Prabhupāda smiled broadly. "No!" he said. "It is my life!"

But one day while sitting in the garden with Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, Svarūpa Dāmodara, and others, Śrīla Prabhupāda became very disturbed when he detected a mistake in one of his already printed books. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa was reading aloud a verse from the First Canto which began, "Munayaḥ sādhu prṣṭo 'ham." Śrīla Prabhupāda had him read the synonyms.

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa read: “munayaḥ—O sages; sādhu—this is relevant; prṣṭah—questioned... ”

“Sādhu?” asked Śrīla Prabhupāda. Thus he uncovered a thoughtless mistake made by the Sanskrit editors. Sādhu means “devotee,” not “this is relevant.” Śrīla Prabhupāda became very angry and denounced the “rascal Sanskrit scholars.” “A little learning,” he said “is dangerous. Immediately they think they have become big scholar, thinking, ‘I shall arrange!’ And then they write all nonsense.” He continued speaking about the mistake for half an hour. He was disturbed. He ordered Tamāla Kṛṣṇa to write at once to the BBT and stop these speculations by his disciples—changing his books in the name of editing. The devotees were startled to see Prabhupāda so angry; he was supposed to be peacefully relishing a Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam reading here in his garden. Such a change was very serious, he said, because it changed the meaning. “Even if the authorized ācāryas would make a mistake,” he said, “it would not be changed. This is āṛṣa-prayoga. In this way the ācāryas are honored.”

By Śrīla Prabhupāda's strong reaction to this one printed mistake, he was again stressing the great importance of his books. “Whatever I have wanted to say,” he explained, “I have said in my books. If I live, I will say something little more. If you want to know me, read my books.”

Śrīla Prabhupāda was especially pleased by letters he received from Ghanaśyāma, who was distributing books in the Communist countries of Eastern Europe. Ghanaśyāma was a member of the BBT library party, which was systematically traveling from country to country all over the world, placing full sets of Prabhupāda's Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam and Śrī Caitanya-caritāmṛta in university libraries. In daring forays into Communist Europe, Ghanaśyāma was meeting with success. On hearing his report, Prabhupāda's demeanor transformed. “My books are the real Communism,” he declared with enthusiasm. “I am writing for the whole human society. My philosophy is to unite human society on the basis of Kṛṣṇa consciousness. And that is actually happening. Why is the black man working for me and the white man also? How much potency this boy has. Practically he is preaching in the jungle. The people do not know the language, and still they are giving him standing orders.”

Prabhupāda had said that the only real medicine for him was kīrtana. And kīrtana, he had explained, included preaching around the world. And for Prabhupāda, who was taking so little food, the chanting of the holy name and the kīrtana of preaching reports from his disciples seemed to be not only his medicine but his sustenance as well.

On the evening of the day Prabhupāda received Ghanaśyāma's letter, he learned that Gopāla Kṛṣṇa had arrived with copies of several newly published Hindi books. Prabhupāda had been lying in bed, but on receiving the good news, he raised his eyebrows and said, “Bring them immediately!” Gopāla Kṛṣṇa entered with the books, and Prabhupāda immediately sat up in ecstasy.

Years ago Śrīla Prabhupāda had begun a large gurukula (a Kṛṣṇa conscious primary school) in Dallas, Texas. But when the Texas state government had begun imposing too many restrictions, Prabhupāda advised in 1976 that the boys' gurukula be moved to Vṛndāvana, India.

The school should be moved to our new gurukula project in Vrindavana. The facility will be built just to suit the needs of the brahmacari to develop spiritually. To live in Vrindavana is the highest perfection, and to grow up in Vrindavana is the greatest fortune. Even to live in Mathura Mandala for a fortnight guarantees one liberation.

In Vrindavana, no one will place restrictions on the school, and it will be encouraged by the government. Thousands will send their children to be trained as human beings and devotees. The atmosphere in Vrindavana is beyond compare, and the Krishna-Balaram Mandir is the finest in the world.

By June 1977, the gurukula building in Vṛndāvana was near completion, and the devotees managing the gurukula were contemplating opening the building in the near future. They were discussing how the rooms should be used, including which rooms would be for staff offices and residences. Although Śrīla Prabhupāda had not been consulted on these details, he seemed to know what was going on, and one morning he told his secretary he would like to see the new building from top to bottom. After taking darśana of Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma, he was carried in his chair for a tour of the new building.

Pleased with the construction, he remarked, "By Kṛṣṇa's grace everything has been done very nicely." The second floor was one continuous wide veranda with many connecting rooms. "The persons in charge," explained Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, "have one room for residence and one for an office."

"Very comfortable," Prabhupāda remarked. He heard and observed everything, occasionally making suggestions—there should be a flower garden and a fountain in the central courtyard. "I think there is no other building equal to this in Vṛndāvana," he said. As they came to the first floor, Akṣayānanda Mahārāja, one of the temple managers, pointed out to Prabhupāda, "I want to keep my office here."

"That's nice," said Prabhupāda. "But because we have got a big enough place now, we should not think, 'I shall keep one leg in one place and one leg in another place,' and then the whole thing is mismanaged. Don't do that. Don't misuse even one inch."

"You were saying you wanted five hundred students," said one of the gurukula teachers. "So we should keep as much space as possible for the students on the floors."

"Yes, yes," said Prabhupāda. This was the point he wanted stressed.

But then another devotee remarked, "We are going to have administrative offices mixing here, both for the temple and the gurukula."

"No," said Prabhupāda, "you have to invite children here. Otherwise what is the use of building such a big building? Not that we have three dozen managers and four students."

Although Prabhupāda's soft voice was sometimes lost amid the noise of construction, and although his comments were made intermittently while being carried from place to place, his message was strong and clear. "Now we have a big facility," he said. "So bring students. That is the first principle."

"We have to get the ISKCON students first," said one of the teachers.

"ISKCON or FISKCON," said Prabhupāda, "bring students." Prabhupāda's word play made the devotees laugh. But he was serious.

"It is a rākṣasa* civilization," said Prabhupāda. And he began mimicking the cry of a typical street vendor: "Do rupyā! do rupyā—and no knowledge. Kṛṣṇa says, tathā dehāntara-praptiḥ, but all they can understand is two rupees, four rupees. Where they will go in the next life they do not understand. They do not understand eternal life, only how to enjoy this life. They don't understand one line of the Gītā, yet they say, 'I read Gītā.' This darkness is going on, and people are kept in darkness in the name of so-called university education. So our gurukula will be successful. It may take time."

After touring the gurukula facility, Prabhupāda had the devotees place his chair down once more before returning to his own rooms. With most of the resident devotees of the Krishna-Balaram Mandir, including gurukula students, gathered around him, Prabhupāda made his emphatic point. "You are thinking of management," he said, "—this manager and that manager and what rooms to utilize. But my question is, 'Who will you manage?' Bring that person. In Bengali there is a superstition that you should not lie with your head toward the northern side. So one man said, 'But I have no head. For me what is the question of keeping it to the northern or the southern side?' So your contemplation about management is like that. First of all, who will you manage? Simply considering office manager and this and that is not good. First thing is bring students. Then it will be successful."

That afternoon Śrīla Prabhupāda said he would speak to the gurukula staff. They gathered in his room, and he instructed them as only he could—he who was empowered to lead the world organization of Lord Caitanya's movement. "Our next business," he began, "is to approach the well-to-do businessmen and tell them, 'Children of your family are expected to be educated with good behavior, good character, and devotion. Cāṇakya Paṇḍita says, 'What is the use of begetting children like cats and dogs?' They must be learned and follow the bhakti-mārga. We will teach your sons these things.' Canvass like that."

In the present society, he said, even the prime minister's son may be a debauchee. The demon Hiranyakaśipu hadn't wanted his son Prahlaḍa to be a devotee but to be like himself, a cheater and a diplomat; and today's society was comprised of little Hiranyakaśipus. "But our idea is to create Prahlaḍas," Śrīla Prabhupāda continued. "At least 250 students can be accommodated nicely. Throughout India and the whole world you cannot bring 250 students? What kind of managers are you? I say bring five hundred. Canvass like this: 'I fall down at your lotus feet. I flatter you one hundred times. Kindly hear me!' In this way canvass. You have to bring students. Not just rooms for management."

Prabhupāda said that if the gurukula was successful and if ISKCON got more standing in the future, the government could take guidance from ISKCON and not allow people to cheat, claiming to be a brāhmaṇa or kṣatriya without the training "These things are now a dream," Prabhupāda admitted, "but it should be done. I am thinking of so many things. But my life is ending. So keep these ideas. You especially, because you are young men."

July brought the rainy season to Vṛndāvana. Clouds began building from the beginning of the month, and by mid-July it would be raining daily. The perfumed odor of the kadamba flower was heavy in the air, and after a rain, the nīm blossoms would give off their onionlike aroma. The peacocks, with their full-feathered tails, became ecstatic, dancing, cooing, and calling. Sometimes a sudden rainstorm would come even while Śrīla Prabhupāda was sitting on his bed or at his dictating desk in an unsheltered part of the veranda, and his servants would rush out to move him inside as quickly as possible. Sometimes when rain prevented his using the garden he would recline instead on the little porch overlooking the garden. But at least the 120-degree heat was broken, and the days became more bearable.

Prabhupāda quietly rested and continued his day's routine, waiting to see what Kṛṣṇa desired. He would often wake about six A.M. and open his eyes to see Tamāla Kṛṣṇa at his bedside. He would then extend his hands, indicating that he wanted to sit up in bed. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa or another servant would then lightly stroke Śrīla Prabhupāda's back while Śrīla Prabhupāda spoke his mind.

Very few devotees were visiting Vṛndāvana, and guests were rarely allowed to see Prabhupāda. His health was not improving, nor did it seem to be at a crisis point as it had been in May. But because he was hardly eating anything, he was not building his strength. His main treatment consisted of hearing kīrtana, Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, and Caitanya-caritāmṛta.

One of the topics which Śrīla Prabhupāda dealt with during these days was the conception of a model universe for a Vedic planetarium. His disciple Ambarīṣa, great-grandson of Henry Ford, had pledged to donate for constructing a gorgeous museum-planetarium in a major city such as Detroit or Washington, D.C. Śrīla Prabhupāda wanted to present the structure of the universe as it is presented in the Fifth Canto, but so far no one had been able to show how it could be done. The devotees who tried were often baffled in an attempt to reconcile the Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam's description with the conceptions of modern astronomy. In Bombay, they had brought a so-called Vedic astronomer before Prabhupāda, but he had been unable to make even a simple diagram. Modern scientists give no credence to the Bhāgavatam's account describing the earth as Jambūdvīpa, an island in the middle of concentric oceans and islands. Nor do the scientists find mountains as tall as those described in the Vedic literature. Śrīla Prabhupāda cautioned the devotees, however, not to be guided by their own Western prejudices but to try and understand the universe as described in the Bhāgavatam.

And that was extremely difficult. Śrīla Prabhupāda admitted, "When I wrote this, I thought it will not be possible for me unless somebody else helps me."

"How did you write it?" Tamāla Kṛṣṇa asked, and Śrīla Prabhupāda replied, "Kṛṣṇa helped me. I don't know. [He laughed.] That somebody—Kṛṣṇa—helped."

Inevitably the devotees asked, "But how will we explain it to the scientists?"

"We do not require to satisfy the scientists," Śrīla Prabhupāda replied. "We have to describe according to śāstra. If they can understand it, then they'll understand it. Otherwise, it is not our business to satisfy the so-called scientists. We are dealing with the real description."

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa suggested that the planetarium would spell the downfall of Western civilization.

"Yes," said Prabhupāda, "I want to expose that they are cheating. Their only interest is to make money, and for this they cheat. If you can make this planetarium, it will be a grand success, triumphant."

In early July, some of the devotees in Vṛndāvana were working on sketches of the universe according to the Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam. They were puzzled, however, about how to account for satellite photos of the earth, which seemed to contradict the Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam's description. Śrīla Prabhupāda's reply was that the scientists were bound up by their own conditioning and could not go beyond a certain point. When Tamāla Kṛṣṇa reiterated that Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam's explanation still didn't agree with modern travel around the earth, Prabhupāda insisted that it did.

"You are prejudiced," he said. "You're conditioned with preconceptions of how everything is. It is just like a bull grinding, going around in a circle. He is tied up and simply going around. So everyone is tied up. They cannot go beyond a point, and they cannot move any way they like, just like the bull."

"They have cheated about going to the moon, so how can we believe them? They want to explain the whole universe, but how can we believe them? Once someone is shown to be a cheater, he will always cheat. A gentleman will say, 'I don't know.' But they are not gentlemen. They are loafer class. How can we believe them? They said the world was flat. Then Galileo said it was round, and for this he was almost hanged. They didn't know, and he didn't know. But our knowledge doesn't change, because it is perfect. As soon as there is change, it is not perfect."

A few days later, the committee of devotees returned to Prabhupāda and said that the question was still unanswered regarding how the Bhāgavatam's description of Jambūdvīpa could accommodate the fact of traveling west from Los Angeles and reaching India. In reply, Śrīla Prabhupāda stressed that they not concern themselves now with such a minor issue. And he referred to the Pacific Ocean as "a drop of water." The descriptions in the Bhāgavatam could not be adjusted within the limits of mundane knowledge.

Prabhupāda gave the example of how after returning from Vaiṣṇava, Nārada Muni had told a simple cobbler that Lord Nārāyaṇa was passing an elephant through the eye of a needle. "Oh, Nārāyaṇa is so great!" the cobbler had said. But an educated brāhmaṇa had said, "It is simply stories."

Nārada had then asked the cobbler, "How can you believe that Nārāyaṇa was passing an elephant through the eye of a needle?" "Why not," the cobbler had said. "I am sitting under a banyan tree. There are so many fruits, and each fruit contains so many seeds, which will each grow into a big banyan tree."

Śrīla Prabhupāda said that with experimental logic one cannot understand the inconceivable. "Everything is inconceivable," he said, "and these rascals want to bring it as conceivable. Don't be puffed up by your so-called education. It has no value."

One day, while Śrīla Prabhupāda was sitting in the garden hearing some news from his secretary, several monkeys appeared on top of the high wall and looked down at the devotees. Śrīla Prabhupāda had often asked the devotees to chase them, and once he had even asked that a monkey doll be hanged by the neck from a tree to frighten the others. But still the monkeys came. Sometimes the sight of a monkey prompted Śrīla Prabhupāda to remark about Darwin. One time he talked about how Kṛṣṇa dealt with the monkeys as friends, giving them butter and playing with them in the forest. As he talked, small chipmunks would run along the top of the wall, and occasionally a pair of green parrots would swoop into the yard, chirping loudly and flittering within the branches of a bush and then flying upwards into the sky above the garden.

Suddenly a large peacock alighted nearby and spread his gorgeous purple, blue, and green feathers, as if posing for the pleasure of the devotees. While a brahmācārī continued steadily fanning him, Śrīla Prabhupāda sat silently. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, however, had some business which he thought would not be too demanding for Śrīla Prabhupāda. Sitting at his spiritual master's feet, he broached an important topic.

"Śrīla Prabhupāda," he began, "we are receiving a number of letters now from people who want to get initiated. So up until now, since you were becoming ill, we asked them to wait." Tamāla Kṛṣṇa suggested that since the guru has to take on the karma of his disciples, and since Śrīla Prabhupāda's health was already weak, he should wait before accepting more disciples.

Śrīla Prabhupāda said nothing, and the Vṛndāvana peace was punctuated by the splashing of the fountain. Then he began to speak. He named three of his disciples and said, "So these three can do."

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa asked if devotees in America should write directly to these men for initiation.

"Nearby," said Prabhupāda, and he named three more disciples, leading devotees in Europe. "Five, six men may divide," said Prabhupāda. "Whoever is nearest."

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa asked whether this would apply to both first and second initiations. Prabhupāda said yes.

"So there is no need for devotees to write to you for first and second initiation," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa. "They can write to the man nearest them. But all these persons are still your disciples. Anybody who would give initiation is doing so on your behalf."

"Yes," said Prabhupāda.

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa asked if there was anyone in India that Śrīla Prabhupāda wanted to do this, and Śrīla Prabhupāda added another name. Śrīla Prabhupāda asked to hear the names he had given, and Tamāla Kṛṣṇa recited seven names.

"That's all, " said Prabhupāda. "Now you distribute. For the time being, seven names." Then he added two more. "So without waiting for me," said Prabhupāda, "whoever you consider deserves. That will depend on discretion."

Śrīla Prabhupāda said nothing else, and after a few minutes Tamāla Kṛṣṇa asked if Prabhupāda would like to hear a kīrtana. Śrīla Prabhupāda assented by a slight gesture, and the chanters, who had been waiting, came to join him.

The next morning Śrīla Prabhupāda added two more names, making a total of eleven disciples who would act as ṛtvik, or representatives of the ācārya. Śrīla Prabhupāda had not liked the idea of newcomers to ISKCON having to wait unnecessarily long to be initiated. Now initiations could continue regularly at the discretion of his eleven selected men.

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa received a phone call from Gopāla Kṛṣṇa. The Māyāpur temple had been attacked by a gang of three hundred dacoits (hoodlums). Five devotees were wounded and in the hospital. Bhavānanda Goswami had fired a shotgun at the attackers, injuring two. The police, who didn't arrive until two hours after being called, had arrested Bhavānanda and put him in jail. Śrīla Prabhupāda became disturbed. "If the dacoits attacked and we used our shotgun," he said, "what is wrong?"

Later that day Prabhupāda heard The Hindustan Times' version of the attack. According to the news report, some cows had wandered onto the ISKCON property, and the devotees had beaten the cows. This had angered the villagers, who on coming to the temple to complain had been shot at. Two had been injured. The article named Bhavānanda Goswami and at the end mentioned that the founder of the temple, A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami, had not been present.

Śrīla Prabhupāda heard the article, made a few comments, and went on with his afternoon's writing and translating as usual. But late that afternoon he called for Tamāla Kṛṣṇa. "I am afraid of a big conspiracy," he said. "The last line of the article says that the founder-ācārya was not present. They were sorry. They would have arrested me and put me in jail."

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa scoffed that the news article was one-sided. "That doesn't sound right," he said, "that the Devotees beat the cows. Devotees don't beat cows."

Within a few days, a letter came from Gopāla Kṛṣṇa giving the facts of the Māyāpur incident. About fifty Muslim men were stealing crops from the ISKCON land. When Nitāi-cānda tried to stop them, they attacked him, cutting his head in three places. Later, while he was being treated in the temple infirmary, the men came and beat Nitāi-cānda and stripped one of the ladies naked. Meanwhile, another 250 men attacked, breaking the gates, cutting phone and electric wires, and destroying the water pumps. Wanting to scare the mob, Bhavānanda had fired a shot in the air, but when they did not disperse he fired another shot, injuring two men.

In the meantime, the attackers had broken both hands of one of the gurukula teachers and beaten many other devotees. Two hours later the police arrived and recommended the devotees go to Krishnanagar police station—twenty miles away—to file a complaint. When the devotees had reached the station, they had been arrested, and the two seriously injured devotees were denied medical treatment. Bhavānanda Goswami was still in jail. Prabhupāda said it was a plot to drive away the Hare Kṛṣṇa men. “They want that all Bengal be completely godless,” he said.

When Tamāla Kṛṣṇa suggested that this incident would hurt their village preaching, Prabhupāda replied, “No, it will be to our favor very soon. I think the central government will take action. This is the same as Kamsa against Kṛṣṇa—Kṛṣṇa must win. No one can defeat Kṛṣṇa. If I had been there, they would have charged that I ordered the shooting and arrested me. Now I am an old man, I cannot take an active stand. So you all must do everything carefully.”

Prabhupāda continued to think and comment on the incident. “The guṇḍā class* doesn't like Caitanya Mahāprabhu,” he said. “They say Caitanya Mahāprabhu made people emasculated. In Orissa they say that after Mahārāja Prataparudra met Caitanya Mahāprabhu, he lost his kṣatriya strength. He was a very powerful king, but after he met Caitanya Mahāprabhu, he became effeminate.”

“What is our reply to that?” asked Tamāla Kṛṣṇa.

“What can you reply?” said Śrīla Prabhupāda. “If they conclude something like that, they have no idea of spiritual life. They say this is disruptive, Lord Caitanya's saying, na dhanam na janam. We don't want such things, and they want them. So how can you reply to such people? Everyone wants this, and we say that we don't want it. How can you make a compromise with such people? In your country also they say, “What is wrong with illicit sex? What is wrong with intoxication?” They say we are brainwashing. Is it not? It is very difficult to push on this movement. Still we are doing. That is Kṛṣṇa's grace.”

Seeing that Śrīla Prabhupāda was disturbed, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa suggested, “Will you try to translate this afternoon, Śrīla Prabhupāda?”

But Prabhupāda continued on the same point. “A young, beautiful woman comes at the dead of night to see Haridāsa Ṭhākura, to offer her body, and he denied. Who will appreciate this?”

“We appreciate,” said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa.

“You appreciate,” said Prabhupāda, “but in the modern world, who will appreciate?” Prabhupāda continued pointing out the irrevocable split between the devotees and the nondevotees: “Their idea is that a young man cannot live without a young woman, and yet Caitanya Mahāprabhu says, “Oh, you are after a young woman? That is more dangerous than drinking poison!” ”

As Prabhupāda spoke of the Māyāpur devotees who had been willing to sacrifice their lives for Kṛṣṇa, he became choked with emotion and began to cry. “Kṛṣṇa will give them protection,” he said, “our Māyāpur men.” He mentioned how Haridāsa Ṭhākura had also been put into jail and beaten and how Prahlāda Mahārāja had been tortured, until Lord Nṛsiṃha had appeared. “Don't be worried," said Śrīla Prabhupāda, crying, and speaking as if all his Māyāpur devotees were directly in front of him. "Kṛṣṇa will protect you. We are doing our best as far as our intelligence goes. Caitanya Mahāprabhu wanted that in every nook and corner of the world this movement should be pushed. We are limited."

In an attempt to ease Prabhupāda's sorrow, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa started reading the latest report from Ghanaśyāma, who was distributing books in Eastern Europe. The report of extraordinary success drew Prabhupāda's attention away from Māyāpur. He smiled and said, "That is dynamic."

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa continued reading the report.

Everywhere we go people either know about you or they are very eager to find out about Kṛṣṇa and yourself by reading your books. Anyone who has distributed your books in the Communist countries will support my claim that nowhere in the world are people more appreciative of your books.

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa looked up from the letter and commented, "He has been everywhere, Prabhupāda, and he says that your books are more appreciated in the Communist countries than anywhere else in the world."

"Yes," said Śrīla Prabhupāda, "they are hungry."

A few days later a full, on-the-scene report came in the mail from Jayapatāka Swami in Māyāpur. The local Hindus of Māyāpur were outraged at what had happened and were mobilizing mass petitions in support of the ISKCON temple. Although the newspaper reports were false, gradually people were learning the facts. Jayapatāka reported vivid details of Bhavānanda and other devotees being marched through Navadvīpa in chains on their way to court and the people of Navadvīpa offering them respects. The devotees were still in jail, he said, constantly chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa.

On the whole, the report was optimistic. Prasādam distribution was continuing in Māyāpur, book distribution in West Bengal was increasing, and the preaching parties were well received wherever they went. Śrīla Prabhupāda's prediction was coming true: the incident was turning in the devotees' favor. He commented that the enemies had thought they were digging up a garden snake by attacking Kṛṣṇa's devotees, but they were finding that they had in fact unearthed a cobra.

July was a good month for Śrīla Prabhupāda's work on Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam. He continued dictating very early in the morning and in the afternoon, completing chapters Eight and Nine of the Tenth Canto. It was his great pleasure to do so. Working on Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, he was completely transcendental to his physical condition, despite the accompanying heart palpitations and despite his faint voice and general weakness. Even to sit was difficult, and yet once he began working, nothing could stop him.

Speaking into the hand microphone of his dictating machine, oblivious to his bodily condition, Prabhupāda described patiently and methodically how Nanda Mahārāja's family priest, Gargamuni, performed the name-giving ceremony for baby Kṛṣṇa. In his purports, Śrīla Prabhupāda often spoke from his personal experiences and realizations.

This is the mission of the Supreme Personality of Godhead, and devotees also have the same mission. One who executes this mission of para-upakāra, performing welfare activities for people in general, is recognized by Kṛṣṇa, the Supreme Personality of Godhead, as being very, very dear to Him (na ca tasmān manuṣyeṣu kaścin me priya kṛttamaḥ). Similarly, Caitanya Mahāprabhu has advised this para-upakāra, and He has especially instructed the inhabitants of India. On the whole, the duty of a pure Vaiṣṇava devotee is to act for the welfare of others.

Sometimes sitting in the predawn open air on the second-floor veranda and sometimes in the humid heat of bright afternoon, Śrīla Prabhupāda worked, describing the limitless Vedic knowledge, just as his predecessors, the Gosvāmīs and Kṛṣṇadāsa Kavirāja, had done when worshiping Kṛṣṇa and Lord Caitanya while living in Vṛndāvana. Śrīla Prabhupāda, however, was the first great ācārya to make Kṛṣṇa conscious literature available to persons of all countries throughout the world, regardless of birth status or previous character. Even as he composed the latest chapters of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, thousands of young men and women were working on his behalf to preach the Vedic message to the world. His disciples were, in fact, keenly aware of how Śrīla Prabhupāda was producing the Tenth Canto purports in Vṛndāvana, and they prayed to Lord Kṛṣṇa that he be allowed to continue for many years, so that he could complete the entire Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam.

In explaining the infant pastimes of Lord Kṛṣṇa, Śrīla Prabhupāda described an entirely transcendental mode of consciousness, beyond material designations of babyhood or old age.

All these pastimes of Kṛṣṇa, and the great enjoyment exhibited by the mothers, are transcendental; nothing about them is material. They are described in Brahma-saṁhitā as ānanda-cinmaya-rasa. In the spiritual world there is anxiety, there is crying, and there are other feelings similar to those of the material world, but because the reality of these feelings is in the transcendental world, of which this world is only an imitation, mother Yaśodā and Rohinī enjoyed them transcendently.

Śrīla Prabhupāda was now rendering a particularly sweet part of Kṛṣṇa's pastimes, and with relish he described Kṛṣṇa's stealing butter and feeding it to the monkeys and His showing the universal form to mother Yaśodā. In describing how the vision of Kṛṣṇa's universal form was beyond mother Yaśodā's comprehension, Śrīla Prabhupāda shed light on all incomprehensible situations—including his own.

She [mother Yaśodā] could do nothing but offer obeisances to the Lord. One should not try to understand the supreme cause by argument or reasoning. When we are beset by some problem for which we can find no reason, there is no alternative than to surrender to the Supreme Lord and offer Him our respectful obeisances. Then our position will be secure. This was the means adopted in this instance also by mother Yaśodā. Whatever happens, the original cause is the Supreme Personality of Godhead. When the immediate cause cannot be ascertained, let us simply offer our obeisances at the lotus feet of the Lord. Mother Yaśodā concluded that the wonderful things she saw in the mouth of her child were due to Him, although she could not clearly ascertain the cause.

Śrīla Prabhupāda made deep and joyful appreciations of the pure devotion of mother Yaśodā for baby Kṛṣṇa, and he described her as the emblem of all pure devotees of the Lord, especially the residents of Vṛndāvana, who love the Lord in spontaneous affection. "The pure devotees who inhabit Vṛndāvana," he wrote, "do not possess any bodily conception." Such pure devotees were fully dedicated to the service of the Lord in sublime affection, prema. This had been described by Lord Caitanya, he said, as the highest perfection of life, pure love in relationship with Kṛṣṇa. "And mother Yaśodā," Śrīla Prabhupāda wrote, "appears to be the topmost of all the devotees to have attained this perfection."

Śrīla Prabhupāda was concerned that what he wrote be published and distributed; it was his service to his Guru Mahārāja. And he received great satisfaction in hearing that book distribution was still expanding all over the world. Harikeśa Swami, the G.B.C. of northern and Eastern Europe, reported that he was printing a very large quantity of books in thirteen languages. After hearing only the beginning of this report, Śrīla Prabhupāda exclaimed, "All the blessings of Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī Mahārāja on you! You are the most important grandson of Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī. Go on doing like this."

In a similar mood, Śrīla Prabhupāda pushed his G.B.C. secretary for India, Gopāla Kṛṣṇa, to produce Hindi books faster and in greater quantities. Whenever Gopāla Kṛṣṇa came to visit Śrīla Prabhupāda without a new publication, Prabhupāda would reprimand him for his slowness. Gopāla Kṛṣṇa therefore began a policy of visiting Prabhupāda only when he had a new book to present. In mid-July, when Gopāla Kṛṣṇa brought a copy of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, First Canto, Part Two, in Hindi, Śrīla Prabhupāda accepted it happily and said, "Twice now unless he brings some book he won't come, because every time I criticize him: 'Where is the book? Where is the book?'"

Abhirāma arrived and reported to Śrīla Prabhupāda about Māyāpur. There was nothing new in his report. Later, Śrīla Prabhupāda inquired from Tamāla Kṛṣṇa why Abhirāma had come. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa explained that Abhirāma had decided to take up business but was undecided which city to work in—perhaps Bangalore or Bombay.

Later, after Śrīla Prabhupāda had retired for the night and was laying in bed under his mosquito net, he again called for Tamāla Kṛṣṇa. Prabhupāda was concerned that Abhirāma not drift away from the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement on the plea of looking for business. Śrīla Prabhupāda said that he himself had lived independently in gr̥hastha life and so had Bhaktivinoda Ṭhākura. "But our aim was different," he said. "When these neophytes remain aloof from the temple connection, without attending the functions, gradually they will be lost."

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa replied that for that very reason he had suggested to Abhirāma that he make his business in Bombay. "Actually," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, "I find the gr̥hasthas have no desire to live independent of the temples." He explained that in the Bombay temple the gr̥hasthas could get apartments near enough to the temple so that they could attend the maṅgala-ārati and other functions.

"Yes," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "Unless these things are continued, the karmīs' poison will spoil them. He can do independent business. There is no harm. But he must be connected with devotional service." Śrīla Prabhupāda had not moved his body while talking, but he had turned his head slightly. Now he laid his head on the pillow.

"Just like Abhirāma constructed that house," Prabhupāda continued. "That's all right. It is within the campus. There is no harm. But if now he goes away after so much training and advancement, if they are lost, then that's a great loss for the society. With great difficulty we make one Vaiṣṇava. And again if he goes, like Śyāmasundara, then it is a great loss. The whole idea is to give up attachment for the material world and increase attachment for Kṛṣṇa. That is perfection. Now according to one's position, it can be done gradually. But this is the aim."

Śrīla Prabhupāda told Abhirāma that by doing a business in Bombay, he could benefit by living near the temple. "Gṛhasthas should not be dependent on the society," he said. "At the same time they should not be independent of the society." Śrīla Prabhupāda laughed at the apparent contradiction. "This is the position," he said. "Our society cannot take charge of a family. There will be so many numbers of families. How we will support? At the same time, if they remain independent of the society, without touch, then the karmīs' poison will infect them." Śrīla Prabhupāda concluded that the solution for the gṛhastha was either to get an apartment near the temple or to live in the temple, if possible. "They should not live completely independent," he said. "That will be future danger."

Śrīla Prabhupāda said he wanted ideal Kṛṣṇa conscious gṛhasthas. "Just like Bhaktivinoda Ṭhākura," he said. "There are many. I was gṛhastha also. There was Deity worship, everything nice. I was publishing Back to Godhead as gṛhastha. So the aim of Kṛṣṇa consciousness was there. I could not leave family life because of certain circumstances. That is a different thing. But I must be in touch with devotional service as in the temple. If you live nearby the temple, it is easier. Or in the temple. But if he remains aloof, that is dangerous."

When Tamāla Kṛṣṇa brought up some problematic details of gṛhasthas living in the temple buildings, Śrīla Prabhupāda stayed to his main point and said, "Anyway, these things have to be adjusted. You cannot follow very rigidly in the case of gṛhasthas. Somehow you have to adjust. We cannot allow them to be lost." Prabhupāda saw with alarm that after much training, a gṛhastha couple could be lost simply because they disassociated themselves from the temple. It would be a great loss, and in an attempt to avoid it, he was instructing one of his G.B.C. representatives. Prabhupāda said unless this danger was curbed, "then the future of our society becomes hopeless."

Śrīla Prabhupāda's servant Upendra was also present, and he asked Prabhupāda about a man's responsibility to maintain his wife and family. A man should not marry, said Prabhupāda, unless he had the power of maintaining his family. He should not expect the temple to. "Why should we maintain a gṛhastha?" said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "And where is the means? But these things are all to be adjusted. I can give you the idea." Then Prabhupāda gave the example that if a gṛhastha was maintaining the Deity worship gorgeously in the temple, that was also preaching, and the temple could consider maintaining such a man's family.

"So the guiding principle," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, "should be that under no circumstances should anyone become lost."

"Yes," said Prabhupāda. "Or else, where is the preaching? It will be like Alexander the Great. He was conquering, but as soon as he went to conquer a new place, the last place was lost. Suppose I have conquered Bombay. Then I go to Karachi, but in the meantime Bombay is lost. That was being done by Alexander the Great. When there is no proper management... Just like the British Empire was lost in that way. They could not manage."

"So similarly we should not expand too quickly," suggested Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, "unless we have the proper management."

"I am therefore stressing book selling," said Prabhupāda. He wanted to impress upon his leaders the main outlines of his program, and it should be their duty to carry these programs out. "At least don't make me Alexander the Great in my lifetime," he laughed. "They say to me, 'You are great, great, great.' But don't make it small while I am living."

"Or after," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa. "We'll never make you that way. We should never do that."

"Then," said Prabhupāda, "that's my request. People recognize I am great. Don't make me small. I'll not give you much trouble, but I am now invalid. What can I do?"

"It seems like even if you are invalid," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, "it gives us more opportunity to serve you."

"Thank you," said Prabhupāda. "What can I do?" He laughed softly and said, "I have to give you that opportunity."

"It seems that it is your mercy to us," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa.

"All right. Go on," said Prabhupāda, dismissing them.

"Jai, Prabhupāda. Thank you for all your merciful instructions."

July 22

In the morning, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa told Prabhupāda that on the following day Lord Jagannātha would travel down Fifth Avenue in New York City. "Lord Jagannātha is very kind to the mlecchas," Prabhupāda said. "Oriyans are mostly mlecchas, but still they are made pūjārīs. One devotee criticized an Oriyan, and Lord Caitanya slapped him: 'Why do you criticize My servants?' Just see His kindness! I prayed to Kṛṣṇa, 'Anyone who has given a little service, please bless him.' And Kṛṣṇa actually does. He doesn't forget any service done."

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa inquired, "Doesn't Rādhārāṇī also pray like that to Kṛṣṇa?"

"Yes," said Prabhupāda. "Rādhārāṇī says, 'I am not sincere. Here is Your real servant.' That is mahā-bhāva. Kṛṣṇa becomes a servant to His servant. Therefore a disciple's first duty is to be submissive to his guru."

“Śrīla Prabhupāda," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, “all your devotees are very much grateful to you."

Śrīla Prabhupāda suddenly became immersed in thoughts of his devotees, and he became very ecstatic. Closing his eyes and rocking his head, he spoke with a choked voice and tears. “Oh, your intense love for me. I am living for you. All over the world everything is going on—money is coming and being spent—and I don't have to worry. I am so much indebted. And I am taking so much service from you all."

“It is we who are indebted," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa. “There is no way we can ever pay this debt to you, Śrīla Prabhupāda."

“That is a br̥hat-mṛdaṅga," said Prabhupāda. “I am beating from this room, and the sound goes ten thousand miles away. Our enemies are surprised: “How this man is still going on?' "

Śrīla Prabhupāda went on appreciating how people in so many cities were enjoying the Ratha-yātrā festivals, seeing Lord Jagannātha, and dancing and chanting. He remembered past Ratha-yātrās, such as in 1969 in San Francisco, when some of the devotees were dancing joyously around a tree. He began recalling many other past wonderful experiences in ISKCON.

Toward the end of July, Prabhupāda's health seemed to be worsening again. And again he mentioned that the end might come at any moment.

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa had been acting as Śrīla Prabhupāda's personal secretary for six continuous months, and he had become Prabhupāda's eyes and ears and his spokesman, especially in dealing with ISKCON management. And he had also become a personal confidant, assisting Śrīla Prabhupāda in his transcendental moods. As a sincere servant, he now began suggesting a different remedy. Śrīla Prabhupāda had recently been feeling and expressing intense devotion toward his disciples in their preaching. Taking this as a cue, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa suggested that if Prabhupāda could travel to the West and be with his disciples there, he would find new life.

“But if I die," said Prabhupāda, “I want to do so in Vṛndāvana." Tamāla Kṛṣṇa replied that Śrīla Prabhupāda should not think of dying. If he would go on a tour of the West, see the devotees there, take prasādam made from food grown on the ISKCON farms, then certainly he would respond to such devotion and regain his appetite and strength. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa pointed out that when Śrīla Prabhupāda had been feeling like this in May and the G.B.C. had come, he had responded to their reciprocation of love by increasing his own desire to live.

“One thing you can do," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. “In your daily routine, you can pray to Kṛṣṇa, “If You want him to stay, please cure him, and if not, please take him away. We are fully surrendered to You. Now it depends on Your desire to keep him alive or let him leave this world.' "

Śrīla Prabhupāda was pointing out that he was not a victim of some mundane moroseness robbing him of a will to live. He had already said that he would be with Kṛṣṇa in any case. Staying in this world or leaving it was not up to him, but up to Kṛṣṇa. He recited the prayer of King Kulaśekhara from the Mukunda-mālā-stotra: “My dear Kṛṣṇa, please let me die immediately so that the swan of my mind can be encircled by the stem of Your lotus feet. Now while I am still strong. Otherwise, at the time of my final breath, when my throat is choked up, how will it be possible to think of You?"

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa persisted in his affectionate line, however, insisting that Śrīla Prabhupāda could not think of leaving. There was so much unfinished business for Prabhupāda in this world, such as personally seeing to the installation of the Deities of Rādhā-Rāsavihārī in the Bombay-temple.

Śrīla Prabhupāda admitted it was so and added, "Another ambition I have is that the populace is suffering from agnosticism. The rascals are suffering, but they do not know why. I want to drive away agnosticism from the world." Tamāla Kṛṣṇa assured Śrīla Prabhupāda that if he were to go to the West, agnosticism would be driven out. The devotees were already working hard on Śrīla Prabhupāda's instruction. But if they could have his physical presence, they would increase their preaching unlimitedly. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa no longer kept himself only in a passive role, waiting for the spiritual master to ring the bell and then waiting to hear what he wanted. Now he was trying to persuade Śrīla Prabhupāda to travel, and as Prabhupāda began to consider it, he became enthusiastic.

"When I am in Vṛndāvana," said Prabhupāda, "it is transcendental. That much mercy Kṛṣṇa has shown me. And wherever there is our center, that is also Vaikuṇṭha—New York, Los Angeles, Paris, or London."

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa offered an itinerary: a visit to London, staying at the Bhaktivedanta Manor, and also seeing Rādhā-London-īśvara; then to New York and seeing the devotees in the ISKCON skyscraper with Rādhā-Govinda; then to the farm in Pennsylvania; and then Los Angeles, where he could see the new dioramas of Kṛṣṇa's pastimes.

"To remain in Vṛndāvana is a sentiment," Śrīla Prabhupāda agreed. "In New York if I die you will have to entomb me on the roof," he joked grimly. "There is no other room. If I die, as long as I die among you, you are all Vaikuṇṭha men. I had a dream that Vaikuṇṭha men came to take me. They were all white men with shaven heads. Your countrymen cannot believe how you have changed."

Śrīla Prabhupāda said that they should consult an astrologer to see whether it was auspicious for him to travel and whether he would be cured and how long he would live. "I was born in the evening at four P.M.," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "It was Nandotsava. You can consult an old Pañjikā to see the day. It was a Tuesday. I am prepared to go to the West."

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa then quoted from the Bhagavad-gītā, Chapter Two, verse 37, where Kṛṣṇa tells Arjuna to fight: "Either you will die and achieve the heavenly planets or conquer and enjoy the earthly kingdom." Śrīla Prabhupāda said the verse was appropriate. Throughout the night and the next day he considered the traveling proposal and mentioned to his other servants, "Tamāla is arranging a big party."

"I was praying to Kṛṣṇa, 'What is this slow death?' " Prabhupāda told Tamāla Kṛṣṇa. "Then you quoted that verse. At least my disciples will know I came at the risk of my life. They are the future hope. I must enthuse them. Kṛṣṇa ordered Arjuna, and I am Arjuna's servant. I am not so limited to think that this is my country. Everything is Kṛṣṇa's. Why should I limit Kṛṣṇa?"

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa gave encouragement: “When you get there, with so many devotees who are giving their lives for spreading Kṛṣṇa consciousness and assisting you, it will really be enthralling. And you won't have to speak so much. It's your presence—your seeing the devotees and them seeing you. So in that sense, it won't be exhausting. It's a good climate now, too—August—in London. It's a very good time.”

Prabhupāda turned to Upendra and said, “His words are making me feel different. Just hearing, I become enthusiastic.”

“Śrīla Prabhupāda,” said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, “by going West I know you will recover.”

“May Kṛṣṇa fulfill your words,” said Śrīla Prabhupāda. He spent the rest of that afternoon hearing Caitanya-caritāmṛta readings from various devotees. At one point he began to express great bliss and said, “Read Caitanya-caritāmṛta always to me! These three books.* There is no comparison in the world. I may boast like this. I am fortunate to be able to present these books throughout the world, and people are accepting them even blindly.”

After a day had passed, Śrīla Prabhupāda considered the travel proposal more seriously and mentioned some of its defects. He said that wherever he went, his physical condition would go with him.

“But here you have not been translating lately,” said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa.

“Who says I shall never again translate?” Prabhupāda countered. “Every action has some relaxation and then activity again.” Prabhupāda said that according to allopathic medicine, the only hope for him was to enter a hospital and undergo intensive medical treatment. According to Āyur Vedic medicine, however, there were specific medicines. As Prabhupāda sat on his balcony speaking with his secretary, he wore sunglasses. He would wear them even late in the day or in a darkened room. To his disciples, this was another source of worry—that he appeared to be having problems seeing. Such things made the prospects of traveling to the West seem doubtful. Why couldn't he just stay in Vṛndāvana, some of the devotees reasoned, where everything was arranged for his convenience?

The devotees had sent messages to three astrologers, and all the reports returned that same afternoon. Some of the reports offered absurd remedies without knowledge of Śrīla Prabhupāda's position, but all of them agreed on one point: the next two months would be the most difficult of Prabhupāda's life, and traveling should be avoided. One astrologer recommended Śrīla Prabhupāda wear a blue sapphire.

“So it is not hopeless,” Śrīla Prabhupāda said, after hearing all the reports. “At least for the next five weeks, keep me very carefully. For the time being, no travel. Secure this blue sapphire, and chant Hare Kṛṣṇa.”

On the last day of July, the governor of Tamil Nadu, Sri Prabhudas Patwari, who was visiting Vṛndāvana, paid a short visit to Śrīla Prabhupāda. The governor could only stay half an hour, but Śrīla Prabhupāda spoke energetically with him the entire time. When Śrīla Prabhupāda explained his condition of health, the governor at once invited Śrīla Prabhupāda to come to Madras and stay at the Raj Bhavan (governor's mansion), where he said the best doctors in the whole of South Asia were available. But Prabhupāda, rather than prolong the discussion about his body, used his bodily condition as an example to preach the philosophy of Kṛṣṇa consciousness.

"After all," he said, "so long we have got this body, then janma-mṛtyu-jarā-vyādhi [birth, death, old age, and disease] we have to accept. This is the statement of Bhagavad-gītā. So the human endeavor should be to stop this repetition of birth and death. When Viśvāmitra Mahārāja went to see King Daśaratha, the king inquired, punar-janma-jayāya: "You are a great saintly person trying to conquer over birth and death. Is your process going on nicely?" "

Prabhupāda then used the example of his bodily condition in a different way, to illustrate the concept of varṇāśrama-dharma. He compared the brāhmaṇas to the head, the kṣatriyas to the arms, the vaiśyas to the belly, and the śūdras to the legs. "If they are all in good condition, then the health is all right," said Prabhupāda. "Now at the present moment I am suffering because my belly department is not working. So we cannot neglect any department. There must be all departments, and they must be cooperative and healthy. This movement is meant for that purpose. It is the duty of government to give us protection."

Śrīla Prabhupāda mentioned the devotees' recent difficulties in Māyāpur and asked for protection. "We'll do it no doubt," Governor Patwari replied. "I'm meeting the prime minister tomorrow, and we are going to discuss that matter." The governor acknowledged that the reports in the newspaper were distorted. He asserted that Madras had a good atmosphere for religious work, and he mentioned several svāmīs who were doing good work. Of one he said, "He is making good propaganda about Gītā everywhere."

"There are many persons making propaganda," said Prabhupāda frankly. "But if you don't mind my saying so, all these men are in ignorance of what is the real meaning of Gītā." Bhagavad-gītā, he said, should be understood as it is, and it should be adopted especially by the rājārṣis, or government leaders.

Again the governor said how nice it would be if Prabhupāda would come to Madras. Prabhupāda seemed to consider it seriously and thanked the governor. Finally, Prabhupāda requested help in getting the permanent residency in India for some of his disciples. "They will never do any harm," he said. "They will never take part in politics."

"I know it," said the governor. "I know it."

"So kindly try to help," said Prabhupāda.

Later, when Prabhupāda mentioned he was fifty-percent decided to go to Madras, he and his servants began discussing the merits of travel to Madras and other places in the world. Although he could not move even a few feet without assistance, if Kṛṣṇa desired he was willing to travel.

July of 1977 was special for pious Hindus, and the people of Vṛndāvana spent extra time in reading scriptures and visiting holy places. So by the end of July, when the trees and bushes were freshening with green leaves, pilgrims came in crowds to Vṛndāvana and to the Krishna-Balaram Mandir. Despite the mud and the rain, many of the people were in a jubilant mood, relieved from the oppressive heat and anticipating Jhulana-yātrā, the swing festival of Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa. Jhulana-yātrā was Vṛndāvana's biggest festival and would occur in mid-August this year.

The local newspapers were giving reports on Śrīla Prabhupāda's health, and a genuine concern for his well-being prevailed throughout Vṛndāvana and surrounding villages. Therefore, because of the festival season as well as out of concern for Śrīla Prabhupāda, many people were coming to the Krishna-Balaram Mandir. Those who came around nine A.M. got to see Śrīla Prabhupāda when he went for his morning darśana of the Deities.

Śrīla Prabhupāda still had no appetite and had scarcely eaten during the past six weeks. He was no longer regular in his times for sleeping, taking massage, or sitting up and translating. Feeling himself to be at a critical period, he had given permission for the devotees all over ISKCON to recite a simple prayer: "My dear Lord Kṛṣṇa, if You desire, please cure Śrīla Prabhupāda." He would regularly go before the Deities each morning. Wearing his dark sunglasses and sitting erect in the rocking chair, he would hold his palms together in a gesture of prayer, while two men, one in front and one behind, carefully carried the rocker from Prabhupāda's room into the temple room. They would set the chair down first before the Deities of Gaura-Nitāi, then before Kṛṣṇa-Balarāma, and then before Rādhā-Śyāmasundara. Then they would carry him to a central spot in the courtyard, under the tamāla tree, and set his chair down on the black and white checkered marble floor.

Śrīla Prabhupāda would sit facing Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma, and the devotees would sit down around him and begin a kīrtana. As the kīrtana began, two gurukula boys would rise and come in front of him, where they would begin dancing with arms upraised, their cotton cāḍars swinging back and forth. Prabhupāda would usually not speak or even smile, but after a few minutes would give his garlands to a devotee, who would place them around the necks of the dancers. Soon two other young boys would come forward, and the first boys would garland them with the garlands they had received from Śrīla Prabhupāda and sit down. For half an hour, the dancing and singing continued. Guests to the temple would gather, many of them offering money at Prabhupāda's feet, which rested on an embroidered silk cushion.

Śrīla Prabhupāda was gaining resolve to go to the West. One of the astrologers had said that by the fourth of September, after checking with a physician, Śrīla Prabhupāda could undertake travel—but for health only. "I will go there to our Pennsylvania farm," said Śrīla Prabhupāda, and he appeared hopeful. He didn't consider the astrologers absolute guides; he had consulted them more out of curiosity. Astrology was part of the Vedic knowledge, but the modern-day practitioners were often dubious. When Abhirāma came from Delhi with a report from a new astrologer, Śrīla Prabhupāda heard it, while continuing to chant intently and silently on his beads.

"His main point, Śrīla Prabhupāda," said Abhirāma, "was that for six months there is trouble, especially in the first week of September and then again on certain dates in October and November. The longevity is eighty-two years, five months, and eleven days, which means February 28, 1978. This is according to birth and stars arrangement. But he made it very clear that due to the hand of Kṛṣṇa this could be changed. And if you can pass through 1978, then he sees four or five years ahead clear."

When the report was finished, Śrīla Prabhupāda was quiet for a few minutes and then said, "By calculation the age is finished. That doesn't matter. Rather, if I am finished now, it will be glorious."

"Living will also be glorious," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa.

"Yes," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "Let us see as Kṛṣṇa desires." Other horoscopes also showed an inauspicious time ahead, due to the entry of Saturn into the eighth house. Śrīla Prabhupāda took this to indicate that his condition was most critical. In either case—whether according to the stars or according to Kṛṣṇa—who could change destiny? Everything was in Kṛṣṇa's hands. But Śrīla Prabhupāda was still inclined to tour the West. "If I can work a little more," he said, "our society will be very strong. I want to see that what I have done is made still stronger."

Prabhupāda's talk of travel, however, coincided with increasing weakness. He talked less. When Tamāla Kṛṣṇa tried to encourage him to translate, he replied, "When I get inspiration, I will take it up. Don't try to force me. I am going through a difficult time and am now feeling restless. It is not mechanical."

The Jhulana-yātrā pilgrims were mostly villagers. Many were from Rajasthan, the men and women wearing bright colored clothes and the women wearing heavy gold and silver bangles and bracelets, which clanked as they walked barefoot on the roads. The numbers of mendicant sādhus also increased, and they became a common sight, with their ash or clay covered bodies marked with brightly colored tilaka. The Yamunā had flooded in many places and was too swift for bathing or swimming. Thousands of visitors came to the Krishna-Balaram Mandir, which was now one of the most popular temples in all of Northern India. The evening āratī at Krishna-Balaram was so crowded that resident devotees couldn't attend but could only stand in the back of the courtyard at the edge of a packed, jostling crowd. Some of the gurukula boys would greet the guests with Hindi Back to Godhead magazines, each boy selling two or three hundred magazines a night. Śrīla Prabhupāda was glad to hear this.

A few of Śrīla Prabhupāda's disciples from the West also arrived just to be with him, hoping to render some menial service. When Prabhupāda received them in his dark, cool quarters, he was sitting up on his bed. One of the arrivals, Madhudviṣa, had left Kṛṣṇa consciousness for more than a year but now came before Prabhupāda shaven-headed and wearing Vaiṣṇava tilaka. "Don't leave us," said Prabhupāda feelingly. "You can stay as grhastha, but don't leave us."

To Satsvarūpa, Prabhupāda said, "I like your magazine [Back to Godhead], especially the article 'Śrīla Prabhupāda Speaks Out.' "

Śrutakīrti, who had come from Hawaii, showed Prabhupāda some candles they were producing and selling, and Prabhupāda laughed. "You Westerners," he said. "There is no scarcity of money. But now I have taught you how to spend it." For more than half an hour, Prabhupāda went on talking pleasantly.

Later, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa told the devotees that Prabhupāda's outlook seemed to change, depending on the people around him and the news he received; and he told them of Prabhupāda's plans to go to the West.

That evening, when Śrīla Prabhupāda called for "Tamāla and the others," the devotees gathered and went up to Prabhupāda's balcony, not knowing what to expect. Śrīla Prabhupāda was lying on his bed. "Sit down," he said. "I want simply to see you all. It gives me vital force." Mercifully and lovingly he looked upon his devotees as they sat around him. The air was filled with frankincense billowing from the pot of coals Upendra had prepared for keeping mosquitoes away. Evening āraṭi began in the temple, and the sounds of the kīrtana rose to the little balcony. One by one the men present began to massage Prabhupāda. Śrutakīrti and Satsvarūpa were each massaging a leg, while Tamāla Kṛṣṇa massaged Prabhupāda's head. Another devotee fanned. Prabhupāda lay back with his eyes closed peacefully. "You are all Vaiṣṇavas," he said. "Be merciful to me."

Śrīla Prabhupāda frankly wanted to hear good news. It inspired him to continue. He didn't want to hear other news. His secretary would read him letters in the afternoon, and Prabhupāda began allowing the other devotees to be present. Once when they entered his room he said, "If in this world there is one Vaiṣṇava, he can deliver all the world."

"You are that one Vaiṣṇava, Śrīla Prabhupāda," said Satsvarūpa.

"You become," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "Each of you. Why not?"

"We can try," said Guru-kṛpā Swami.

"Yes, try," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "But follow. Do not imitate."

"Today we have a letter about book distribution," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, "the monthly report."

"That is the real good news," said Prabhupāda, and he listened with full attention as Tamāla Kṛṣṇa read the BBT newsletter. He was pleased and absorbed, sometimes shaking his head and smiling to hear the achievements of his disciples. Then he heard a long letter from Ghaṇaśyāma about his triumphant book distribution in Eastern Europe. When he heard a letter from Tulasi dāsa, who was developing a Kṛṣṇa conscious farm community in South Africa, he commented, "This letter makes my chest swell, that I have such disciples performing such activities."

In another letter, a devotee wrote a prayer stating that all his Godbrothers were praying for Prabhupāda, and he hoped that Kṛṣṇa would respond. "Surely," said Prabhupāda, "I am practically living on your prayers. I haven't eaten in the last six months. So I must be simply living on your prayers." And hearing in a letter from South America that devotees were praying for him, he said, "I think I will have to stay. Kṛṣṇa is very kind. He is bhakta-vatsala. So many devotees are praying, it cannot be frustrated. I think this is why I am feeling inspiration to go out. In this condition, anyone else would prepare for death, but I am going on a tour. I don't think of it as sentiment. Kṛṣṇa is actually present as the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement. I am not without Vṛndāvana wherever I go to our temples."

Pañcadraviḍa Swami wrote that he would exchange his youth for Śrīla Prabhupāda's old age. "We are the same age," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "The body has nothing to do with the ātmā. In the Vaikuṇṭha world, we are the same age. New life, new boys—nava-yauvana. The outward dress does not affect one." As a further reply to Pañcadraviḍa, Prabhupāda dictated, "May Kṛṣṇa give you long life, and preach Kṛṣṇa consciousness. You are our future hope."

For the devotees who had not been with Prabhupāda in months, it was like old times, sitting with him and hearing him answer letters and give advice for becoming victorious in Kṛṣṇa consciousness. Hearing him discourse made everything all right. But as they were leaving his room, he said softly, "These are my last days."

When Tamāla Kṛṣṇa got an especially dynamic report from Hamsadūta Swami in Sri Lanka, he decided to bring it to Śrīla Prabhupāda early in the morning. Prabhupāda had just finished his bath and was sitting upstairs on the balcony, just before his nine-thirty darśana in the temple. He wore a tulasī garland from Kṛṣṇa-Balarāma as well as a fresh flower garland. He reclined on a round bolster pillow and listened.

Hamsadūta's letter contained news of a debate he was having with a famous atheist in Colombo, a Dr. Kovoov. As soon as Tamāla Kṛṣṇa began to read the letter, however, Prabhupāda asked to hear Dr. Kovoov's response. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa then began reading from a news clipping enclosed in the letter.

"Das and Swami asked whether scientists can make a chicken to come out of a plastic egg," Tamāla Kṛṣṇa read. "I do not know whether they are aware that scientists have made over ten elements, such as fermium, plutonium, einsteinium—"

Prabhupāda interrupted, "Rascal. You are simply producing empty sound. Where is the chicken, rascal? The chicken, the hen, is better than the scientist. She has produced another egg within a week. You simply say this and that, this and that, this and that, that's all. What is your value? We don't give you any value. You are less important than the chicken."

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa resumed reading: "We have created over ten elements that even God—"

Again Prabhupāda interrupted. "Who cares for your creation? Without your creation the egg is there."

"No, he says," Tamāla Kṛṣṇa went back to reading the text, "even God could not create them, because He did not know the technology involved in making them."

"God kicks on your mouth," said Prabhupāda. "He doesn't require to take your creation. Without your creation He can do everything. God kicks on your mouth with shoes. Talkative nonsense. Tell him like that."

"I'm sure Hamsadūta did," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa. "Next we'll read his reply. Anyway, the scientist goes on, 'Are these two men aware of the success of the Sri Lanka scientist Dr—' "

Prabhupāda: "Who cares of his scientists?"

"“The Nobel Prize–winner in synthesizing amino acids—”"

"Nobel Prize–winner," scoffed Śrīla Prabhupāda. "Another rascal has given him a Nobel Prize. He is a rascal, and another rascal has given. Sūrī-sākṣī matta. In a liquor house the witness is a drunkard. If there is an incident within the liquor shop and the proprietor of the liquor shop has brought some witnesses, but all of them are drunkards—what is the value of that? As soon as you are drunkard, immediately you are rejected."

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa read on, and Prabhupāda continued to interrupt him at almost every sentence. The devotees had not seen Prabhupāda so fiery in weeks. When Tamāla Kṛṣṇa read Hamsadūta's reply, Prabhupāda was pleased to see how many of the same points his disciple had made. "He is putting very strong arguments," said Prabhupāda. "This is preaching!"

Two factors were making Śrīla Prabhupāda indecisive about going West. One was the worldly formalities of passport and U.S. residency card, and the other was Śrīla Prabhupāda's personal hesitancy, based on reports from the astrologer. His health was, of course, the main factor, but at times he seemed ready to disregard everything and order his servants to somehow take him to London. Already he had sent Abhirāma to Calcutta to deal with certain complications. His U.S. residency "green card" had expired, and the Consulate in Delhi had insisted that he come for an interview. Meanwhile, Prabhupāda's passport and a temporary visa were being readied and would take four or five days. One of the Āyur Vedic doctors who sometimes visited told Prabhupāda he should wait a week or so.

But Prabhupāda found simply working up the will for travel, and then not going, and then deciding again to go, was exhausting. On hearing the latest news, that the U.S. Consulate insisted on an interview—which seemed to be a physical impossibility—he couldn't rest. Lying on his bed for hours, he finally called Tamāla Kṛṣṇa and said, "I want to go. Can you arrange to carry me? Somehow or other take me. Here I don't expect any good. Psychological enthusiasm is there. Don't be afraid. I am not afraid. Either to die in the temple here or there—it is all Vaikuṇṭha." Tamāla Kṛṣṇa asked to first discuss this with a few of the G.B.C. men who were present, but when the devotees came into Prabhupāda's room that afternoon, Prabhupāda said, "No discussions. I have made up my mind. Arrange immediately for going."

But again there were complications. The doctor asked Śrīla Prabhupāda to wait another week, and Prabhupāda also did not want to leave India without his green card for the U.S. He sent Balavanta to Calcutta to try and get the green card. With so many matters unsettled, Prabhupāda remained undecided whether to go to England now or wait.

"I plan to stay in America," Śrīla Prabhupāda said. "I will not come back until I complete the Bhāgavatam. I want to organize there. The American boys are so nice. If I make everything strong then the movement will endure. Let us go now. The doctor will say four days for the medicine to act, then wait a little longer. This is their method."

Finally a report came from Abhirāma in Calcutta that the passport had been secured and the American Consulate in Calcutta would help in getting the green card. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa ran upstairs and told Śrīla Prabhupāda, "There is very good news." Śrīla Prabhupāda was lying down in bed, but when he heard the news he began to slowly clap his hands, saying, "Give me good news and keep me alive!" He began to think ahead to London. "The Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa Deities there are so nice," he said. "Rādhā-London-īśvara—an innocent boy, He is." Tamāla Kṛṣṇa reminded Śrīla Prabhupāda how they had obtained those Deities.

"Yes," said Prabhupāda, "it was unexpected. I was in a hopeless condition, but Kṛṣṇa said, 'Here I am. Take Me.' " Śrīla Prabhupāda thought of the Bhaktivedanta Manor. "That lawn before my room is magnificent," he said. "I think good time is coming. Madhudviṣa has come, and Gaurasundara has come—lost child has come. These are good signs." As he spoke on, his voice, which had sounded at first small and weak, grew in strength. "Mistake there may be," he said, referring to the fall of some of his disciples. "But it can be rectified. At the time be very careful not to commit mistakes. Kṛṣṇa never forgets a person who does a little service."

"You also never forget, Prabhupāda," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa.

"How can I forget? You have all helped me to execute the mission of Lord Caitanya and my Guru Mahārāja. I always pray to Kṛṣṇa to give you strength. I am insignificant. I cannot do anything. But I pray to Kṛṣṇa to give you strength." Prabhupāda recalled how after installing the Deities in Australia he had thought, "These mlecchas and yavanas, what will they do with the Deity?" Then the next time he went there he saw that they were worshiping nicely. "Try to do everything nicely," he said, "and Kṛṣṇa will help. Whatever I have done has been done on this principle. Whatever my Guru Mahārāja taught me, I tried to the best of my capacity to carry out."

Śrīla Prabhupāda spoke on, carried by waves of transcendental emotion and carrying his loving disciples with him. "When I go to America," he said, "especially Los Angeles and New York, I feel at home."

At the mention of New York, he began to remember his first days there. "I was like a street boy," he said. "I was going here and there, sightseeing. I was in New York City, but one morning I saw all the walls were white. 'How have they become white? Who has whitewashed them?' I thought. I went downstairs, and there was so much snow. I went with an umbrella and purchased a pack of milk in the snow. At that time I was living in a dungeon. It was always dark. But I didn't care. Whatever difficulty, I didn't care. I only wanted to preach. Sometimes people would touch me, like men on the Bowery, but no one was inimical. Everyone was friendly. Even the bums. When I went to enter my New York building, the bums would get up from where they were lying down and let me pass by. I couldn't understand the difference between friends and enemies."

Prabhupāda said a friend of his had been shocked to hear that he was moving to the Bowery. "Oh, Swamiji," his friend had said, "you have gone to Bowery Street? It is a horrible place!"

"I passed through many dangers," continued Prabhupāda, "yet I couldn't understand that, 'Here is danger.' Everywhere I thought, 'This is my home.' "

Śrīla Prabhupāda recalled random details of his first preaching endeavors at 26 Second Avenue. "I was working very hard," he said. "Lecturing at seven in the morning and seven in the evening. Cooking and distributing prasādam to anyone who was coming. Do you remember, Satsvarūpa? You would bring some mango and fruit. Daily you would come. Those days are passed. Now I feel happiness remembering those days. Remember that boy Stryadhīśa? He would eat so many capātis. He would never have enough. Every time he wanted more I would give him four capātis at a time. Kīrtanānanda, Acyutānanda. Seventy-five people would attend that Sunday feast."

Prabhupāda recalled the first San Francisco temple, the first Los Angeles temple, going to Seattle, pushing Gaurasundara to go to Hawaii, receiving a letter from Govinda dāsi in Hawaii who said that it was mango season, except that when Prabhupāda went there, "it was rat season, and all night the rats were running in the rafters."

"This is a new life, this Kṛṣṇa consciousness," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "There is no doubt about it." His thoughts returned to his upcoming tour, and he said he could sleep in three seats across in the airplane. But he cautioned the devotees to be careful that once he got to America he not get kidnapped. Previously he had considered that Kṛṣṇa may have been detaining him from going to the West so that he would not be disturbed by the demons. But now he would go in any case.

Prabhupāda was ready to leave, but the delays and anxieties persisted. Balavanta returned from Calcutta, but Śrīla Prabhupāda was not pleased to see him. Why, he demanded, had he come back without Abhirāma? Balavanta said he had wanted to be with Śrīla Prabhupāda and he thought that Abhirāma could handle the last steps of getting the green card. Prabhupāda reprimanded Balavanta, saying service to the guru was better than being with him.

Then Tamāla Kṛṣṇa left for Delhi to arrange for the tickets. When two days later Śrīla Prabhupāda learned that there might be a delay of several days before Tamāla Kṛṣṇa and the other Americans in the party could leave India, he said he could leave immediately, without them, taking Śrutakīrti as his servant.

Then Prabhupāda heard of an airport strike in London. And the night before his scheduled departure, his health worsened. Many devotees urged him not to go. But amazingly, the tickets and passport arrived, and at midnight on August 28, after a six-month stay in Vṛndāvana, Śrīla Prabhupāda and his party left from the front gate of the Krishna-Balaram Mandir and headed for Delhi in a caravan of cars.

Just as Prabhupāda was leaving, Bisan Chandra Seth, a friend of Prabhupāda's in Vṛndāvana, had come and protested, "It will not be good if something happens and you leave your body outside of Vṛndāvana." Prabhupāda told Mr. Seth that, because his disciples were so much in love with him, he could not easily refuse their request. If the trip became too difficult, he said, he would return immediately. He told Mr. Seth that he was simply depending on Kṛṣṇa.

Prabhupāda rode lying on a mattress in the back seat of his car, and after two hours of driving over roads greatly damaged by flooding, they reached Delhi airport. Śrīla Prabhupāda waited in the car. The early morning was warm, and the devotees opened the car doors. Bhavānanda Goswami, who had just been released from jail in Bengal, had arrived in time to see Śrīla Prabhupāda. Bhavānanda approached the car and placed his head on Prabhupāda's feet.

"How are you?" Prabhupāda asked. Bhavānanda reported that everything was improving in Māyāpur. All the local sādhus and citizens were now siding with ISKCON against the hoodlums who had attacked the temple.

Śrīla Prabhupāda was moved to an airport waiting room prior to going through the customs formalities. About ten devotees were there to see him off as he left with his party of four: Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, Upendra, Pradyumna, and Pradyumna's wife, Arundhatī. Śrīla Prabhupāda sat up right on the airport couch, silently fingering the beads in his bead bag. His bare feet, resting in his sandals, were slightly swollen, as were his hands. He looked to see who was present and slightly nodded to each disciple in recognition.

The devotees felt there was no need for Śrīla Prabhupāda to talk. Just being with him was wonderful and fully satisfying. He had already spoken to them fully and had given himself in his books in many other ways. So they chanted and looked lovingly at him, up until the last moment when he went by wheelchair onto the plane.

SPL 53: Krishna's Great Soldier

CHAPTER FIFTY THREE

Kṛṣṇa's Great Soldier

During the long flight, Śrīla Prabhupāda remained solemn. His servants were helpless to alleviate the difficult situation, as they might have in Vṛndāvana, and cigarette smoke, loud talk, and drunken laughter surrounded them. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, despite his concern, did not know what to do for Śrīla Prabhupāda or what to ask him. Śrīla Prabhupāda had often expressed a dislike for conversations with questions like "How are you feeling?"

Prabhupāda's servants knew that they could not fully understand their spiritual master's thinking, and the scriptures also warned that one should not attempt to understand the mind of the Vaiṣṇava. But they knew their service was to relieve him—by arranging for quiet, by assisting him in bathing and dressing, or by taking him to the temple for darśana of Kṛṣṇa-Balarāma. Now, however, they were helpless to perform any of these tasks. Now, more than ever, Śrīla Prabhupāda was in Kṛṣṇa's hands. Earlier that year, in Bhubaneswar, he had said that his disciples, although willing to help, could not change the situation if he was inconvenienced by old age. And he had even given the example that although he might be in his opulent quarters at the Bhaktivedanta Manor, that did not mean he would not suffer inconvenience. But Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, being very sensitive to Prabhupāda's desires and experienced in serving him, several times moved over and spoke with his spiritual master.

"Śrīla Prabhupāda," he said, "when you get to London the devotees will be so pleased to be with you."

"Yes," Śrīla Prabhupāda replied, "it is good that we are going." Otherwise, Śrīla Prabhupāda was mostly silent, meditating on Kṛṣṇa and his mission of bringing love of Kṛṣṇa to the world.

The flight turned out to be an unusually exhaustive ordeal. When the plane landed in Rome it was delayed there for four hours, and Śrīla Prabhupāda had to wait in the airport lounge. When finally they arrived over London, the captain announced that they could not land yet due to the strike, and so they continued circling for hours. Finally, twenty hours after leaving Delhi, the plane landed at Heathrow Airport.

Customs and immigrations officials and the British Airways ground crew allowed Śrīla Prabhupāda, in a wheelchair, to quickly pass through all the formalities. And soon he was amid a throng of enthusiastic disciples and then sitting in a white Rolls Royce enroute to Bhaktivedanta Manor.

The London airport and the busy highways leading into the city are certainly a great contrast to the peace and spirituality of Vṛndāvana. But for Śrīla Prabhupāda to suddenly leave the climate and transcendental culture of India to fly to the West was not unusual. He had been doing that, going from East to West, from north to south, from one nation to another—to the snowlands, to the tropics, to the cities, to the jungles, mixing with white people, black people, and Orientals—at an almost constant pace for years. He was no Hindu village guru suddenly astounded to see hundreds of automobiles racing on the highway or to see factory smoke or skyscrapers or the blind rat race of the meat-eaters. There was no question of "culture shock" for Śrīla Prabhupāda.

But there was a shock for his disciples in London, who had never imagined that he would be so thin or that anyone could travel in such condition. For the devotees who had been at the airport to meet him, it had been a heart-rending experience. Even those who had heard the reports of Prabhupāda in Vṛndāvana were not emotionally prepared for such a change. Prabhupāda was as transcendental as ever, or even more than ever, but the devotees were shocked at first to see him so different. Now he appeared like a powerful sage who had been undergoing long austerities for the benefit of humankind and who had become transcendental to his body, although living within it.

At Bhaktivedanta Manor, Śrīla Prabhupāda went from the car to a palanquin and entered the temple room, where about three hundred disciples and well-wishers were waiting to be with him. Devotees from all the ISKCON centers in northern and southern Europe had rushed to England on a last-minute notice. They were holding kīrtana for Śrīla Prabhupāda as he entered, and they, too, like the devotees at the airport, were deeply shocked. And for a moment, when they saw Śrīla Prabhupāda wearing his dark sunglasses and appearing so thin, the kīrtana almost stopped. Yet they simultaneously remained joyful and ecstatic, realizing that despite such difficulty, he had actually come to the West to be with them and encourage their Kṛṣṇa consciousness. They had been praying for him for months. The prayer, "My dear Lord Kṛṣṇa, if You desire, please cure Śrīla Prabhupāda," had been printed on a banner and hung over Prabhupāda's vyāsāsana.

The devotees of England, wanting to reciprocate with Śrīla Prabhupāda with more than just the sentiment of their words, were also leading the world in transcendental book distribution. When, a few weeks ago, they had heard that Śrīla Prabhupāda might be coming to England, it hadn't seemed possible, considering his physical condition. They had heard he might leave his body at any moment, but then later they had heard he was better and he was coming to London. Even when they had heard he was definitely coming, they had been incredulous. But now it had come true.

The Deity room curtains were open, and Śrīla Prabhupāda beheld Rādhā-Gokulānanda. Some devotees stood in front of him, and with a small gesture characteristic of his hand, he waved them aside. Without any change of expression, he sat with concentrated attention facing the gorgeously dressed Deities of Rādhā-Gokulānanda, whom he had named four years ago when calling for Them to come and be worshiped here by the devotees of England.

Without saying a word, Prabhupāda went up to his room, where as many devotees as possible joined him. He had always said he felt comfortably at home in these quarters, and once again he was pleased to see outside his window the large lawn, the lake, and the ducks. The devotees sat before him with their palms folded, aware that this was no casual meeting. They had already offered their lives completely to Śrīla Prabhupāda, and there was nothing more they could offer in words that would equal their dedication.

A devotee placed a large silver plate full of prasādam on the table before Śrīla Prabhupāda. He picked up a milk sweet and tasted it, then a piece of mango. The hundred devotees who squeezed into the room and looked in from the doorway watched his every movement with fixed attention. There was complete silence. Then Śrīla Prabhupāda looked up, smiling.

"So," he said, "is everyone all right?"

"Jaya, Śrīla Prabhupāda!" was the warm reply. The tension of seeing Śrīla Prabhupāda's different appearance suddenly melted, and everyone simply wanted to make him feel comfortable and to please him with their service.

For the rest of the day Śrīla Prabhupāda remained alone, resting. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa lectured to the devotees in the temple room, explaining how Śrīla Prabhupāda had decided it was better to travel, even at such a great risk, than to be invalid. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa told how someone had suggested Śrīla Prabhupāda go to Tehran or Italy or France, because of the airport strike in London, but how he had said, "I want to go to London." Śrīla Prabhupāda has come to take shelter of you, said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa. He said that, according to śāstra, a devotee should stay in Vṛndāvana, especially at the end of his life, but because Śrīla Prabhupāda's spiritual master had ordered him to go to the West and preach, he had returned, determined to fulfill that mission until the last.

The devotees were deeply touched that Śrīla Prabhupāda's coming was at least partially in recognition of their preaching. They resolved to reciprocate with him while he was there by holding a book distribution marathon. If they showed him their dedication by preaching, maybe he would stay a long time.

At two o'clock the next morning Bhagavān and Tamāla Kṛṣṇa went into Śrīla Prabhupāda's quarters to attend him. Śrīla Prabhupāda, who had just awakened, was very pleased to see Bhagavān, his leader from southern Europe. This was why he had come to the West: to be with his preachers, and to be encouraged by them.

"Tamāla has brought me with great difficulty," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "It was the correct thing. I thought, what is the use of dying? Better to come. So Kṛṣṇa-Balarāma has placed me in the care of Rādhā-Gokulānanda."

Bhagavān presented Śrīla Prabhupāda with some newly printed books: an Italian Bhagavad-gītā As It Is, another volume of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam in French, and other books in Dutch. The total book distribution in Europe, Bhagavān reported, had surpassed that of America.

"Tamāla, did you hear that?" Prabhupāda asked. "This is my life. Come here." Śrīla Prabhupāda began rubbing Bhagavān's head, and tears fell from his eyes. "You have no problems," he said to Bhagavān. In his own work on Śrīla Prabhupāda's behalf, Bhagavān had been encountering a rough period, but when Śrīla Prabhupāda said, "You have no problems," he took it that if he persevered, everything would be all right. As long as he stayed engaged in devotional service he had no problems. For Bhagavān, there was no need for Prabhupāda to say more; Prabhu pāda's order was already his heart and soul. But now that order and Śrīla Prabhupāda's love entered deeper into his heart. Śrīla Prabhupāda's mood was one of pure thankfulness, without his usual critical instructions. He simply wanted to be with his devotees and encourage them.

"Produce books," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "These books are all the mercy of my Guru Mahārāja. No author throughout the world has written so many books—Shakespeare, Milton, Dickens. Neither their books have been so widely read or with such appreciation."

When Prabhupāda came down to the temple in the morning, all the devotees were able to be with him. "Devotees here are all Vaikuṇṭha men," said Śrīla Prabhupāda, "—good-looking and nice-dressing. Gokulānanda is so beautiful. I shall be glad to die in that condition—amongst the devotees and seeing Gokulānanda."

The devotees had come to see that Śrīla Prabhupāda actually looked very wonderful in his dark sunglasses and freshly pressed silk dhotī and kurtā, with clean, clear Vaiṣṇava tilaka on his forehead. He would come gliding down the stairs on the palanquin carefully carried by two able-bodied disciples, and he would sit on the vyāsāsana and watch them perform kīrtana of the holy name. Since he rarely spoke, the kīrtana and his appreciation of it was the main exchange between him and his disciples.

Externally, Śrīla Prabhupāda gave very little indication of even appreciating the kīrtana. Those who were standing or dancing near to him, however, could see behind his glasses the tears sprinkling from the corners of his eyes and onto his cheeks. And all the devotees chanted and danced, rejoicing in the knowledge that Śrīla Prabhupāda simply wanted to be with them. They knew that although he was a pure devotee and self-satisfied, he could actually be inspired by his disciples' affection. By their intense enthusiasm to serve and praise Kṛṣṇa under his order, he could become enlivened to stay in the world longer and preach.

The devotees in the Manor agreed that Rādhā-Gokulānanda seemed to be looking especially at Śrīla Prabhupāda, and he was looking especially at Them. Some felt that by witnessing Śrīla Prabhupāda and Rādhā-Gokulānanda, they were looking directly upon the spiritual world, seeing Kṛṣṇa and His pure devotee. Therefore, there was no need for talks or demonstrations further than what Śrīla Prabhupāda was giving everyone by coming to be with them in the temple room.

Each morning the kīrtanas would build enthusiastically. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa asked that devotees not sing the guru-pūjā song because it created too much emotion for Śrīla Prabhupāda, so they chanted the Pañca-tattva mantra and then Hare Kṛṣṇa. After half an hour, the singing and chanting would be fervid, and Śrīla Prabhupāda would sometimes tap his thumbs together. Just this slightest movement of his body increased the intensity of the kīrtana. Then with the raising of one finger, Śrīla Prabhupāda set the whole roomful of hundreds of devotees into jumping ecstasy. The devotees felt that by chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa and dancing they were somehow singing and praying for Śrīla Prabhupāda's good health and continued life. Śrīla Prabhupāda would sit, unmoving. But the devotees knew his desires, and many of them continued jumping several feet into the air, almost touching the chandeliers. After a wild transcendental hour of kīrtana Śrīla Prabhupāda would go upstairs again, carried over the heads of the devotees on the palanquin.

When the devotees in London heard that Śrīla Prabhupāda was getting many invitations to go to America, they began to worry. They were thinking this would be the last time they would see him, and they wanted to keep him with them forever. If they could distribute an incredible number of books, then maybe he would live longer and stay longer at Bhaktivedanta Manor. They were already feeling privileged that Śrīla Prabhupāda had chosen their temple out of all others, and as they spoke among themselves, they concluded that Rādhā-London-īśvara and Rādhā-Gokulānanda must be Prabhupāda's favorite Deities. They realized that aside from chanting and serving, there was nothing they could do to help Śrīla Prabhupāda and keep him with them, and this inability made them helpless. Despite their efforts, everything was up to Kṛṣṇa.

Śrīla Prabhupāda confided to his secretary that he was disturbed by thoughts of India, and that he had no wish to go back. "In India," he said, "whatever project I made the government has simply given me obstacles. I had to tax my brain so much." India, he said, had lost its culture. "Now they think everyone is God, and they do not understand bhakti, the teachings of the Bhagavad-gītā. From the members of Parliament to the members of the street, everywhere there is suspicion that I have brought the CIA. Such a mistake they have made!"

Since Śrīla Prabhupāda had come to London, his emotions were much more noticeable than before. Where he would have checked his emotions before, he now did not or could not. He frequently cried in ecstasy. Because he was saturated with love for Kṛṣṇa, at any moment his tears might come—while hearing a kīrtana, seeing the Deities, hearing of a devotee's service. The tears would pour down his cheeks, making his visage more beautiful. At other times, he would utter a long, deep "Hmmm," not out of physical pain, since he said he was quite all right, but out of his Kṛṣṇa conscious emotions, the ecstasy of his love of God.

After a few days, Śrīla Prabhupāda got a good report on the progress of his U.S. residency. Balavanta had gone to Washington, D.C., and now phoned to say Śrīla Prabhupāda would have no difficulty in getting his expired residency renewed. All the officials Balavanta had contacted were friendly and invited Śrīla Prabhupāda to return. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa conveyed this while Śrīla Prabhupāda sat on a mat, his frail body being massaged by Upendra. Instantly tears welled up in Śrīla Prabhupāda's eyes, and with a choked voice he said, "America has been so good to me to give me money, men, everything. I have no designation that "this is my country," but because they have given me so much facility, I cannot forget my obligation to them. I want to make them happy, and through them, the whole world."

Śrīla Prabhupāda looked forward to traveling to America shortly after Janmāṣṭamī, which would fall on September 6, two weeks from the date of his arrival in England. "I want to live a little longer," he said, "to make everything more perfect."

"Will you do this by enthusing the devotees by staying with them," asked Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, "or is there a specific program?"

"A specific program," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "I want to introduce varṇāśrama. At our Pennsylvania farm, the biggest problem of life is solved: food."

Letters from Ghanaśyāma in Eastern Europe had brought Śrīla Prabhupāda repeated pleasure. When Ghanaśyāma came to England, therefore, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa brought him before Śrīla Prabhupāda. Calling him near, Prabhupāda stroked his head. "This is the paramparā system," he said. "My Guru Mahārāja pushed me, I am pushing you, and you are pushing others. It is like a train." The following day, at Tamāla Kṛṣṇa's request, Ghanaśyāma came in and read his latest report—which was lengthy—to Śrīla Prabhupāda. He explained some of the difficulties in his preaching and how he was getting around them. But Prabhupāda's mood had changed, and he reminded his disciple that the credit was all due to Kṛṣṇa.

Then Harikeśa Swami, the G.B.C. secretary for northern and East Europe, arrived, he entered Prabhupāda's room and offered prostrated obeisances. Śrīla Prabhupāda, his eyes overflowing with tears, reached out and rubbed his disciple's head, and Harikeśa also began to cry.

Harikeśa explained that he was setting up his own press for producing Śrīla Prabhupāda's books in European languages. "Very good," said Prabhupāda. "As a father likes to see his estate nicely managed, so I am like that. Get places and print books."

Harikeśa Mahārāja had brought with him most of the book distributors from Germany, and he arranged that they meet privately with Śrīla Prabhupāda. The men, most of whom had never been with Prabhupāda, gathered in his room and sat in overwhelming appreciation of the moment. Śrīla Prabhupāda quoted, yāre dekha tāre kaha "kṛṣṇa-upadeśa," and then asked, "So what is this kṛṣṇa-upadeśa?" At first no one replied, but then one of the boys spoke and said, "One should preach everywhere."

"No," said Śrīla Prabhupāda, "what is kṛṣṇa-upadeśa?" Then again there was a silence. This time another boy recited, "Sarva-dharmān parityajya mām ekaṁ śaraṇaṁ vraja." [Bg. 18.66] Śrīla Prabhupāda accepted that and spoke for a few minutes about surrender to Kṛṣṇa. Thinking it an opportune moment, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa brought out a package of color photographs just arrived from Los Angeles. It was a complete story-in-pictures of the recent Los Angeles Ratha-yātrā. The pictures were brightly colorful eight-by-ten-inch enlargements, and as Śrīla Prabhupāda saw one after another and heard the descriptions from his secretary, he began to make long, low humming sounds, and tears came to his eyes.

Earlier that morning, as soon as he had awakened, Śrīla Prabhupāda had begun spontaneously speaking about the Ratha-yātrā he had performed as a child in Calcutta, and now he was seeing the pictures of a grand procession and festival conducted by his disciples. Seeing the photo of the chariots with a large crowd following, Śrīla Prabhupāda raised his eyebrows and said, "We have never seen such carts!" Another photo showed long lines of people waiting to see the "Changing Bodies" exhibit, a diorama depicting the transmigration of the soul. "I told you this would happen!" Prabhupāda exclaimed. "I am very much glad to see this." Śrīla Prabhupāda remained so affected by seeing the Ratha-yātrā pictures that he wouldn't take his usual massage. "Not now," he said in a choked voice, and he sat meditatively, silent for two hours.

On Janmāṣṭamī day Śrīla Prabhupāda rode in a rented Rolls Royce to the temple at Bury Place in downtown London to see Their Lordships Śrī Śrī Rādhā-London-īśvara. Entering the building in a palanquin, Prabhupāda came before Rādhā-London-īśvara and slowly removed his sunglasses, his eyes flooding with tears, while around him devotees chanted his name and the names of Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa. On the way back to the Manor, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa recited to Śrīla Prabhupāda the many pastimes of Prabhupāda's preaching days in London.

The next day was Vyāsa-pūjā, Śrīla Prabhupāda's eighty-second birthday. Again, upon waking he recalled his childhood and how an uncle had called him Nandulal, because he was born on the day Nanda Mahārāja gave presents to the brāhmaṇas, the day after Kṛṣṇa's birthday. Śrīla Prabhupāda went down to the temple, and after a fully exultant kīrtana by hundreds of devotees, he accepted, without tasting, a three-tier, five-foot-long birthday cake. He noticed that the devotees had only used eighty-one candles, due to counting age by the Western method, so another candle was added. At Śrīla Prabhupāda's request, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa stood and spoke.

The next day Śrīla Prabhupāda's health suddenly became much worse, and he couldn't come down to the temple. This was the first crisis since his coming to England, and suddenly his plans changed. Instead of going on to the United States as he had planned, he now requested that he be taken back to India. He spoke of Bombay. "If I live a few days more," he said, "let me see the opening of the Bombay temple. We can wait here and then fly to Bombay. I have worked so hard for it. If I see the opening and then die, it will be a very peaceful death. Even if I live, I can come back here."

The health crisis seemed to pass, but Śrīla Prabhupāda now felt he would be unable to go to New York. He asked to hear the various astrological calculations. "Let us have a laugh," he said. The readings predicted that these would be the most difficult days.

For many of the devotees, Śrīla Prabhupāda's not going to America upset their hopes of his getting better and living a long time. But Prabhupāda felt he had traveled as far as he could, and now he should return to Bombay and Vṛndāvana. For a few days more he stayed, waiting for a clearer indication from Kṛṣṇa. And he resumed going to the temple in the morning.

Brahmānanda Swami had come from Africa, and Śrīla Prabhupāda watched with pleasure as heavy-set Brahmānanda, the first disciple to dance for him eleven years ago in New York, rose to dance again before his spiritual master. As Brahmānanda jumped up and down, dancing ecstatically, Śrīla Prabhupāda smiled and clapped his hands.

Afterwards, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa asked Śrīla Prabhupāda what he had prayed that morning as he had sat looking intently at the Deities. Prabhupāda replied, "I was praying to Rādhā-Gokulānanda to please engage me in the service of Śrī Śrī Rādhā-Rāsavihārī."

Śrīla Prabhupāda wanted to return to India, and his desire was his servants' order. "If I survive this time," he said, "we shall do Vṛndāvana parikrama. You can carry me on a palanquin."

At the airport there were delays. During the wait, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa put earphones on Śrīla Prabhupāda so he could listen to a tape-recorded kīrtana. Prabhupāda slowly rocked his head, listening, until finally he was allowed to board the aircraft, riding in a wheelchair.

September 14

With no disruptive incidents, Śrīla Prabhupāda arrived with his party in Bombay, where he was promptly escorted from the plane into a waiting car and driven to Hare Krishna Land at Juhu. This time the elevator worked, and Śrīla Prabhupāda reached his quarters on the fifth floor and went at once to bed.

He called for Girirāja, who came and sat on the floor beside the bed. Prabhupāda told him how in Vṛndāvana, Mr. Somaiya, a very important man of Bombay known to both of them, had come to see him in bed and had started to cry out of sympathy. Prabhupāda then told Girirāja of his pleasant stay in London, especially mentioning the kīrtanas, which he said were wonderful. When Girirāja asked if the chiseling and hammering and other noises of temple construction in Bombay were going to disturb him, he replied that it was like music. He then lay back and rested.

When Prabhupāda awoke at the end of the day, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa asked him if the noises were bothering him. "These sounds do not disturb me at all," he replied, "because I am thinking that work is being completed. You can note the distinction, how in London I was feeling restless, but here not. It is because I like Bombay. Of all the cities in India, I like it the most."

Śrīla Prabhupāda wanted to get reports from some of his sannyāsī disciples in Bombay. He heard good news from Gargamuni Swami of his party's selling complete sets of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam and Caitanya-caritāmṛta and also other books to libraries and universities throughout India. Now they were preparing to go into Muslim countries to sell books. "Whoever preaches in the Muslim countries," said Śrīla Prabhupāda, "I take the dust of his feet on my head." Lokanātha Swami told Śrīla Prabhupāda of his success in traveling to Indian villages in a bullock cart. Śrīla Prabhupāda loved it.

Within a day or two of his return to India, Prabhupāda had abandoned the simple regimen he had agreed upon with a doctor in England. The doctor had said Prabhupāda was a difficult patient. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa mentioned that when he had told the doctor that Śrīla Prabhupāda was trying to cooperate, the doctor had said Śrīla Prabhupāda's only compromise was to wait until Friday instead of Thursday before traveling. Śrīla Prabhupāda gave a little laugh and said, "And then I went even earlier—Tuesday. Supercompromise. I could understand when he wanted blood that he would begin his allopathic treatments."

For weeks Śrīla Prabhupāda had been taking a commercially prepared food supplement, Complān, but now he refused it. "What is the use of artificial food," he said, "when there is natural? You Westerners like the taste of canned, frozen, preserved, rotten food. You eat and then keep the leftovers for seven months, and this you like. And you like drinking cold milk. This Complān is not fresh. I shall try to live on milk and fruit juice. Nothing artificial."

Śrīla Prabhupāda's plan was to stay in Bombay and wait for the grand opening of the temple, now scheduled for Rāma-vijaya Daśamī, in five weeks. But he didn't expect to get much stronger. Although he had spoken in favor of fresh food, he was actually taking nothing more than a little fruit juice and a little mung-jala (water in which mung beans have been soaked).

Śrīla Prabhupāda began chanting constantly on his japa beads, which he insisted on keeping around his neck at all times. During his massage he would finger the beads and silently chant, and even while resting they remained around his neck.

When Tamāla Kṛṣṇa asked Śrīla Prabhupāda how he felt, he simply replied, "Crisis." After a few days he named a certain Bombay doctor and suggested that he be brought in. But Tamāla Kṛṣṇa gave arguments as to why calling in yet another doctor would not be good at this time. Śrīla Prabhupāda listened and agreed.

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa said he felt confident that Śrīla Prabhupāda would live to see the temple opening in Bombay and later go on to Vṛndāvana. Śrīla Prabhupāda seemed very relieved by these words and rubbed Tamāla Kṛṣṇa's head affectionately, saying, "May your words be blessed. Bless me that I may fix up my mind."

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa was pleased to see Prabhupāda take some encouragement, although he felt himself to be in no position to bless his exalted spiritual master. But this kind of exchange had been occurring for weeks now, where Tamāla Kṛṣṇa and others sometimes took the role of Śrīla Prabhupāda's advisors. Such dealings made the disciples feel uncomfortable, yet because Śrīla Prabhupāda was instigating the relationship, they accepted it as very intimate service. He had openly said, "Encourage me," and had allowed himself to become dependent in many ways on the care and intelligence of his disciples. Sometimes he was like a small child turning to his disciples to pick him up and carry him. But his disciples remained aware—and if they didn't, he reminded them—that he was deliberately arranging and allowing this so that they could render him intimate service, for only by serving Kṛṣṇa's pure devotee can one attain love of Kṛṣṇa. This intimate service was completely spiritual, and for doctors who came and went, with their medicines and prescriptions, it was incomprehensible.

Śrīla Prabhupāda was teaching his disciples right up until his last days—instructing them in how they should prepare for their own inevitable death. And he was also instructing them in the advanced stage of devotional service, testing them to see whether they were willing to serve, not just as official devotees but out of spontaneous love, love which goes sometimes beyond the rules and regulations. This love was tested, for example, by the disciples' willingness to stay up all hours of the night and constantly attend Śrīla Prabhupāda, assisting him in even his most basic bodily functions. And it was tested as Prabhupāda engaged his disciples in the ordeal of deciding whether he should fight to live or pass away peacefully. It was on the basis of such intimacy, for example, that Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, unsure what was best, argued against Śrīla Prabhupāda's request for a certain doctor. He was completely involved in Śrīla Prabhupāda's well-being, and he was always thinking about it and ready to do whatever was required.

Ultimately, Prabhupāda never changed from being the authority and master of all his disciples, and they knew it. They could offer countersuggestions, as he inspired them to reach across the barriers of ordinary protocol and serve him with love to their heart's content. He even allured them to reprimand him. But when he liked, he would have the final word, emerging again as the absolute authority for his disciples. It was only to serve his will that his disciples lived and acted. Śrīla Prabhupāda said that his disciples' determination and complete surrender and their desire and prayers for him to remain with them, for him to fight and stay—this was all that was still keeping him in the world.

Certainly Prabhupāda was not being kept in the world by Complan or by the ordinary therapeutic effects of massage. In fact, he was so thin that the massages were no longer actual massages, but were more soothing caresses, which could be given only by faithful, surrendered servants. When one day Tamāla Kṛṣṇa asked Prabhupāda if he felt he could stay for five weeks until the temple opening, he replied, "If you encourage me."

Whatever his condition, Śrīla Prabhupāda always maintained his essence: aggressive in preaching Kṛṣṇa consciousness, thoughtful of others, humorous, and completely devoted to Kṛṣṇa. When Abhirāma joined them from England and exclaimed that Śrīla Prabhupāda's Bombay quarters were fit for Indra, the king of heaven, Śrīla Prabhupāda broke into a big, sustained smile. When Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, after being absent for a few hours, returned before Prabhupāda and explained, "I was just resting because I was tired from the trip," Śrīla Prabhupāda replied by teasing him, "You already rested on the plane. You just like to sleep, especially in the car."

When Tamāla Kṛṣṇa asked Prabhupāda if he would see any important guests, Prabhupāda replied that he would only see Mr. Bhogilal Patel and Mr. Mahadevia if they came. A few minutes later, as if summoned, Mr. Mahadevia showed up and was brought before Prabhupāda. Although usually very talkative, Mr. Mahadevia seemed too shocked by Śrīla Prabhupāda's appearance to speak as freely as usual. At Prabhupāda's request, however, he described the present political climate in India.

Prabhupāda asked to be raised up, and he showed an unusual amount of interest in the report. "They're missing the point," he said. "The whole world is. This is the disease of the body. One party is no better than the other. It is stool, one side or the other. What they can do?"

Although Prabhupāda was not able to go down to the temple for seeing Rādhā-Rāsavihārī, he daily asked to see Their picture, which he would look upon lovingly. He could also hear the āratī-kīrtanas coming from the temporary temple. Then one day he asked that the framed picture of Rādhā-Rāsavihārī be fixed to his bedpost so that he could see Them always.

On awakening one morning Prabhupāda immediately began talking: "Every living entity is suffering. From Brahma down to the ant, there is no happiness." And then he closed his eyes. Later he awoke and said, "Daivī hy eṣā guṇa-mayī/ mama māyā duratyayā." [Bg. 7.14] Tamāla Kṛṣṇa asked Prabhupāda if he was thinking of these things while resting. "Yes," Prabhupāda replied. "I was dreaming."

Brahmānanda Swami arrived from England, and Prabhupāda spoke with him of how the senior disciples would have to maintain what he had given them. "You cannot expect me to have a young body like you," he said. "You cannot expect me to live forever. It will have to depend upon Kṛṣṇa." Brahmānanda listened with mixed pleasure and pain. He said that Prabhupāda's quarters were beautiful and that not only these quarters but everything in the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement was simply made for Śrīla Prabhupāda's pleasure. "I cannot take these with me," Prabhupāda replied. "I am leaving them for you to use."

Jayapatāka Swami arrived from Māyāpur, asking Śrīla Prabhupāda to sign a legal statement concerning the recent attack on the ISKCON center in Māyāpur. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa said that Prabhupāda had already written his will, stating that everything in his name belonged to ISKCON; he didn't want anything further to do with management. Śrīla Prabhupāda confirmed this, saying, "Now there is no other way but to make me completely aloof from all management."

Prabhupāda wanted to stay absorbed in hearing the holy name and the Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam. He liked to sit up in bed, wearing his reading spectacles and looking at the photo of Rādhā-Rāsavihārī, while a devotee read aloud from Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam. For hours at a time he would meditate in this way, hearing and seeing Kṛṣṇa. This was the medicine he desired. Those who observed him in this way could understand that he was completely transcendental to thoughts of his body and that he was relishing the reading with great relief. When Tamāla Kṛṣṇa suggested that these readings go on each day, Śrīla Prabhupāda said, "This is the most important thing. Read as much as possible."

One evening, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa and Brahmānanda recounted to Prabhupāda the history of his purchasing the Bombay land. Prabhupāda lay, listening carefully to each word of the narration of his tolerance and triumph over many obstacles.

At one point, Prabhupāda interjected, "That dog." The devotees paused, not knowing what he meant. Was he referring to the landlord or one of the politicians? But then he made it clear. He said that when he had stayed at the house of Mr. Sethi, he would have to ride each morning in Mr. Sethi's car to the beach, and he would have to sit next to Mr. Sethi's big German shepherd. Śrīla Prabhupāda continued to talk, and as he did, both Tamāla Kṛṣṇa and Brahmānanda realized that he was still conducting a battle. He was fighting for the strength to go on preaching for Rādhā-Rāsavihārī, if They desired. At the end of the recitation, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa offered his obeisances and said, "All glories to Kṛṣṇa's great soldier!"

Śrīla Prabhupāda had been planning to stay for the Bombay temple opening and then to go on parikrama around Vṛndāvana, but now he thought of going early to Vṛndāvana. He asked that the G.B.C. men and certain others present in Bombay gather before him and decide. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, Brahmānanda, Surabhi, Gopāla Kṛṣṇa, Hari-śauri, Girirāja, Upendra, Abhirāma, and Kulādri all entered and sat surrounding Śrīla Prabhupāda.

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa began by making various comments in favor of going to Vṛndāvana. He directed his comments to Prabhupāda and pointed out that even if Prabhupāda were to remain in Bombay in his present condition, he would not be able to attend any of the functions. Also, Prabhupāda was known for his powerful speaking and preaching, and it would not be fitting for the public to see him in his present condition. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa also pointed out that Prabhupāda could come back to visit after the temple opening. Prabhupāda heard these remarks without commenting.

Brahmānanda Swami said that Śrīla Prabhupāda should definitely go to Vṛndāvana. Hari-śauri spoke next, saying that he felt it was difficult to decide but that it depended upon how strongly Prabhupāda desired to stay in Bombay as opposed to doing the best thing for his health. "It is for health," Prabhupāda replied, and Hari-śauri immediately said he was in favor of Prabhupāda's returning to Vṛndāvana.

Gopāla Kṛṣṇa, however, thought that it would be better if Prabhupāda remained in Bombay until after the opening. How could he leave Bombay after so many arrangements had been made and so many important guests had been invited? Surabhi also voted for Prabhupāda's staying in Bombay, because he wanted Prabhupāda to see the temple being opened. He said that if Prabhupāda went to Vṛndāvana, he might not come back.

Then Girirāja spoke. Each day in Bombay was very difficult for Prabhupāda, he said, and each successive day would be even more difficult. And the noise from the construction was constant. Therefore, Girirāja concluded, waiting three weeks would be too risky. As Girirāja spoke, Śrīla Prabhupāda moved his head in affirmation. But for the most part Prabhupāda was noncommittal, asking a question now and then, but mostly listening. For the devotees, the mood was very tense and momentous. Abhirāma spoke next, in favor of going to Vṛndāvana. Upendra said he didn't know.

If Prabhupāda's purpose in asking for opinions had been to get a majority vote, the decision had gone in favor of leaving Bombay. Even as they discussed, the hammering and chiseling noises were constant and almost drowned the sound of Prabhupāda's voice.

Prabhupāda wanted to also discuss the best course of treatment. His friend Dr. Ghosh had written recently, and Prabhupāda asked Tamāla Kṛṣṇa to read the letter. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa then read aloud Dr. Ghosh's advice that Prabhupāda should go to a good hospital for a thorough check-up and treatment. Almost with the attitude of an impartial judge asking for discussion, Prabhupāda said, "So what is wrong with this proposal?"

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa mentioned that the doctors would probably want to give intravenous feeding. Prabhupāda replied, "What is the use of artificial feeding when there is no digestion?" Making a point in favor of the hospital, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa then remarked that although Āyur Vedic medicine was perfect, the practitioners have lost the science in the present day and are mostly quacks, whereas allopathic medicine, although imperfect, has many expert practitioners. Prabhupāda conceded.

"Well, Prabhupāda," said Upendra, "the doctor should come, but only here in your house. You should never go to the hospital." Abhirāma was even stronger about Prabhupāda's not going to the hospital. They already knew that Prabhupāda was not in favor of going to the hospital, and that in fact he had already made up his mind to go to Vṛndāvana. They took it that in his kindness and mercifulness he wanted to consult them and give them the opportunity to decide. At least apparently he was submitting himself to their decisions. But some of them got an eerie, uneasy feeling in thinking his well-being could be the subject of their argumentation.

Finally Prabhupāda concluded, "The hospital is not a guarantee, but we take it as up-to-date scientific knowledge. My Godbrother Tīrtha Mahārāja had to undergo all these treatments, and they were very proud that he died with the best scientific treatment. My Guru Mahārāja, however, did not like it when he was given injection. He objected, saying, "Why are you giving?" Going to a hospital means giving in to the mercy of the material scientists. Whatever they like, they will do. They cannot guarantee, and we cannot be confident. And going to Vṛndāvana—whatever may happen, let Kṛṣṇa do it. Hospital is a chance technique. Going to Vṛndāvana, I have no objections. But now there is a dilemma—I am neither dying nor living."

When Tamāla Kṛṣṇa asked whether the Vṛndāvana kavirāja was any better than the present one in Bombay, Prabhupāda replied, "Better or worse, some husband must be there."

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa then offered a new argument. As long as Prabhupāda was in Bombay waiting for the opening, he said, then he would have a reason for living. But if he returned to Vṛndāvana, it would mean he was going there to die. So on that basis, Prabhupāda should remain in Bombay, since it would help give him motivation to live. Śrīla Prabhupāda smiled and said, "That is sentiment."

Now that Prabhupāda sounded so convinced, there was no alternative. There was no question of the devotees controlling him; only Kṛṣṇa could. Some of the alternatives had been frightening, and certainly the idea of voting about Prabhupāda had been. Now some of the devotees laughed nervously, relieved to hear Prabhupāda's final decision.

"Vṛndāvana," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "Let's go."

"Yes, Prabhupāda," said Surabhi.

"But Śrīla Prabhupāda," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, "what will happen to all the devotees here? They have been serving you so sincerely. How will they be able to open the temple without you being here? I mean, all the devotees, when they hear you are going to Vṛndāvana, they will all want to come. They won't want to stay here. Then they will all want to leave their posts and come with you to Vṛndāvana."

"Yes, then let them come," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "I have no objection." Tamāla Kṛṣṇa mentioned that if a thousand devotees might come to be with Prabhupāda, that would slow down the ISKCON work all over the world. Prabhupāda again said he had no objection. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa asked whether it was compulsory for the G.B.C. members to come, and Prabhupāda affirmed that it was.

There were no more questions, and the devotees excused themselves to go and make immediate preparations for Prabhupāda's moving to Vṛndāvana. Only Kulādri remained in the room with Prabhupāda.

"So, Kulādri," asked Prabhupāda, "what do you think?" Kulādri had been disturbed by the fact that some of the devotees had seemed to be opposing Prabhupāda's desire and even arguing against him.

"Śrīla Prabhupāda," he said, "I don't really understand. How can they give you advice like that? I feel like an intruder. I shouldn't even be here. But it seems to me that you are waiting for Kṛṣṇa to make some decision on whether you stay or go."

"What?" Prabhupāda asked.

"It seems you are waiting for Kṛṣṇa's decision," said Kulādri. "If you are going to wait for Kṛṣṇa's decision, that might as well be in Vṛndāvana." Prabhupāda smiled and closed his eyes. "Yes," he said, "that is very good advice."

SPL 54: At Home in Vrindavana

CHAPTER FIFTY-FOUR

At Home in Vṛndāvana

Prabhupāda traveled by train from Bombay to Mathurā. Brahmānanda carried him in his arms from the train to a waiting car, and within fifteen to twenty-five minutes Prabhupāda was back in Vṛndāvana.

The devotees at the Krishna-Balaram Mandir were upset to see that Prabhupāda's condition had deteriorated so much in the one month he had been away. His room was as he had left it, except for the addition of a large double bed. He lay down, and they closed the curtains and dimmed the lights. For about five minutes he lay still, with his eyes closed.

"Now you are home, Śrīla Prabhupāda," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa.

Still Śrīla Prabhupāda lay quietly, not moving. Then slowly he brought his hands to his chest, clasped them together, and said, "Thank you." He seemed relieved.

"Now you are in the care of Kṛṣṇa-Balarāma," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa.

Śrīla Prabhupāda smiled and nodded slightly. "Yes," he said. "Kṛṣṇa tvadiya-pada-pankaja-panjarāntam," indicating King Kulaśekhara's prayer to Lord Kṛṣṇa: "My dear Kṛṣṇa, please help me die immediately so that the swan of my mind may be encircled by the stem of Your lotus feet. Otherwise, at the time of my final breath, how will it be possible for me to think of You?"

Although Śrīla Prabhupāda was in a precarious state, he remained completely fixed in thought of Kṛṣṇa in one way or another—Kṛṣṇa's name, His form, His pastimes, or His devotional service.

Prabhupāda suggested going to see Kṛṣṇa and Balarāma at nine-thirty, just as he had done before, but his servants advised that he rest today and begin that program tomorrow. "Whatever you desire, I will do," Prabhupāda said.

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa asked Prabhupāda if he wanted the kavirāja to come.

"As you said, Prabhupāda, for better or worse, some husband must be there."

Śrīla Prabhupāda nodded. "Now manage everything," he said, "and let me think of Kṛṣṇa-Balarāma."

A little before four in the afternoon, while devotees were reading aloud from Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, Prabhupāda asked if the temple bell had rung the hour. Ever since the temple opening in 1975, he had insisted that the bell at the front gate be rung every hour to signify the hour and once every half hour. At first, the temple president had been unable to get a watchman who would remain awake through the night and ring the bell regularly. But Śrīla Prabhupāda had insisted so strongly that the temple management had finally established the bell-ringing. For Śrīla Prabhupāda, it was more than just a good standard; it was a symbol of the entire temple management's effectiveness. If they couldn't even arrange that the bell be rung regularly, then how could they manage everything else? Now Śrīla Prabhupāda was saying he thought he heard the bell ring at the wrong time. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa explained it might have been a different bell, and the devotees continued reading Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam. But Śrīla Prabhupāda again asked about the bell in the temple dome. As Hari-śauri rose to go out and check, the bell began loudly ringing— one... two... three... four—properly sounding the hour.

"That is my concern," said Prabhupāda, "that such a huge establishment is properly managed. If not properly managed, then everything will be finished."

"I don't think that that's going to happen," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa. "We are too much indebted to you to allow what you have established to become spoiled."

"Please see to that," said Prabhupāda.

Nevertheless, Śrīla Prabhupāda called for Akṣayānanda Swami and, as soon as he came into the room, inquired from him, "Will the bell ring or not?" Akṣayānanda promised to diligently see to it, taking the instruction very seriously, as perhaps his last order from his spiritual master.

The pūjārī entered and gave Prabhupāda a large, fragrant tulasī garland from Kṛṣṇa-Balarāma, and Prabhupāda returned to listening to the reading.

Later in the day, he confided to Tamāla Kṛṣṇa about the past few weeks. "I must thank you," he said, "that you took me to London and again brought me here without any difficulty. That is a great credit for you. For that I am thanking you. In this condition, a bundle of bones—still you did it. Kṛṣṇa will bless you."

Hari-śauri had obtained another detailed astrological chart on Śrīla Prabhupāda from Delhi. This astrologer recommended a mantra to Lord Śiva to be chanted by ten brāhmaṇas for twenty-one days.

"We have the mahā-mantra," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "There is no need of others." He spoke disapprovingly of the suggestion.

"Are these astrological charts very much applicable for devotees, Śrīla Prabhupāda?" asked Hari-śauri.

"No," said Prabhupāda. "Don't waste money for this astrology."

Śrīla Prabhupāda's faith was only in kīrtana. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa suggested they again have continuous kīrtana, and Prabhupāda said, "That is real business. These astrologers are karmīs. We have nothing to do with the karmīs."

* * *

In response to Śrīla Prabhupāda's call, the twenty-three G.B.C. members again began gathering in Vṛndāvana. They arrived heavy-hearted, yet on coming before Śrīla Prabhupāda they were pleased to give him progress reports on their preaching on his behalf. Śrīla Prabhupāda was happy to hear the reports and was as encouraging as ever to his leaders, despite his condition.

Hamsadūta Swami was one of the first to arrive, from Sri Lanka. Śrīla Prabhupāda instructed him to develop farm projects there, as Kīrtanānanda Swami had done in New Vrindaban. "Sometimes when preaching," said Hamsadūta, "I tell them, 'What kind of country is this? The land is of the rājarṣis, and some lady is running the government!'"

"Do not touch politics," Prabhupāda warned. "We are cultural and philosophy."

Prabhupāda began dealing with Girirāja over bank matters. The local Vṛndāvana bank was reluctant to allow a withdrawal from an ISKCON fund, and Śrīla Prabhupāda had to be called in for advice. He gave keen, practical strategy for solving the problem, but he asked to be spared these things in the future. Devotees in the room were amazed to see Prabhupāda still dealing expertly with such affairs. When Girirāja apologized to Prabhupāda for involving him, Prabhupāda replied, "Therefore I said, do the needful."

Actually, Prabhupāda's calling the G.B.C. men together had been so they could chant for him. Now, more than ever, he wanted the medicine of the holy name, not of the doctors. When he heard that his friend Dr. Ghosh was coming to Vṛndāvana to open a clinic and that he could prescribe treatment, he refused the offer. "These doctors will come and give something to try and save," he said. "I don't want to be saved. Dr. Ghosh may come for the clinic he wants to develop, but not for my treatment." Tamāla Kṛṣṇa asked if they could at least call in some local Vṛndāvana doctors.

"No," said Prabhupāda. "Let us take your advice for kīrtana only." Tamāla Kṛṣṇa agreed that kīrtana was best, because in that way they were pleading for Kṛṣṇa's help.

"Better you don't pray to Kṛṣṇa to save me," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "Let me die now." Prabhupāda then asked to sit up. "If Hamsadūta is not tired," he said, "he can continue singing."

When Harikeśa had received the call to come immediately to Vṛndāvana, he had been told to "expect the worst." Immediately he contacted his printer, who was in the process of completing several books, and told him that he must have advance copies by the next day. So by the time he got on the plane for India, he had newly printed volumes of the Second Canto of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam in German, the Kṛṣṇa trilogy in German, and a Yugoslavian Śrī Īsopaniṣad. But when he arrived at Śrīla Prabhupāda's door in Vṛndāvana, a devotee told him he could not bring the books to Śrīla Prabhupāda now. "Why not?" Harikeśa asked.

"This is not the kind of mood we are trying to create here," the devotee explained.

"What? Are you crazy?" exclaimed Harikeśa. "Books are Prabhupāda's life and soul!" He went in and showed Prabhupāda the seven new books. Immediately Prabhupāda took the first volume of the Kṛṣṇa trilogy and held it up, looking at the cover painting of Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa. Prabhupāda began crying and reached out, trying to stroke Harikeśa's head. Harikeśa reached out and held Śrīla Prabhupāda's hand, thinking himself unworthy of being patted.

"He was rotting here, typewriting," said Śrīla Prabhupāda, referring to when Harikeśa had been his secretary, just before going to preach in Europe. "I said, 'You go.' I had ten servants. You thought that I was degrading you by sending you away. No. Now you understand?"

"Yes, I understand," said Harikeśa, sobbing.

"Here is an intelligent boy, I thought," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "Why should he rot here, typewriting?" Prabhupāda looked at each book. "Printing and everything is first class," he said. He asked how many had been printed, and Harikeśa replied, "One hundred twenty thousand Kṛṣṇa trilogies, sixty thousand Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam Second Cantos, and ten thousand Īsopaniṣads."

"Can you distribute that Īsopaniṣad?" Prabhupāda asked. Harikeśa assured him that they could definitely distribute the book in Yugoslavia.

"Then print more," said Prabhupāda. They continued discussing book production. Books were indeed Śrīla Prabhupāda's life and soul. From Harikeśa's entering with the new books, Prabhupāda had felt a profound ecstasy that had spread to Harikeśa and all the devotees present. Everyone was keenly aware that what they were experiencing was transcendental, a special reciprocation with Śrīla Prabhupāda, and as long as they were sincere it would not die.

"Now you just have to become better," said Harikeśa. "More healthy."

"Healthy?" said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "I have nothing to do with this body."

During one of the long kīrtana vigils, Brahmānanda Swami was present, and Śrīla Prabhupāda called him forward. He wanted to give him last instructions about Africa. Prabhupāda was lying down, and Brahmānanda had to put his ear near Śrīla Prabhupāda's mouth to hear. The other devotees in the room also hushed and came as close as possible.

"With Nava-yogendra," Prabhupāda said in a hoarse whisper, "the both of you. South Africa also. There gradually the people are taking. Try to bring Puṣṭa Kṛṣṇa back. He is very competent. So jointly organize Africa. Have saṅkīrtana. All Europeans, Americans, Africans. Tulasī dāsa is very competent also. United Nations under Caitanya Mahāprabhu's flag. It is possible. Otherwise, that United Nations will be simply false attempt."

"You said that when you first came to New York," replied Brahmānanda, urgently recalling his first days with Śrīla Prabhupāda, "you went to the United Nations. The very first day I came to the kīrtana there in New York. The next day you went for that peace vigil outside the United Nations, and you were chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa and saying that this Kṛṣṇa consciousness is the only method for making United Nations."

"That is a fact," said Prabhupāda. "Try for the protection of Caitanya Mahāprabhu, and things will be successful. Others, they will simply waste time and be disappointed and change the body and suffer." Prabhupāda changed the subject, but Brahmānanda was satisfied. He had been given enough service for many lifetimes.

Kulādri came into the room on behalf of Kīrtanānanda Swami, with gifts for Śrīla Prabhupāda: an $8,000 check, a sapphire ring, a gold medallion studded with sapphires and rubies.

"So, why don't you find out some bride?" Śrīla Prabhupāda remarked, and the devotees' sudden laughter broke the room's solemn mood. Accepting the ring on his finger, Śrīla Prabhupāda said someone should take care of the other valuables.

Kulādri said he had also one request to make on behalf of Kīrtanānanda Swami: "Kīrtanānanda Mahārāja said that you have asked us to pray to Kṛṣṇa before. But he says he doesn't feel qualified to pray to Kṛṣṇa. So he is asking that you please pray to Kṛṣṇa for us, because we cannot pray to Kṛṣṇa directly. We don't know Kṛṣṇa. But if you ask, Kṛṣṇa must be sure to fulfill your desire. So would you please pray to Kṛṣṇa to stay with us? We want you to come to the palace that we're building in New Vrindaban, Śrīla Prabhupāda, if it is possible."

"I wish," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "But unless I become a little strong, how can I go?"

"We've also brought some sweets and ice cream," said Kulādri. He knew that Prabhupāda could not take it, but he asked if he could just at least take a little taste. Prabhupāda agreed, and a small piece of the ice cream was put on his tongue. "First class," he said.

Later Kīrtanānanda arrived, and Prabhupāda asked for a report on New Vrindaban.

"Everything is going very nicely, Prabhupāda," said Kīrtanānanda. "Your palace is almost finished. Already many people are coming every day to see it. It will be finished in a couple of months. The other day a lady went in, and she turned to one of her boys and said, "I cannot tell you what I am feeling. It is so wonderful."

"Yes," said Prabhupāda. "It is wonderful in that quarter." He paused, reflecting. "Hmm... Let us see which palace I am going to."

Śrīla Prabhupāda asked Kīrtanānanda to take back his valuable gifts and use them for New Vrindaban. "You require money," said Prabhupāda, "so you take back and utilize it there. That is my request."

"Thank you very much," said Kīrtanānanda. "Most of all we want you, though."

"Yes, I also," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "And if I survive, I have a strong desire to go where you are and live there. It will be a great pleasure."

Kīrtanānanda had pictures of the palace, and Prabhupāda sat up to see them. "You are fulfilling my dream," he said. "New Vrindaban. I dreamt all these things. Wonderful things he has done. He is the first student—from the very beginning. When I was in the storefront, he was bringing carpets, bench, some gong, some lamps."

In Vṛndāvana, Girirāja had seen Prabhupāda a number of times, mostly on business. He also regularly took his turn in the kīrtana vigils in Prabhupāda's room. But one day, wanting to take full advantage of Vṛndāvana, he went to visit some of the temples. At the end of the day he took rest for the night on the roof of the gurukula building. But in the middle of the night he was awakened by a devotee saying that Prabhupāda wanted to see him. He ran down immediately, aware that Prabhupāda might pass away at any moment. Anything Prabhupāda might say could be his last words. He came into Prabhupāda's room, offered obeisances, and got up very close beside the bed.

"Do you think this movement can go on without me?" Prabhupāda asked. Girirāja was astounded that Prabhupāda had called him in the middle of the night to ask him this.

"I think," said Girirāja, "that as long as we are sincere and go on chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa and follow the principles, the movement will be successful."

Śrīla Prabhupāda was silent. When he spoke, each word seemed to come with great effort. He uttered the word organization. Then he said, "Organization and intelligence. Is there anything else?"

Girirāja felt within his heart that he wanted to cry out, "Śrīla Prabhupāda, stay with us." But instead he said, "No."

"All right," Prabhupāda said. And Girirāja offered obeisances and left. Outside Prabhupāda's room, Girirāja continued to reflect on Prabhupāda's words—"organization and intelligence." Prabhupāda seemed to be demanding much more love and commitment; not that ISKCON could survive on organization and intelligence alone. Girirāja was thinking that perhaps these might be the last words Prabhupāda would ever speak to him.

Paramānanda, the temple president of Prabhupāda's Pennsylvania farm project, Gītā-nagarī, also came to be with Prabhupāda. "So organize this farm project," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "Simple living. Human life is meant for God realization. Try to help them."

"We're always feeling your presence very strongly, Śrīla Prabhupāda," said Paramānanda. "Simply by your teachings and instructions. We are always meditating on your instructions."

"Thank you," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "That is the real presence. Physical presence is not important." Paramānanda had brought a letter from his wife, Satyabhāmā. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa asked if he should read it, and Prabhupāda agreed. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa read on.

Dear Śrīla Prabhupāda,

Please accept my most humble obeisances. All glories to Your Divine Grace.

This shawl is made of the wool from our own sheep. It is spun and woven here at Gītā-nagari. It is the first piece we have made. While I was working on it I would always think of you, how I was supposedly making you a gift. But actually you are giving me the gift of engagement in devotional service. Śrīla Prabhupāda, I always pray to Lord Nṛshimhadeva to protect you and allow you to stay with us to finish your books. But I think today the rain falling from the sky is actually the tears of the demigods, crying at the prospect of your departure. I am also crying. Even Kṛṣṇa cried at the passing of Grandfather Bhisma. So I have a right to cry. I cannot be so philosophical to say that you are always present in your books and teachings, though I know these things are true. I will miss you so much, Śrīla Prabhupāda, if you go. I beg that I may always remain your menial servant and devotee

Your humble disciple,

Satyabhama dasi

"Thank her," said Śrīla Prabhupāda, and he reached for the shawl. "Made with our wool."

"So you'll take rest now, Śrīla Prabhupāda?" suggested Tamāla Kṛṣṇa.

"Umhm," said Prabhupāda. "This can be on the foot." And he gestured that the saffron-colored shawl be put as a blanket on his bed. Tears came from his eyes as he lay back.

Śrīla Prabhupāda was becoming more and more in favor of departing from the world. When Tamāla Kṛṣṇa remarked that Prabhupāda was not drinking much, he replied that he had no inclination.

"I don't know what to say, Śrīla Prabhupāda," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa. "It's certainly bewildering. I can only expect somehow Kṛṣṇa will have to do something." Tamāla Kṛṣṇa requested again that they bring a doctor. "Still some husband must be there, you said," Tamāla Kṛṣṇa reminded. "We should have a doctor's help. I still believe that. After all, we are not doctors."

"No," said Prabhupāda, "but we are already taking help of doctor, Āyur Veda—that is Yogendra-Ras."

"You're just beginning that now, of course," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa. "Tomorrow you might give it up. Then what will be our position?"

"Widow," said Prabhupāda with a laugh. Then he added, "Actually, Kṛṣṇa is the ultimate husband."

The devotees with Prabhupāda found it very difficult to adopt his mood of looking forward to his passing away. Once during a kīrtana, Upendra asked if Prabhupāda wanted something to drink. When Prabhupāda refused, some of the devotees began to cry, thinking that if Prabhupāda didn't eat or even drink, he would not remain with them much longer. The devotees were trying to be submissively resigned to Prabhupāda's will, and they accepted that his direction was more and more toward leaving. They were coming to accept it, surrounding him with kīrtana and not causing him any inconvenience with their problems or demands. Whatever he wanted, they should want. But the idea of his passing away was still almost unbearable.

In their resignation, the devotees became philosophical. Rūpānuga said Prabhupāda could be likened to an ambassador in a foreign country. He may have many affairs in the foreign country, but finally he's called back. Jayādvaita said that Prabhupāda had taught his disciples everything and that now he was teaching them how to die. Another devotee said that Prabhupāda had better friends in the spiritual world. In their talks, the devotees stressed the importance of their cooperating with one another, and they discussed how ISKCON would continue in the future. But it was all depressing.

Nevertheless, they kept returning to the unpleasant but unavoidable realization that Prabhupāda would very soon leave them. With Prabhupāda so clearly indicating that he had decided to definitely leave, the devotees were becoming despondent. At best, a solemn mood prevailed.

Then Śrīla Prabhupāda said they should consult Nārāyaṇa Mahārāja, a disciple of Prabhupāda's sannyāsa-guru, for details on how to conduct the ceremony for a departed Vaiṣṇava. He also described where his samādhi should be located and asked that after his departure, a feast be served in all the main temples in Vṛndāvana, with ISKCON bearing the expense. On one level, everything seemed to go on as usual. The October weather was very pleasant. The gurukula boys were continuing with their routine, and the Deity worship went on as usual. But in front of the temple, workmen began clearing a space for Prabhupāda's samādhi.

After several days of Prabhupāda's not eating or drinking, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa tried again, but gently. "You don't want to drink anything today?"

"Let me drink hari-nāma amīya vilāsa,*" said Śrīla Prabhupāda.

"Jaya Śrīla Prabhupāda," said Hari-śauri. "Hari-nāma is the sweetest nectar."

“Nivṛta-tarṣair upagīyamānam bhavauśadhāt,” Prabhupāda quoted. “This is bhavauśadha, hari-kīrtana.”

Jayādvaita completed the verse: “Bhavauśadhāc chotra-mano 'bhirāmāt.”

“Ah,” Prabhupāda acknowledged. “And caraṇāmṛta—diet. Diet and medicine. Let me depend on these.”

Although he was fasting, Śrīla Prabhupāda inquired about the prasādam being served to the devotees. Now a hundred or more extra devotees were at the temple, and more were expected.

“This time, what do they supply?” asked Prabhupāda.

“What they supply?” said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa. “You mean prasāda? Of course, today is the day after Ekādaśī, so they had some cereal made with gur and some fruit salad made with guavas and bananas. That was all this morning. Lunch is usually substantial, very good. This is the best prasādam that we have had in many years in India. The cook, Ayodhyāpati, is doing very nicely. Do you want to know what he cooks for lunch?”

Prabhupāda nodded slightly.

“He cooks an ālu-sabji with dāl sauce,” Tamāla Kṛṣṇa continued, “and he makes bindi, very nicely spiced, and dāl, rotī, rice, apple chutney, and dahi-raitā every day.”

Prabhupāda asked who assisted Ayodhyāpati. He didn't want any hired cooks.

“Only devotees are cooking,” said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa. “And it is very tasteful. And everybody—about 125 devotees—sits together and takes prasādam. And the guests from the guesthouse also take. Everyone takes together.”

“Everybody liked?” asked Prabhupāda, smiling.

“Yes, oh, yes,” was the combined reply of the devotees in the room. They all crowded close around Prabhupāda's bed.

“That's nice,” said Prabhupāda.

“You are the perfect father, Śrīla Prabhupāda,” said one of the devotees. “You provide everything for us. A place to live, food to eat, everything. And you've trained us in spiritual knowledge.”

Prabhupāda uttered one of his deep sounds—“Hmmm.” Then he said, “Chant. All together,” and the assembled devotees gladly began a kīrtana.

The room was very dark except for a nightlight behind the head of Śrīla Prabhupāda's bed. Devotees were chanting softly, using only the one tiny pair of karatālas for keeping rhythm.

Tripurāri Swami was massaging Śrīla Prabhupāda's feet, Bhagatjī his right leg, and Tamāla Kṛṣṇa his left arm. Suddenly, Nārāyaṇa Mahārāja, from the Devananda Sarasvatī Math in Mathurā, entered along with two of his men. Prabhupāda's disciples immediately gave him a seat at the side of the bed. Śrīla Prabhupāda began speaking, but so softly that Nārāyaṇa Mahārāja had to lean over to hear. Seeing a conversation about to begin, the devotees in the room, numbering about fifteen or twenty, moved in closer.

Śrīla Prabhupāda began, “Śrīla Prabhupāda [Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī] said that we should preach in Europe, America. That was his desire. And his other desire was that we all would work together jointly to preach.”

“Yes, that is right,” said Nārāyaṇa Mahārāja.

“I didn't waste a single moment,” said Śrīla Prabhupāda. “I tried my best, and it has been successful to some extent.” Śrīla Prabhupāda's voice was choked with emotion. “If we work conjointly,” he continued, “then as Śrī Caitanya Mahāprabhu said, *prthivīte... Saṅkīrtana has great possibilities. My life is coming to an end. It is my desire that you all forgive me for my mistakes. My Godbrothers, when you are preaching at times there are some disputes, some misunderstandings. Maybe I also committed some offenses like that. Please ask them to forgive me. When I am gone, you will all sit together and decide how you can manage for some utsava, or festival for me. How much should we pay? What do you think of this?”

“Whatever instructions you give me,” said Nārāyaṇa Mahārāja, “I will follow them with absolute sincerity. I consider you my guru.”

Nārāyaṇa Mahārāja said that what Śrīla Prabhupāda had created should be protected, and it was everyone's duty to do so. He pledged to help in whatever way he could. Śrīla Prabhupāda inquired if his Godbrothers who had temples in Mathura-Vṛndāvana were present, and Nārāyaṇa Mahārāja replied that most of them were out of station.

Regarding Śrīla Prabhupāda's asking his Godbrothers for forgiveness, Nārāyaṇa Mahārāja said, “They are all trivial things. In this worldwide preaching, if some little things go wrong here and there, what difference does it make? It is all right. Whatever you have done, you have done for the well-being of the entire human society. There is no individual interest. Everything was done in the interest of God.” He advised that Śrīla Prabhupāda not worry. His disciples were worthy and would maintain things; therefore Prabhupāda should now simply “think of the Lord.”

Nārāyaṇa Mahārāja then asked his assistant, Śeṣaśāyī Brahmācārī, to sing Śrī-rūpa-mañjarī-pada. While everyone listened in silence and Śrīla Prabhupāda lay still, Śeṣaśāyī Brahmācārī sang the song very sweetly. Next, Nārāyaṇa Mahārāja sang a bhajana, finishing with the refrain Jaya Gurudeva! Jaya Prabhupāda!

After a pause, Nārāyaṇa Mahārāja spoke again, this time referring to Śrīla Prabhupāda's disciples. “They should be told that they should never get motivated by their own self-interest,” he said. “They should make your mission successful.”

Śrīla Prabhupāda turned his head slowly, looking over the devotees as they gathered in even more closely. Then slowly he lifted his hand, as if to call them all to attention, and said, "Do not fight among yourselves. I have given direction in my books." He then lowered his hand.

Prabhupāda's Godbrother Indupati entered the room. Śrīla Prabhupāda heard his greeting and repeated his request: "First of all I want to say forgive me for all my offenses. I didn't want to hurt anyone, but while preaching one has to sometimes say something that may offend others. Will you forgive me?"

"Yes, yes," Indupati said.

"Mahārāja, you didn't commit any offense," said Nārāyaṇa Mahārāja. "We never thought that you did anything wrong. On the other hand, you bless us. We need it. You never did any wrong. If someone is offended by your actions, that is his fault."

Nārāyaṇa Mahārāja then gently took Śrīla Prabhupāda's right hand and felt his pulse. After a moment or two he said, "Pulse is all right. And your consciousness is perfect. If you have to go, by the will of the Lord, then you will go perfectly." Promising to return again, Nārāyaṇa Mahārāja asked permission to leave, and he and Indupati and their party left the room.

Śrīla Prabhupāda's disciples moved back and remained silent, not wanting to instigate any conversation to unnecessarily tax Prabhupāda. They appreciated Nārāyaṇa Mahārāja's words, but it was another final goodbye. Before the atmosphere of despair could engulf them, they began again their soft, singing kīrtana.

Early one morning in October, as Śrīla Prabhupāda continued fasting from food and drink, Upendra made an innocent but somewhat impertinent complaint. "How can you refuse to drink?" he asked.

"What is wrong if I don't drink?" Śrīla Prabhupāda replied. "I feel no inconvenience." Upendra added that if Śrīla Prabhupāda didn't drink, his body would become dehydrated. Prabhupāda made no reply, and Upendra left the room.

"What about water?" Abhirāma asked.

Śrīla Prabhupāda thought for a moment and said, "So you discuss among yourselves and decide what you want me to do."

Discuss? He seemed to be speaking of more than the merits of drinking water. "Discuss about recovery?" asked Abhirāma.

"I don't want," said Śrīla Prabhupāda.

"You say you don't want recovery, Śrīla Prabhupāda?"

"Yes," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. Abhirāma then went to the outer room, the secretary's reception room, where some of the G.B.C. men were sitting together. He dutifully mentioned what Śrīla Prabhupāda had just said—to discuss among themselves about his recovery. But Abhirāma's remark didn't seem like news. The devotees were already well aware that Prabhupāda was making almost no attempt to carry on. They were signed to it. Śrīla Prabhupāda wanted to leave now, to "die peacefully." They had been trying to encourage him to drink, but now he was determined to simply fast until the right time came. Whether they could accept it or not, it was happening. Therefore Abhirāma's comment provoked no formal discussion.

That afternoon Prabhupāda called for Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, who was at that time taking his lunch. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa responded at once and entered the room along with several other G.B.C. men. They all came very close to hear what Prabhupāda wanted to say.

"If I want to survive," he said, "of course I'll have to take something." His words came slowly, but with difficulty. "It is not possible to survive without taking any food. But my survival means so many inconveniences, one after another. Therefore I have decided to die peacefully." His voice trailed off, and everyone was too stunned to speak. They sat looking almost blankly at him as he lay with his eyes closed. He occasionally made a noise like "ummm," and only after several very long minutes did Tamāla Kṛṣṇa manage to ask Prabhupāda if they should continue with the kīrtana. By this time, more devotees, having finished lunch, were entering the room, and they began softly singing kīrtana. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa leaned forward and assured Prabhupāda about the stipend payments for his former family. Prabhupāda acknowledged.

"Don't worry," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa. "I'll see that each of them is satisfied. They won't feel sorry in any way. You've provided for everyone, Śrīla Prabhupāda."

After a few minutes, Prabhupāda turned his attention to Hari-śauri, who was sobbing silently near Prabhupāda's head. With some sternness in his voice, Prabhupāda asked, "Why do you want me to survive?" Hari-śauri could not speak. He felt that if he asked Prabhupāda to stay it would be an offense, since he had already decided to leave. Hari-śauri could not keep his emotions in check, and yet he did not want to say, "Stay and struggle." Neither did he nor any of the others want Prabhupāda to leave. Somehow, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa had not caught Prabhupāda's last remark to Hari-śauri, and so he leaned forward towards Prabhupāda, half questioning, "They want you to survive?"

"If I want to die," said Śrīla Prabhupāda, "this is a very peaceful death. You go on chanting."

As the kīrtana continued, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa asked to be excused. Prabhupāda asked why, and he replied he was going for discussion.

"For discussion," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "They want me to survive, and I want to die peacefully. I cannot make miracles. The physical body has to be maintained if I am to survive. But without taking food, how the physical body will go on? That is fanaticism."

"Everything is in the hands of Kṛṣṇa," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa.

Śrīla Prabhupāda's eyes had been closed, but suddenly he opened them and said, "Kṛṣṇa wants me to do as I like. The choice is mine. Kṛṣṇa has given me full freedom."

These words struck some of the devotees as extremely startling and different. But Brahmānanda spoke up in the mood of resigned assurance. "It doesn't matter whether you live or die, Prabhupāda," he said. "You'll always be with Kṛṣṇa, and we will always be with you, because we will follow your instructions."

"Whether I live or die," Prabhupāda said, "I will always be Kṛṣṇa's servant. So if Brahmānanda has assured me that this movement will go on, then better let me die peacefully." The devotees, who were only inches away from Prabhupāda, heard these faint words with dismay. After a few minutes of heavy silence, they resumed the kīrtana. Prabhupāda seemed to rest.

Within a few minutes all the available G.B.C. men and senior sannyāsīs were gathered in the outer room. Brahmānanda was feeling very low that he had told Prabhupāda that everything would go on without him and that Prabhupāda had replied that he would therefore die. The devotees remained amazed at Prabhupāda's statement that Kṛṣṇa had given him freedom to do as he liked. These words now struck like a thunderbolt. With these words, "Kṛṣṇa has given me the choice," Prabhupāda turned all the devotees' minds in a different direction. Abhirāma reminded them that Prabhupāda wanted them to discuss about his recovery, and now they were having that discussion. But they were confused and bewildered by the sudden change in Prabhupāda's mood.

Kīrtanānanda Swami, the seniormost disciple, spoke up with clarity and logic. "If Kṛṣṇa has given Śrīla Prabhupāda the independence to choose, that means He also has given us the independence. So we should assert our independence and ask Śrīla Prabhupāda to stay."

One by one, devotees spoke up in support of the decision to ask Śrīla Prabhupāda to stay. Yes, it was a fact that the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement would go on without Śrīla Prabhupāda's physical presence; but it wouldn't be the same.

"Yes, and Prabhupāda hasn't finished translating the Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam," said Brahmānanda.

"Yes," said another, "we should ask Śrīla Prabhupāda to stay for at least five or ten years."

"Five or ten years? We should ask him to stay for one hundred years!" "But not all of the G.B.C. members are here to decide."

"Well, who in the G.B.C. is going to say that we shouldn't ask Prabhupāda to stay?"

They were in agreement. They did want Prabhupāda to stay, and they should express their desire to him. The mood of the last few days had suddenly reversed. They were no longer in the depths of despair but were thinking positively and enthusiastically that Śrīla Prabhupāda would stay with them.

"Why should we think that there is no hope for him to become fit again?" said Kīrtanānanda. "Jesus could bring people back to life from the dead, and even mundane yogīs can do it. So Śrīla Prabhupāda certainly can if he wants."

Now Brahmānanda spoke up with great strength. "We weren't realizing that actually we need Prabhupāda! That should be the understanding. There is no question of allowing Prabhupāda out of our presence for a moment!"

It was about 3:30 P.M. when the twenty devotees entered Śrīla Prabhupāda's room and crowded around his bed. Śrīla Prabhupāda lay with his eyes closed, motionless, but alert to their presence. Kīrtanānanda Swami had been chosen to be the spokesman, and as he leaned over to speak to Śrīla Prabhupāda, his lips began to tremble, his eyes filled with tears, and he broke down, sobbing, with his head at the side of the bed. Śrīla Prabhupāda reached out but could not find Kīrtanānanda.

"Who?" said Prabhupāda.

Many voices spoke, "Kīrtanānanda."

Śrīla Prabhupāda then laid his hand on Kīrtanānanda's head and gently rubbed it.

"Hmmm? So what do you want?" he asked. No one could say anything, as they were all waiting for Kīrtanānanda. Brahmānanda was rubbing Kīrtanānanda on the back to soothe him, and Tamāla Kṛṣṇa was encouraging him to try to say something. Finally, after another minute of emotional waiting, Kīrtanānanda raised his head. He looked at Śrīla Prabhupāda and pleaded, "If Kṛṣṇa gives you the choice, then don't go! We need you!"

"So this is your joint opinion?" asked Śrīla Prabhupāda. "You have discussed?" He held his hand in the air and moved it around, so as to indicate all the devotees.

Brahmānanda Swami spoke up very emotionally but positively: "We have all met together, Śrīla Prabhupāda. We want you to remain and lead this movement and finish the Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam. We said that you must remain for at least another ten years. You have only done fifty percent of your work."

Śrīla Prabhupāda was listening very carefully without any movement, but when Brahmānanda said "fifty percent" he frowned and said, "No." Finally he uttered a "Hmmm." He was considering the proposal. His eyes were still closed, and he seemed to be consulting Kṛṣṇa from within himself. Several times he uttered "Hmmm," and everyone was held in suspense, not able to speak or think or do anything except look intently at Śrīla Prabhupāda. Then with his eyes still closed, he yawned, and his gold teeth began to show. "All right," he said.

It was probably the most casual-sounding decision on life or death ever made. At that moment the devotees understood Śrīla Prabhupāda's independent position; he could stay or go as he chose. They had become so faithless, however, that they were thinking that his passing away was inevitable and could not possibly be delayed, even by Śrīla Prabhupāda himself. Now he displayed his wonderful transcendental nature with a simple yawn—"All right"—as if choosing between life and death was the most unimportant thing in the world. Harikeśa gave a short laugh, the kind that he saved for when Śrīla Prabhupāda did something completely transcendental, incomprehensible, and inimitable. "Jaya, Prabhupāda!" he said.

Prabhupāda had again proven himself to be beyond understanding. The devotees laughed nervously, unsure what was appropriate. Not knowing whether to laugh or cry, they fell silent again to see what Prabhupāda would do.

"So give me something to drink," he said, and all the devotees shouted, "Jaya, Prabhupāda!" He would stay with them. It was confirmed. Everyone was greatly relieved. "All glories to Śrīla Prabhupāda!"

"This is real affection" Prabhupāda replied.

The atmosphere had changed. Śrīla Prabhupāda had changed. His servants lifted him up, and all the devotees watched as he drank a full glass of grape juice. Now, instead of withdrawing his energy, as he had done steadily for the last few days, he came back to life again. Then he lay back. "Thank you very much," he said. "Hare Kṛṣṇa."

And the devotees replied, "Hare Kṛṣṇa."

So this was what Prabhupāda wanted. He was drawing out their emotions and increasing their affection for him more and more by putting them into a state of transcendental distress. Now they could understand, at least to a tiny degree, what the gopīs' pangs of separation were like. Śrīla Prabhupāda was bringing his disciples to the extremes of devotional sentiments and showing that actually their lives were in his hands.

After a long pause he asked, "Strawberries, they have been brought?"

"Yes, Śrīla Prabhupāda," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, "very nice strawberries."

"I will take some strawberries," he said.

"Śrīla Prabhupāda," Tamāla Kṛṣṇa said, "you gave your word to Kṛṣṇa in Bombay that you would see Him sitting in His new big temple, and you have yet to keep your word to Him." Prabhupāda smiled very brightly.

"You have fixed the date for the opening of Bombay," said Brahmānanda. "January the first. So we would like to invite you to come, Śrīla Prabhupāda. It is your temple. You have asked Kṛṣṇa to come there. When we all gave up, you carried on the fight."

"Yes, that was a great fight," said Prabhupāda, smiling. "After so much fighting and then to construct a big temple is a great triumph."

"I don't think Kṛṣṇa will come into the temple," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, "unless you are personally there, Śrīla Prabhupāda, to open the door."

Prabhupāda was still smiling. "All right," he said. "But chanting should not be stopped. Things should go on naturally."

Turning to Kīrtanānanda, Prabhupāda asked, "Kīrtanānanda's palace —when it will be ready?"

"In early spring," Kīrtanānanda replied, "as soon as the weather is a little warmer. It gives you the chance to have a little time to recuperate, then go to Bombay and open the temple there, and then you can come open your palace. We have about seventy-five letters from all the devotees in New Vrindaban, and they are all begging you to come. They say their life is finished if you don't come."

"So let me take a little rest," said Prabhupāda, "and then I shall take strawberries."

Later that day, Śrīla Prabhupāda was speaking more audibly and quoting verses, including the Īṣopaniṣad verse that says one who acknowledges the Supreme Personality of Godhead can go on living for hundreds of years. He sat up and drank some vegetable broth. He also talked for half an hour with Girirāja about bank matters, repeatedly questioning him to make sure he understood. He also spoke at length with Rāmeśvara Swami about preaching Kṛṣṇa consciousness in Iran.

Word spread quickly to the devotees throughout the world that Prabhupāda had decided to live. Especially in Vṛndāvana, where gloom had pervaded, the devotees were now light-hearted and thankful. They spoke more enthusiastically about preaching. All the devotees in Vṛndāvana agreed that everything Śrīla Prabhupāda had been doing was for instructing his disciples. Previously there had been discussion of Śrīla Prabhupāda's teaching them how to die, but now there was more awareness that he was teaching them how to live—by love. He was doing this by increasing their love for him.

Some of the devotees felt that the instruction Śrīla Prabhupāda was giving now was his ultimate instruction, the motive for everything he did. The basis for Kṛṣṇa consciousness was, in fact, love. Śrīla Prabhupāda had written in his books, prema pum-ārtho mahān: "Love of Kṛṣṇa is the ultimate goal of life." Only when a devotee developed pure, unalloyed love for Kṛṣṇa could he go to the spiritual world. Some of the devotees said that to bring all the devotees to a higher, purer love, Prabhupāda was remaining in the material world and offering his disciples the opportunity to serve him very intimately in Vṛndāvana. Other devotees, however, considered Śrīla Prabhupāda's activities too grave for them to understand and simply accepted these pastimes as acintya, inconceivable. But everyone could at least understand, either by witnessing or hearing reports, that Śrīla Prabhupāda had responded to his disciples' dependent cries of love by saying, "This is real affection."

SPL 55: The Final Lesson

CHAPTER FIFTY-FIVE

The Final Lesson

Despite his promise to live, Śrīla Prabhupāda said his life was still in Kṛṣṇa's hands—everything was. His free choice did not mean he was absolutely independent. Rather, the pure devotee's attitude is to freely surrender to Kṛṣṇa, whatever happens. In the mood of the gopīs, the foremost devotees of Lord Kṛṣṇa, Lord Caitanya Mahāprabhu prayed, “You may handle me roughly in Your embrace or make me brokenhearted by not being present before me, but You are always my worshipable Lord, unconditionally.”

Because the exchanges between the Lord and His pure devotees are always supremely personal, both the Lord and His devotees express desires and individual will. In His childhood līlā, Kṛṣṇa sometimes breaks mother Yaśoda's butter pot, and sometimes He allows her to catch Him and bind Him. In any case, the will of the Lord and the will of the devotee are always one in interest, but they are sometimes expressed in the form of a loving conflict. Similarly, although Śrīla Prabhupāda had promised his devotees that he would stay in the world and defy death, he still remained surrendered to the will of Kṛṣṇa.

Śrīla Prabhupāda had already expressed his surrender in the prayer he had given his disciples to offer on his behalf: “My dear Lord Kṛṣṇa, if You desire, please cure Śrīla Prabhupāda.” By the phrase “if You desire,” he was reminding his followers of the supreme prerogative of Kṛṣṇa and was asking them to abide by it, although he was also giving them an acceptable way to petition Kṛṣṇa. In a similar case in 1967, he had given his disciples another prayer: “My master has not finished his work.” He had said then that Kṛṣṇa had responded to this prayer, granting the wishes of the devotees. Śrīla Prabhupāda himself was responding to the devotees' prayers, and Kṛṣṇa had given him the choice. But as a surrendered soul, Śrīla Prabhupāda waited for further developments, ever sensitive to Kṛṣṇa's desire. As Prabhupāda had said when invited by Kīrtanānanda to come to his palace in New Vrindaban, “Let us see which palace I am going to.”

As a loving tension can sometimes exist between the Supreme Lord and His pure devotee, so now a similar tension existed between Śrīla Prabhupāda and his followers. Prior to his disciples' desperate petition at his bedside, Śrīla Prabhupāda had seen his duty as instructing his disciples in how to die. Part of his mission was to set the perfect example in this most important lesson—how to pass life's ultimate test. But now his disciples were asking him to postpone the lesson in dying and stay with them indefinitely in the preaching field. And Prabhupāda had agreed, showing that he had the ability to live if he chose. But sooner or later he would have to return to the lesson on how a person should face the end of life.

One special feature of Śrīla Prabhupāda's activities is his relating intimately to the human condition while at the same time remaining aloof and transcendental. As a pure devotee, he was not subjected to the law of karma, which awards reactions for pious and sinful deeds. He was not born by the force of karma, nor would he die by force of karma. As stated by Śrīla Rūpa Gosvāmī, “One whose body, mind, and words are fully engaged in devotional service to Lord Kṛṣṇa is a liberated soul, even while living in this world.” People often misunderstand the movements of a pure devotee within the material world, just as one, on seeing clouds blowing past the moon, may think the moon itself is moving. The śāstra, therefore, warns us never to see the guru as an ordinary man subject to karma.

But Śrīla Prabhupāda, while always transcendental to this world, showed the conditioned souls how they too could come to the stage of liberation by constantly thinking about Kṛṣṇa and serving Him, so that at the time of death they could return to Kṛṣṇa in the eternal, spiritual world. And Prabhupāda's lessons were always practical and universal. Śrīla Prabhupāda's books, for example, were not mere theory but were practical and full of realized knowledge. And Prabhupāda practiced what he preached; his entire life was exemplary. He had been in family life, and even then he had vigorously preached, by starting his Back to Godhead magazine. In poverty and obscurity he had struggled to start a spiritual movement, and by the grace of Kṛṣṇa and his spiritual master, he had become successful. He had always shown by his humanlike attempts his willingness to bravely take on austerity and face danger. He had shown exemplary spiritual life for all to try and follow. He had gone alone, in old age, to a foreign country and had chanted Hare Kṛṣṇa in a park in New York City, attracting the young men and women of America. Therefore everyone should take his example and try to serve Kṛṣṇa, despite the immediate impediments. Śrīla Prabhupāda encountered obstacles, yet by his free will and the help of Kṛṣṇa, he surmounted them. This was his wonderful example. It is said that Lord Caitanya, five hundred years ago, made surrender to Kṛṣṇa more attainable than Lord Kṛṣṇa had five thousand years ago. And now, in the twentieth century, Śrīla Prabhupāda has made Kṛṣṇa consciousness possible for people all over the world.

As part of his instruction and example, Śrīla Prabhupāda knew he would have to show people just how to die. He had escaped death a number of times—by Kṛṣṇa's grace, by the prayers of his disciples, and by his own pure and powerful will to propagate his movement. But from the signs given to him by Lord Kṛṣṇa in 1977, Śrīla Prabhupāda began decisively and conclusively ending his mission in the material world. And among his final duties was his giving complete guidelines on how to die. He was perfectly showing how to do that which everyone has to do, but which is most difficult to do successfully: die.

But a loving conflict was there. Prabhupāda loved his disciples. He also knew they were not yet fully mature. His movement already had great potency and stature in the world, and yet it had many enemies. He was inclined to always protect his devotees, his movement, and all living entities, even the animals. So when his most intimate and faithful disciples pleaded that they could not go on without him, he had turned from showing how to die, agreeing to stay with them and preach. But at what point would they ever be willing to let him go? At what point could he say that the world of māyā and the enemies of Kṛṣṇa were all gone? At what point would his disciples become fully mature?

In following his decision to stay, Śrīla Prabhupāda turned himself over to his disciples, allowing them to care for him completely. Those who took part recalled that never before had Śrīla Prabhupāda allowed such intimate dealings between himself and his disciples. The only thing comparable was in New York, in 1966, when he had been very intimate in dealing with the first persons to join him, persons who had known nothing of the etiquette of approaching a spiritual master. But those who were present now and who had also been present then said that these days were even more intimate.

At one point Kīrtanānanda firmly insisted that Śrīla Prabhupāda drink a full cup of juice, even when he said he had had enough. Kīrtanānanda felt awkward, insisting. "I am not like mother Yaśodā that I can do this," he said. "I keep remembering that you are my spiritual master." But Śrīla Prabhupāda allowed himself to be ordered by Kīrtanānanda. Similarly, Bhavānanda, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, Bhakti-cāru, Upendra, and other servants coaxed Śrīla Prabhupāda to follow certain diets and cared for his body constantly. The other devotees were reminded of the story of Īśvara Purī, who gave intimate bodily service to his spiritual master, Mādhavendra Purī, when Mādhavendra was in the last stages of his life and apparently invalid. According to the Caitanya-caritāmṛta, it was by this menial, bodily service that Īśvara Purī proved his love for his spiritual master and was allowed to become the spiritual master of Lord Caitanya.

Śrīla Prabhupāda had deferred the lessons in dying in favor of giving his disciples an unparalleled opportunity to serve him in pure and simple love. And he allowed this not only for a few, but for whoever came to Vṛndāvana. Many came, and all were allowed to enter Śrīla Prabhupāda's room, massage his body, and sit with him as long as they liked, day and night, chanting the holy name for his pleasure. Śrīla Prabhupāda also recommenced his translating, and this was done openly. Whereas previously he had always worked in solitude, he now encouraged all devotees to come as he lay in bed dictating his Bhaktivedanta purports. He was giving himself completely and declaring it also, telling the devotees present, "Never leave me," and "I cannot live without your company." They had asked him to stay, and he had agreed, consigning himself completely to their care.

Those who were blessed to have this service felt themselves passing over all barriers of reluctance to serve, as well as all barriers of material desire. By intimately serving Śrīla Prabhupāda, they felt the strength of complete surrender and sensed that this would sustain them always, even when Śrīla Prabhupāda eventually did depart from the world.

Prabhupāda also continued speaking, as he had in recent months, about being unafraid of death and being fixed in transcendental knowledge. When receiving a presentation of some of his books recently printed in Portuguese by Hṛdayānanda Goswami, Prabhupāda encouraged him and said, "This is life. The material world is just bones. The bones are not our real life. Our real concern is the living force. The bones may remain or go—it doesn't matter. The real life is sustaining the bones. There is even a history that there was a ṛṣi who had only bones. So there is a science by which you can sustain life by only bones. Hiraṇyakaśipu did it."

"You are also doing it, Śrīla Prabhupāda," Tamāla Kṛṣṇa said.

"So take care of the bones as long as possible," said Prabhupāda, "but the real life is here, always remember that. The material world means we are simply all protecting bones and flesh together. But they have no knowledge of what they are."

And when Ātreya Ṛṣi visited Śrīla Prabhupāda and asked that he visit Tehran, Prabhupāda said that he was ready to go, but "Now you have to take a bundle of bones." These were, of course, the same themes that Prabhupāda had always taught, the same themes that were in his books. But the lessons were more poignant and striking when Prabhupāda applied them to his own situation.

More than one devotee compared Prabhupāda to Bhīṣmadeva, who gave important instructions in his last days. As Bhīṣma felt no pain and delivered learned and loving discourses even from his "bed of arrows," and as Bhīṣma determined by his own will the time of his departure from the world, so Śrīla Prabhupāda spent his last days oblivious to his physical condition, defying death, and instructing his spiritually innocent sons. But Prabhupāda's sons could no longer stand by and simply hear the philosophical lessons. Prabhupāda had accepted their affection when they had cried for him to stay with them, and now they wanted to express that affection in the only world they understood, a world with Śrīla Prabhupāda living and talking with them, laughing or reprimanding them, as he liked. They wanted him to eat and drink and become physically strong again.

But again Śrīla Prabhupāda seemed to change, and he began refusing food and drink. He had postponed his passing away to exchange lovingly with his disciples, and yet at the same time, by refusing to eat or drink, he was showing his preference for passing away. He admitted, when pressed, that it was an impossible course of action—to live without food or drink. Nor did he expect or want miracles. If he was to get better, it would be by taking nourishment. But for reasons of his own, he would not eat. He said recovery was material, and he didn't want it.

He kept closely in tune with the will of Kṛṣṇa, allowing the holy name to sustain him. The doctors who came were often puzzled, but those who were Vaiṣṇavas understood and respected his prerogative. Prabhupāda's servants made anxiety-filled attempts to induce Prabhupāda to take regular treatment. But Prabhupāda preferred to take only kīrtana and Bhāgavatam, while at the same time sustaining a willingness to live. He empathized with his disciples' anxiety and patiently explained the puzzling situation they were in. He wanted their care, and he allowed them to try and treat him, knowing that it was bringing them more and more into a surrender of love. But gradually it became more clear that Kṛṣṇa's will was indicating Prabhupāda's departure.

"Śrīla Prabhupāda," Bhavānanda coaxed, always working on the assumption that Prabhupāda could stay if he wanted, "your presence on this planet is the only thing that's keeping the onslaught of the Kali-yuga from really taking effect. We have no idea even what will happen if you leave."

"It is not in my hands," said Śrīla Prabhupāda, with perfect clarity of consciousness. "Kṛṣṇa-Balarāma."

Śrīla Prabhupāda always spoke clearly, logically, and with complete devotion to Kṛṣṇa. Up until the last he dealt with practical matters, forming a Bhaktivedanta Swami Charity Trust for reconstructing ancient temples in Bengal and arranging final details regarding ISKCON properties and monies. Through all dealings he stayed always alert, and he absorbed himself in kīrtana and Bhāgavatam.

But it became obvious to his disciples that, despite his promise, he was again moving inevitably towards giving the final lesson. He was teaching that love was beyond death, that a disciple's love could call the spiritual master back to the world to stay, and that a pure devotee has the ability to stay in the world beyond his allotted time. Meanwhile, however, he was progressing steadily to the final point. The devotees didn't feel angry with him or cheated that he was doing so. He had told them that he had free will given by Kṛṣṇa. And they also, by their free will, had asked him to stay, and he had agreed. But they knew he was not obliged. If, despite their prayers, Lord Kṛṣṇa was telling Śrīla Prabhupāda that he should come back home to Godhead, what could they do but accept? If Śrīla Prabhupāda was accepting, then they would accept also. Nothing, however, could change the fact of their surrendered love; it had now become a solid pact that could not be vanquished by any material changes. They had passed the test of eternal loving service, and that could not be taken away by death.

Up until the end there were interludes of sweetness as well as displays of Prabhupāda's indomitable mood of fighting for Kṛṣṇa. One day Prabhupāda's sister Piśimā arrived unexpectedly, and Prabhupāda asked her to cook kicharī. At that time Kīrtanānanda was trying to put Prabhupāda on the road to recovery by gradually increasing his liquids, and Kīrtanānanda and the other devotees opposed the idea of his suddenly eating solid foods. But Śrīla Prabhupāda insisted.

"It doesn't matter whether what she cooks does good to me or bad," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "She is a Vaiṣṇavī. It will be good for me." He then began speaking in an extremely humble way. "Probably I became a little puffed up because of my opulence and success," he said. "Now God has shattered that pride. If you don't have your body, what is there to be puffed up about?"

Bhakti-cāru Swami protested, "Śrīla Prabhupāda, whatever you have done, you have done for Kṛṣṇa."

"That may be, but in this world, unknowingly you commit offenses."

When Piśimā heard this, she exclaimed, "No, no, he never committed any offense."

"You cannot ever commit offenses," said Bhakti-cāru. "You are God's very dear one. How can you commit offenses?"

"I am a little temperamental," said Śrīla Prabhupāda. "I used to use words like rascal and so on. I never compromised. They used to call it 'A club in one hand and a Bhāgavatam in the other.' That is how I preach. Anyway, make arrangements for my sister."

There were also visits from Śrīla Prabhupāda's Godbrothers, and again Prabhupāda asked forgiveness for his offenses. One time, Niṣkiñcana Kṛṣṇadāsa Bābājī, Purī Mahārāja, Āśrama Mahārāja, Ānanda Prabhu, Puruṣottama Brahmācārī, and about twenty others came and sat next to Prabhupāda's bed. He was resting when they arrived, and they joined the kīrtana until he awoke. When he saw them, he asked to be raised up. Sitting in the center of his bed with his Godbrothers all around, he addressed them.

"All over the world there is a beautiful field to preach Kṛṣṇa consciousness," he said. "I didn't care whether I would be successful or not. People are willing to take. They are all taking also. If we preach together, the saying of Mahāprabhu, pṛthivīte, will come true. We have everything. Spread the holy name and distribute prasādam. There is a beautiful field. In Africa, in Russia, everywhere they're accepting."

When Prabhupāda began asking his Godbrothers to forgive him, they protested. "You are the eternal leader," one of them asserted. "You rule over us, guide us, and chastise us."

"Forgive all my offenses," Prabhupāda repeated. "I became proud of all my opulence."

"No," said Purī Mahārāja, "you never became proud. When you started preaching, opulence and success followed you. That was the blessing of Śrī Caitanya Mahāprabhu and Śrī Kṛṣṇa. There cannot be any question of your being offensive."

When Śrīla Prabhupāda presented himself as mahā-patita, greatly fallen, Purī Mahārāja did not accept it. "You have saved millions of people around the world," he said. "Therefore there is no question of offenses. But you should be called mahā-patita-pāvana [the great savior of the fallen]."

Prabhupāda's disciples regarded Prabhupāda's asking for his Godbrothers' forgiveness as a manifestation of his humility. But they were also puzzled. Certainly Prabhupāda's Godbrothers were sincere in saying Prabhupāda had committed no offense. Whatever he had done, he had done for Kṛṣṇa. But Śrīla Prabhupāda was also sincere in asking for forgiveness. That was the beautiful gem of his humility—to ask everyone for forgiveness.

For the purpose of preaching, displaying this gem had not always been the most effective way to spread the merciful teachings of Lord Kṛṣṇa in every town and village. But now it could be displayed. In London and now in Vṛndāvana, Prabhupāda was showing his disciples extra affection and gratitude, without the reprimands usually necessary in training disciples. This attitude of complete humility was a symptom of the highest stage of devotional life. Śrīla Prabhupāda had explained in his books that the madhyamādhikārī, the second-class devotee, makes distinctions between the devotees, the innocent nondevotees, and the demons, whereas the mahā-bhāgavata, or first-class devotee, sees everyone—except himself—as a servant of God. Sometimes, however, the mahā-bhāgavata desires to come down from the first-class platform to the second-class platform, just to take up the most compassionate service of preaching Kṛṣṇa consciousness. Prabhupāda's disciples had all read of the mahā-bhāgavata stage in the scriptures, and now they were seeing it fully displayed, as Prabhupāda referred to himself as the most fallen and asked for everyone's forgiveness.

Śrīla Prabhupāda had heard of the program of his disciple Lokanātha Swami, who was taking a small group of men on a bullock cart and preaching in villages throughout India. Lokanātha had told Śrīla Prabhupāda how in the course of their travels they had recently visited tīrthas such as Badarikasrama and Bhim Kapur. Śrīla Prabhupāda was enlivened to hear this, and he then evolved a transcendental desire to go himself on a cart pulled by bullocks to circumambulate the area of Vṛndāvana. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa and Bhavānanda, who were serving Prabhupāda with increased intimacy, felt themselves unable to support Śrīla Prabhupāda in his desire, since they thought his fragile body could not survive such rough treatment on the roads.

But Śrīla Prabhupāda reasoned that "Dying on parikrama is glorious," and he asked them to take him. A controversy developed among the devotees, as some said Prabhupāda's will to go on parikrama should be immediately honored as an order from the spiritual master; he wanted it, and he should not be denied. The doctor, however, assured them that Śrīla Prabhupāda's body would not survive the jostling of the cart. The many devotees who crowded around Śrīla Prabhupāda's bed held different opinions, and Prabhupāda could see this. Following his request, however, Lokanātha went out and hired a cart with bullocks and prepared it for the ride. Lokanātha and Hamsadūta suggested that the parikrama could go to the city of Vṛndāvana or visit the seven main temples of the Gosvāmīs. But then they said that since the next day was Govardhana-pūjā, Prabhupāda could go to Govardhana Hill. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, Bhavānanda, and Bhakti-cāru, however, protested adamantly against the parikrama.

"One-day experiment," Prabhupāda said. "It is for one day. Rest assured I will not die in one day." He liked the idea of going to Govardhana. "And we shall make our cooking there," he said. Lokanātha Swami, he assured them, was experienced. "Make very good picnic," he said.

After discussing back and forth, the devotees finally decided that early the next morning they would take Śrīla Prabhupāda in a bullock cart to Govardhana. The majority of the devotees then left Śrīla Prabhupāda alone for the night.

Later that night Śrīla Prabhupāda received a visit from Niṣkiñcana Kṛṣṇadāsa Bābājī, who sat with Prabhupāda, chanting and sometimes speaking in Bengali. Suddenly, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa and Bhavānanda came to Prabhupāda's bedside. They were in tears and beside themselves with anxiety.

Prabhupāda understood. "You request me not to go?" he asked.

"Well, Śrīla Prabhupāda," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, "I'll tell you, I'm getting so upset sitting in the room upstairs. I was walking around. Two of the devotees told me that this road is so bad that if you go on this road you're going to be jolted back and forth. The road is terrible. I just can't understand, Śrīla Prabhupāda, why it has to be tomorrow that we have to go. Of anybody that wants you to travel, I do. But why do we have to go when you're in this condition? I can't understand it. Why are we throwing everything out the window that we must go tomorrow? I can't understand."

"All right," said Śrīla Prabhupāda softly, immediately agreeing to their proposal that he not go.

"Jaya, Śrīla Prabhupāda!" said Bhakti-cāru, who was also present.

"Thank you, Śrīla Prabhupāda," said Bhavānanda with great relief.

"All right. You're satisfied?"

"Now I am, Śrīla Prabhupāda," said Bhavānanda. "Yes. I was in too much anxiety."

"Never mind. I shall not put you in anxiety."

"Actually, Śrīla Prabhupāda," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, "we're so much attached to you that you practically drive us Tomadness sometimes. To night we were becoming mad."

"No, no, I shall not do that," said Prabhupāda. "Bābājī Mahārāja," Prabhupāda turned to Niṣkiñcana Kṛṣṇadāsa Bābājī and said, "—just see how much affection they have for me."

"Śrīla Prabhupāda," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa, "the way you deal with us simply deepens our attachment every moment."

"It is my duty," said Prabhupāda, and the devotees laughed warmly, understanding. Yes, they could understand—that was his duty. By all his actions and dealings, Prabhupāda's intention was to capture spirit souls and deliver them to Kṛṣṇa. His method was loving service, but he did not do it for himself. He was delivering them to Kṛṣṇa. That was his duty.

On November 14, 1977, at 7:30 P.M., in his room at the Krishna-Balaram Mandir in Vṛndāvana, Śrīla Prabhupāda gave his final instruction by leaving this mortal world and going back to Godhead.

His departure was exemplary, because his whole life was exemplary. His departure marked the completion of a lifetime of pure devotional service to Kṛṣṇa. A few days before the end, Śrīla Prabhupāda had said he was instructing as far as he could, and his secretary had added, "You are the inspiration." "Yes," Śrīla Prabhupāda had replied, "that I shall do until the last breathing."

Prabhupāda's "last breathing" was glorious, not because of any last minute mystical demonstration, but because Śrīla Prabhupāda remained in perfect Kṛṣṇa consciousness. Like grandfather Bhiṣmadeva, he remained completely collected and noble and grave, teaching until the end. He was preaching that life comes from life, not from matter, and he was showing that one should preach with every breath he has. The many devotees who crowded the large room bore witness that up to the very end, Prabhupāda remained exactly the same. There was nothing suddenly in congruous with what he had previously shown and taught them. At the time of his departure, therefore, he was teaching how to die, by always depending on Kṛṣṇa. Prabhupāda's passing away was peaceful. During the evening of November 14, the kavirāja asked him, "Is there anything you want?" and Prabhupāda replied faintly, kuch icchā nahīn: "I have no desire." His passing away was in the perfect situation: in Vṛndāvana, with devotees. A few months previously, a young girl, the daughter of one of Prabhupāda's disciples, had passed away in Vṛndāvana, and when Śrīla Prabhupāda had been asked if she went back to Godhead to personally associate with Kṛṣṇa, he had said, "Yes, anyone who leaves his body in Vṛndāvana is liberated."

Of course, "Vṛndāvana" also means the state of pure Kṛṣṇa consciousness. As Advaita Ācārya had said of Lord Caitanya, "Wherever You are is Vṛndāvana." And this was also true of Śrīla Prabhupāda. Had Śrīla Prabhupāda passed away in London, New York, or Moscow, therefore, his destination would have been the same. As Lord Kṛṣṇa states in the Bhagavad-gītā, "One who is always thinking of Me, surely he attains to Me." But because Vṛndāvana-dhāma is the quintessential realm of Kṛṣṇa consciousness within the universe, the ideal place for departure from this world, so it was yet another exemplary feature of Śrīla Prabhupāda's life that he went back to Godhead with Vṛndāvana as his last junction.

Those Vaiṣṇavas who had taken the vow never to risk leaving Vṛndāvana could see that Śrīla Prabhupāda, after sacrificing everything—including the benefit of residing in Vṛndāvana—to deliver fallen souls in the most godforsaken locations of the world, had returned to the holy land of Vṛndāvana and from there had departed for the original abode of Lord Kṛṣṇa in the spiritual sky. As stated in the Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, "Anyone who executes service in Vṛndāvana certainly goes back to home, back to Godhead, after giving up his body."

Śrīla Prabhupāda's departure was also perfect because he was chanting and hearing the holy names of God. Thus the Supreme Personality of Godhead was present at Śrīla Prabhupāda's passing just as He was at the celebrated passing away of Bhīṣmadeva, who said, "Despite His being equally kind to everyone, He has graciously come before me while I am ending my life, for I am His unflinching servitor." As Lord Kṛṣṇa came before Bhīṣmadeva, assuring him and everyone else that Bhīṣma was returning back to Godhead on leaving his body, so the Lord in His incarnation of namāvatāra, the Hare Kṛṣṇa mantra, was present for Śrīla Prabhupāda's departure.

Śrīla Prabhupāda's life had been dedicated to spreading the holy name to every town and village, and for a month he had been surrounding himself with the holy name. For his passing away, he especially wanted to fill the room with devotees chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa, and Kṛṣṇa fulfilled that wish. Śrīla Prabhupāda, therefore, departed under the most favorable circumstances possible—in the most sacred place, Vṛndāvana, surrounded by Vaiṣṇavas chanting the holy name.

An ideal spiritual teacher (ācārya) always acts in such a way that others may follow his example. As Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam states, these great souls who cross over the ocean of birth and death by taking shelter of the "boat" of the lotus feet of Kṛṣṇa miraculously leave the boat on this side for others to use. And Śrīla Prabhupāda's disappearance, by its perfect example, affords all conditioned souls the means for meeting the greatest of all dangers. An auspicious death is not merely a matter of psychological adjustment, so that one may die without regret or without becoming unduly upset. The real point is that at the time of death the soul must leave the body and take his next birth. Only the Kṛṣṇa conscious soul can leave this world of birth and death and attain an eternal, blissful life in the spiritual world. Therefore one's life is tested at death.

Death means the soul cannot stand to live in the body anymore. Whatever the material cause may be, the situation has become unbearable for the soul. And leaving the body causes great distress. The śāstras, therefore, advise us to get free from the cycle of repeated birth and death. Meeting an inauspicious death and being dragged down to a lower birth is the most fearful thing for the living being. So fearful is it that we may try to ignore death altogether. Death is painful because the eternal spirit soul is placed in a most unnatural situation: although he is eternal and should not have to die, he is forced to die because of his connection with the material body. At death, the eternal soul is forced to leave the body for a destination he knows not. Thus he is full of fear and suffering. The pain and fear are usually overwhelming, and one thinks only of material attachments or bodily pain. Therefore King Kulaśekhara prayed, and Prabhupāda often quoted, "Please let me pass away, not in some prolonged contemplation of my bodily death, but just while I'm chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa. If I can meditate on You and then pass from this body, that will be perfection."

Over the last months of his life in this world, Śrīla Prabhupāda taught how it is possible to meet death step by step in Kṛṣṇa consciousness. In his last days, he told one of his sannyāsīs, "Don't think this isn't going to happen to you." Prabhupāda came into this world, on Kṛṣṇa's request, to teach us how to live a pure life of Kṛṣṇa consciousness, and that includes how to finally pass away from this world to attain eternal life. Prabhupāda underwent death in a way that was perfect and glorious, and at the same time in a way which we can all follow. When we have to go, we can cling to the memory of how a great soul left his body—always thinking of Kṛṣṇa, surrounding himself with the medicine of chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa, always desiring to hear about Kṛṣṇa, and practicing detachment from the misery of the material condition. This last lesson was one of the most wonderful and important instructions Śrīla Prabhupāda gave us. He taught by his life, by his books, and at the end by his dying. Education in how to die is meant especially for the human being. An animal dies, and a human being also dies; but a human being is supposed to understand the process of going back to the spiritual world at the time of death. Remaining always fixed and undisturbed in Kṛṣṇa consciousness, Śrīla Prabhupāda expertly taught the process. His passing away, therefore, was a perfect lesson, and one that can be faithfully followed.

While there was nothing lamentable for Śrīla Prabhupāda in his departing from the world and going back to Godhead, it was certainly lamentable for his followers and for the people of the whole world, who became bereft of the presence of their greatest well-wisher and benefactor. Śrīla Prabhupāda had written in a Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam purport, "When the mortal body of the spiritual master expires, the disciple should cry exactly like the queen cries when the king leaves his body." At the departure of his own spiritual master, Śrīla Prabhupāda had written, "On that day, O my Master, I made a cry of grief; I was not able to tolerate the absence of you, my guru." And so on November 14, 1977, as the powerful news spread around the world, those who knew and loved Śrīla Prabhupāda were gripped by a fearful, unrestricted grief. They saw everything around them in the overwhelming atmosphere of separation from Śrīla Prabhupāda. They turned for solace to Śrīla Prabhupāda's books.

However, the disciples and the spiritual master are never separated, because the spiritual master always keeps company with the disciple, as long as the disciple follows the instructions of the spiritual master. This is called the association of vāṇī. Physical presence is called vapuḥ. As long as the spiritual master is physically present, the disciple should serve the physical body of the spiritual master, and when the spiritual master is no longer physically existing, the disciples should serve the instructions of the spiritual master.

Śrīla Prabhupāda's disciples were already carrying out his instructions, but now they would have to do so without the vapuḥ, without the opportunity of regularly seeing and being with him. At first this was very difficult for them to face, but those who were sincere soon realized that Śrīla Prabhupāda had, upon his departure, given them the greatest gift of all: service in separation.

Service in separation is the highest realization and ecstasy. This was the teaching of Lord Caitanya Mahāprabhu, in regard to Lord Kṛṣṇa and His foremost devotees, the gopīs of Vṛndāvana. When Kṛṣṇa left His beloved gopīs and went to Mathurā, never to return to them in Vṛndāvana, the gopīs (and all the other residents of Vṛndāvana) wept piteously in separation. They so much loved Kṛṣṇa that they could not live without Him, and to maintain their lives they began to constantly remember and discuss His name, fame, form, and entourage. By constantly remembering Him in love and by anticipating His return to Vṛndāvana, they achieved an ecstasy of union in separation, which Gauḍīya Vaiṣṇava scholars declare to be superior even to the ecstasy the gopīs felt in Kṛṣṇa's presence. Because Kṛṣṇa is absolute, even remembering Him or chanting His name puts the devotee into direct contact with Him. But because there is simultaneously a feeling of separation from Him, there is an added dimension of inconceivable, simultaneous union and separation. This is the epitome of Kṛṣṇa conscious realization.

Prabhupāda's followers knew this principle of service in separation, technically known as vipralambha-sevā, but to most devotees it was a theoretical realization. Before one can feel intense loving separation from Kṛṣṇa, one must first feel intense attraction to Him. But for the conditioned soul who has forgotten and abandoned Kṛṣṇa and has come to the material world under the spell of māyā, illusion—for him, “separation” from Kṛṣṇa is based on complete ignorance and forgetfulness.

In coming to spiritual life, a neophyte first begins to awaken to the very existence of God, as he overcomes atheistic misconceptions. Next, he comes gradually, through practice, to take up a relationship of service to Kṛṣṇa, through serving the spiritual master. Intense love of Kṛṣṇa in separation is the most advanced stage and cannot possibly be realized in full by the neophyte. Thus service in separation had remained a theoretical teaching to many of Prabhupāda's followers.

But when Śrīla Prabhupāda departed from the world and left his disciples to carry on his mission, they immediately realized union with him in separation. He was gone, but he was still very much present. This realization was not a pretention or a myth, nor was it sentimental psychic phenomena—telepathy, “communion with the dead,” or so on. It was a completely substantive, practical, palpable reality, a fact of life. Śrīla Prabhupāda had given them personal service, and now they would continue that service. Prabhupāda was still present through his instructions, and all the nectar of his direct association—all the nectar of Kṛṣṇa consciousness that he had given and shared with them—was still available.

Service in separation for Prabhupāda's disciples was undoubtedly a fact, otherwise, now that they were without his personal presence, how were they able to sustain themselves in spiritual life? The fact that they could continue as before, increase their feelings of devotion, and even increase their serving capacity, meant that Śrīla Prabhupāda was very much still with them. As Śrīla Prabhupāda's last instruction was the lesson of how a human being should die, he now taught, beyond dying, how to practically implement the highest philosophical teachings of Gauḍīya Vaiṣṇavism.

This realization gave the devotees great hope that Śrīla Prabhupāda and the revolutionary life of Kṛṣṇa consciousness he had brought with him were not finished upon his departure. Often when a great personality dies, his contribution collapses; but Śrīla Prabhupāda's presence remained and expanded, sustaining his devotees' lives. He was still in charge.

EPILOGUE

In describing how the followers of His Divine Grace A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami Prabhupāda continue to relish the nectar of serving him in separation, we are not speaking of only a small band of several thousand devotees whom he initiated during his lifetime. Śrīla Prabhupāda was not only an ācārya, but he was the founder-ācārya of the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement, which is a dynamic spiritual reality. That reality is nothing less than the yuga-dharma, or the form of spiritual life recommended for all humanity in the present age of Kali, the most dangerous of ages, in which humanity eventually abandons all religious principles.

The ultimate goal of human life was taught by Lord Kṛṣṇa in the Bhagavad-gītā, when He declared, “Abandon all varieties of religion and just surrender unto Me. I shall deliver you from all sinful reaction. Do not fear.” Kṛṣṇa taught this five thousand years ago, when He appeared in the world, but people have misinterpreted and misunderstood what Kṛṣṇa meant. Lord Caitanya advented, therefore, to revive the original message of surrender to Kṛṣṇa, primarily by introducing the saṅkīrtana movement of chanting the holy names of God.

Bhaktivinoda Ṭhākura, a great devotee of Lord Caitanya appearing in the nineteenth century, foresaw that Lord Caitanya's saṅkīrtana principles could and would be introduced all over the world. He had studied deeply many other religions and philosophies, but he felt that Lord Caitanya's saṅkīrtana was universal, the essence of religious life able to unite all people and bring them to perfection. Bhaktivinoda Ṭhākura's son was Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī, who became the spiritual master of Śrīla Prabhupāda and who ordered Śrīla Prabhupāda to implement the vision of worldwide Kṛṣṇa consciousness by going to preach in the West.

A. C. Bhaktivedānta Swami Prabhupāda is, therefore, to be appreciated not only as the guru of a few intimate servants or even the guru of a single generation of disciples. As the founder-ācārya of the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement, he introduced the standard of Kṛṣṇa consciousness as it can be practiced by all sincere followers for thousands of years to come.

The scriptures predict that although the present age is constantly becoming more inauspicious, unfortunate, and degraded, for a period of ten thousand years from the time of Lord Caitanya's advent a golden age of Kṛṣṇa consciousness can appear, despite the force of Kali-yuga. Śrīla Prabhupāda, therefore, prepared his translations and Bhaktivedānta purports on the essential Vaiṣṇava scriptures—Bhagavad-gītā, Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, Caitanya-caritāmṛta, and Bhakti-rasāmṛta-sindhu—with the plan that they would form the foundation of the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement for ten thousand years.

We cannot limit Śrīla Prabhupāda, therefore, by describing him only within the drama of his being the guru for one generation of followers. Śrīla Prabhupāda is jagad-guru, the spiritual master of the entire world. He is a bona fide spiritual master, faithfully conveying the message of the disciplic succession from Lord Kṛṣṇa, as he received it in paramparā from his spiritual master. But more than that, he was empowered by Kṛṣṇa to do what no other spiritual master has ever done. He is the founder-ācārya for spreading Lord Caitanya's saṅkīrtana worldwide in the midst of the age of Kali.

Anyone who wants shelter from the evil effects of the present godless age can have it by taking up devotional service under the guidance of Lord Caitanya's teachings as given by Prabhupāda. The dynamic preaching and realizations of Śrīla Prabhupāda reveal the sublime teachings of Lord Caitanya, which otherwise have been neglected, misused, and kept within the confines of India. Śrīla Prabhupāda was actually able to understand Lord Caitanya's prediction that Kṛṣṇa consciousness would spread to every town and village in the world.

Śrīla Prabhupāda had faith in these words and personally saw in his lifetime that pure Kṛṣṇa consciousness could be adopted by people of all races and cultures, even those considered by Vedic standards to be aborigines and outcasts. Through the applications of Śrīla Prabhupāda, therefore, the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement is now proven to be viable for anyone, anywhere in the world.

Anyone can serve Śrīla Prabhupāda in separation. He asked all his followers to avoid four sinful activities—meat-eating, intoxication, illicit sex, and gambling—and to chant the Hare Kṛṣṇa mantra a minimum of sixteen rounds daily on beads. He also advised that one regularly read Vedic literatures such as Bhagavad-gītā As It Is and Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam. And for keeping spiritual health and strength to follow the spiritual principles, he advised that one associate with like-minded devotees. Whoever follows these basic practices and recognizes Śrīla Prabhupāda as the direct representative of Kṛṣṇa is his follower. And the Vedic scriptures say that only by serving the representative of Kṛṣṇa can one become dear to Kṛṣṇa Himself.

The ways of serving Kṛṣṇa are unlimited, as Śrīla Prabhupāda expertly displayed. He invited scientists, artists, philosophers, and businessmen to serve Kṛṣṇa according to their occupations and capabilities. The artist, instead of painting pictures out of his imagination or making renderings of the material energy, can paint pictures depicting Kṛṣṇa in the spiritual world. The poet can describe Kṛṣṇa as the Absolute Truth; the philosopher can explain Kṛṣṇa as the cause of all causes; the scientist can prove that life comes from life; and the businessman can contribute money to the worthiest welfare activity of Kṛṣṇa consciousness. A person does not, therefore, have to abandon his family or retreat to a solitary cave to realize God. In any situation of life one can move from mundane to spiritual by adopting the practices of Kṛṣṇa consciousness. This is the broad and liberal way Śrīla Prabhupāda intended Kṛṣṇa consciousness to pervade society.

The International Society for Krishna Consciousness, Prabhupāda's own society of devotees, is meant to help all persons interested in developing spiritual life under Śrīla Prabhupāda's guidance. ISKCON was Prabhupāda's organization for establishing and proliferating temple worship, book printing and distribution, and communities where devotees could live and serve together in close association. Prabhupāda therefore entrusted all his properties, including the magnificent temples he had built in India, to ISKCON, for the protection and perpetuation of his work. And he instructed his disciples to show their love for him by always cooperating among themselves to expand further the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement.

When a disciple expressed his appreciation of Prabhupāda's magnificent quarters in Bombay, Prabhupāda replied, "I cannot take these with me. I am leaving them for you to use."

The essential gifts of Kṛṣṇa consciousness which Prabhupāda brought are for everyone. Although most people do not know it, they are actually hankering for the happiness of genuine spiritual life. Prabhupāda, out of compassion, wanted to distribute the gifts of Kṛṣṇa consciousness to all the hungry people in the world. These gifts—peace of mind, satisfaction, freedom from anxiety—can be obtained by anyone who takes wholeheartedly to devotional service to the Supreme Personality of Godhead. This pure, happy state can be realized by receiving the ongoing, dynamic legacy which Prabhupāda left: his books, his devotees, his Kṛṣṇa consciousness society, and his method of expertly applying Kṛṣṇa consciousness to every situation in the modern context. Whoever intelligently takes up the practice of Kṛṣṇa consciousness will also inherit the most wonderful realization in his relationship with Śrīla Prabhupāda, the pure devotee of Kṛṣṇa.

We hope that the Śrīla Prabhupāda-līlāmṛta will help the readers in establishing their relationship with Śrīla Prabhupāda. Its contribution is in the mood of remembering Śrīla Prabhupāda in separation. Remembering his pastimes puts one into direct contact with him and with the Supreme Personality of Godhead, and this remembrance can free one from bondage to material life and enable one to taste the nectar of the eternal pastimes of Kṛṣṇa and His associates in the spiritual world.

Śrīla Prabhupāda's life did not end on November 14, 1977. And we hope that the readers of Śrīla Prabhupāda-līlāmṛta will not feel they have finished their connection with this literature by having read it once. Śrīla Prabhupāda-līlāmṛta can be read regularly, from beginning to end. Our hope is that by hearing about Śrīla Prabhupāda the reader will become himself a Prabhupādānuga, a follower of Śrīla Prabhupāda. We can wish no better fortune upon anyone.

THUS ENDS THE SIXTH VOLUME OF THE ŚRĪLA PRABHUPĀDA-LĪLĀMṚTA, COMPLETED ON NOVEMBER 9, 1982, IN THE KĀRTIKA SEASON, AT THE ISKCON KRISHNA-BALARAM MANDIR IN VṚNDĀVANA.

CHAPTER FIFTY-SIX

Volume 7 - Extra's

Return to America

= San Francisco

December 14, 1967

As soon as Śrīla Prabhupāda came into view, many devotees began to cry out or shed tears. He looked much healthier, tanned from the sun, spritely. He waved and smiled. That smile made them still more eager, and they could hardly contain themselves while Prabhupāda patiently waited for a customs official to inspect his bags.

When Prabhupāda had left America, his disciples had been uncertain whether they would ever see him again. He had suffered a paralyzing stroke in New York and had gone back to India to recuperate. If he were going to die, he had said, the best place in the world was Vṛndāvana. But soon in his letters from India came news of his returning strength. Kṛṣṇa had saved him. Now he was back. They needed him; if they were to represent him and spread Kṛṣṇa consciousness, then they needed more association with Kṛṣṇa's pure devotee.

Jayānanda drove him from the airport in an old limousine decorated with flowers. Prabhupāda would be staying in an apartment in the brahmacārīs' house on Willard Street, about two blocks from the storefront temple on Frederick Street. As he approached the door of his apartment, he saw the picture of Lord Viṣṇu, taped to the inside of the glass, facing him. Although the devotees had debated about the picture because Lord Viṣṇu had not been colored blue, Prabhupāda joined his palms together in the praṇāma gesture and, slightly bowing his head, passed Lord Viṣṇu and entered the house.

The devotees gathered excitedly in Prabhupāda's room. One of them had read about a Vaiṣṇava ceremony of washing the feet of the spiritual master, so they had prepared a pitcher of water and a bowl. Prabhupāda permitted it, and in a few seconds it was done. Then he sat facing a crowded room of intimate devotees. Taking his karatālas and playing them softly and sweetly, he led a Hare Kṛṣṇa kīrtana. It was no ordinary thing how Prabhupāda sang and how they listened and chanted in response with fastened, ecstatic attention. But it was brief.

Afterwards, he began to speak of Kṛṣṇa. He said that Kṛṣṇa is the Supreme Personality of Godhead and everyone's best friend. Even a good friendship in this world is a small indication of Kṛṣṇa's friendship, because everything is coming from Kṛṣṇa. If you feel good on a nice spring day, that is an indication of Kṛṣṇa. The smell of an aromatic flower—that is Kṛṣṇa. Whatever is good in this world is Kṛṣṇa, and all that is bad comes from forgetfulness of Kṛṣṇa. Prabhupāda spoke with a kind, gentle, and humble attitude.

He had brought back some gifts. For the ladies he had sārīs. He held up the thin cotton cloths one at a time, called the name of each initiated girl disciple, and handed her a sārī. One sārī was white with a red and black design, others were white with single-color borders. In a small saffron cloth Prabhupāda had three silken garlands. He unwrapped them, saying, "These can be tied around the necks of Lord Jagannātha, Subhadrā, and Balarāma." Previous to this, the deities had received no dresses or decorations.

Mukunda and Śyāmasundara came forward to show Prabhupāda their first American-made karatālas. Months ago Prabhupāda had suggested that they might make karatālas in America, and the men had analyzed the metals in the Indian karatālas, gathered the ingredients from scrapyards, taken them to a foundry, and had them molded into a finished product. Prabhupāda took the first pair of American karatālas in his hand, hit them together a few times, and pronounced, "Not so great." Again he took up his own beautifully polished brass karatālas from India. Striking them together once, he let them ring for a long time. "This is great," he said.

Then, looking around the room, Prabhupāda engaged in friendly little exchanges with his disciples. Seeing Līlāvatī sitting in a corner with her baby daughter, Subhadrā, Prabhupāda said, "Your daughter looks just like Subhadrā." Līlāvatī sighed gratefully to hear it. "Govinda dāsī," Prabhupāda said, "I am always thinking of your paintings."

Prabhupāda asked whether all the devotees were chanting their prescribed sixteen rounds daily. Almost everyone replied, "Yes, Swamiji." One new devotee, however, an English girl whose face turned bright red, began to stammer in a faltering voice. "I chant..." she said, "I chant..." and then suddenly blurting out like a little girl about to cry, "Sometimes I chant more than sixteen rounds a day!" Her voice cracked, and she seemed on the brink of tears, but the devotees and Prabhupāda could not help from laughing. In Prabhupāda's presence it all seemed jovial. Uddhava dāsa came into the room and announced, "We have some prasādam for you, Swamiji. Would you like to take now?"

"What?" asked Prabhupāda. "A little rice?" The devotees began to laugh, thinking of the elaborate feast they had prepared for Prabhupāda.

Prabhupāda had one more thing to show them in his bag. It was a coconut grater commonly used in Bengali households. Prabhupāda gave it to Yamunā, who began to grate a coconut while the devotees watched. Surrounded by his devotees, Prabhupāda then went to the kitchen and prepared coconut laddus made from the white coconut pulp, butter, sugar, black pepper, cardamom, and camphor flavor. He rolled them into balls, ate one himself, and distributed a few.

Prabhupāda returned to his room, where he sat down again and was silent. Sensing that he should be left alone, the devotees excused themselves from his presence. Everyone was satisfied. Prabhupāda was back, and they would have him for a while.

Jīvānanda: After everybody left, I stayed behind to talk to him, and seeing me just kind of sitting there, he put me to work and made me clean up his room. I began to pick up the paper and stuff and throw away all the boxes. So afterwards Prabhupāda said, "So you have some question?" And I said, "Yes, Swamiji. I would like to get married to Harṣarāṇī." He said, "Oh. Who are you?" I said, "I am Jīvānanda." He said, "Oh, you have been initiated?" I said, "Yes." He said, "By me?" and I said, "Yes." He said, "That's very nice. What do you do?" I said, "Well, when I was in Santa Fe, I used to milk the cows." He said, "That is very nice." We talked some more, and then I said, "Swamiji, can I get married?" He said, "I will think about it. You can ask me again later."

Cidānanda: That evening I went to his room to see him, as I felt he might be lonely. I went into his room to try to keep him company, but as soon as I got there he started talking about Kṛṣṇa. There were some Brijabasi posters of Kṛṣṇa on the wall, and he would point to them and explain a little, saying, "Here is Kṛṣṇa and Arjuna on the Battlefield of Kurukṣetra." He talked, and I didn't have a chance to say anything, but he just talked about the posters on the wall. I got the feeling that we had known each other from some other time, although this was the first time I was seeing him. Yet he seemed like an old friend. He was certainly magnanimous and cordial as he sat there and talked about Kṛṣṇa. I felt that if he was an old friend, then maybe I would know this to be a fact some day. But my attention span was not very long, and I really didn't know very much about the life of Kṛṣṇa, so I left after a short period of time.

Prabhupāda had a small band of disciples in San Francisco—not more than fifteen—but they were becoming intensely attached to him, especially since his poignant departure and now his return into their midst. Each of them wanted to engage more in Prabhupāda's personal service, although only his secretaries, Gaurasundara and Govinda dāśī, and his servant, Upendra, were allowed to be with him constantly. One of the devotees asked Prabhupāda about feeling envy toward those devotees who seemed to be especially favored. Everyone, Prabhupāda replied, from Lord Brahmā and Indra down to the insignificant ant, is sometimes envious. No one wants to tolerate another person's advancement or an other person's taking an exalted position. And it is a fact, Prabhupāda said, that if we find a person excelling in a field or serving the spiritual master, then that person is very fortunate by Kṛṣṇa's arrangement. But in the spiritual world there is not envy over such a thing. Rather, in the spiritual world everyone is pleased and excited to see that one person is in a more advanced position. They are enthused and gladdened by it. But in the material world there is always competitive nature and envy. His words pacified them. If Prabhupāda allowed someone to serve him, they would accept it as the arrangement of Kṛṣṇa.

But everyone got a chance to accompany Swamiji on his morning walks. They were open to whoever wanted to go. Usually one or two of the brahmacārīs and one or two householder couples would accompany him. They would drive Prabhupāda to the park in the temple's car, a 1952 blue Ford coupe. Usually Jayānanda would drive the car. The passenger seat was broken and tilted back at a forty-five-degree angle to the ground, and although Prabhupāda sat up straight, his chin held high, the seat slanted so much that he could only see out of the lowest part of the window. But it was the only car they had, and Prabhupāda never complained.

He began his old routine of daily walking around Stowe Lake in Golden Gate Park. Healthy, free, and spontaneous, always in command, talking and preaching, Prabhupāda seemed very happy to be back in San Francisco. And there were also new devotees who were seeing him for the first time.

For about the first week on his morning walks, Prabhupāda talked frequently about the existence of the soul, explaining Kṛṣṇa's arguments in the Bhagavad-gītā.

One morning a car was parked near where they walked, and seated in the driver's seat was a dejected-looking man who sat slumped over, with a long, drawn, unhappy face. Day after day this car appeared there, and the man sat unhappily while the devotees walked past in the company of Śrīla Prabhupāda. Finally, after about a week, Prabhupāda one day broke away from the group of devotees and approached the man's car. The car window was rolled up, but on seeing Prabhupāda, the man rolled down the window. Prabhupāda greeted him, "Good morning." The man smiled, happy to see Prabhupāda, as if he had never noticed Prabhupāda and the devotees walking by day after day. Prabhupāda then rejoined his disciples and continued walking. They looked back and saw that the deep unhappiness in the man's face had vanished and he appeared happier. They did not see him any more on the morning walks. Among themselves the devotees discussed these things or kept the impressions privately in their hearts. After a little incident like that of the man sitting slumped in his car, they were even more convinced that Swamiji had the power and ability to make people happy, and that he really wanted to do it.

One morning Prabhupāda arrived in the park, stepped out of his car, and waited for the devotees who had come in another car to join him. Līlāvati had difficulty getting out of the car because she had her baby, Subhadrā, in a carrier on her back. When she finally did get out of the car, Prabhupāda turned and laughed at her, saying, "Ah, burden of affection." "Yes, Swamiji," Līlāvati replied. They all began to walk together along the path.

"So there are two ways to carry a baby," Prabhupāda said, tapping his cane on the ground in time with his regular stride. "There is the monkey way and the cat way. Do you know this?"

"No, Swamiji," said Līlāvati.

"Well, which way do you think is better?" Prabhupāda asked her. "The monkey way or the cat way?" She couldn't understand or imagine what he meant. Prabhupāda continued, "The monkey baby climbs on the back of the mother and holds on, and this is the way he travels. And the kitten is carried in the teeth of the mother. So which is better?"

Līlāvātī could still not understand which way could be better; they both sounded very difficult to her.

"Well," Prabhupāda said, "the monkey baby is very small and very weak, and he is holding on to the mother by his own strength. But the kitten is being supported by the strength of the mother. So which way do you think is better?"

And then she understood. "The cat way is better."

"Yes," Prabhupāda said, "that is the difference between the yogī and the devotee. The yogī is trying to climb on the back of the Absolute Truth by his own strength, but he is very weak, so he will fall. But a devotee, he cries out for Kṛṣṇa"—and as he spoke the word Kṛṣṇa, Prabhupāda held his arms up high and looked up at the clear morning sky—"A devotee cries out for Kṛṣṇa, and Kṛṣṇa picks him up."

Another time a devotee picked a pretty bluish-colored flower and handed it to Prabhupāda. Prabhupāda took it, smelled it, then held it far away and looked at it, saying, "Oh, this is like a beautiful man without any qualifications." He then tossed it away. It had no aroma.

Upendra liked to ask Swamiji questions on the morning walks.

"Swamiji," Upendra asked, "what does the spiritual master or pure devotee see as he walks through the park?"

"He sees Kṛṣṇa," Prabhupāda replied. "He thinks that these are Kṛṣṇa's trees, and this is Kṛṣṇa's house. He sees everything as belonging to the Supreme Lord."

"But if Kṛṣṇa is everywhere," Upendra pursued, "does the pure devotee see Kṛṣṇa on the wall on the right and then the wall on the left or in the corner or in between every atom? Does he see one form of Kṛṣṇa merge into another? Where does one form of Kṛṣṇa begin and take off from the other form?"

"No, it is not like that," Prabhupāda said. "Do you see my spectacles?"

"Yes," said Upendra.

"So whose spectacles are they?" Prabhupāda asked.

"They are yours."

Prabhupāda pointed to his shoes. "And what is that?"

"Those are your shoes," said Upendra.

"Yes," Prabhupāda said. "Similarly, a pure devotee sees Kṛṣṇa like that. Everything is Kṛṣṇa's. This is how he sees Kṛṣṇa everywhere." Near the end of the walk, when Prabhupāda had answered many questions, Upendra asked again, "Swamiji, you've spoken to us so much, but I forget most of it. If a devotee becomes Kṛṣṇa conscious, will he remember everything the spiritual master says?"

"Yes," Prabhupāda replied. "It is all there. Not only that, but when a person becomes Kṛṣṇa conscious, he will be able to see his relationship with Kṛṣṇa."

Walking through Golden Gate Park one day, they heard a scratching coming from a garbage can. Prabhupāda went over and looked in, then pulled back in repulsion. A big city rat had somehow become trapped in the garbage can and was scratching, trying to get out. Prabhupāda shook his head and said, "He is doomed." He walked on. Prabhupāda commented that later the garbagemen would come, see the rat, and kill him. Prabhupāda was always after the philosophical and Kṛṣṇa conscious meaning; even a seemingly ordinary comment about the rat's doom struck his disciples as deep and philosophical. They could understand that their position was similar: they were trapped in the material world, waiting for the end, but Prabhupāda was saving them.

On his return from India, after taking part in the first evening kīrtana in the San Francisco temple, Prabhupāda said, "You have all advanced." He saw that the devotees had become more enthusiastic and ecstatic—guests were also rising and dancing—and that pleased his own Kṛṣṇa consciousness.

Each night after kīrtana he would lecture. He was discussing the verses in the sixth chapter of Bhagavad-gītā. "I am making here a series of lectures on the Kṛṣṇa conscious yoga system," Prabhupāda wrote to Brahmānanda in mid-December of 1967, "and they are tape recorded."

Prabhupāda thought of assembling the lectures into a small book. Indian gurus introducing self-styled techniques were increasingly popular in the U.S. Therefore Prabhupāda wanted to distinguish the standard form of yoga and meditation, as taught by Lord Kṛṣṇa in the Bhagavad-gītā, from the farce taught by gurus who never mention Kṛṣṇa as the Supreme Personality of Godhead but rather say everyone is equal to God, and whose disciples are allowed to indulge their senses in intoxication and illicit sex. They give a mantra for a fee, Prabhupāda noted, and claim that by meditating twenty minutes in the morning you can become God in six months. He was surprised that American people, who were supposedly intelligent, were being so easily cheated. "We have actually seen such so-called yogīs," Prabhupāda said, "sleeping and snoring while meditating."

"Service begins by the tongue," Prabhupāda said in one of his December '67 lectures, "by chanting this Hare Kṛṣṇa, and by the taste of kṛṣṇa-prasādam. The beginning process is very nice. If prasādam is offered to you, accept it. If you become submissive and give service, by these two practices, Kṛṣṇa will reveal Himself to you—just like Kṛṣṇa is revealing Himself to Arjuna. Arjuna is a devotee, he is a friend: 'I am speaking to you that old system of yoga, bhakti-yoga.' Only one who has developed the service spirit with love and devotion, he can understand Kṛṣṇa."

After the lecture Prabhupāda would continue the theme, Kṛṣṇa consciousness, in his room. It was the same theme as on his morning walks, in his letters, or in his intimate talks with individual disciples or visitors; it was the theme of his writing, and the very heartbeat of his life. When a devotee asked Prabhupāda how the soul is carried from body to body, Prabhupāda replied, "By desire," and cited himself as an example. "Just like I have come to America. Why? Because I wanted to preach. So by that desire I was carried here. Otherwise, I have no business to come here."

Cidānanda: There would be three, four, or five devotees in his room, and he would just start talking. They would somehow gather in his room, and he would start talking about what he was trying to do. His talk was not directed specifically to anyone, but he was saying that this is what he was doing. He made everything very clear. He wanted to publish his books. He was trying to get a press for this back in New York. And if he had a letter from Rāya Rāma in New York, he would read the letter right there. In this way it was allaying any doubts in people's minds about what he was really going to try to do. He had his books and the temple. He was concerned about the temple and the new lunch program, where we were giving out free prasādam. His concern kept everybody going. Before he came, there wasn't that much activity. But when Prabhupāda came, things started bustling very fast.

One night in his room on Willard Street, Prabhupāda was talking about seeing Kṛṣṇa. "Don't try to see Him," Prabhupāda said, "but act in such a way that He will come and see you... Sūradāsa was a blind man, yet due to his sincere chanting—"O Kṛṣṇa, Kṛṣṇa, Kṛṣṇa"—Kṛṣṇa came to see him. So Kṛṣṇa is there whether we see Him or not. All we must do is become sincere, and He will present Himself whether we see Him or not. Kṛṣṇa hugs the cow. What does a cow know? He is a dumb animal. Is the cow as great as Arjuna? No. Yet due to the cow's sincerity to come and lick Kṛṣṇa's body, Kṛṣṇa says, "Oh, yes, My dear cow, come, and I shall take care of you." And Kṛṣṇa gives him some sweet nectar. So we should want Kṛṣṇa to come and see us, not that you should want to see Kṛṣṇa."

At that time, few devotees were very well read in Prabhupāda's books. They didn't know the vastness of the philosophy. Only a few books were published, and so Prabhupāda in person was the real source of Kṛṣṇa conscious knowledge.

Eighteen-year-old Kim used to have philosophical arguments with his atheistic father and then invariably have questions for Prabhupāda at the end of the lectures. He would ask so consistently that Prabhupāda would turn to him and say, "Are there any questions?" Given a good question, Prabhupāda might launch into another impromptu lecture.

Kim's sister, who was only sixteen, also wanted to get initiated. "Are there offenses in the spiritual world?" she asked Prabhupāda at one evening lecture. Prabhupāda turned to the audience. "See?" he said. "This little girl, she wants to go back to Godhead." And in the course of the answer, he said, "Kṛṣṇa may kiss you." When he said that, Kim's sister blushed, and everyone laughed.

Upendra asked, "Swamiji, how should we feel humble? I feel sometimes that when I try to be humble I first think about it, and then I try to be humble. But it seems artificial."

"This is humbleness," Prabhupāda said. "When we think, 'Oh, I should have done it this way'—that is good. Because then there is always room for improvement. If you go on thinking, 'Oh, I did not perform this duty so nicely. I should have done it this way,' then you will improve. Our love for Kṛṣṇa keeps growing as long as we think that we are not doing the most for Kṛṣṇa and that we must do more. This is humbleness. If you think, "Oh, I did this so wonderfully. I am such a nice and sincere devotee," then this is not good. There will be no improvement."

If, in questioning, anyone brought up the names and philosophies of famous contemporary Māyāvādīs, Prabhupāda would become angry. He was adamantly against the mission of the Māyāvādīs, who deny the absolute reality of Kṛṣṇa. Prabhupāda expressed that they had greatly damaged the original Vedic culture by spreading misleading doctrines. One time Mālatī brought up the subject of certain Māyāvādī teachings, and Prabhupāda, as usual, argued strongly. Afterwards Upendra chastised Mālatī, saying that she shouldn't have brought it up because Prabhupāda was still recuperating in his health. In his excitement his blood pressure might rise too much. Mālatī was silent, but later gave Upendra a letter to be delivered to Prabhupāda. "What have you said to Mālatī," Prabhupāda asked after reading her letter, "that now she no longer feels she can come before me?" Upendra explained how he had corrected her for inciting Prabhupāda too much. It was nonsense, Prabhupāda said, and he told Upendra to apologize to her.

Uddhava confided to Kim that he felt left out because he never had any questions to ask Prabhupāda. Kim encouraged him. One night Uddhava finally asked, but it was a strange question. "Swamiji," said Uddhava, "what is Rādhārāṇī's relationship with Kṛṣṇa's brother, Balarāma?"

Prabhupāda was annoyed: "Why are you asking that? You don't even understand the basic principle of the Bhagavad-gītā. You don't understand the nature of the soul and the Supersoul or Kṛṣṇa and devotional service, and yet you are asking questions like this?" For a long while Uddhava didn't ask again.

Shortly after Prabhupāda's arrival he continued the process of initiating disciples. Kim and his younger sister were initiated at the same time. A few days before, Kim had suggested his sister should go to Prabhupāda's apartment and ask to be his disciple.

"Are you following the four rules?" Prabhupāda asked.

"Yes," she replied. And then he said it was all right.

"I just wanted to say something else," she continued, "that is, I heard that you had taken birth because in your last life you had been a physician and had killed a snake for some medical purpose."

Prabhupāda laughed. "Oh, your brother has told you that?"

"Yeah," she replied. No more was said about it. Kim was given the name Kṛṣṇadāsa, and Prabhupāda also initiated a few disciples who had written from New York. He performed the initiation ceremony in the temple and chanted on everyone's beads, including the New York disciples'. That night he also spoke for a few moments on the telephone with Brahmānanda in New York and told him, "I have returned by the grace of Kṛṣṇa, and I am now fit to serve you."

Prabhupāda said he was fit to serve the devotees, and he certainly looked and acted wonderfully. But he was still feeling the effects of his stroke of half a year ago. There was a persistent ringing sound, like a bell, in his head, and he couldn't sleep more than three hours at night and one in the day. But he pushed on as always. He even wrote a letter to a disciple pointing out that although he had disturbance in his head, he was continuing to work on the transcendental plane; and he advised his disciples to do likewise.

Prabhupāda again took up his translating of the Third Canto of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, which he had put aside for half a year. Living in the same house with the brahmacārīs, he would wake before any of them and work at his translating. Then after they rose around five, they would hear him ringing a bell in his room, and they would smell incense. Because of their proximity, the boys would often drop by his room. They would watch Prabhupāda sitting at his desk, fresh from his morning shower. He would meticulously place several tiny spoonfuls of water in his left palm and then rub a ball of Vṛndāvana clay into his palm, making the mixture for Vaiṣṇava tilaka. Using a hand mirror, he would artistically make the markings of tilaka—first on his forehead and then on eleven other parts of the body—as directed by the Vaiṣṇava smṛti. Prabhupāda would then hold his brāhmaṇa thread and silently say the Gāyatrī mantras, while facing the pictures of Kṛṣṇa he had on a little altar.

One day, while sitting with Prabhupāda in the morning, Upendra mentioned that the brahmacārīs put their tilaka on while in the bathroom.

“No,” said Prabhupāda, “tilaka should be put on in front of Kṛṣṇa, like this.”

“Well,” Upendra said, “here I've seen them putting it on in the bathroom.”

“Do not worry too much about the rules and regulations. Just get everyone to chant Hare Kṛṣṇa.”

One thing Prabhupāda liked about California was that it was easy for him to obtain eucalyptus twigs there. Prabhupāda used them for brushing his teeth in the morning. He liked them cut the thickness of the little finger and about six inches long, and they were soaked in water overnight before he used them. At this time Kṛṣṇadāsa was going out in the morning to pick them. He would keep a good supply wrapped up in tin foil in the refrigerator. Hearing that eucalyptus trees were uncommon in America, Prabhupāda had asked Kṛṣṇadāsa to send him a supply wherever he traveled.

These sometimes small and domestic dealings of Prabhupāda with his disciples may be seen by someone outside of devotional service as of little consequence, but to the devotee they are always important, because the devotee holds the pleasure of his spiritual master as the supreme value in life. If the spiritual master, Kṛṣṇa's representative, is pleased by even a little service, then that means that Kṛṣṇa is pleased. For the most part, Prabhupāda's disciples simply knew that they loved him, loved serving him, and felt great satisfaction and bliss when he showed his pleasure with them.

Govinda dāśī: He needed some house slippers. I saw that. So I went and bought him some house slippers. He told me he wore size eight. I got him some all-man-made slippers in San Francisco. They were black with red fluffy, furry lining, so that they were easy to slip on the feet. Whenever he would walk around the house you could hear this nice little shuffling sound. He would have his hands behind his back and his head held high.

Although some of the devotees had their own idea that Prabhupāda should go on a special diet, he didn't think much of it. He wanted his regular prasādam—dāl, rice, capātīs, and sabjī. Upendra was regularly cooking these staples. But one day Yamunā came into the kitchen and asked Upendra if she could cook a special lunch for Prabhupāda. He stepped back and allowed her. Yamunā was learning the art of Indian cooking. She made extra preparations, sour, spicy, and sweet. Upendra brought in the tray as usual, without any comment. A few moments later Prabhupāda rang his bell, calling for Upendra.

"Who has made this prasādam?" Prabhupāda asked, looking up as he sat on a cushion before a small table which held his lunch.

"Yamunā-devī cooked it, Swamiji," said Upendra.

"I do not want such fancy things," said Prabhupāda. "I want to eat simply. A little rice, a little dāl, like that." He wasn't very pleased with the special feast; he was used to eating the same simple thing every day. Upendra continued to cook like that, occasionally creating variety by cooking kichrī and fried eggplant in cuddy sauce once a week. But Upendra was also extravagant. Prabhupāda confided to Gaurasundara, "That Upendra is using too much ghee, so that I cannot taste the prasādam before it slips down my throat. It is too slippery."

One of the devotees who had been with Prabhupāda in India wrote that Swamiji should not be given sweets. Prabhupāda didn't think much of that either, as he had introduced coconut laḍḍus on the first evening of his return.

Upendra: He gave us the recipe that you grate the coconut and cook it in a pot, along with some sugar and camphor, and cook it and cook it until it comes to a certain thickness, and then it can be squeezed into balls and offered in this way. So he was giving this instruction to me, and I was following. The stove was an old-fashioned type that allowed for one half of the stove to be covered with a safety cover. While I cooked, Prabhupāda leaned against the corner of the stove with his elbows, his chin resting in his hands, and he leaned and watched me stir. He got up and walked away and then came back, just like a restless young boy. He walked around the kitchen and then returned to look into the pot, stirring it to see if it was done. He asked, "Is it done? I think it's done. It must be done. Let us try." I took the substance out, and although it was still hot, we began squeezing it into balls. As soon as one ball was squeezed, Prabhupāda took it and popped it into his mouth. He turned away from the stove and, shaking his head pleasingly, said, "Yes, it is done. Very nice."

Prabhupāda spontaneously showed his displeasure also. That was the risk of serving him closely as his personal servant or cook. One day Govinda dāsī was cooking a cereal for Prabhupāda's breakfast when he walked past the kitchen, looked in, and asked, "What are you cooking?"

"I am making cereal, Swamiji," she replied.

"But today is Ekādaśī," said Prabhupāda.

"Oh, thank you, Swamiji. I didn't know." She thought that by his reminder she had not actually done anything wrong. After all, neither he nor anyone else had eaten the grains. But Prabhupāda began to criticize her with a severity that surprised her. It was a great disqualification on her part, he said, to cook grains on Ekādaśī, the day when devotees fast from all grains. He kept repeating that she had cooked grains on Ekādaśī and described her mistake as very serious; her one mistake seemed to indicate a whole wrong mentality. Govinda dāśī finally felt it was as bad as if she had actually eaten grains, so she fasted entirely for the rest of the day.

Many things had to be done exactly right. When Upendra placed a small amount of salt on Prabhupāda's plate in front of the rice, it made it difficult for Prabhupāda to eat the rice without mixing it in the salt. Prabhupāda mentioned it. But when Upendra did it again the next day, Prabhupāda said, "I told you to put the salt in back of the rice, not in front!" And foregoing his own pleasure, due to his servant's foolishness, Prabhupāda added, "Now give me no more salt." The next day, however, Upendra put salt and pepper in separate containers and placed them beside the plate so Prabhupāda could move them as he liked. Prabhupāda accepted them silently. Whenever a mistake was rectified, he seemed to immediately forget the wrong.

The śāstras enjoin, "One can never know the mind of the ācārya." Since this is true, then how can we know Prabhupāda? How can we share his inner life in those pleasant homecoming days of December 1967 and January 1968 in San Francisco? In one sense we cannot. As Kṛṣṇadāsa Kavirāja says, "I do not know the deep meaning of Śrī Caitanya Mahāprabhu's activities. As far as possible I shall try to explain them externally." But sometimes Prabhupāda reveals himself directly in his own words: "I have returned by Kṛṣṇa's grace. I am fit to serve you." We can enter his thoughts through his spoken words. Through those who knew him and lived with him, we have another intimate approach to Prabhupāda's life. How they saw him and how they dealt with him—often this is as close as we can get.

Mukunda: It was in this period that Prabhupāda went to visit Mr. B. K. Nehru, who was a big Indian government official. I drove Prabhupāda to the St. Francis Hotel in a beat-up old Ford with the name Kṛṣṇa stenciled in multicolors in three different places on the car. The St. Francis Hotel, of course, is a very elite hotel. We arrived at the front door and there was a doorman. I got out and asked him if we could leave the car in front of the hotel for about fifteen minutes. Somehow, I don't know why, he immediately agreed to look after the car. We went up to one of the top floors of the building to a very beautiful suite. Mr. Nehru greeted us. He was wearing Western clothes. I was also wearing Western clothes, and my head wasn't shaved. Mr. Nehru's wife was also there. I sat on the same couch as Prabhupāda, with Mr. Nehru in the middle and Prabhupāda on the other end.

In the beginning they spoke English. Prabhupāda reiterated some of his past life history and mentioned that he had had a pharmacy called Prayag Pharmacy. He had met Mr. Nehru in India, and Mr. Nehru acknowledged that he knew about the pharmacy. Prabhupāda then explained how he had taken sannyāsa. I noted that Prabhupāda was very warm and friendly. It was a side of him that I had never seen before. Not that he hadn't been warm and friendly, but to a nondevotee person, I had never seen him quite in such a friendly attitude. I was totally intrigued to see how open and almost intimate Prabhupāda was becoming with this man. I noticed that Prabhupāda was presenting himself as a mendicant, a sannyāsī.

And then the rest of the conversation took place in Hindi. It was a wonderful time for me to observe the facial expressions and gestures and the great depth of feeling with which Prabhupāda communicated, because I had to try to guess what he was talking about. In fact, I was always speculating on what he might be saying. Then of course Mr. Nehru and sometimes his wife would interject remarks—all in Hindi. I was spinning enormous fantasies about what they all might be talking about. Prabhupāda had introduced me as Michael Grant, secretary, and I was sitting on top of the world from the beginning of the conversation. I felt that I had a stake in the conversation, that maybe Mr. Nehru is not aware that I am not understanding. I was very tuned in to the mood of the conversation even though I was not understanding it, but thinking that maybe I was understanding part of it, and trying to act as if I might know something about what they were saying. At some point in the conversation I was getting very involved in my fantasies of what it was about, and I heard the words missionary work come from Prabhupāda. He stopped and looked at me momentarily—there was a beat, and then the conversation resumed. I then realized that I had really been tuned in by that. Prabhupāda was asking something. Then, later in the conversation, he said in English, “But one word from you,” to Mr. Nehru. Then Śrīla Prabhupāda's eyes opened wide and he paused, and I believe he looked around at me at that time. Then after a somewhat awkward silence, the conversation resumed again. Then I knew that Śrīla Prabhupāda was really asking for a favor and that he was letting me in on this by saying it in English. I felt that all I could do was try to look very serious and important somehow, such that this man would think that by my presence, as an American disciple, he could see that Śrīla Prabhupāda was doing great things by converting us Westerners to Kṛṣṇa consciousness. Somehow I wanted to help. But I didn't know what it was, so I couldn't say; and I just tried to play the part that Śrīla Prabhupāda seemed to want me to play in this transcendental game. Then the conversation became very convivial and the subject had changed.

Later the wife of B. K. Nehru came forward and called Prabhupāda “Swamiji” and said something in Hindi and gave him something wrapped in tin foil. It was about the size of a small apple. Then they exchanged words, and Śrīla Prabhupāda was very warm and cordial with Mrs. Nehru. On the way out I asked Prabhupāda first of all what the conversation was about. He was very vague but said it was about some land that he had been trying to get in India, I think in Vṛndāvana. It may have been in litigation, I don't know, but he was asking Mr. Nehru's help. I asked whether he was going to help, and Śrīla Prabhupāda was again rather vague about it, but he indicated that he felt the meeting was successful, or at least a step in the right direction. Then I asked about Mr. Nehru's wife, whether she was European or what, and Prabhupāda said, “No, she is a Parsi.” Then on the ride back Prabhupāda opened the tin foil, and in it was a huge date, the biggest one I have ever seen in my life. And he took it out and took a big bite out of it and then offered me the rest, which I took, of course!

Mukunda was also present with Prabhupāda in his room, along with a small group of devotees, when an earthquake took place. The telephone poles and wires began moving outside the window. The building trembled. No one said anything until Prabhupāda said, “What is this?” A devotee replied, “It's an earthquake, Swamiji.” Prabhupāda said, “Oh.” And then the earthquake suddenly stopped. Everyone present was very intent on Prabhupāda's reaction. He said, “We can just sit down and chant Hare Kṛṣṇa.”

He recounted the bombing of Calcutta during the war. "I was in the bomb shelter, and the bombs were falling; and I was thinking as I was chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa that if I had to die now, it would be wonderful to die while chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa." Mukunda and the other devotees felt secure being in Prabhupāda's presence, even during the earthquake. They felt that no matter what catastrophe might happen, they could simply sit with him and chant Hare Kṛṣṇa and be happy.

When Prabhupāda had first returned from India, he had criticized Mukunda for failing to obtain the permanent residency status for him. Mukunda had only been able to obtain a temporary visitor's visa. "Why did you do this?" Prabhupāda had asked him sharply. Mukunda made a few excuses, and Prabhupāda replied, "You do not understand." Later Prabhupāda and Mukunda visited a local immigration office to seek the permanent residency status. The official who met with them was a woman. In the course of the routine conversation, Prabhupāda briefly mentioned the philosophy of Kṛṣṇa consciousness. The woman remarked, "It must be very difficult to follow such a discipline in your life."

Prabhupāda replied, "No, it is not. It's just a question of remembering God." Then he gave her an example. Just as a woman goes to work and has to think of many different things, yet she never forgets to dress properly, so one has to think of God despite worldly duties. The woman immigration official could understand.

During the conversation, the recent earthquake was mentioned, and the woman said that the building they were in was "earthquake-proof." After the meeting, when Prabhupāda was leaving, he said to Mukunda, "There is no such thing as 'earthquake-proof,'" and he laughed.

Līlāvati: He called me into his room. He was sitting on his bed talking to Mukunda. When I arrived, he stopped speaking with him and turned to me and said, "So how are you liking this Kṛṣṇa consciousness?" And I said, "Oh, Swamiji, my life has changed completely." He bowed his head and said, "Thank you very much." He was very pleased. Then he continued his conversation with Mukunda. He was asking him, "So, Mukunda, you have cast so many pairs of karatālas from the ones I have brought, but I do not see any of the devotees with them." I chimed in and said, "Oh, Swamiji, that is because he is charging money." This was my conception of spiritual life—no eating, no money, nothing, everything neti neti neti. So Prabhupāda said, "Oh, charging money is bad?" I was surprised. He said, "You must understand that anything that is used in the service of Kṛṣṇa is not bad. It is good. Money is not bad if it is used in the proper way." This was my first lesson in real renunciation, real spiritual life. He then asked me to edit the first volume of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, correcting punctuation and grammar. I was so thrilled and enthusiastic. After leaving his room very shortly after we spoke, I immediately began work. I was extremely excited about doing it.

Līlāvati's main occupation was taking care of her baby daughter, Subhadrā. She would treasure different incidents in which Prabhupāda showed attention to her daughter. The first time he saw Subhadrā on returning from India, he said, "She is very fortunate." And he quoted a verse from the Bhagavad-gītā to the effect that the yogī who does not complete his practice has a chance to be born in a family of pious brāhmaṇas. Another time, noticing that Subhadrā was sleepy in his presence, Prabhupāda remarked laughingly, "Yes, young children and old men must take a lot of rest." He also held the child several times and played with her. One time, when speaking to a roomful of people, Prabhupāda suddenly told Līlāvati, that her daughter was very warm and that she should take off her sweater. He had been speaking on a philosophical topic and had interrupted himself. Others in the room were taken aback to see that Prabhupāda was concerned about such a small child. When Prabhupāda was leaving in a car to go to a speaking engagement, Līlāvati handed him a garland of narcissus flowers through the window of the car. He lowered his head in a humble way and said, "Thank you very much." She then handed him three narcissus flowers that had not been used in the garland. He took them and said, "Oh? And this is from your daughter?" Līlāvati laughed and said, "Yes, Swamiji," and he said, "Oh, very nice." Such thoughtful and clever remarks from Prabhupāda about her daughter totally encouraged Līlāvati's Kṛṣṇa consciousness.

Kṛṣṇadāsa: He was continually working on the Bhāgavatam and would make dictaphone tapes that he would send to Satsvarūpa every other day in Boston. I remember one morning as I was going to work, Govinda dāsī gave me this little package that was a tape with Satsvarūpa's address in Boston, and she asked me to mail it on my way to work. The address was on one side, and the stamps were on the other. Every day when I went to work, Prabhupāda left his door open. So whenever I would go to work, I would pay my obeisances, or sometimes as I was walking by he would see me and ask me to come in, and he would give me a little prasādam. He would say, "Oh, you are off to work now? Good. I am glad you are steady." Then in the evening I would get off the train, which would stop right at Willard Street. Prabhupāda's room overlooked the streetcar stop. Sometimes I would get off the streetcar, and Prabhupāda would be looking down at me from his room, so I would pay my obeisances right there in the street, and he would nod. I would come in, and he would ask how the day was. So our relationship was very personal. I was never afraid of asking him if I had any difficulties. So when I was asked by Govinda dāsī to mail this tape, I stopped in Prabhupāda's room and told him that I noticed that the stamps were on one side and the address was on the other. "Are you sure there won't be any difficulty in the mailing?" I asked. He said, "No, no, there won't be any difficulty. I've done it before." So I went out and I was getting ready when I noticed that the thing was stapled. I had been mailing jewelry all my life, and I never sent anything with staples—always a string or something in case the staples fell off. So again I knocked on the door and said, "Swamiji, I've got to apologize, I don't mean to disturb you, but it's stapled. Are you sure it doesn't have to be tied?" I was trying to be helpful, not critical. Maybe I was a little overly confident. So Swamiji said, "No, no, it's all right." So I left. As I was putting my jacket on I saw that about two inches of the envelope was unstapled and the tape was open to view. You could actually squeeze the thing, and although it couldn't fall out, it was visible. So I walked back in the room and paid my obeisances and said, "Swamiji, you can see the tape inside." Prabhupāda immediately hit his hand on the table loudly and yelled, "The spiritual master is never at fault! And even if he is, it's your duty as his disciple to do whatever he asks." He went on for at least half an hour about how one should be very observant of what the spiritual master says and not criticize. It was like he was saying, "I will be your spiritual master, and I will instruct you, but what can I do if you won't take my advice?"

Kṛṣṇadāsa also got a chance to shave Prabhupāda's head. Not many of the devotees in those days wore the Vaiṣṇava śikhā, the tuft of hair at the back of the head. Prabhupāda had very little hair, but he did have a śikhā about three inches in diameter at the back of his head. Thinking that only the disciples wore the śikhā, Kṛṣṇadāsa shaved off Prabhupāda's śikhā. But Prabhupāda only mentioned it mildly: "Oh, you have cut off my śikhā." On another occasion while shaving Prabhupāda's head, Kṛṣṇadāsa cut him, but Prabhupāda didn't notice it. He was chanting the whole while. But when Upendra came in and saw a bit of blood on Prabhupāda's head, he exclaimed. Prabhupāda said, "What? What?" and put his hand to his head. "Oh, you've cut me," said

Prabhupāda. But that was all he said. Upendra later told Kṛṣṇadāsa that he had committed a great offense. That evening Kṛṣṇadāsa went to Prabhupāda and mentioned the cut. "There is not difficulty," said Prabhupāda. "You are just a little young yet. Young don't have a steady hand."

There is a saying in India that a mother teaches her daughter-in-law by teaching her daughter. In other words, the mother will most readily give corrective instruction to her own daughter, but the instruction will apply equally to the less accessible daughter-in-law. Similarly, Prabhupāda gave many instructions not only during class lectures but in daily dealings with his servants, such as Upendra. Any exchanges with the ācārya are themselves teachings both by precept and example, and the whole world can benefit from hearing them.

With Upendra, Prabhupāda's instructions were often in response to Upendra's mistakes. Upendra followed Prabhupāda everywhere. Once they were walking downstairs on the way to the temple, and Upendra, walking behind, called out to Prabhupāda to get his attention. Prabhupāda turned around on the stairs, raised his cane, and said, "I told you never to call from behind." On the way back from the temple, Upendra was supposed to carry Prabhupāda's Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, eyeglasses, and karatālas. One evening Upendra got sidetracked talking with a guest, and when he returned to the house, Prabhupāda was waiting for him. Govinda dāśī warned Upendra that Prabhupāda was angry at having to walk back to the house alone. Uttering apologies, Upendra entered his room. Prabhupāda said, "Whenever you are to do something, do it nicely. Do not be irresponsible." One day Upendra was looking for Prabhupāda within the apartment, and he went into Govinda dāśī's room to ask her where Prabhupāda was. As Upendra left Govinda dāśī's room, he met Prabhupāda coming down the hall. Later Prabhupāda called him and told, "You are a brahmācārī. You should not be in the same room alone with Govinda dāśī or any girl. Do not do like that in the future."

When Govinda dāśī had to go to the doctor, Upendra, although having no experience, whimsically volunteered to take dictation from Prabhupāda as Prabhupāda answered his letters. Prabhupāda began to dictate quickly, and Upendra immediately ran into trouble trying to write down his words. At the end of the letter, Prabhupāda asked him to reread it, but Upendra couldn't read his own handwriting because it had been scribbled with such speed. Prabhupāda looked at him incredulously, saying, "Why do you do things like that? You cannot read your own handwriting?" Upendra attempted to read but could not, and Prabhupāda had to fill in the whole letter again, while Upendra wrote in the words that he had missed or could not read.

One of Upendra's regular duties was to crush up rock sugar candy, which Prabhupāda took in water as medicine. One evening, while Prabhupāda watched him, Upendra put the crushed sugar candy in water and mixed it by pouring the water from one glass to another. Somehow a glass slipped from his hand, and in trying to catch it, he splashed it all over his head, face, and the front of his body. Prabhupāda looked at him and simply said, "Go wash."

"No, no," Upendra protested. "Let me finish making your medicine for you." As he continued his work, the sugar water thickened, leaving his hands, face, and arms sticky as the sugar hardened and crystalized. Prabhupāda said nothing, but watched and accepted the service of his foolish but sincere disciple.

Perhaps certain activities cannot be called instructions; they are simply līlā.

Upendra: At the Willard Street apartment, Prabhupāda would sometimes go out on the back porch. It was very small and wasn't meant for walking, just for going down the back stairs two levels. But the people in the apartment below us had a little Pekingese dog that would bark at anyone who would come out above. The dog would run up the stairs to the next platform below and yap away with a shrill bark. Prabhupāda would go out and stand on the little porch, inciting the dog's barking, and then ignore the dog. Then all of a sudden he would turn to the dog, raise his hands, and make a scary face. The Pekingese would become very frightened and would whimper and run down the stairs, while Prabhupāda would laugh. He did this a number of times, like a young boy.

SPL 57: Opening a Temple in Los Angeles

CHAPTER FIFTY-SEVEN

Opening a Temple

in Los Angeles

= Los Angeles January 6, 1968

The building at 5364 West Pico Boulevard was a small storefront in a middle-class black neighborhood of Los Angeles. With his key, Aniruddha opened the rear door, and Śrīla Prabhupāda entered, followed by a few disciples.

The room was stark. A Brijabasi print of Lord Kṛṣṇa sat atop the altar, which was no more than two orange crates covered with an old madras. A tamboura and a mṛdaṅga on end stood in one corner, and a curtain hung over the front window. Prabhupāda's seat, a simple raised platform, was the only furniture.

Prabhupāda, dressed in saffron robes and walking with a cane, crossed the room, opened the front door, and stepped outside. Glancing up and down the street, he saw small, run-down houses. It was a quiet, out-of-the-way neighborhood, unlike the more vital locations his disciples had found in San Francisco's Haight-Ashbury and Manhattan's Lower East Side. But it was a place in Los Angeles, a start.

Prabhupāda stepped back inside and shut the door. Aniruddha, Dayānanda, his wife Nandarāṇī, and their three-week-old daughter Candramukhī were there—the members of the Los Angeles temple. Several other devotees who had driven down a few days earlier from San Francisco were also there and stood anxiously around Prabhupāda, waiting to hear what he would say.

Prabhupāda looked around carefully. "All right," he said, "let us have kīrtana. And picking up the mṛdaṅga, he sat down on the small platform while his disciples sat down before him on the floor.

No sooner had he begun to play, however, when Jānakī rushed over to him, carrying the tamboura. "Swamiji," she said, "you can't play the drum! You're not well enough! Play this." Her reprimand was motherly. Prabhupāda was seventy-two and only six months ago had been hospitalized after a heart attack and stroke. He had only recently returned from India, where he had gone to recuperate. Naturally his disciples were concerned about his health.

"All right." Prabhupāda smiled, trading instruments with Jānakī. "Then I will play tamboura."

As Śrīla Prabhupāda softly plucked the metal strings, his disciples clapped the one-two-three rhythm. Prabhupāda chanted: "Hare Kṛṣṇa, Hare Kṛṣṇa, Kṛṣṇa Kṛṣṇa, Hare Hare/ Hare Rāma, Hare Rāma, Rāma Rāma, Hare Hare." With his traditional Bengali melody he led the singing, joining with his disciples on the chorus.

As Prabhupāda's disciples sat earnestly chanting before him—some of them looking up to him, others singing with eyes closed—he looked at each disciple. Nervous, timid Aniruddha was there; he blushed easily, and his bespectacled eyes squinted when he smiled. Tall, lean Dayānanda was there; he had a good job as a computer technician for RCA, and he was giving two hundred dollars monthly to support the temple he and his wife had started.

Śrīla Prabhupāda had been in India when Dayānanda and Nandarāṇī had moved to Los Angeles and found this little storefront. Immediately, they had written to him about the new "temple" and the warm, sunny Los Angeles climate, which they said would be good for his health. He had expressed his eagerness to join them.

I am pleased that our desire is fulfilled by the Grace of Lord Krishna. Your specific duty is to chant and hear the transcendental Name of the Lord, read some passages from my English version of the Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam and Śrīmad Bhagavad-gītā (Gitopanisad) and explain them as far as possible as you have heard from me. Any devotee who has developed genuine love for Krishna can also explain the truth about Krishna because Krishna helps such sincere devotee seated in his heart.

Dayānanda and Nandarāṇī had written to Prabhupāda that people in Los Angeles weren't as receptive as in San Francisco and New York, but Prabhupāda had assured them that if they chanted with devotion, success would come. Kṛṣṇa would help them.

In his room at the Rādhā-Dāmodara temple in Vṛndāvana, Prabhupāda had meditated on sending young men and women like Dayānanda and Nandarāṇī all over the world to open Kṛṣṇa conscious centers. Despite old age and ill health, this was his life's ambition, his single dominating desire. And in whatever time he had left, he wanted to establish the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement worldwide. His success in America over the past two years had given him hope. Mukunda had begun a temple in San Francisco, Kīrtanānanda had begun one in Montreal, Satsvarūpa in Boston, Subala in Santa Fe, and Brahmānanda had stayed in New York. These temples were storefronts only, and the leaders young, inexperienced men. But the Western youth were showing interest. There was great potential.

After the kīrtana, Dayānanda drove Prabhupāda to his apartment two miles away. It was small—a front room, a kitchenette, a back room with a tiny bathroom—and noisy. Aniruddha had arranged for Gaurasundara and his wife, Govinda dāsī, who were acting as Prabhupāda's servant and secretary, to stay in the front room.

Prabhupāda said his health was still not good. His sleep was often disturbed, and he spoke of a “gong-gong-gong” sound in his head. He had occasional headaches and a ringing in his left ear. An Ayur-vedic doctor in India had told him to take cinnamon buds, and he had seen a doctor in San Francisco. But the doctors' prescriptions had not helped.

I may inform you in that connection that I am at the present moment physically unfit; I am having always a buzzing sound in my brain. I cannot sleep at night, but still I am working because I try to be on my position of spiritual platform.

Prabhupāda was in good spirits, however, despite his age and lingering sickness. He appeared strong, and six months in India had tanned him a golden, healthy hue. He always sat straight and smiled often. He walked with a cane, yet upright, with a quick step, tiring his young disciples who attempted to keep up with him. He even mentioned that if his inability to sleep continued, he would have more time for writing his books.

Gone was the mindlessness of his young followers who had previously thought that Swamiji, because he was a pure devotee, should be let to do any strenuous activities he liked, working all night or singing and playing the mṛdaṅga for hours in the park. Now the devotees had become concerned and protective, trying always to arrange for his ease, suggesting when they thought something was too strenuous for him. Usually, however, Prabhupāda would give the last word on what he would or would not do. When Yamunā and Jānakī arrived from San Francisco, they decided that if Swamiji were to get well he would require a special diet. So they devised a regimen featuring small servings of boiled vegetables without salt, spices, or ghee. At first Prabhupāda gently submitted to their requests. But on trying their meals, he commented, “These vegetables are nasty. They are not fit for eating.” After three days, when Govinda dāsī told him of some new reductions in his diet, he roared, “Let the starvation committee go to hell! You feed me.”

Again Prabhupāda began taking his regular lunch—dāl, rice, capātīs, and a couple of sabjīs with ghee. One day when Govinda dāsī brought him his lunch, he commented, “Oh, this is very nice. When I was in India everyone told me, ‘Oh, Swamiji, you cannot go to America. You will starve there. They have no food. They eat only meats and potatoes.’ So I said, ‘What is that? I shall live on bread and potatoes. There is no problem. I can survive on bread and potatoes.’ So I was thinking like that when I came to your country—that I shall live on bread and potatoes. But now I have come here, and Kṛṣṇa is so kind. He has not only given me everything in the way of nice food, but you are also cooking all sorts of nice vegetable preparations—capātīs, dāl, rice. Everything is there. So this is Kṛṣṇa's kindness.”

Although when Prabhupāda had first arrived in America he had been alone and had had difficulty finding even a single sincere person, now he was surrounded by sincere students eager to learn from him. Still, he accepted this new position in the same spirit as he had accepted the lonely months in New York City. He was doing his beloved duty to his spiritual master: writing books, seeking to engage others in the Kṛṣṇa consciousness mission, and speaking about Kṛṣṇa always.

Sometimes, as Prabhupāda would shuffle through the apartment in his slippers, he would see Gaurasundara and Govinda dāsī seated at the kitchen table practicing their first lessons in the Bengali alphabet. He had given them a Bengali verse from Caitanya-caritāmṛta to memorize, and regularly he would drill them to see if they knew it.

Looking over their shoulders, Prabhupāda remarked, “This very nice. Just like a child is learning to write. His writing may not be perfect. It may be crooked or imperfect. But the teacher wants to see that the students are trying. It doesn't matter how well they are doing, but just that they are fully engaged. So it is just like our service to Kṛṣṇa. What can we do for Kṛṣṇa? Kṛṣṇa is everything. He doesn't need our service. But He wants to see that we are trying—we are trying a little bit to give Him service. That is the whole idea.”

It was only four days after Prabhupāda's arrival. He had just risen from an afternoon's rest, walked into the front room... and there was Subala. Prabhupāda was surprised. Subala was supposed to be in Santa Fe.

“My wife has left me,” Subala burst out. And a sad tale followed. Subala told how he had left his wife, Kṛṣṇā-devī dāsī, alone at the Santa Fe temple for a few days and gone to New York to visit his parents. Meanwhile, Kṛṣṇā-devī had run away with a boy who had been visiting the temple; and she had decided to stay with him and give up her husband.

“Don't worry,” Prabhupāda told Subala, “everything will be all right. I will write a letter to Kṛṣṇā-devī and tell her to come back to you. You can go back to Santa Fe tomorrow, and everything will be all right.”

Subala left the next morning for Santa Fe, and Prabhupāda, although calm in Subala's presence, began to show deep disturbance over the sordid affair. Kṛṣṇā-devī was his disciple, and he had performed the sacred marriage ceremony for her and Subala. He had asked them to be an ideal couple, cooperating together in Kṛṣṇa consciousness. Together they had gone to start the center in New Mexico. “Don't be discouraged,” he told them. “Even though no one may come to hear you, still you chant and hear.” But now Kṛṣṇā-devī had simply left the temple and her husband.

When Subala arrived in Santa Fe, he found that Kṛṣṇādevī and her boyfriend, Randy, had left town. Meanwhile, in Los Angeles Prabhupāda received a letter from Kṛṣṇā-devī. She said she wanted to stay in Kṛṣṇa consciousness—but with her new boyfriend. “This is all nonsense,” Prabhupāda exclaimed. “I will simply go back to Vṛndāvana and sit and chant Hare Kṛṣṇa. Why should I do this? Why should I deal with this quarrel between husband and wife? This is not the business of a sannyāsī."

Prabhupāda wrote a letter to Kṛṣṇā-devī in care of the Santa Fe temple.

Your recent activities have been very much upsetting to each and every member of our society. I never expected that you shall act in this way. If you love me at all and Krishna at all, you should immediately return back, either to me or to your husband without delay. In your letter it is understood that you are repenting. You have done a great mistake. Come back and everything will be all right.

To Subala, Prabhupāda wrote,

I am very sorry to learn about your present plight; you must be feeling a great shock for the separation, but there is a great lesson also. Anyway, if you are feeling too heavy-hearted, you may come here and live with me for some time. I hope I shall be able to ease your heaviness.

But before Prabhupāda's letter arrived, Subala had already left Santa Fe for Los Angeles, thinking, "I can't take this anymore. I'm going back to Swamiji."

Sitting on his porch taking his noontime massage, Prabhupāda suddenly saw Subala, looking more miserable than ever, coming up the sidewalk. "Subala," Prabhupāda called out, remaining seated. Subala approached and offered obeisances before Śrīla Prabhupāda, who sat in the California sunshine and dressed only in an Indian gamchā, while Gaurasundara massaged him with mustard oil. "You did not get my letter?" Prabhupāda asked.

"No," Subala replied.

"Yes." Prabhupāda nodded. "You have got my letter. I have written you and told you that if you are feeling too heavyhearted, you may come here and live with me for some time."

Subala: So I moved into the crowded front room of Swamiji's apartment. I slept in the living room, right outside of Swamiji's room, and there was only a curtain separating us. At night I could hear him dictating Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam.

He asked me to carve some Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa Deities for him. I had already carved some Jagannātha deities, and now Swamiji said he wanted Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa Deities carved. So I bought a block of mahogany and began carving Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa.

Prabhupāda received word from Rāya Rāma in New York that his editing of the Bhagavad-gītā manuscript was "nearing completion." When Prabhupāda read Rāya Rāma's letter, he exploded: "Nearing completion! I heard this before I started for India." Rāya Rāma's slow editing was delaying the manuscript too much. Although the contract with Macmillan Company had already been signed, the manuscript had still not been submitted. Seeing Rāya Rāma's editing as a perpetual delay, Prabhupāda decided Rāya Rāma should immediately stop all other duties and come to Los Angeles.

After a few days, Rāya Rāma arrived. He, too, settled into the crowded front room of Swamiji's tiny apartment, picking a corner for himself where he could work on the Bhagavad-gītā manuscript. After having spoken in the temple in Swamiji's presence one night, Rāya Rāma wrote home to the devotees in New York,

Although his health is delicate, he is not to be held back. After all that activity last night, he continued talking to us when we returned, and then got up at two-thirty a.m. this morning and worked for three hours. He just returned now from a two-and-a-half-mile morning walk. So he's not exactly weak or failing. And if we say anything to check him, he tells that this life has no value if it is not used for Krishna. Last week Gargamuni was telling Swamiji that he sometimes dreams of how to sell things, and Swamiji said that he also dreams of preaching. But he told us last night that when he's speaking of Krishna there is no pain.

One day on a walk, Prabhupāda discovered a special place across the street from his apartment. There on a neighbor's front lawn stood a broad, tall tree. Taking a few disciples with him, Prabhupāda went over and sat down beneath the tree. On a warm Los Angeles afternoon, this was a great but simple luxury, sitting in the pleasant sunny atmosphere beneath the shade tree. Rāya Rāma considered the occasion something to write to the devotees in New York about.

This afternoon I took a stroll to the temple, which is some distance away, and when I returned I found Swamiji crossing the street from his house, accompanied by Gaurasundara. So I trailed them—up close—Swamiji took his seat under a big oak tree which grows close by our house across the street. “Meditation under a tree is very nice,” he said after a few minutes. As we sat there, other devotees came and joined us, all sitting around Swamiji on some unknown person's lawn, under their tree. “Therefore, in former times, sages used to seat themselves under trees and teach.”

...I know that I am a worthless fool. Here I sit at Swamiji's feet, and my tears aren't flowing or my heart breaking with joy. But even for a fool, Swamiji's presence is intoxicating in the extreme.

Swamiji said that saintly persons in India often sat under trees and even lived there with no other shelter. The six Gosvāmīs, who wrote books under the order of Lord Caitanya, lived this way in Vṛndāvana, staying each night under a different tree and compiling sublime Sanskrit literatures. Hearing Swamiji speak on such transcendental subjects in this setting fit perfectly the devotees' ideal notions of the guru beneath an ancient towering banyan tree in India. It didn't seem to them that they were sitting in an ordinary neighborhood of Los Angeles. Often Aniruddha would return to the apartment after shopping or errands, and he would see from afar “this gorgeous-looking, saffron-robed person sitting there on the grassy lawn.”

One day as Subala, Govinda dāsī, Rāya Rāma, and others sat with Prabhupāda in the shade, Prabhupāda observed a pair of white butterflies. “Just see these worms,” he said, pointing to the butterflies. “Here also there is husband and wife. The whole world is in this bondage.”

Knowing Subala was still lamenting, Prabhupāda continued to speak about the topic on both their minds. "It is not so wonderful that Kṛṣṇā-devī has left," he said. "What is wonderful is that we are able to stay and serve Kṛṣṇa. The māyā is so strong. It is Kṛṣṇa's divine energy. And for someone to actually stay engaged in Kṛṣṇa's service is very rare. The living entity is practically helpless under the sway of māyā's power and can only cry out to Kṛṣṇa for help. But we have to pray at every moment that the power of māyā does not disturb us."

Subala continued to live with Prabhupāda, cooking for him, tending to his personal needs, and carving Deities of Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa. Prabhu pāda wrote Kṛṣṇā-devī again.

Your husband Śrīmān Subal das is living with me very peacefully, and he is carving Radha and Krishna from hardwood. So this life of material existence is just like hardwood, and if we can carve Krishna out of it, that is the success of our life. So, at any circumstance, you must not forget Krishna. I love you at my heart and therefore I gave you the name Krishna devi dasi. Don't forget Krishna even for a single moment chant Hare Krishna loudly or slowly as it may be convenient. But don't forget to chant the holy name. I hope everything will be all right as soon as you come here with Randy, and I am awaiting your arrival with great interest.

One day after a walk, Prabhupāda told Aniruddha that Los Angeles reminded him of Bombay and that he wanted to build a very big temple in Los Angeles. Although Aniruddha was not one to endeavor hard for building a big temple, Prabhupāda still told him his vision. Another day Prabhupāda called Aniruddha in and showed him the Deity of Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa that Gaurasundara and Subala had carved. Prabhupāda's eyes were shining. "I want to have Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa Deities in everyone's home," he said. Aniruddha was amazed by the joyful expression on Prabhupāda's face.

"What can I do?" Aniruddha asked.

"I want you to go to different foundries and find out the cost of casting Deities."

Aniruddha and Subala then phoned and visited various foundries in the Los Angeles area, returning with information. But their investigations were unbusinesslike and not well thought out. Knowing this, Prabhupāda smiled and asked, "So, what intelligent news do you have for me today?" Aniruddha knew Prabhupāda was criticizing him, but he could only giggle in return. He loved it.

One morning Aniruddha went to see Prabhupāda with what he considered a frightening story. Before dawn he had been out in the park collecting eucalyptus twigs for Prabhupāda to use as toothbrushes. He had been standing on a park bench cutting the branch of a tree with his knife when a police car had suddenly pulled up and a policeman had rushed out of the car. "What are you doing?" the policeman demanded. Aniruddha explained that he was getting toothbrushes for his spiritual master. The policeman had said, "Don't you know that these trees belong to the city? They belong to the people of California." He had said that Aniruddha could be arrested for carrying an open knife. When he had asked Aniruddha what was in the bag around his neck, Aniruddha had shown him his beads. The policeman had then asked if Aniruddha had come from a mental institution.

Prabhupāda smiled to hear the story and inquired, "Did you ask him if he was crazy?"

Govinda dāsī had been complaining to Aniruddha that Swamiji's apartment was too noisy and crowded and that there were no private bathroom facilities for Swamiji. She kept insisting Aniruddha find a better place. Aniruddha, however, was getting only two hundred dollars a month from Dayānanda, and with Prabhupāda plus so many visitors, there was a financial strain. "Swamiji is very uncomfortable," Govinda dāsī nagged. But Aniruddha didn't know what to do.

When Aniruddha asked Prabhupāda if the place was all right, he said it was. Aniruddha explained that more devotees were eager to visit from San Francisco and would probably want to stay in the apartment. "Personally," Prabhupāda said, "I have no suggestion myself. It is up to them, whatever they decide."

Prabhupāda had his translating to do, but he also wanted to see his disciples. For Aniruddha, however, the prospect of more devotees coming to visit was a cause of anxiety. Finally, he and Dayānanda found a larger apartment for Swamiji.

The new apartment was four rooms over a private garage in the rear of an apartment complex. Aniruddha painted, and some of the other devotees helped prepare the apartment as comfortably as possible for Prabhupāda. Then they moved him in.

The landlord, a small Japanese man, came by and, seeing Prabhupāda seated on the floor behind his trunk, asked, "Where's your furniture?" He seemed suspicious.

Prabhupāda smiled, thanked him, and said it was all right.

"We can sit down anywhere," Prabhupāda explained. "We are mendicant." But after leaving, the landlord kept standing outside on the landing, peeking through the window. "Tell him to go away," Prabhupāda said to Aniruddha.

At the temple during the evening program, Śrīla Prabhupāda would sometimes ask one of his disciples to speak after the kīrtana.

Dayānanda: One night as I was driving Swamiji to the temple, he asked me to speak. I immediately thought I would rather not. Although in Swamiji's absence his other disciples had given talks, I had never given even an informal talk. So I told Swamiji I preferred to hear him speak, but he said he preferred to hear me. So it was settled.

At the temple we had kīrtana as usual, and then I began to speak. I was speaking on the validity of God, trying to prove that God's existence was logical and scientifically reasonable. Such a talk should have been given with reference to the Vedic literature, but my fund of knowledge was not embellished by verses from the scripture, nor was it even adequately based on basic Kṛṣṇa conscious philosophy. I was aware that my talk wasn't adequate, a fact that Prabhupāda himself brought home in the sweetest possible way.

When at one point I made a mistake and said the wrong thing altogether, Prabhupāda matter-of-factly interrupted, explaining the point I had misstated. He then motioned me to go on. I continued without any loss of face. I was being corrected in public, but without the embarrassment that a chastisement might cause. Swamiji's correction was always based on love and sincerity—in relation to the goal rather than to the ego.

On the appearance day of Śrīla Prabhupāda's spiritual master, Śrīla Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī, Prabhupāda gathered some of his disciples—Aniruddha, Govinda dāsī, Gaurasundara, Nandarāṇī, and a boy named Saṅkarṣaṇa—for a special celebration. In the kitchen of his apartment, Prabhupāda cooked a feast for his spiritual master. Nandarāṇī brought flowers, and Prabhupāda led the devotees in a ceremony of offering flowers and chanting prayers in honor of Śrīla Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī.

Nandarāṇī: I had my daughter, Candramukhī, with me then. She was about two months old and was sitting very quietly in a little basket in a corner of the room. After the ceremony, Swamiji gathered a handful of flowers, walked over to the basket where Candramukhī was lying, and placed the flowers around her head. He smiled and said, "One day I will take you to India with me."

After the feast the devotees followed Prabhupāda into his room. He sat at his desk and read letters aloud to the small gathering of his disciples seated on the floor before him. The letters were of appreciation. And these letters became Śrīla Prabhupāda's offering to his spiritual master. Prabhupāda read aloud statements like, "We really like chanting," "We're happy since we met you," "We're trying to teach other people how to chant Hare Kṛṣṇa"—simple sentiments.

Reading the letters, Prabhupāda became very happy. He then put the letters along with the flowers before the picture of Śrīla Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī. Then looking at Nandarāṇī, he asked, "Have you become happy since you have been chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa?"

"Oh, yes," Nandarāṇī replied, "my life is wonderful."

Looking at the others, Prabhupāda asked, "And what about you? Do you feel more satisfied since you have been chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa?" They all answered yes.

"Then I have only one request," Prabhupāda continued. "Whatever happiness you have felt, you simply tell someone else about that. That is all you have to do. You don't need to teach anything. You don't need to teach the philosophy. You just explain to people that because you chant Hare Kṛṣṇa you have become happy, and if they chant, they will become happy. Then I will be satisfied, and my spiritual master will be satisfied."

As Śrīla Prabhupāda entered the storefront one evening, he was surprised to find Umāpati there to greet him. Umāpati had left Kṛṣṇa consciousness almost a year ago, and Prabhupāda had not seen him since. Spontaneously, Prabhupāda went forward and embraced Umāpati. A few months before, Umāpati had written, indicating that he was thinking of returning; so his arrival was not a complete surprise to Śrīla Prabhupāda. As Prabhupāda took his seat, he asked Umāpati about the devotees in New York. Briefly Prabhupāda reminisced how he had begun his movement in New York and how boys like Umāpati had helped him.

Later that evening, back at the apartment, Prabhupāda expressed sadness that some of his disciples had left Kṛṣṇa consciousness. He told Umāpati that when the wife of one of the sannyāsī disciples of Śrīla Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī had forcibly dragged her husband away, Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī had shed tears over his inability to save the disciple. A disciple, due to māyā's influence, may fall away, Prabhupāda said, but the spiritual master will never forsake him.

Umāpati had left Kṛṣṇa consciousness because of intellectual doubts. Having been a eclectic follower of Buddhism, he had objected to Prabhupāda's explanations of Buddhism. On leaving Kṛṣṇa consciousness, however, he had simply returned to his old job in a radio station, grown back his beard, and reverted to his old habits. "Whenever I saw someone doing something wrong, like eating meat," Umāpati explained to Prabhupāda, "I would think, "My spiritual master said this is bad."

"When you think like that," Prabhupāda said, "your life at once becomes sublime."

Several other devotees entered Prabhupāda's room as Prabhupāda talked. As a person becomes more Kṛṣṇa conscious, Prabhupāda explained, he becomes concerned not to cause suffering to other living beings. He doesn't want to cause suffering, even to a small insect. "Don't you feel?" Prabhupāda asked, imploring them with his eyes to understand the nonviolence of the devotee.

Umāpati had left Kṛṣṇa consciousness because of intellectual doubts. Having been an eclectic follower of Buddhism, as had Dayānanda and Aniruddha, he decided to stay in Los Angeles and help them. He moved into the storefront with Aniruddha, got a job, and began helping support the temple.

Seeing that Prabhupāda was almost constantly occupied by various disciples, Līlāvatī, one of the girls visiting from San Francisco, decided not to take up her spiritual master's time unnecessarily. Prabhupāda noticed her frequent absence from the gatherings at his apartment. When she finally visited him, he asked her, "Why are you not coming?"

"Oh, Swamiji," Līlāvatī said, "you must do your translating work. I don't think you're getting your work done."

"No, you don't know?" Prabhupāda corrected her mistake. "Don't you know my disciples are my work?"

Prabhupāda said he would go to as many speaking engagements as Aniruddha could obtain. Aniruddha got engagements, but there were many difficulties. On two occasions, Prabhupāda, Subala, and Aniruddha were on their way to an engagement at a college when their car broke down. Another time, a policeman arrested Subala for not having a driver's license, and Prabhupāda, accompanied by his servant, had to walk back to his apartment. At an engagement at the U.C.L.A. Student Center, not a single student attended; Prabhupāda sat waiting for ten minutes and then turned to Aniruddha: "So, what happened?" At an outdoor engagement at Long Beach State College, there was no seat for Prabhupāda, and Aniruddha had to run and find an umbrella to shade Prabhupāda from the sun. "Aniruddha, this is not very nice," Prabhupāda remarked from the podium.

But there were successes also. Mukunda dāsa arranged for Prabhupāda to appear on national television on the Les Crane Show. He also arranged for Prabhupāda to appear on the Joe Pyne Show, as well as on several radio programs. And Life magazine featured Prabhupāda's picture and an accompanying story as part of an article, "The Year of the Guru."

Although Aniruddha was prepared to arrange preaching engagements for Prabhupāda for as long as he would stay, the devotees in San Francisco, New York, Montreal, and Boston had repeatedly asked Prabhupāda to visit them. He had gone to India in July 1967, returning to San Francisco December 14. He had stayed in San Francisco three weeks and in Los Angeles two months. So while his disciples in San Francisco and Los Angeles had seen him, the others had been waiting for more than eight months. It was time to move on.

On March 7, the day Prabhupāda left Los Angeles, he thanked Aniruddha for his service in maintaining the center.

"Despite my ill health," he said, "I was very comfortably situated. Kṛṣṇa will bless you."

"Actually, what did I do?" Aniruddha replied. "Everything was a mistake. All the engagements were messed up."

"No," Prabhupāda said, "that's all right. You tried your best."

As Prabhupāda was leaving for the airport, he had to walk from his apartment to the car. It was raining, and he had no umbrella or raincoat. Govinda dāsī frantically ran into the bathroom, tore down the shower curtain, and wrapped it around her spiritual master to protect him from the rain.

Prabhupāda had unlimited plans for expansion—a big city like Los Angeles deserved a big temple, organized distribution of books on Kṛṣṇa consciousness, and sophisticated cultural programs. And there should be Deities of Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa in every home. Yet while enthusiastically planning to make everyone and everything Kṛṣṇa conscious, Prabhupāda waited patiently to see if a stray disciple like Kṛṣṇā-devī would return. Prabhupāda was ready to appear on television or meet boldly with any challenger or travel anywhere in the world, and yet he allowed Govinda dāsī to cover him with a shower curtain against the rain.

The Los Angeles temple would become a great Kṛṣṇa conscious success only with hard work and sincerity. And that, Prabhupāda knew, would take time. His disciples were not yet so well trained as to make formidable advances for Kṛṣṇa against the forces of māyā. Yet by his staying for two months in Los Angeles, he was strengthening his disciples' Kṛṣṇa consciousness. And they would continue to progress. ISKCON L.A. was now a little stronger. A few devotees were going to stay and help. He would come back when they had done more.

San Francisco

March 8, 1968

Śrīla Prabhupāda flew from Los Angeles to San Francisco. After the slower pace of the Los Angeles center, the activities in San Francisco encouraged Prabhupāda.

I think San Francisco center has been very much sanctified by unalloyed devotional service of the members here. As soon as there are sincere devotees, immediately the situation changes favorably.

The morning and evening meetings drew crowds of interested young people, and Śrīla Prabhupāda observed: "Dancing in ecstasy is often exhibited to the transcendental pleasure of everyone present."

Prabhupāda was witnessing the success of the saṅkīrtana movement. He had planted the seed, and now the plant of kṛṣṇa-bhakti was flowering. To revisit a center and see that his disciples, by sincerely following his orders, were advancing in Kṛṣṇa consciousness increased Prabhupāda's bliss and satisfaction. He was witnessing the power of kīrtana to transform the fallen souls. And to see his smile of approval increased the ecstasy of the devotees.

Guru dāsa showed Prabhupāda slides of the Kṛṣṇa Deity Prabhupāda had named Kartāmīśana. One picture showed Kartāmīśana shortly after the devotees had obtained Him from an import store and placed Him in the temple. Other slides showed Kartāmīśana after the devotees had been regularly worshiping Him and offering Him food. As Prabhupāda viewed the slides, he began to chuckle. "I think the Deity has changed."

Guru dāsa reviewed the slides. Sure enough, Kartāmīśana had become bluer and plumper. "Has He been painted or anything?" Umāpati asked. Guru dāsa said they hadn't done anything to Him.

"You have been taking care of Him," Prabhupāda affirmed.

Bhakti-yoga was a scientific law; as one approached Kṛṣṇa, He reciprocated. Wherever Prabhupāda's disciples were following the process carefully, he saw the improvement. Kṛṣṇa consciousness, he said, was a treatment of the diseased soul by medicine and diet. The medicine was chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa, and the diet was prasādam. If one followed this program, he would be rejuvenated; if one neglected it, he would relapse. Śrīla Prabhupāda found both health and illness.

Upendra, Prabhupāda's personal servant in San Francisco, came before Prabhupāda crying. He said he couldn't overcome his sex urge. He had engaged in illicit sex. When he asked if Kṛṣṇa forgives offenses, Prabhupāda consoled him: "Yes, Kṛṣṇa forgives." Upendra asked if he could overcome his lust by getting married. "No, you are too young," Prabhupāda said. "You should stay away from rich food. Eat starvishly." He told Upendra to take unsiced dāl and capātīs without butter.

After a few weeks in San Francisco, Śrīla Prabhupāda flew to New York, where the devotees greeted him with a grand airport reception. A city newspaper ran an article "Guru Returns." The New York center at 26 Second Avenue had improved, and there were new faces and enthusiastic kīrtanas.

Here are many new flowerlike young boys and girls, and they are all so much interested in Krishna consciousness very seriously. I am surprised at their great enthusiasm, and I am very happy amongst them.

Prabhupāda stayed in his old rooms at 26 Second Avenue. Although there had been talk of getting him another residence, everything had been too expensive. Prabhupāda had assured Brahmānanda, "I would like to stay in my apartment. If it is silent and solitary I feel pleasure to live there, better than elsewhere." Although Śrīla Prabhupāda's plans were to stay in New York less than two weeks, he talked of staying longer—if his disciples could arrange for him to work steadily at his translating and would help him publish his books one after another. Prabhupāda had written Brahmānanda,

I want to sit down tightly with some assistants and spend the rest of my time translating Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam and other books. And train students to do preaching on the outside. So, from now on, I would like to speak only at very important engagements, and for most engagements, have my students preach. All of you must learn to preach; and for me, my most important preaching work is to finish up the Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam. So please try to make arrangement like this, as it is very important that my books be finished, as soon as possible.

One day, while Prabhupāda was sitting in his room receiving his massage, he began talking and laughing. As he sat on the floor with one leg tucked under his body and one leg outstretched before him, he told the two or three devotees present how Kṛṣṇa, carrying the lunch His mother had packed for Him, would go to the forest with His cowherd boyfriends, who were also carrying lunches from home. Kṛṣṇa and His friends would all sit together sharing their lunch, and Kṛṣṇa always had the best laḍḍus and kachaurīs. Prabhupāda's eyes flashed, and he rubbed his hands together, smiling. "I simply want to go to Kṛṣṇaloka, so I can have some of Kṛṣṇa's laḍḍu and kachaurīs. I do not have any great diversion from this. I simply want to go there so that I can enjoy eating laḍḍus and kachaurīs with Kṛṣṇa and the cowherd boys." Opening his eyes widely, he glanced at Devānanda, who was massaging him, and at the others in the room. "Oh," he said to them, "if you will give me laḍḍus and kachaurīs, then I will bless you."

"Swamiji, please teach us how to make laḍḍus and kachaurīs," the devotees replied excitedly. "We will definitely make them for you!"

"Yes," Prabhupāda assured them, "I shall show you. I shall teach you." And he went on talking in a jovial way.

Newcomers in New York wanted to be initiated. One boy had seen Prabhupāda's picture in Life magazine, cut it out, and put it in his high school locker. A boy named Jay, after having read about Prabhupāda and the devotees in Evergreen Review, had visited the temple and found that everyone was devoted to Prabhupāda. Some disciples whom Prabhupāda had initiated by mail—like Indirā and Ekāyanī, two sisters still in high school and living at home—were meeting their spiritual master for the first time. Prabhupāda initiated all the eligible newcomers.

The day before Prabhupāda left for Boston, he lectured at the New York State University at Stonybrook, a two-hour drive from the temple.

Brahmānanda: The engagement was in a huge auditorium with rows of seats. And the house was full. The bleachers were completely packed when we came in. It was dark, just some spotlights on us and everything else was dark. The rows of seats went back and up, and we could hardly see the audience. First we held kīrtana and then Prabhupāda spoke. As Prabhupāda was speaking, we could hear the sound of chairs popping up as the students were getting up and leaving. But Prabhupāda just went right on lecturing, as if he weren't aware of it. By the time the lecture was over, there were only about two dozen people left.

After the program, the devotees discovered that the car Prabhupāda was supposed to ride in had already left. A student stepped forward, however, and offered his Triumph sports car, a tiny two-seater. Prabhupāda didn't like the car, but it was the only thing available. So Brahmānanda drove Prabhupāda back to Manhattan.

Around midnight, Prabhupāda dozed while Brahmānanda speeded, hurrying to get back to the temple as soon as possible. Prabhupāda was dozing peacefully when Brahmānanda hit a large pothole, and Prabhupāda struck his head on the metal bar on the roof of the car.

When finally they returned to the Lower East Side it was past midnight, and there would only be a few hours for resting before Prabhupāda would have to catch his 9:00 A.M. flight to Boston. Although Prabhupāda rose that morning on schedule, most of the devotees were still asleep when he left his apartment. At the airport Prabhupāda commented that his disciples, rather than simply praising him, should try to follow his example and rise early.

SPL 58: A Visit to Boston

CHAPTER FIFTY-EIGHT

A Visit to Boston

= Boston

May 1968

The apartment was near the elevated train line in a rough lower-class neighborhood of Boston. But it was the best Subhadrā could afford. Just before Śrīla Prabhupāda had left for India on July 24, 1967, he had sent Satsvarūpa here to Boston, affectionately rubbing his hand up and down Satsvarūpa's back as a blessing.

At first Satsvarūpa had been alone, working full time at the Welfare Department, hoping to find a storefront suitable for a center. Then Hamsāduta and his wife, Himāvatī, had joined him, as had Jadurāṇī, who had been having difficulty doing her artwork in the New York temple. Hamsāduta cooked, Himāvatī helped him and did the housecleaning, Jadurāṇī painted, and Satsvarūpa went to his job. On Sundays they would chant on the Boston Commons.

In September Śrīla Prabhupāda wrote from Vṛndāvana, expressing pleasure that even in his absence his disciples had opened a Kṛṣṇa consciousness center in Boston. "Physically I may be present or not," he wrote, "but the work must continue... Kindly make the Boston center very nice." He closed, "The prospect there is very good due to the large number of students."

The Boston devotees considered Prabhupāda's letter very important, and as they studied and quoted the letter, it strengthened their convictions. While cooking, Hamsāduta would think about what Prabhupāda had said in his letter; Satsvarūpa would meditate on the letter while riding to work on the train and chanting on his beads; and the women, who sometimes quarreled—usually about why Jadurāṇī didn't keep her room clean—would improve the quality of their conversation by referring to Prabhupāda's recent letter.

After a couple of months in Boston, Satsvarūpa found a tiny storefront for rent. Even before he was able to get a key and see inside, he wrote Prabhupāda about the little storefront situated among student apartment buildings near Boston University.

When Satsvarūpa had gained entrance to the storefront for the first time, he had come alone and had checked out the bare front room, the basement, and the oil burner. Just as he was about to leave, however, he spotted a blue aerogram on the floor. Although it lay only a few feet from the door, he hadn't noticed it on entering. Picking the aerogram up, he saw that it was from Swamiji in Calcutta. It was as if Swamiji were there to greet him—a miracle!

As Satsvarūpa tore open the blue aerogram, he considered how it had traveled from hand to hand, originating with Swamiji in his room in Calcutta, and had flown to America, mixed in with thousands of other letters in a large mail bag, and had been separated and brought here to a building where no one lived. Yet the mailman had put it through the chute, and it had glided a few feet and landed on the floor, where it had sat for days. This was, of course, no more than the miracle of the postal service. But what the postman could not have possibly appreciated was that so much was being carried in that lightweight aerogram. Sitting on the window shelf, Satsvarūpa read Swamiji's words.

I can understand that you have secured a very nice place in Boston and there is very good possibility of pushing our movement amongst the student community there. Our movement is certainly very much appealing to the younger section of your country and if we are successful in the matter of attracting the students' community in your country, certainly this movement will scatter all over the world and the foretelling of Lord Caitanya that in every village and every town of the world the Lord will be famous for His glorious sankirtana movement. Please try for this with your heart and soul and your life will be a successful mission.

Satsvarūpa took the letter as confirmation that they should take this building. But as there was little space and no hot water, and as Himāvatī was pregnant, Hamsadūta decided to move with his wife to the Montreal temple. At the same time, however, another disciple, Pradyumna, moved to Boston. So Satsvarūpa, Jadurāṇī, and Pradyumna moved into the little storefront.

Śrīla Prabhupāda wrote Satsvarūpa from India, asking him to try and get him an appointment as a lecturer at a university in Boston. Such an appointment, Prabhupāda reasoned, would enable him to easily obtain permanent residency in the U.S. Satsvarūpa went first to Harvard, where administrators and faculty members simply sent him from office to office. Although some of them seemed curious to hear about the learned swami, his books, and his mission, none seriously considered endorsing the swami as a member of the Harvard faculty. Satsvarūpa continued, however, walking from office to office, rapt in thought of Swamiji, praying to be a better and more effectual disciple. Keenly he felt the lack of appreciation of these educators for that person who was actually the most valuable teacher of all.

A famous Sanskrit professor, in his cubbyhole within the Widener Library, gave half an hour to hearing from Satsvarūpa about the swami and talking to him about the Vedas. But the professor was unable to sign a letter requesting that the swami come to America.

Finally, after several days at Harvard, Satsvarūpa managed to reserve a hall in a fraternity house for a single evening in November. The most difficult part was to persuade the house clerk to type a letter on the fraternity's letterhead acknowledging that Swami Bhaktivedanta would lecture at the hall for one night in November. Although it was only a tiny victory, Satsvarūpa was pleased nevertheless. He sent the "Harvard" letter to Swamiji, who gratefully acknowledged it but added that an appointment as lecturer would have been better.

November came, and Swamiji was still in India. So Satsvarūpa, Pradyumna, and Jadurāṇī attended the engagement themselves, handling lively debates with the students. The Harvard Crimson printed a picture of the devotees, describing them as prophets. Śrīla Prabhupāda said he liked that in his absence his disciples were acting as prophets of Kṛṣṇa consciousness.

One night about two weeks before Prabhupāda left India for San Francisco, Satsvarūpa dreamed that Swamiji had already come to Boston. When he wrote Prabhupāda about this, Prabhupāda replied,

You have described in your letter that my presence again before you will be wonderful. I quite agree that it will be wonderful to be with you. Your sincere prayer to Lord Nṛsimhadeva is helping me to recuperate my health, and you will be glad to know that I am arriving in San Francisco on 14 December... I can understand that you are all thinking for me twenty-four hours and therefore Satsvarupa had a dream that I had gone to Boston and was enjoying your company.

On December 14, 1967, Śrīla Prabhupāda arrived in San Francisco. The next day a devotee there phoned the devotees in Boston and told them details of Swamiji's arrival. He said he might even be able to arrange for Swamiji to speak to them on the phone; at least he would try.

Then one night the phone rang in the Boston storefront... and it was Swamiji! Jadurāṇī, who answered, said she had heard that Swamiji had looked very healthy at the airport and that he had been walking quickly and was tanned from the sun. When Prabhupāda mentioned that he had traveled all the way from India by himself, Jadurāṇī corrected, "But Kṛṣṇa was with you." Satsvarūpa was next. "Swamiji," he began, "we miss you very much." And Prabhupāda replied, "Yes, and I am hearing you also." Then Pradyumna spoke to Prabhupāda, explaining how he was trying to advertise Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam.

Afterwards, each devotee related to the others what Swamiji had said. Each admitted to having said at least one very foolish thing to Swamiji; but they agreed that everything Swamiji had said had been wonderful. Satsvarūpa's and Pradyumna's happiness became so great that they couldn't restrain themselves from rolling on the floor.

On the phone Prabhupāda had said that when he had left America he had had very little hope of returning. But Kṛṣṇa had informed him that he was not going to die immediately, so he had returned. He had said that he was getting inspiration in Kṛṣṇa consciousness from his own disciples, whom he considered to be "good souls."

Prabhupāda later wrote the Boston devotees from San Francisco.

Although officially I am your spiritual master, I consider all you students as my spiritual master because your love for Krishna and service for Krishna teach me how to become a sincere Krishna conscious person.

He told them that although they were only three devotees, they should each work for three hundred. A Kṛṣṇa conscious person, Prabhupāda explained, is never tired of working. Prabhupāda saw this as a symptom of spiritual advancement in his disciples, many of whom never tired of devotional service and always wanted to be overloaded with more and more work.

To each of the three devotees in Boston Prabhupāda had given a specific engagement. Jadurāṇī's was painting. Prabhupāda had told her to increase the beauty of Back to Godhead magazine with illustrations. He had especially commissioned certain paintings: Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa in Vṛn dāvana, Lord Viṣṇu, Lord Caitanya with His four principal associates, Lord Caitanya and His associates performing kīrtana, as well as paintings of Bhaktivinoda Ṭhākura, Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī, and Swamiji himself.

Since Jadurāṇī didn't have much art training, her first paintings had been crude, and Prabhupāda had sometimes laughed to see a picture's defects. But he had been pleased with Jadurāṇī, who chanted Hare Kṛṣṇa while she worked and executed each painting just according to his instructions. If she stayed absorbed in painting, Prabhupāda said, then wherever she lived would be as good as Vṛndāvana.

Prabhupāda wrote to Jadurāṇī, asking her to gather other female disciples interested in art, form an art department, and flood the world with paintings of Kṛṣṇa. The paintings, he said, were like windows on the spiritual world. He instructed her in many of the details of painting.

The airplanes in Vaikuṇṭha aren't exactly like the airplanes here, but it is something like the swan while flying, in shape, with a throne on the back, bedecked all over with golden filigree work, and looking very brilliant. It isn't a bird flying, but the shape of the plane is like the swan bird flying.

In depicting the fight between the boar incarnation of Lord Kṛṣṇa and the demon Hiranyākṣa, Prabhupāda gave specific instructions.

The demons could assume any gigantic shape they liked. They can play jugglery; they are not ordinary human beings. You must know that a person with whom God had to fight is not an ordinary person. He could play almost equally with the Lord, but nobody can excel the Lord...

Yes, Varaha is very beautiful. Generally, the boar picture is depicted as half-human, and half-boar, but in Bhāgavatam it is stated that full boar. You can make the first two legs as two hands, and the rear two legs as legs, and make it as beautiful as possible... Yes, He is reddish just like a boar.

Eager to improve her art, Jadurāṇī began studying the great masters. But when she painted Nārada Muni after the style of Raphael, Prabhupāda said that Nārada looked too sensuous. He said he preferred her first painting of Nārada, although it had not been much more than a stick figure, because she had carefully tried to follow a print he had given her. Seeing the new sensuous Nārada and hearing of Jadurāṇī's plans to study art and sell her paintings, Prabhupāda replied critically.

You are already a great artist. You don't want to become a great artist to satisfy the senses of the public. If your present paintings are not acceptable to the general public, I do not mind; they are fools. You continue trying your best to make your pictures as far as they can be nice looking, but not to satisfy the senses of the rascal public. Yesterday I was in a Unitarian church and there I saw two pictures of only logs and bamboo, and it was explained to me by our great artist Govinda dāśī that these are modern abstract art. Anyway I couldn't see in them anything but a combination of logs and bamboos. There is nothing to impel my Krishna consciousness. So, if you want to be a great artist in that way, I will pray that Krishna may save you. Anyway, if the public doesn't buy, we don't mind. Why you are anxious for selling? We shall distribute them to devotees without any price. If our things have no market in the sense gratification society that does not mean we are going to change our principles. We are meant for satisfying Krishna, not anybody's senses. That should be the principle of our life.

Jadurāṇī became despondent. Feeling like a fool and a deviant disciple, she wrote Prabhupāda only a brief reply. For several days she moped, considering her situation hopeless. Then she received another letter.

This is the first time I have received a letter from you finished in only three lines, so I can understand that you have been depressed by receiving my last letter. The idea is that there is a story, "That, I have lost my caste and still my belly is not fulfilled." In India, it is the custom that the Hindus do not ever take meals in the house of a Mohammedan, Christian, or anyone other than the house of a Hindu brahmana. But a man was very hungry, and accidentally he took his food in the house of a Mohammedan. And when he wanted still more food, the man refused, as the Mohammedan could not supply. So the Hindu man said, "Sir, I have lost my caste, and still I am hungry(!)" Similarly, if artistic pictures as they are approved by the people in general in this country can be sold quickly, I have no objection to present our pictures in such a way. But I know that pictures in this country are sold not on the merit of the picture, but on the reputation of the artist. That system is also current in India. But to come to the point of a reputed artist will require a long duration of time. And our time is very short. We have to finish our Krishna consciousness during our lifetime, and we should not waste a single moment for anything else. According to Caitanya-caritamṛta, a man is famous who is known as a great devotee of Krishna. So if there is not possibility of selling our pictures immediately on presentation, I do not think there is any necessity to improve our artistic craftsmanship. We should be satisfied with our pictures hanging in our different temples. But we may not sacrifice our valuable time for becoming famous artists so that pictures may be sold like hotcakes... Of course, I am not an artist, neither I have power to see from artistic viewpoint; I am a layman, so whichever picture appeals to me I say it is nice, and whichever picture does not appeal to me I say it is not nice. That is my common sense affair. Therefore my remark has no value from artistic sense. Anyway, don't be depressed; you can go on with your work, and we shall talk more on this subject when we meet together.

Taking heart, Jadurāṇī continued to turn out more new paintings until there was scarcely room enough in the storefront to hang another.

Pradyumna's service was Sanskrit. Prabhupāda encouraged him to become expert so that one day he would be able to assist in the translation of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam. Although to help support the temple Pradyumna had taken a clerical job with an insurance company, when he wasn't at his job, he would usually be in the basement studying Sanskrit. A natural scholar, he began accumulating books and talking to Sanskrit students and professors at Harvard, where a prominent professor allowed him to audit one of his Sanskrit courses. Prabhupāda gave Pradyumna as his first assignment in Sanskrit the rendering of English synonyms for the verses of Brahma-saṁhitā. He also assigned him specific books to study, and Pradyumna took to them with enthusiasm, even avoiding the chores Satsvarūpa asked him to do in the temple.

Prabhupāda was pleased with Pradyumna's work, and this inspired Pradyumna to work more and more. But when Pradyumna sent a list of books he wanted to read to Prabhupāda for his approval, Prabhupāda, although interested in Pradyumna's scholarship, warned him of the dangers.

Regarding the book list: Lord Gaurāṅga by S. K. Ghose and Veder Parichaya by Bon Maharaja are useless and you may not get them. The other books and the Gaudiya paper are acceptable... I am glad to know that you are working hard to expand the Krishna consciousness propaganda in Boston. I may say that this practical devotion is the secret to understanding the sastras. My Guru Maharaja used to say that for one who is not engaged in devotional service, reading all of the books is simply like licking the outside of the honey jar. One who thinks the book is the thing is content in this way. But we should learn the secret to open the jar and taste the honey. In this way, if we can simply understand one book, one sloka, the perfection is there. Lord Caitanya warned about reading too many books, although I see in America this is very popular to get volumes and volumes of books and not understand one. Anyway by sincerely working and by carefully executing the instructions of the spiritual master you will be all successful by Krishna's grace. I am always praying to Krishna for your advancement in Krishna consciousness, all of you, sincere souls.

When Prabhupāda noticed spelling errors in the Sanskrit words in Back to Godhead magazine, he asked that Pradyumna standardize the Sanskrit transliterations. Pradyumna had the aptitude, and Prabhupāda hoped he would become a successful scholar.

Satsvarūpa's special assignment was typing and editing Prabhupāda's Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam dictations. Prabhupāda had first given Satsvarūpa this assignment in New York in 1966, and Satsvarūpa had continued when Prabhupāda had gone to San Francisco early in 1967. Later that same year, when Prabhupāda fell ill and stopped dictating, there had been no more tapes for Satsvarūpa to type. But as soon as Prabhupāda had returned from India, he had again begun translating Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam. He had written Satsvarūpa in Boston, asking him to rent a dictating machine: "As soon as you let me know that you have one dictaphone there, I will send you the tapes regularly."

By the end of December the tapes had begun arriving at the Boston temple—plastic reels, Grundig dictation tapes, wrapped in a simple business envelope, stapled and addressed in Swamiji's own hand. First they had come at the rate of one a week, then more quickly—two or three a week. Satsvarūpa had set aside the early morning hours for typing, before going to work, even before the others had risen from bed. He would sit on the kitchen floor listening to Prabhupāda's voice through earphones and typing. "This is better than getting a letter," he would think. It was Swamiji himself teaching the philosophy of Kṛṣṇa consciousness.

Satsvarūpa became so attached to his service that his whole existence began to revolve around it. He would feel a pang of love for every U.S. mailman he saw in the city, because it was the mailmen who delivered Swamiji's tapes.

Although Satsvarūpa considered himself expert in hearing Swamiji's voice, on one tape there was one word he couldn't understand. Prabhupāda was describing the demon Hiraṇyākṣa's birth from Diti, and to Satsvarūpa it sounded like "by the pores of the pregnancy of Diti, the whole universe went dark." How could Diti's pregnancy have pores? Prabhupāda wrote back that it was "force," not "pores." Prabhupāda wrote, "The best thing will be as soon as you typewrite the tapes send me one copy after editing. I will keep one copy with me, you keep one copy with you..."

Sometimes, while riding on the bus to work, Satsvarūpa would fall asleep and dream of hearing Swamiji's voice in his ears and himself rapidly typing. It was a very personal service. Prabhupāda had nine tapes, and he wanted to keep track of how many were with Satsvarūpa and how many were on their way back to him. "I have sent one tape this morning," Prabhupāda wrote. "Probably you are getting it tomorrow. So far I received your edited copy of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, and it is nicely done."

Since the arrival of winter's snow and ice in Boston, not many people had been coming by the storefront in the evenings. And the devotees were content to stay indoors, working at their respective tasks. Each of them was satisfied that his engagement was perfect.

Prabhupāda had fixed the date of his arrival in Boston for May 1, and he asked Satsvarūpa to begin arranging lectures for him in Boston's many universities. When the devotees sent Prabhupāda a few photographs of the storefront interior, he wrote back, "It gives me a nice idea." Although the photos showed only a small empty room with an unfinished altar, Prabhupāda had not been looking with the eyes of an interior decorator. Rather, his "nice idea" was that his disciples in Boston were engaging in Kṛṣṇa consciousness to the best of their ability. The important thing was that they were serving Kṛṣṇa. By adding Kṛṣṇa consciousness, anything material could become valuable.

When Pradyumna had to enter the hospital for a hernia operation, Satsvarūpa didn't know how they would pay for it. Pradyumna's parents had refused. Having no one else to turn to, Satsvarūpa wrote Prabhupāda, asking him if he could pay the bill. Just as a dependent child, fearful of the world, turns always to his protective parents, Satsvarūpa had faith that Swamiji knew everything and could decide everything. And besides, no one else cared about Pradyumna or how the Boston center for Kṛṣṇa consciousness would pay a five-hundred-dollar hospital bill. Satsvarūpa concluded that if Swamiji thought it wrong for him to ask for the money, then he would tell them that also.

Śrīla Prabhupāda considered the hospital bill a botheration. Why should he have to worry about every item of business in ten different centers around the world? Although he assured Satsvarūpa that if necessary he would send the money for Pradyumna's bill, he suggested that his disciples form a governing board to manage such problems. His growing institution had to be properly managed—and not entirely by him. He should be left to carry on the duties proper for the spiritual master, not that he should have to be simultaneously treasurer, chairman, troubleshooter, and counselor for each problem of each devotee in each center. And yet that was happening as he accepted more disciples. They were turning to him for everything: medical advice, marriage counseling, financial assistance, as well as transcendental knowledge. Prabhupāda said it gave him a headache.

After Pradyumna's successful surgery, Prabhupāda wrote, congratulating him.

I shall be glad to know how you are making progress, and I am anxious that you are still feeling pains. I am glad to know that proper care is being taken, and you are not going up any stairs. That is very nice.

As the time grew nearer for Prabhupāda's arrival, Satsvarūpa, Pradyumna, and Jadurāṇī arranged for his living accommodation. When they wrote to Prabhupāda in New York candidly telling him what they had and asking if it was good enough, he replied that he didn't mind walking the nine blocks from the storefront to the house as long as there were no hills. And he didn't mind how many devotees stayed with him at the apartment, but he must have a separate, silent place. As for college lecture engagements, he said whether they were big or small, he was always "prepared to serve." "Probably you are making fine arrangements," he wrote. "Many will come to the temple to hear me. So in that case I must come."

May 1, 1968

The first devotee to meet Prabhupāda in Boston was Jadurāṇī, walking forward at the airport with a flower garland for her spiritual master. As they rode in the taxi together back to the temple, Prabhupāda asked Jadurāṇī about her painting. She complained that in preparing for his visit she had had to sew material for the altar, put up curtains, and make posters and post them all over the city—because the men in the temple were working at their office jobs. Consequently, she hadn't been able to do her real service of painting. "Don't worry," Prabhupāda said, "I won't stay long."

The taxi stopped at Prabhupāda's house on Hester Street. It was a two-story building, the first floor being Prabhupāda's apartment. Up stairs were some Boston University students, who had agreed to play their music softly while the swami was visiting; their motorcycles were parked beside the house. Walking slowly up the wooden stairs and across the front porch, Prabhupāda entered his apartment. Prabhupāda found Satsvarūpa in the kitchen, standing over the stove, cooking. Satsvarūpa offered obeisances and immediately returned to his cooking, apologizing that he hadn't been able to meet Swamiji at the airport. He had three burners going at once, and he appeared both very happy and very nervous.

"What are you cooking?" Prabhupāda asked.

"Sweetrice, halavā, purīs, and a vegetable," Satsvarūpa replied, stirring the sweet rice and watching over the other preparations as he spoke. It was more like the Sunday feast than Swamiji's daily fare of rice, dāl, and capātīs. But these rich dishes were all Satsvarūpa knew how to cook.

Prabhupāda smiled. Looking around the kitchen, he saw against the window a poster: "The Spiritual Master of the Holy Name is Coming to Boston." It was a photo of Swamiji with a list of speaking engagements at various universities. As Prabhupāda read it his face brightened. "You have given me a full month's engagement!" he said. Then he walked leisurely out of the kitchen, leaving Satsvarūpa anxiously trying to hurry lunch without burning anything.

Prabhupāda entered his room and took a seat at the low desk, leaning his back against the pillow. "Why don't you take some rest now?" Jadurāṇī suggested.

"I rested on the plane," Prabhupāda replied.

"Well," Jadurāṇī persisted, "you could rest some more."

Prabhupāda turned his head slightly away from her and said softly, "I am not meant for resting all day and night."

Prabhupāda asked to see Satsvarūpa. Gaurasundara went to fetch him but returned saying that Satsvarūpa couldn't come; he was too busy cooking.

When Prabhupāda's lunch finally arrived, the devotees in his room excused themselves and left Prabhupāda alone. Most of the devotees—including several guests and visitors from New York—having stayed up all night preparing Swamiji's apartment, fell asleep on the floor in various rooms throughout the apartment. Prabhupāda could hear their snoring, and after finishing his lunch he went out and looked from room to room without waking anyone. In the living room, he sat down on the couch, and soon the devotees awoke and joined him.

Prabhupāda began talking about Kṛṣṇa in Vṛndāvana. "Vṛndāvana," he said, "is the kingdom of Rādhārāṇī. In Vṛndāvana, if someone wanted to visit me"—he looked behind him down the long hallway toward the door at the rear of the apartment—"they would call 'Jaya Radhe!'" Prabhupāda called out loudly, as if he were a visitor at the back door. "And I would call back"—he looked again toward the rear door—"Jaya Radhe! Kṛṣṇa is very strict, and Rādhā is very nice. A woman, unless she is unnatural, is very soft-hearted and very kindhearted. And Rādhārāṇī is not unnatural."

Later Jadurāṇī apologized to Swamiji for foolishly complaining to him in the car. He had said to her, "Don't worry, I won't stay long," but actually she wanted him to stay permanently. She didn't want him to think that his presence was an inconvenience. She had complained because she was in anxiety about neglecting the service that Prabhupāda had directly given to her. Whenever Satsvarūpa gave her service to do other than painting, she would become confused about the priority. Prabhupāda heard her patiently, clearly understanding the heart of her inquiry. "The direct order of the spiritual master," he said, "is the most important thing to do, except in an emergency."

Prabhupāda's first college lecture engagement in Boston was at Northeastern University. It was noon, and the paved campus, in the center of downtown Boston, was busy with thousands of students. Prabhupāda, accompanied by a small band of his disciples, moved gravely through the crowds.

At the entranceway to one of the main buildings was a large bronze statue of a dog, a husky, Northeastern's mascot. Prabhupāda became amused. Some of the older disciples knew that Swamiji was sarcastically humorous about Americans' attachment to their dogs. Because now people have no interest in God, he would say, therefore they have become devoted to dog. Instead of worshipping G-O-D, materialistic people had become enamored with D-O-G and considered him man's best friend. Some of Prabhupāda's disciples had told him strange stories of how Americans pampered their dogs so much that dogs sometimes sit at the dinner table with their masters or receive their master's property through the master's will. Pausing silently, regarding the almost deified form of the dog, Prabhupāda scored an unspoken criticism of Western values.

About two hundred students and a few teachers crowded into the pews of the small chapel. While Prabhupāda sat cross-legged on a cloth-covered table, Satsvarūpa led the kīrtana, playing on a one-headed drum.

After the kīrtana, Prabhupāda leaned forward to the microphone: "Thank you for giving me this opportunity to glorify the Supreme Personality of Godhead." And he began to lecture about the three aspects of the Absolute Truth, which he compared to the three aspects of the sun: the sunshine, the sun globe, and the sun-god. Although the Absolute Truth is one, some persons see Him as impersonal, all-pervading light; some see Him as the localized Supersoul in the heart of all beings; and some see Him as Bhagavān, the Supreme Personality of Godhead. Prabhupāda's talk was very philosophical.

Digressing, Prabhupāda began talking more about the sun. He said that on the sun there was a presiding deity, Vivasvān. "You can't disbelieve it," Prabhupāda said. And he quoted the Mahābhārata that on the sun are living entities with bodies of fire. Just as certain living entities have bodies adapted to living in water, so there are living entities that live in fire.

The big noonday crowd listened politely. Prabhupāda concluded his half-hour lecture by explaining God, the Supreme Being, as the origin of the material (external) and spiritual (internal) energies. We living entities, although spiritual, have marginal position; all of us in this material world are covered by the external energy. The prayer of "Hare Kṛṣṇa" means, "O my dear Lord, I am Your part and parcel eternally, but some way or other I have fallen in this ignorance of material energy. Kindly lift me up to the spiritual energy."

Although Prabhupāda invited the audience to stay afterward and speak with his disciples, when the bell rang, the lecture abruptly ended, and most of the students immediately left the chapel to make room for the next group of students. It was the academic factory; class was over, and Swamiji and his followers should now leave.

As Prabhupāda was walking down the hall, the wife of one of the college administrators joined him, walking at his side and chatting pleasantly and effusively, assuring him that everyone at the university was very glad he had come. She walked with him to the door and then shook his hand. Turning to Satsvarūpa, she exclaimed that everything had gone beautifully, that Swamiji had spoken wonderfully, and that she would send the hundred-dollar honorarium in the mail. Feeling excited and successful, the devotees accompanied Prabhupāda to the car. Riding back to his house, Prabhupāda agreed it had been a successful engagement.

The Boston University engagement in spacious Marsh Chapel was poorly attended. Despite thousands of students riding the trolleys and going in and out of the luncheonettes and big gray buildings that lined both sides of Commonwealth Avenue for blocks, only half a dozen came to Marsh Chapel to hear Swamiji. The devotees, pained and embarrassed, criticized Satsvarūpa for the turnout. Even the onstage arrangements were poor, with Prabhupāda seated on a too-high, rickety table.

Yet without hesitation, Prabhupāda held a full program, beginning with a kīrtana that lasted almost an hour. He requested Brahmānanda, visiting from New York, to give an introductory speech. Then Prabhupāda spoke, his voice reverberating over the sound system throughout the cavernous empty chapel.

After the lecture, Prabhupāda called for questions. A boy, standing at his seat and shouting to make himself heard, asked, "Is this advaita philosophy?" A challenge. The devotees could tell that this student had come with his own ideas about yoga and "advaita."

"Do you know what is advaita philosophy?" Prabhupāda asked.

"All is One," the boy replied. "Just as the rivers enter into the ocean, so we all enter into the Ultimate Oneness."

Śrīla Prabhupāda replied that although the river goes to the ocean, its place in the ocean is not permanent. Again that water evaporates into the sky, forms clouds, and falls back onto the land. To argue that spiritually everything becomes one as the rivers go to the ocean, then the boy would have to accept the actual conclusion: the water again falls back onto the land. Similarly, those spirit souls who try to merge into the Absolute must again fall back into the material world. Prabhupāda thoroughly defeated the impersonal notion of oneness. The boy sat down silent. There were no other questions.

Talking with his disciples afterwards, Prabhupāda said sarcastically, "People today do not even know how to ask a good question. These impersonalists always ask the same hackneyed question about the river going into the ocean."

On the way back to the temple, some of the devotees continued to grumble about Swamiji's having to go to an engagement with such a poor turnout. Brahmānanda warned Satsvarūpa that the next engagement had better not be like this one.

Prabhupāda was well aware of the worldwide prestige of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology in Cambridge. Many Indians went there to study. It was, in fact, an Indian organization that invited Prabhupāda to speak. When Prabhupāda arrived in the evening, he found over a hundred people waiting in the carpeted, luxurious student lounge where he was to lecture. Some students were sitting on the floor, while others sat on the leather-upholstered couches and chairs scattered casually throughout the room.

Although it was time for the lecture to begin, the devotees had still not arrived with the paraphernalia. There was no flower garland for Prabhupāda, no painting of Kṛṣṇa, and no sign with the mahā-mantra. The audience waited.

In anxiety, Satsvarūpa asked Prabhupāda, "Can you begin without the painting?" Looking at the large, momentous gathering, Śrīla Prabhupāda said simply, "Painting is not important." He sat on the plain wooden platform and, since the musical instruments had not arrived, asked one of the devotees to play the Hare Kṛṣṇa album. Prabhupāda sat clapping his hands in time and listening.

Prabhupāda spoke boldly, challenging the very concepts underlying MIT. Where in this big university, he asked, is a department for studying the technology of the soul, for understanding that principle which distinguishes a living body from a dead body, that principle which when present in the body gives life and when absent brings death? Where is the science to study this all-important principle of life? Although scientists consider life to be merely chemicals or electric impulses, he argued, still they are unable to assemble the chemicals and produce life. Why? There is no department in this university for answering this question, and therefore people are in ignorance. They don't know the self or the next life or the purpose of human life beyond animal activities. This science, however, is taught in the Bhagavad-gītā.

After the lecture there were many questions. "What is the symbolism," one student asked, "of that object behind you on the stage?" Prabhupāda turned and beheld a bare U-shaped metal stand—compliments of the janitor—for holding the painting of Kṛṣṇa that never arrived.

"This?" Prabhupāda frowned. "I do not know what this is. This is some kind of technological symbol."

Another student asked, "Why do you wear that marking on your forehead?"

"Why do you wear that necktie around your neck?" Prabhupāda snapped back, annoyed with the question. The student sat down, looking at his necktie, and Prabhupāda explained to him that questions about why people dress a certain way are trivial, especially considering the gravity of the present subject matter.

When the question-and-answer period ended, Satsvarūpa stood and briefly addressed the students, inviting them to attend other college lectures by Śrīla Prabhupāda or to come hear him at the temple. "Wherever a saintly person goes," Satsvarūpa said, "becomes a tīrtha, or holy place. And now for the month of May, Boston is a tīrtha, so please take advantage of it."

As Śrīla Prabhupāda was leaving with his disciples, a group of Indian faculty members and students came and stood around him, speaking rapidly, challenging him. One student, espousing the philosophy of monism, asserted that the highest expression of the Absolute Truth was that "All is One." Prabhupāda tried to make him understand that simply oneness was a rudimentary idea, because from that "one" come so many variegated manifestations. But the man would not accept defeat, and Prabhupāda became excited arguing with him. Taking the man by the shirt collar, Prabhupāda shouted, "You say everything is one! But is this cotton shirt the same as a cotton ball? Why don't you wear a cotton ball instead of this shirt?"

The Indian technologists surrounded Prabhupāda, raising their voices and arguing, while Prabhupāda's disciples looked on anxiously. Govinda dāsī warned the devotees about Swamiji's health, and Brahmānanda and the others smoldered at the offensive Indians. This wasn't the way to speak with a sādhu.

Meanwhile, a devotee reported that Prabhupāda's car had broken down, and someone ran out into the street to get a taxi. The arguing continued. When a taxi finally arrived, a few disciples pushed through the arguers, insisting, "Swamiji, please, your taxi is waiting. It can't wait any longer. You have to go." And they disengaged their spiritual master from the mass of arguing technologists. Prabhupāda considered the evening a success.

Some of the devotees who had seen the poor attendance at Prabhupāda's Boston University lecture feared the same thing might happen at the Harvard School of Divinity. So they suggested Swamiji wait at his apartment while they went ahead to the lecture hall to see how many people would gather. When they saw a decent number gathering, one of them phoned Satsvarūpa that Swamiji should come. Meanwhile at the lecture hall, Joseph Matthews, a graduate student in Vaiṣṇavism, addressed the audience, describing from the mundane academic viewpoint the history of the Caitanya movement.

Prabhupāda, arriving half an hour later than scheduled, led the audience in kīrtana and began his talk. He praised the Harvard students as fortunate, citing that according to Vedic literature, aristocratic birth, good education, beauty, and wealth are the four chief material opulences. Compared to others in the world, he said, the students at Harvard had all these opulences. If, however, they could increase their good fortune by adding Kṛṣṇa consciousness, then that would be their perfection. For example, gold is certainly very valuable. But if gold were to have a pleasant fragrance, then it would be even more valuable. Similarly, if these materially fortunate persons could add the spiritual fortune of Kṛṣṇa consciousness to their life, then that life would be successful.

After Prabhupāda's talk, Mr. Matthews thanked him for his discourse on Hindu philosophy. But immediately Prabhupāda interrupted: "Actually, we are not Hindu." And Prabhupāda explained the universality of Kṛṣṇa consciousness.

As the meeting broke, some interested students came forward for more discussion with Swamiji. One Sanskrit student asked, "How can a brahmacārī be expected to understand the Gītā-govinda, since it deals in so many intricacies of man-woman relationships and love affairs?"

Śrīla Prabhupāda replied, "Only a brahmacārī can understand Gītā-govinda, because it is not about mundane sexuality. It is the highest spiritual technology of Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa."

Prabhupāda was especially pleased about his Harvard lecture. The next morning Satsvarūpa went to see him with a check for $125 from Harvard. "That was a very good meeting last night," Prabhupāda said.

It seemed to the devotees accompanying Prabhupāda from one speaking engagement to another that they were the real audience, the ones to whom Prabhupāda was speaking. It was for them that he had come to Boston, more than for the two hundred students who sat in the chapel at Northeastern until the bell rang, or the technologists in the lounge at MIT who left after the lecture for the movies and the bars. Prabhupāda was setting the example of how to preach. It was for them—the ones who would have to carry on the mission in his absence.

From morning until night, Prabhupāda spoke about Kṛṣṇa. Although yogīs sometimes take a vow of silence to avoid useless, frivolous talk, he said, one who knows Kṛṣṇa wants to speak twenty-four hours a day. "When you love God, you want to tell others about Him. And automatically you write volumes and volumes of books."

Of course, many times in the day Prabhupāda was actually silent, alone in his room. But that "silence" was also Kṛṣṇa conscious. Sometimes Govinda dāsī would peek in and find him reading the Sanskrit Bhāgavatam commentaries, chanting on his beads, or dozing briefly at his desk after lunch. Sometimes he would sing verses from Caitanya-caritāmṛta or walk around the apartment with his hand in his bead bag, chanting to himself and observing his assistants.

Govinda dāsī: In Boston Swamiji would sing for hours from Caitanya-caritāmṛta or Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam—just singing with the most feeling all by himself in his room. And I would peek in the keyhole to see how he was. Sometimes I would go in and check on him when he would pause. I would try not to disturb him—"Just checking." I would just go in to see if he needed anything. Sometimes I would peek in and simply think, "Who is he? Nobody knows who he really is or where he really came from or how great he really is." Especially in Boston I began to feel very strongly that he was such a great personality and that I was viewing only a very, very minute glimpse of him, and that actually much, much more was going on than I could realize.

A devotee might go in to ask Swamiji what he wanted for lunch or to check on his travel schedule or to get advice on some business item, but the talk would almost invariably turn to Kṛṣṇa conscious philosophy once matters at hand had been dealt with. What Swamiji wanted for lunch might bring him to talk about what Kṛṣṇa liked for lunch, or how great devotees went without eating, or how the modern-day civilization was demoniac for killing helpless cows. And whoever entered Prabhupāda's room might find himself being pressed to argue against the existence of God and then be defeated by Prabhupāda. Or Prabhupāda might start talking—even to a disciple who came to replace a burned-out bulb—about how he wanted to one day introduce the Kṛṣṇa conscious social order, varṇāśrama-dharma, all over the world.

Sometimes a lone devotee sitting with Prabhupāda as he spoke so profoundly would feel guilty: "If instead of talking just to me he were translating his books, then everyone could benefit. I shouldn't be taking up his time in this way." Once Jadurāṇī expressed the sentiment, "Swamiji, maybe you should save your strength for translating."

"If you love someone," Prabhupāda replied, raising his head back while looking at Jadurāṇī, "you like to hear him speak."

More often, however, once a devotee got into Prabhupāda's room he wouldn't leave until Govinda dāśī came in, dropping broad hints or pointing to her watch and signalling from the doorway. In fact, the devotees took up so much of Prabhupāda's time that Gaurasundara and Govinda dāśī complained to Satsvarūpa. Swamiji was being disturbed more in Boston than he had been in any other place, they said, and he was getting very little translating done. Alarmed that Boston was becoming inconvenient for Swamiji, Satsvarūpa agreed to restrict devotees from seeing Prabhupāda in his room. He informed the devotees that they could accompany Prabhupāda on his walk, but that they should not follow him back to his house.

Satsvarūpa: Following my instruction the next morning everyone stopped at the bottom of the porch; Swamiji alone walked up the steps to his house. When he got to the top step, he turned around to see us all standing there, and he waved to us, "Come on." Everyone immediately ran up the stairs and joined him in his room.

Feeling guilty that we were taking up his time, I made an attempt to terminate the discussion in his room. Bowing my head to the floor in a gesture of leaving, I announced to Śrīla Prabhupāda, "We will leave you now and let you do your work." But Swamiji checked me as presumptuous. "You think I am not working now? Do you think this is not work?" He said, "You do not know what work is. This is also work." And he talked on.

Śrīla Prabhupāda spoke to eradicate the ignorance of whoever would hear him—whether a crowd of thousands or a single disciple in his room. Although he was especially interested in addressing the younger generation—the older was too biased—the number of listeners wasn't important. After the first meeting in the temple, when the attendance had dropped, Prabhupāda had said that it didn't mean he should stop speaking. He gave the example of a university in Calcutta that had kept classes open although only two students had enrolled in one course and only one student in another. And this, Śrīla Prabhupāda said, should certainly be the standard with transcendental education; if only one person learned it, he could do good to many others.

Early one morning as Śrīla Prabhupāda walked through the neighborhood of Allston with Satsvarūpa and Gaurasundara, Satsvarūpa mentioned that a famous swami had recently given a talk at Arlington Street Church, where Prabhupāda was also scheduled to speak. "What does he say?" Prabhupāda asked. Satsvarūpa said that he had heard that the swami had said he was God. Immediately Prabhupāda began to argue, destroying the swami's alleged claim to be God.

"They say they are God and the dog is God," Prabhupāda began. As he spoke, Satsvarūpa and Gaurasundara walked beside him, sometimes holding back a low tree branch or watching on Prabhupāda's behalf for traffic at the street crossings. But mostly they were concentrating on Prabhupāda's words. Satsvarūpa could understand that Swamiji was expending energy just to instruct him, to equip him to defeat such arguments. He tried to remember every word exactly as Swamiji was speaking it.

"If everyone is God," Prabhupāda continued, "then why is God worshiped all over the world in temples and churches, and why are these 'Gods' shoe-kicking each other? Do they know what God is that they say they are God? Do they have an idea of what God is? God is the controller. Are they controlling the universe? Ask them these questions. Are they omnipotent and omniscient? These are qualities of God. If you are God, do you know what I am thinking?—because God is all-knowing. They should not be allowed to say these things. They should be curbed with these questions."

Prabhupāda punctuated his talk by sudden stops. He was angry. It was as if he were charging his disciples for allowing this nonsense "I am God" talk to go on unchecked. Why didn't they stop these rascals? He looked at them with eyes flashing. Were they meeting the challenges of the atheists? They should be. They should be fighting. And these were the arguments they should use. They shouldn't doubt.

"We understand God is vast," Prabhupāda continued. "We are similar to Him in quality, but we are infinitesimal. If they are God, then how is it they have come to this doggish state? You may be God, but for the present moment they are not God. They will admit that for the present moment they are not God, but that they will become God in the future. But what kind of God is this? And how have they fallen under illusion? That means illusion is stronger than God—that they have come under illusion. So the God then is māyā, or not God. They may be God, but they are not the param brahman, the supreme God. We have the definition of God—that He is all-powerful. This swami is not all-powerful. If some poor fellow came to him on the street, he could not stop from getting a beating. And if he got a toothache, he would be ruined as God. God is all-wealthy. This swami is begging for money, and he is God? God is all-knowing. They are not even intelligent. To surrender to Kṛṣṇa is intelligent. They are kicking each other, and they are fallen in the conditioned state. And they say they are God! These questions should be put to them. They cannot answer them."

Prabhupāda continued his walk through a neighborhood of automobile showrooms, hamburger luncheonettes not yet opened, and bus stops crowded with workers who stared at the elderly Swami passing with his young followers.

"The devotees," Prabhupāda said, "are more interested in talking about Kṛṣṇa and in chanting His name than in arguing. But because so many godless parties come forward and challenge, a Vaiṣṇava must be able to argue on the basis of śāstra and sound logic."

Mr. Matthews, the Harvard graduate student of Vaiṣṇavism, visited Prabhupāda at his apartment one evening. Prabhupāda explained that if one is inquisitive not about temporary things but about the Absolute, then he must go to a guru. Mr. Matthews asked whether sannyāsa was necessary.

According to Bhagavad-gītā, Prabhupāda replied, a sannyāsī is one who has given everything to the service of Kṛṣṇa. The dress and social standing are not important. While Mr. Matthews posed intricate questions about the contemporary situation of spiritual masters in India, Śrīla Prabhupāda explained that a true spiritual master must be in disciplic succession and must strictly follow the regulative principles of Vaiṣṇava behavior. The current family custom in India of having a family guru was foolishness. The guru was not a family commodity or a pet.

Mr. Matthews was trying to make the point that Prabhupāda was not the only spiritual master and that there were many pure devotees in places like Vṛndāvana who did not necessarily go out for preaching but who preached to whoever came to them.

"Lord Caitanya," said Śrīla Prabhupāda, "ordered to go out and preach Kṛṣṇa consciousness. Not that I stay in Vṛndāvana, and if anyone comes to me, I will teach. We must go out and go to them. Caitanya Mahāprabhu ordered like that. He is the authority. We don't serve this or that. We serve Kṛṣṇa and nothing else: 'I am a servant of Kṛṣṇa.' And the best position for preaching is sannyāsa, because he doesn't have to send money to his family or go back to his wife at a certain hour. But everything is for Kṛṣṇa. This is the attractive background for preaching. The dress is not important."

Mr. Matthews disagreed that a spiritual master had to be a sannyāsī or a renounced preacher. After about an hour, Mr. Matthews checked his watch and became alarmed: "Oh, my goodness. It's late. I am having guests over, and my wife is cooking a dinner for them. I have to go."

"You see?" Prabhupāda said. "This proves my point."

Late in May, Prabhupāda held a public lecture at the Arlington Street Church, a well-known landmark in the heart of downtown Boston. With many respectable-looking older people as well as young people in the audience, the meeting was well attended. Śrīla Prabhupāda spoke on yoga as Lord Kṛṣṇa explains it in Bhagavad-gītā. Prabhupāda emphasized that Kṛṣṇa chose Arjuna as the recipient of the knowledge of yoga.

Why Arjuna? Arjuna, Śrīla Prabhupāda explained, wasn't a sannyāsī, he was a family man. He wasn't a scholar. And so many big scholars were present at the time. He wasn't a haṭha-yogī or even a brāhmaṇa. So why was he picked? Prabhupāda shouted into the microphone: "Bhakto 'si me!... Bhakto 'si me sakhā ceti. Because you are My devotee!"

Afterward, Prabhupāda asked for questions.

"There are different levels of yoga," someone asked, "so you can take any yoga and then go further up?"

"Step by step you can go up—that is your option. But bhakti-yoga is to take the life immediately. 'One who is thinking always of Me within his heart and is engaged in My service with faith and devotion—he is a first-class yogī of all yogīs.' Yoga means to contact the Supreme Personality of Godhead. If by some process you can at once contact, that is first class. Why not try it? Try chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa. Try this process."

"Does devotion come first and then awareness, or awareness first?"

Prabhupāda: "First devotion, then awareness. If you do not labor for passing exam, how you can pass? The primary rule is to chant. Just see. We have a little faith in the beginning, a little respect. We think, 'Let me see what is this Kṛṣṇa consciousness.' If we think it is nice, then we come again and associate. These boys did not accept in the beginning, but they came and advanced. For others, it is hackneyed. But these boys have become purified and they have a taste. They cannot give it up. It is ecstasy. So there is gradual process of love of God."

The next morning three disciples of Swami Satchidananda visited Śrīla Prabhupāda. Accompanying him on his morning walk, they asked many questions.

They were young men like Prabhupāda's disciples. One of them was a hairdresser named Bob. If they are already disciples of a guru, Satsvarūpa thought, then why are they so curious about another guru's process?

Bob asked, "Don't you need to practice haṭha-yoga in order to purify the body so that eventually you can purify the higher self within?"

"Cleanse the mind and the intelligence," Prabhupāda replied, "and the body is automatically cleansed. Haṭha-yoga is for those in the gross bodily concept of life. In the second chapter of Bhagavad-gītā, Kṛṣṇa says that a wise man doesn't place much importance on the body. The haṭha-yogī's main concentration is this body. By bodily exercise he wants to have Kṛṣṇa's love. If this were possible, all wrestlers and athletes would have achieved Kṛṣṇa's love. Lord Caitanya's program of chanting begins with the cleansing of the mind, and this takes care of cleansing the body."

Yoga student: "What about sex desire? I want the spiritual, but I have such a strong desire for sex."

Prabhupāda: "Haṭha-yoga is also for controlling sex desire. If you have such desire, you are making no progress."

Yoga student: "How does a devotee of Kṛṣṇa control sex desire?"

Prabhupāda: "Automatically. Kṛṣṇa is so beautiful. We are accustomed to this habit for a very long time. Become sincere, and Kṛṣṇa will protect you."

Yoga student: "Sometimes I have a sex urge..."

Prabhupāda: "What? You? Everybody! In birds, beasts, demigods—the binding force is sex. The material life means sex desire. Free from sex desire means advancing in spiritual desire. If you have a strong sex desire, pray to Kṛṣṇa. Know that this is the attack of māyā. Pray, and māyā will go away. You cannot fight with māyā with your own energy. Māyā is presenting herself more beautiful than Kṛṣṇa. But Kṛṣṇa is more beautiful."

Yoga student: "How soon before I could get initiated by you?"

Prabhupāda: "The first initiation is to understand the philosophy. Actually, one should be initiated after hearing for one year."

Yoga student: "How can you tell a Kṛṣṇa conscious holy man from an ordinary holy man?"

Prabhupāda: "He is always thinking about Kṛṣṇa. Not even a moment without thinking about Kṛṣṇa."

Yoga student: "Can māyā have a hold on a man who's dedicated to selflessness, even if he doesn't take to Kṛṣṇa?"

Prabhupāda: "Yes, māyā is always holding you. Unless you surrender to Kṛṣṇa, some way māyā has you. God says, 'Here I am.' But you say God is somewhere else. You are searching after God, and you cannot see when He comes before you. Then you are in māyā. Why don't you accept Kṛṣṇa as God?"

Yoga student: "What is the nature of a devotee? Is he always in ecstasy?"

Prabhupāda: "Yes, always in ecstasy. He's always feeling separation: 'I could not serve Kṛṣṇa.' This is nice."

Yoga student: "Does it actually say anywhere in the scriptures that you have to come back to the material world if you don't worship Kṛṣṇa? Does it actually say it?"

Prabhupāda: "Yes, yes: āruhya kṛcchreṇa paraṁ padaṁ tataḥ patanty adho 'nādr̥ta-yuṣmad-aṅghrayaḥ. 'By neglecting Your lotus feet he has to come down again.' 'Feet' means He is a person."

These yoga students were attracted to Prabhupāda's teachings. They began to act like his followers, attending his kīrtanas and lectures, offering obeisances to him.

One day after a morning walk, Prabhupāda, accompanied by some of his disciples and the yoga students, returned to his room. When Prabhupāda noticed that his secretary, Gaurasundara, was absent, he called for him. Gaurasundara came to the door, and Prabhupāda asked why he was not attending the talk. He was busy working in another room, Gaurasundara explained. "Do you think that these talks I give are just for new men?" Prabhupāda asked angrily. "You don't have to hear? Do you think that you are so advanced? This is not good. You should always hear when your spiritual master speaks."

After several days, the haṭha-yoga students stopped coming. "They appeared so devoted," Prabhupāda remarked casually. "That one boy was even helping me with my shoes."

Prabhupāda continued attending the storefront three nights a week. Wearing his swami cap, with its hanging straps, he looked like a rugged aviator. Entering the room, he would look around to see who was there, walk forward to the altar, offer his obeisances to the picture of Kṛṣṇa, and ascend to the raised platform to speak.

One night, while Prabhupāda was down on his hands and knees before the altar, just about to rise up after offering obeisances, he began to carefully scrutinize a picture one of the devotees had recently placed on the altar. The picture showed a young woman handing baby Kṛṣṇa to His father Vasudeva; both Vasudeva and the young woman were standing in a river. The devotees didn't know the meaning of the picture or who the woman was, so one of them asked Prabhupāda about it.

While Prabhupāda and half a dozen devotees remained on the floor on their hands and knees, Prabhupāda told them the story. Kṛṣṇa's father Vasudeva had been carrying Him across the Yamunā when Kṛṣṇa had fallen in. In great anxiety, Vasudeva had searched within the water for his son. The Yamunā River personified (the young woman in the picture) had then risen out of the water and handed Kṛṣṇa to Vasudeva, saying, "I just wanted to play with Him for a while."

One night after his lecture, while Prabhupāda sat conversing with disciples, Govinda dāsī handed him an advertisement Rāya Rāma had designed for Back to Godhead magazine. The ad featured several pictures of Prabhupāda and the headline "This Man Has Changed the History of the World." The devotees were proud of the ad, which was supposed to be in accordance with the latest graphic and advertising trends. Prabhupāda, however, held the ad in his hand silently. Finally, someone asked him what he thought of it, and Prabhupāda replied, "This is not good. It is not considered respectful to call the spiritual master by the term 'man.' " This shows the state of consciousness of the disciple, he explained. Frowning, he handed back the ad.

Several times one evening, children screaming and rapping on the window panes interrupted Prabhupāda's lecture. After several interruptions, Prabhupāda shook his head and said that these children had no training, which was the fault of modern society. A man in the audience objected: "But children are known as the divine folk."

"What is that?" Prabhupāda asked.

"These children are supposed to be divine."

Prabhupāda looked at the man. "Supposed to be," he said dryly. "That's all right."

One evening after the lecture, Prabhupāda toured the small storefront. One of the main features he noted was the abundance of paintings by Jadurāṇī, and he looked at each one with pleasure.

When he went downstairs to the basement and saw the devotees' austere living and bathing conditions, for which some people had criticized them, he was not disturbed. He inspected the oil burner and asked if it worked all right. There was little for Satsvarūpa to show him in the tiny building, so Prabhupāda saw everything in only a few minutes. Yet because it was Kṛṣṇa's center and they were Kṛṣṇa's devotees, Prabhupāda's brief tour made everything seem important and worthwhile.

It came as a surprise to everyone when one day Prabhupāda said that he would be giving some of his disciples brāhmaṇa, or second, initiation; he would award the Gāyatrī mantra and sacred thread to those men who had been initiated for at least one year. The devotees wanted to know more about the initiation, and Prabhupāda said he would explain everything at the ceremony. The ceremony, he said, would be in the temple, and there should be a sacrificial fire just as at any other initiation. He invited Mr. Matthews from Harvard as the guest of honor.

One the day of the initiation, everyone crowded into the temple room around the mound of earth where the sacred fire would soon be blazing. The half a dozen male disciples whom Śrīla Prabhupāda had selected to receive brahminical initiation took their seats.

Prabhupāda entered. Taking his seat on the pillow on the floor directly before the mound of earth, he began to explain how his spiritual master, Śrīla Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī, had introduced brahminical initiation for disciples not born of brāhmaṇa families. He said the Vedic scriptures offered much evidence that by associating with pure devotees, anyone could become a brāhmaṇa. In fact, the scriptures said that if one born in a brāhmaṇa family did not behave as a brāhmaṇa, then he should not be accepted as a brāhmaṇa. So it was in following his spiritual master and the Vedic scriptures that Śrīla Prabhupāda was now going to give brahminical initiation to his disciples.

Addressing Mr. Matthews as "Professor Matthews," Prabhupāda asked whether he had any questions about the procedure. Mr. Matthews laughed and said he was not a professor yet. He asked whether the Gāyatrī mantra was more important than the Hare Kṛṣṇa mantra. Prabhupāda replied that the Hare Kṛṣṇa mantra was sufficient in itself for delivering the disciple back to Godhead; nevertheless, the Gāyatrī mantra would increase the Kṛṣṇa consciousness of the disciple.

Mr. Matthews: "Do these disciples take on any new vows, such as fasting?"

Prabhupāda: "No, there is no new vow. As far as fasting is concerned, people take to fasting because generally they eat all nonsense all week. So for one day they stop eating in order to purify themselves. But the devotees are always eating Kṛṣṇa prasādam, which is sanctified. So even by eating, they are fasting."

Later in the ceremony, the boys went, one by one, and sat beside Śrīla Prabhupāda, who placed a sacred white thread over their bare shoulders and chest and showed them how to count the mantras on their fingers.

While the sacrificial fire was blazing and the devotees were chanting mantras and throwing grains in the flames, the landlord's wife suddenly intruded. She was middle-aged, intoxicated, disheveled—a grotesque alcoholic tottering in the doorway. Striding into the room, she shouted, "God damn this house!" and then turned and left, slamming the door. Prabhupāda looked up innocently. "What did she say? Did she say that this is the house of God?"

"She's just drunk," Satsvarūpa said.

Govinda dāsī hadn't gone to the initiation, excusing herself as ill. Although she hadn't told Prabhupāda, she was upset that he wasn't giving brahminical initiation to women. Disappointed, she had stayed at Swamiji's apartment, crying. After an hour, however, she decided that by behaving so foolishly she was missing out on Prabhupāda's talk. So she hurried out of the house and ran all the way to the temple, arriving near the end of the ceremony. As she entered, Prabhupāda looked up. "Oh," he said, "I was just thinking, 'Where is that girl?' and Kṛṣṇa has sent."

After the ceremony Govinda dāsī conferred with Jadurāṇī, who also felt slighted. Prabhupāda could detect their mentality, although they didn't openly voice their complaints. The next morning he told Gaurasundara and Govinda dāsī that he saw no harm in offering the Gayātrī mantra to women—but they could not receive the sacred thread. That very night, he held a separate ceremony, initiating Govinda dāsī and Jadurāṇī into the Gayātrī mantra.

A few days later a group of devotees came from New York and Prabhupāda initiated more brāhmaṇas. One morning, when he saw a group of new brāhmaṇa initiates coming to join him on his walk, he said, "Oh, here come the brāhmaṇas. But now don't be brāhmaṇas in name only."

The bus was painted green, had a cracked windshield, no seats, and a dubious engine. It was unregistered and uninsured. Haṁsadūta, who had received the bus as a donation, planned to use it for the world-touring saṅkīrtana party Prabhupāda had asked him to form. Before Śrīla Prabhupāda and a gathering of devotees in Prabhupāda's room, Haṁsadūta talked enthusiastically about the newly donated bus. Prabhupāda asked to go for a ride.

Rohiṇī-kumāra: This bus was so horrible. It was in terrible condition and rattling so much. It was on the verge of breaking down at any minute. The only seat on the bus was the driver's seat, so someone got a chair from the house for Swamiji to sit on. He sat in front like the captain of a ship.

He was completely transcendental to the whole horrible situation. And I felt very bad. I thought, "Oh, Swamiji shouldn't have to ride in such a horrible bus."

What began as a group of devotees taking their spiritual master on a short ride suddenly changed when, after going a block, Prabhupāda began giving the driver directions: "Go to the right, turn left, turn here, now go here." With the bus's engine coughing sporadically, the ride remained rough and rickety, despite several men pooling their weight against the legs of the chair. But by following Prabhupāda's directions, they soon arrived at the waterfront. Prabhupāda said he wanted to go to Commonwealth Pier, the first place he had come in America when, in September of 1965, he had arrived from India aboard the Jaladuta. The boys marvelled as Prabhupāda continued to direct them to Commonwealth Pier.

"I first came here," Prabhupāda said, as he walked along the pier with his disciples. "I thought, 'I don't know why I have come here. The language is different, the idea is different. They are all after sense gratification. I don't know why I've come here.' But now I have got some boys, and even if I am not here, it will go on."

As the devotees walked beside Prabhupāda, trying to hear him speak, they could see the city skyline nearby. One large building was being torn down, and new ones were going up. "So many strong buildings," Prabhupāda said, "being torn down and then rebuilt. There is no pleasure in it, neither in building nor in tearing down. Nobody is happy. It is like with a small child. He is happy to get a toy, and then he is happy to break it. But there is no real happiness. Just like the boy and girl—they come together in union, and then they separate, divorce. There is no real happiness in the union or in the separation. Real happiness is in union with Kṛṣṇa and separation from māyā. But it is māyā that again and again causes this union and separation in the material world."

As they walked together under a steel bridge, Prabhupāda pointed upward with his walking cane, "Look"—a sign under the bridge read UNALLOYED STEEL—"they have unalloyed steel, and we have un alloyed devotional service."

"What if people don't want to hear our message?" Pradyumna asked.

"The people might not understand our message, but Kṛṣṇa will be pleased," Prabhupāda replied. "And that is our mission. They thought Jesus Christ's mission was stopped. They killed him. But his mission was attained. He preached three years only, but so many followers. He pleased Kṛṣṇa. We must not be disappointed that no one is hearing Kṛṣṇa consciousness. We will say it to the moon and stars and all directions. We will cry in the wilderness, because Kṛṣṇa is everywhere. We want to get a certificate from Kṛṣṇa that, 'This man has done something for Me.' Not popularity. If a pack of asses says you are good, what is that? We have to please Kṛṣṇa's senses with purified senses."

For an hour Prabhupāda led them up and down the unattractive, historic pier. Finally, he stood by the bus about to return. "All religion is useless," he said, "until we know that this world is useless. It is not wanted. That is real knowledge. And when you know this, then there is no attachment. And then immediately no hankering and loss. But now they are hankering, 'I have no girl friend' and then 'I've lost my girl friend.'"

Vāmanadeva had trouble starting the engine, and even after he got it started, it stalled several times on the way back to Hester Street. When Prabhupāda arrived at his house, he said they should sell the bus. Such vehicles presented a bad public image. Having a bus was a good idea, but not a bus like that.

With Prabhupāda's permission, the devotees scheduled him for the all-night Uncle Jay Show, a talk show on radio station WMEX. At 11:00 P.M. three devotees—Satsvarūpa and Pradyumna, in suits and ties, and Jadurāṇī in a sārī—went on the air. Prabhupāda was scheduled to join them at 3 o'clock.

"I have before me in the studio tonight," Uncle Jay began, "two nice young men and a young woman who have normal American names like Steve and Paul and Judy. And when you hear them speak, they sound like normal Americans. But if you could see them—they look a little unusual. Down the front of their noses they have some white paint..."

Uncle Jay's listeners began calling in questions, and although most of the questions were trivial, the devotees got many good opportunities to talk about Kṛṣṇa consciousness. Finally, around 3:00 A.M. Śrīla Prabhupāda arrived. He had risen according to his usual schedule and had come directly to the station. Impressed by Prabhupāda, Uncle Jay received him politely and had him sit down and begin answering questions.

Question: "I heard a swami can't pass over water, so how did you get to the U.S.A.?"

Prabhupāda: "No, why not? That is superstition. Lord Caitanya said to spread this philosophy all over the world, in every town and village. So He certainly knew I would have to cross over the water."

Question: "How did you become a swami?"

Prabhupāda: "Everyone is expected to become a swami. Suppose one lives a hundred years. The fourth state is to renounce and completely be engaged in controlling the senses. So it takes seventy-five years to become a swami."

Question: "Did you give up your wife?"

Prabhupāda: "Woman is not given up. She is always dependent—on her father as a young girl and then on her husband, then on her children, older sons. I was in India recently and my son saw me, but my wife could not see me."

Question: "In this country we would call that desertion."

Prabhupāda: "No, it is a question of progress. There is no divorce. She's a devotee of another swami. The wife generally is not allowed to be the student of her husband who has become a swami."

Question: "Do you believe the soul is immortal?"

Prabhupāda: "Yes, you know the soul is immortal. Immortality is not a question of belief. It is a fact. You know what you were in your childhood and your youth..."

Question: "What does it mean in the Bible, 'The soul that sinneth also dieth'?"

Uncle Jay interrupted and said that since this was a question about the Bible, the caller should ask his priest and not trouble the Swami.

But Prabhupāda interrupted: "No, we can answer this. He who identifies with the body commits practical suicide. He forgets himself. Those who are sinful forget their spiritual identity, and they have to take an other body."

Question: "What impelled you to take sannyāsa?"

Prabhupāda: "Routine work. One has to become a swami. It is not a hobby. Because they don't take sannyāsa, they suffer."

Question: "You say meditation is very difficult. How does chanting make it easier?"

Prabhupāda: "At the present moment, meditation in its pure form is not possible. To do it properly, one has to control the senses, follow the rules, practice the sitting posture, thinking, feeling, become absorbed in thought. But chanting—as soon as you hear 'Kṛṣṇa,' immediately the mind is attracted. There is no necessity of prequalification. Anyone in any country can sit down and chant Hare Kṛṣṇa, and he will find himself in complete meditation."

Uncle Jay: "So Maharishi's transcendental meditation is nothing new?"

Prabhupāda: "No. He says to go and enjoy and simply pay him thirty-five dollars. But you have to control your senses, or how can you meditate? Because you do not want to practice, you do not want to follow. I was surprised that people in America and Western Europe took these cheap things. You don't want the real thing. These yogīs never restrict their students. If they restrict their students, the students do not come and pay the fees."

Uncle Jay: "When I was small, I read a book about swamis who slept on beds of nails. Are you that kind of swami?"

Prabhupāda: "That is just a trick. That is not perfection."

Uncle Jay: "Do you mean when you say swami means 'control of the senses' that if I cut you, you won't feel pain?"

Prabhupāda: "That is not perfection. If you take even chloroform, then you will not feel pain—as in a surgical operation. Control of the senses means that I can be in the midst of beautiful women, but I will feel no desire for sex. I have got sufficient strength, but I have no desire for this. That is real control of the senses."

And so it went until five in the morning.

On the way home, Śrīla Prabhupāda rode in the front seat of the taxi beside the driver. Understanding he had an unusual passenger, the driver—who had been listening to the Uncle Jay Show—asked Prabhupāda, "Are you similar to that transcendental meditation swami?"

"We are similar," Prabhupāda said, "in that he is a Hindu sage and we are a Hindu sage. But his method, meditation, is actually a very difficult process. But ours is very easy—chanting."

The children on Chester Street would call out "Hare Kṛṣṇa!" whenever they saw Prabhupāda come out of his apartment. They were making fun, but Prabhupāda liked it. Once when a devotee tried to stop the children, Prabhupāda said, "Oh, no, they are chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa. That's all right." He said Chester Street should now be called Hare Kṛṣṇa Street.

It was in Swamiji's room one day on Hare Kṛṣṇa Street that he accepted the name Prabhupāda. While Govinda dāśī was taking dictation, Prabhupāda mentioned that the affix "ji" was a third-class address.

"Then why do we call you Swami-ji?" she asked. "What should we call you?" "A spiritual master," Prabhupāda replied, "is usually addressed by names like Gurudeva, Viṣṇupāda, or Prabhupāda." "May we call you Prabhupāda?" she asked. "Yes." And Govinda dāśī told the others. At first some of the devotees were reluctant to give up the long-cherished "Swamiji," which for them was a name of affection. "I heard we shouldn't use the name Swamiji anymore," one of the boys asked one morning on a walk. "Who said?" Prabhupāda replied quickly. "They said you said it was third class, and we shouldn't say it."

"I never said that." "Then we can use it?" "Yes, that is all right." But "Swamiji" soon disappeared. Rāya Rāma even printed an explanation in Back to Godhead.

PRABHUPĀDA

The word Prabhupāda is a term of utmost reverence in Vedic religious circles, and it signifies a great saint even amongst saints. The word actually has two meanings: first, one at whose feet (pāda) there are many Prabhus (a term meaning "master" which the disciples of a guru use in addressing each other). The second meaning is one who is always found at the lotus feet of Kṛṣṇa (the supreme master). In the line of disciplic succession through which Kṛṣṇa consciousness is conveyed to mankind there have been a number of figures of such spiritual importance as to be called Prabhupāda. Śrīla Rūpa Gosvāmī Prabhupāda executed the will of his master, Śrī Caitanya

Mahāprabhu, and therefore he and his associate Gosvāmīs are called Prabhupāda. Śrīla Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī Gosvāmī Ṭhākura executed the will of Śrīla Bhaktivinoda Ṭhākura, and therefore he is also addressed as Prabhupāda. Our spiritual master, Om Viṣṇupada 108 Śrī Śrīmad Bhaktivedānta Swami Mahārāja, has in the same way executed the will of Śrīla Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī Gosvāmī Prabhupāda in carrying the message of love of Kṛṣṇa to the western world, and therefore the humble servants of His Divine Grace, from all the different centers of the saṅkīrtana movement, are following in the footsteps of Śrīla Rūpa Gosvāmī Prabhupāda and prefer to address his grace our spiritual master as Prabhupāda. And he has kindly said, "Yes."

Prabhupāda's next destination was fixed for Montreal. Satsvarūpa, Pradyumna, and Jadurāṇī, all of whom had drunk deeply of Prabhupāda's personal association, got their last bearings directly from him.

"I am scheduled to leave for Montreal in two days," Prabhupāda said to Satsvarūpa on a morning walk. "Is that all right?" Satsvarūpa felt strange that Prabhupāda would ask him for permission to leave. He also felt sad. But he could think of no way to detain him.

As they walked, they passed a toy store displaying guns and battleships in the window.

"This is the kind of thing we grew up with," Satsvarūpa told Prabhupāda. "But you grew up with Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa Deities. Does this still affect us?"

"Yes," Prabhupāda said, "the impression is still there."

"Prabhupāda," Satsvarūpa asked, "now that you are with us, we can ask you any necessary direction. But in the future, when you are not always with us, how can we get direction from you?"

"Kṛṣṇa's name is not different than Kṛṣṇa. Do you understand?"

"Yes," Satsvarūpa replied. But he knew his understanding was only theoretical. He knew he would have to think more deeply on Prabhupāda's answer. Prabhupāda was indicating that by chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa, Kṛṣṇa Himself would be present, so the disciple could get direction from Him, by the grace of the spiritual master.

In Jadurāṇī's case there was no doubt that she should continue painting. She had often gone to Prabhupāda's house for detailed instructions. When she had shown him a just-completed portrait of his own spiritual master sitting amidst trees and greenery, Prabhupāda had commented, "You have put my Guru Mahārāja in the American forest! He was never in such a forest." He told her to paint Lord Caitanya in a garden scene but not to copy the Indian print showing an Om sign and Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa above Lord Caitanya's head. "That is an artist's imagination," Prabhupāda said. "This is the way Lord Caitanya appeared in Navadvīpa. Don't change anything. And Yaśodā and Nanda Mahārāja should be colored as Indians are generally—a light brown, tan like wheat. Balarāmji is colored milk white with little bluish tint and rosy luster."

Prabhupāda also encouraged Pradyumna, telling him just what he wanted to hear: he should continue studying Sanskrit so that he could make transliterations for all of Prabhupāda's work and eventually come to the standard of a good Sanskrit scholar for the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement. Pradyumna asked to come to Montreal with Prabhupāda and learn more things from him. Prabhupāda agreed.

When the day came for Prabhupāda's departure, the devotees accompanied him to the airport. In the departure lounge, an unknown boy suddenly appeared and sat at Prabhupāda's feet. "Can you see God?" the boy asked.

"Yes," Prabhupāda replied. "At every moment."

"Are you liberated?"

"Yes."

"Then, if you're liberated," the boy challenged, "why don't you go back to the spiritual world—right now?"

"Don't be crazy," said Prabhupāda. "We go when Kṛṣṇa desires. We have already surrendered. So we shall go when Kṛṣṇa desires. We have just bought tickets for Montreal, so we are assured of going there. But it is not that as soon as we buy the tickets, we turn and say, 'Where is Montreal?' No. Everything will happen in due course. We have bought the tickets. We are waiting. Soon the plane will leave."

Prabhupāda advised the boy to stay with the devotees in the Boston temple and hear from them. In time, he said, the boy would be able to understand.

Jadurāṇī: Govinda dāsī and I got on the plane with Prabhupāda, just so we could see him up to the last minute. His last words to us were from the Bhāgavatam. He quoted two verses: vāsudeva-parā vedā vāsudeva parā yogā/ vāsudeva-param jñānam... This means that Kṛṣṇa is the goal of yoga, He is the benefactor of fruitive activities, He is the cause of the Vedas—Kṛṣṇa is everything. And I began to cry because Prabhupāda was leaving. He reached over and passed his hand over my face. I asked him, "Śrīla Prabhupāda, sometimes when we ask you something and you give us permission, are you being like the Supersoul? Are you just giving us sanction for what we want?"

Śrīla Prabhupāda replied, "When the spiritual master speaks, it is Kṛṣṇa speaking."

When Prabhupāda got to Montreal he wrote me a letter within a day or two, saying, "I am simply remembering your face when you were crying in the plane." And then he gave me an order: "Please don't be agitated in any way. Kṛṣṇa is always with you, and He is always your friend. So many disturbing elements may enter into your life, but a devotee is never agitated."

SPL 59: A Summer in Montreal

CHAPTER FIFTY-NINE

A Summer in Montreal

= Montreal

June 3, 1968

In Montreal Prabhupāda often sang a Sanskrit prayer composed by a great Vaiṣṇava, King Kulaśekhara. While walking around his room, sitting at his desk, or roaming through the house, he would sing to himself, and the others would hear him. He would chant it—it is a Sanskrit mantra—but to a tune of his own in a voice that dropped to a deep, low tone at the end of a line.

kṛṣṇa tvadīya-pada paṅkaja-pañjarāntam adyaiva me viśatu mānasa-rāja-haṁsaḥ

prāṇa-prayāṇa-samaye kapha-vāta-pittaiḥ

kaṇṭhāvarodhana-vidhau smaraṇam kutas te

In India almost twenty years ago, Prabhupāda had translated and written commentary on this and several other verses—"The Prayers of King Kulaśekhara"—for his Back to Godhead newspaper. Now, during the summer of 1968, while still recovering from his heart attack of a year ago, he sang this particular verse often. And several times he explained its meaning to the devotees gathered in his room in the evening.

"Swans have a proclivity to stick their long necks underwater and wrap them around the stem of the lotus flower. So King Kulaśekhara is praying, 'My dear Kṛṣṇa, may the swan of my mind enter the network of the stem of Your lotus feet.' He is praying to do so now, at the present moment, while he is healthy and can chant Hare Kṛṣṇa and entangle his mind in Kṛṣṇa thought. Therefore, King Kulaśekhara wishes that he may die immediately, because he fears that if he waits until later, when the time of death comes, he will be choking. The elements of his body will be disturbed, and there will be a death rattle, like 'gar, gar.' How will it be possible then to remember Kṛṣṇa?"

Prabhupāda's health, however, had improved. Rising early, dictating Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, going for morning walks, taking full lunch—he was the healthiest he had been in months. After lunch he would nap. (At least he would try, although many of the floorboards in the house would squeak loudly when stepped on.) Later in the afternoon he would often ask for watermelon or cantaloupe. And in the evening, either he would meet with devotees in his room or go to the temple for kīrtana and a lecture. After returning at night he would call for "that puffed rice set": puffed rice, fried peanuts, fried potatoes, and slices of cucumber.

So Prabhupāda was well, yet more than once he remarked to his servants, "If I become sick, do not take me to the hospital. Simply let me chant Hare Kṛṣṇa and die."

The summer of 1968 was a relaxed time, without many outside engagements. Prabhupāda would spend most of his time in his apartment on Prince Arthur Street, a five-minute walk from the temple. In his room he would often meet with disciples visiting from various centers in the United States. Sometimes he would sit in a chair on the front lawn, speaking to visitors, or in the later morning sit out back in the driveway, while Gaurasundara massaged him.

One day while Prabhupāda sat in the warm late-morning sun, some of his disciples came and sat on the ground at his feet. "The sunshine is so powerful," Prabhupāda explained. "There are planets where the trees are miles tall, just being supported by the sunshine. And all the planets are supported by the sunshine. It is so powerful."

One of Prabhupāda's reasons for coming to Canada was to get permanent residency status in both Canada and the United States. While in Boston, he had received an "Order of Denial" from the Immigration Department, directing him to leave the country. For the past three years, except for his six months in India, Prabhupāda had managed to extend his stay in the U.S. by extending his temporary visa; but now, on a technicality, he had been denied permanent residency. From Montreal he wrote the district director of the U.S. Immigration in Boston.

In your Order of Denial, you have clearly mentioned in paragraph four that your denial order was not on the basis of my qualification of Religious Minister, but on your discretion for the reason that I submitted my application just after a fortnight of my arrival in the U.S.A., and as such I was not a bona fide immigrant. I did not know what was the technical mistake on my part in this connection, but I honestly submitted the application after consulting your Calcutta American Consulate and our Indian Embassy in Washington, D.C., and I have their letters of confirmation with me.

In your Notice of Denial of May 3rd, 1968, you have mentioned that there is no appeal for this decision. As such, I did not prefer to appeal in this decision, but I left the U.S.A. as per your direction. Now I am simply requesting you to give me your valued direction what to do next.

Brahmānanda wrote Prabhupāda from New York explaining his plan to get a lawyer and to appeal. But Prabhupāda, now skeptical of U.S. lawyers, who took money and resolved nothing, chose instead to make a new application as religious minister for ISKCON. Although U.S. Immigration had denied his application, ostensibly on the grounds that he had been in the wrong immigration status, Śrīla Prabhupāda suspected that the State Department was not overly fond of Indian swamis.

I understand that the government of the U.S.A. is disgusted with so-called swamis because they have exploited the people in so many ways. That is a fact. And if I would have been in the government, I would have also considered like that. So they have not got a very good opinion about these rascal swamis. Under the circumstances, it will be difficult to get me admitted as a swami, although I am not a swami of the rascal group. But we have to prove it by action that this Swami is not like those swamis. This remark was made by Mr. Allen Burke of the television company: He introduced me to the public as "Here is a real swami," and he showed me all respectful compliments. Anyway, I am not after respectful compliments by the public. But I am concerned more about my disciples. I want to see them quite able to preach this sublime doctrine of Krishna consciousness, and therefore I wish to stay. Otherwise, I am not attracted for any place, either hell or heaven.

Prabhupāda accepted the denial of permanent residency in the United States as Kṛṣṇa's desire and blessing. Now, instead of returning to the U.S., he would go to London and the European continent. Mukunda, Śyāmasundara, and other disciples in San Francisco had asked Prabhupāda if they could open a center in London, and on June 7 Prabhupāda replied.

As a sannyas I should not fix up at a certain place and take your service comfortably. It is not the desire of Krishna. He wants me traveling throughout the whole Western part of the world and therefore I think it is Krishna's desire that now I shall start my activities at least for some time in the European countries. So it is almost certain that I am going to London by the month of August. And if you all wish to come there, then you can prepare for the trip.

Prabhupāda's plan was to travel and preach with a party of devotees who would support themselves by distributing Kṛṣṇa conscious literature. But as Śyāmasundara was already building a cart for the second annual Ratha-yātrā festival in San Francisco, and as his wife was pregnant, Prabhupāda advised him to wait. After the Ratha-yātrā festival and after his wife had delivered her baby and taken a month's rest, Śyāmasundara and his family could go to England. Prabhupāda asked that Mukunda also go. "I shall go to England for the time being," Prabhupāda wrote Mukunda, "and start a center there which is long overdue."

But more important than traveling or obtaining permanent residency in the U.S. was the publication of Prabhupāda's books. Prabhupāda felt that writing and printing books was his best contribution in executing his spiritual master's order. So when Brahmānanda came to Montreal from New York with the printer's galley proofs of Bhagavad-gītā and Teachings of Lord Caitanya, Prabhupāda was very pleased.

Macmillan Company was publishing Bhagavad-gītā, and Prabhupāda himself was publishing Teachings of Lord Caitanya through Dai Nippon in Japan. Because Brahmānanda had contacted the editors at Macmillan Company, Prabhupāda credited him with the success of the Gītā's being published by such a famous company. Brahmānanda was also Prabhupāda's man for dealing with Dai Nippon. Both books were on tight printing schedules, and Brahmānanda had to return quickly to New York with the corrected proofs.

Brahmānanda: I came up to show Prabhupāda the galley proofs for both Teachings of Lord Caitanya and Bhagavad-gītā As It Is. I just happened to have both galley proofs that had arrived. So it was a wonderful thing to bring these galley proofs to Prabhupāda for checking. I was there only for a few days, maybe a weekend or so. Prabhupāda personally read through the entire galleys and made notations in his own hand. He did the proofreading of the galleys. Everything was done by Śrīla Prabhupāda. It was a very personal kind of thing. Of course, that gave Prabhupāda great pleasure because he wanted his books published, and we had started to do it. So Prabhupāda took great pleasure in proofreading those galleys. And he handed them to me, and it was very wonderful.

"When one of my books is published," Prabhupāda said, "I feel like I have conquered an empire." Having books in print gave meaning to Prabhupāda's fight for U.S. residency. And only with these books published could he tour Europe. Kṛṣṇa conscious literature was solid evidence that his movement was not a concocted, fly-by-night yogī's dream. Let the government leaders and scholars read these books. Let the student community read them. Any intelligent man would be impressed. These books were the most enduring glorification of Kṛṣṇa and the most powerful propaganda for spreading Kṛṣṇa's teachings throughout the world. Far from being the speculations of an ordinary, conditioned soul subject to mistakes and cheating, these books contained the teachings and activities of Lord Kṛṣṇa—the science of Kṛṣṇa consciousness—passed down by the great ācāryas. They were books of perfect knowledge.

Before Brahmānanda left Montreal, Prabhupāda asked him to send the Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam second and third canto manuscripts from the closet in his New York apartment. By October, as soon as Teachings of Lord Caitanya was printed, he would have the manuscripts ready for Dai Nippon. Speaking to Brahmānanda and others in his room, Prabhupāda charged them with the organization of book sales. There would be no scarcity of books, but his disciples would have to sell them.

When Prabhupāda had been alone in India, he had printed, gathered statements from scholars, advertised, and distributed his books. But now he was depending on his disciples. They recognized the importance of his books, but they had no ideas or means for distributing them. Prabhupāda assured them, however, that by applying his instructions and trusting in Kṛṣṇa for results, they would be successful.

Prabhupāda and Brahmānanda discussed plans for starting their own printing press—perhaps in Montreal. With the costs of printing so high, Prabhupāda wanted some of his disciples to learn the techniques of book publication. He suggested that one of his disciples in New York learn to run a press and some of the girls learn to compose type. Thus in the future he might be able to start his own press in some convenient location.

Despite Prabhupāda's plans for preaching in Europe, obtaining permanent residency in the United States and Canada, printing his books, and starting a press, his life remained regulated and simple. He would give Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam lectures in the temple and daily see guests in his room. Constantly thinking, writing, chanting, and speaking about Kṛṣṇa and how to spread Kṛṣṇa consciousness, Prabhupāda was the driving force of a revolutionary movement. Yet he mostly stayed at home, spending much of his time alone or in simple domestic dealings with his servants.

One quiet afternoon in Prabhupāda's sitting room, Govinda dāśī was bringing Prabhupāda his prasādam when Prabhupāda spied a baby rat running across the floor. Immediately Govinda dāśī set the tray of prasādam down and tried to catch the rat as it darted toward Prabhupāda's desk. Getting up quickly from his seat, Prabhupāda also joined excitedly in the chase. Then another rat appeared. When Harināma, visiting from San Francisco, heard the commotion, he came to the door and offered to help. Taking up a shoebox, he began chasing the rats, finally catching them both and letting them loose outside.

Later Prabhupāda walked into the room where Gaurasundara and Govinda dāsī were working and told them, "If you kept everything very clean, these rats wouldn't come. If someone is very much attached to his dwelling, then he may take his next birth in that dwelling as a cockroach or a rat. These are sinful living entities, and they are taking their birth because of that attachment." He then asked Śivānanda to seal up the cracks in the floor.

Sometimes when Prabhupāda criticized Govinda dāsī for her mistakes, she would take it very emotionally and go into the bathroom and cry. One night, while cooking Prabhupāda's "puffed rice set," Govinda dāsī made the peanuts too dark.

"Why are these peanuts black?" Prabhupāda asked as she served him his prasādam. "Why have you made them black?" When Govinda dāsī began to cry, Prabhupāda criticized her all the more: "Why are you crying? You are crying because you are angry. Why have you done this?" His stern and angry look made her tears come even harder.

"I am not angry," she sobbed. "I am very sorry I made the peanuts too dark."

Once Govinda dāsī lent the dictating machine to a Godsister, who broke it, and Prabhupāda became disgusted: "You American boys and girls! You are rich men's sons, so you simply think you can break something and then throw it in the street and buy a new one. You do not take care of such things. Only one person should use a machine. You should not have allowed her to use it." These words devastated Govinda dāsī, and she retired to cry for a while. But she soon recovered, and Prabhupāda acted as if the scene had never taken place. Govinda dāsī took the chastisement as a test of her sincerity. And she had learned that Prabhupāda's thunderbolts were generally followed by his usual kindness and gentleness.

Prabhupāda rarely went anywhere alone. For his disciples it was unthinkable that he should go somewhere without one of them accompanying him to care for his needs or to confront whatever difficulties might arise. So when one afternoon Govinda dāsī looked in Prabhupāda's room and found him gone, she became perplexed. Seeing that his shoes were gone, she ran out to the street. Unable to see him in either direction, she ran down to the corner, where she saw him in the distance, walking away. When she finally caught up to him, she asked in a voice distraught and breathless, "Where are you going? Why have you left?"

Prabhupāda laughed quietly as he walked erect with his cane, his movements flowing. "Oh," he said, "I am just going to the bank. It's all right. I'll be back."

Govinda dāsī apologized for being so demanding. "I just thought you shouldn't go alone. Because you have been ill..."

Prabhupāda snapped back, "What do you know? Physician, heal thyself." And he walked on, leaving Govinda dāsī behind.

As far as Prabhupāda was concerned, it was Govinda dāsī who was sickly, not he. She was always bundled in sweaters and coats or blowing her nose. Once he had gone into the room where she and Gaurasundara worked, and it had been messy, with tissues thrown here and there. "This is why you are always getting sick," he had said, "because of uncleanness."

Another day Prabhupāda, accompanied by Gaurasundara and Govinda dāsī, was walking out of the house on his way to the temple when he began laughing, saying, "Yes, Govinda dāsī, everything is nice! You are an excellent secretary, an excellent cook, and you are good at everything. Your only disqualification is that you are a woman. But don't worry. Next life you shall be a brahmacārī!"

"Thank you, Śrīla Prabhupāda," Govinda dāsī replied, enjoying Prabhupāda's joking mood.

Gaurasundara was a quiet young man, steady in his duties. He liked to study Prabhupāda's books and could understand the philosophy. Although negligent about studying Bengali and therefore sometimes unable to translate the verses Prabhupāda had assigned, he was a careful servant, and Prabhupāda was pleased with his work.

Often, Prabhupāda, taking the part of the Māyāvādī, would debate with Gaurasundara. Early one morning Śrīla Prabhupāda walked into the room where Gaurasundara was sleeping and woke him with an argument of Māyāvāda philosophy: "Kṛṣṇa's personality must be a product of illusion, because the Absolute is defined as beyond personality." And Gaurasundara had to immediately refute the argument.

Prabhupāda would sometimes remark that eventually Gaurasundara and Govinda dāsī should travel together to some part of the world and preach. Kṛṣṇa consciousness had to be introduced in so many places, and Prabhupāda envisioned that one day his servant and secretary would go off to open a new center. "Taking care of my body," he said, "is not such an important thing."

One day Prabhupāda and Gaurasundara were discussing philosophy while Govinda dāsī spent a long time in the kitchen washing pots and dishes. The noise of her cleaning carried into Prabhupāda's room. "She has this cleanliness disease," Prabhupāda warned. "My wife and daughter also had it. You should catch it while it is not developed. Otherwise it will get worse. I caught my daughter once—she was washing the electric sockets by splashing water into them. And I told her, 'Do not ever do this again. If you do this, I will kill you!' So she promised she would never do it again."

While Prabhupāda was in Montreal, many of his disciples from the United States came to visit him. They were serving on his behalf, some of them thousands of miles away, and the urge to see him would grow until it impelled them to travel to Montreal. Sometimes these visitors would be newcomers who had joined one of Prabhupāda's temples and had heard about him from his disciples but had never seen him. Prabhupāda was always happy, of course, when his disciples remained in their posts, executing their respective duties. But he was also glad when they came to visit him.

Nanda-kiśora: I walked into the room, and Śrīla Prabhupāda greeted me very enthusiastically with a smile and said, "American Vaiṣṇava." I paid obeisances, sat down, and we began to talk. I had heard that Kṛṣṇa could be in the heart of every living entity at the same time, so I asked Prabhupāda how it was possible.

He began by saying, "Just try to understand." So I tried. I strained and squinted to show that I was really trying to understand. And Prabhupāda continued, "Just like the sun is over your head and mine and is over the head of someone who may be a thousand miles away. That is because the sun is great. Similarly, Kṛṣṇa is so great that He is simultaneously in the hearts of all living entities."

And I understood. He had said, "Try to understand," and because I was hearing, I did understand. I was trying to understand, and I was hearing from the pure devotee. As I was leaving his room, he waved his right hand in the air, sitting back in a very relaxed way, smiling. He said, "Chant Hare Kṛṣṇa! Chant Hare Kṛṣṇa!"

Kṛṣṇa dāsa: I had heard that Prabhupāda was planning to travel abroad and that he wanted to take several devotees with him and that whoever wanted to go should save his money. So I got a job with a jewelry firm. Then I had a vacation while Prabhupāda was in Montreal. Uddhava and I were having our vacation at the same time, and we decided over breakfast one morning to go see Prabhupāda in Montreal. In one hour we were packed.

Wearing suits, we hitchhiked from San Francisco to New York in three days. When we got to Montreal, Gaurasundara said, "Well, Prabhupāda is about to have lunch. Would you care to join him?" We said yes. Uddhava and I went in, and Prabhupāda was immediately very thankful that we had come so far to visit him.

But as we had come to lunch so late, there wasn't really enough prasādam for two guests. So Gaurasundara first served Prabhupāda, and we sat there with our empty plates. Then Prabhupāda asked, "What about their food?" Govinda dāsī went to get something for us, and Prabhupāda said to me, "You are very thin. You look sickly. You should eat more." So he proceeded to take food off his plate and put it on my empty plate. And he told me to eat. He said I should eat six capātīs a day. He gave me a whole diet to follow so I could gain weight.

During lunch a mouse came into the room, and Gaurasundara captured it. Prabhupāda joked about how the mouse had been a devotee in his past life and had come back in this life to eat prasādam off the floor. Afterwards we paid our obeisances. I touched my head to Prabhupāda's foot, and he got up and walked over and rubbed our heads.

Jeffrey Hickey (Jagadīśa dāsa): When I entered Prabhupāda's apartment, I got the most amazing feeling. Kīrtanānanda Mahārāja and Hayagrīva were there talking to Prabhupāda about New Vrindaban. They were saying that they had bought some land, and Prabhupāda was encouraging them. I just sat in the back and listened to what was going on.

Prabhupāda's presence was very strong. I felt small. And I had the feeling that he knew everything about me and that I couldn't pretend to be someone big—although previously I had always thought of myself as being a little advanced. But in Prabhupāda's presence I couldn't pose as anything because I understood that he knew everything about me and could understand my mentality. So I just sat with my face turned downwards. Once in a while I would look up at him.

I was in Prabhupāda's room for about half an hour. I wanted to say something, but I didn't know what to say. So at the end, while everyone was leaving, I bowed down and let the others leave first. Then as I was about to leave, I told Prabhupāda that I was chanting sixteen rounds daily and that I expected to get initiated later. He welcomed me to stay in the Montreal temple, and I fumbled some reply.

Vaikuṇṭhanātha: I was in great anxiety because I had just returned from my draft board physical. But as soon as I walked into Prabhupāda's room, all my anxiety completely melted. As soon as I came into his presence, I thought, "How wonderful he is." Spiritual truth became real in his presence.

Śivānanda: I had come to Montreal to visit Prabhupāda, but Gaurasundara and Govinda dāsī didn't want many devotees going with him on the morning walk. One morning I was out for a walk by myself when I met Prabhupāda. He motioned to me and said, "Come on." As we walked, I mentioned to Prabhupāda that I had traveled in various places in Europe and all over America, and he said, "Oh, yes, you must go to these places and open some temples."

At that time the word was out that Prabhupāda wanted some of his disciples to go to London to open a temple there. So as I was walking along with Śrīla Prabhupāda—we were just about to cross the street—Prabhupāda turned to me and said, "Kṛṣṇa says in Bhagavad-gītā that "One who is spreading My teachings of Bhagavad-gītā to the devotees is the most dear to Me, and there is never one who is more dear."" Then Prabhupāda added, "Our business is to become dear to Kṛṣṇa." That started me thinking about opening a center somewhere.

In the evenings devotees and guests would crowd into Prabhupāda's room to sit with him. Gaurasundara and Govinda dāsī would attempt to confine the devotees to Prabhupāda's visiting hours, but their restraints were not very strong, and Prabhupāda himself would often override them. Prabhupāda was more relaxed in his room than in the temple, and he would laugh and speak about many different things.

Brahmānanda: Prabhupāda would just talk. Often there wouldn't be any questions, and he would just get on a topic and talk, sitting casually. Sometimes it wouldn't even be directly about Kṛṣṇa, but he would describe different things about life in India or some other topic. He would always make sure that everyone had some prasādam. One night he was explaining to a visitor that his disciples—"these American boys and girls"—were taking up Kṛṣṇa consciousness naturally, not artificially. He referred to his servant Gaurasundara: "Actually, he is doing so many nice things for me all day long because he loves me. It is not artificial."

Govinda dāsī: One time there was an elaborate discussion about whether trains were better than buses or buses were better than trains. Another time Prabhupāda was talking about liquor, and I said, "Oh, Śrīla Prabhupāda, whiskey tastes awful!" He was shocked. He said, "Oh. You have tasted?" He was surprised that I had tasted liquor. He talked in detail about Bengal tigers and all sorts of other things.

Most of the devotees were not so astute—most of us were just recovering from being hippies and taking drugs—but everyone loved him very much. Actually, there was no name and fame. There was no money. There was no position. The center of our service, the motivating factor, was simply love of Śrīla Prabhupāda.

Nanda-kiśora: Prabhupāda explained how he had first seen snow when he had come to America. He said, “One day I looked out the window and I thought, ‘Oh, someone has taken lime and thrown it all over.’ And then I looked up at the sky and thought, ‘Oh, they are still throwing.’ ” And then he laughed. I could hardly believe he had never seen snow fall before. He was like a child. He said such things so beautifully, like an innocent child, that whatever doubt I had was just wiped away due to the beauty of his expression.

Satyabhāmā: Prabhupāda told a story about a man from Calcutta who could tell the make of any car just by hearing it. I think Prabhupāda was making an important philosophical point, but I forget the point. Anyway, this man's friend wanted to test the other man's ability to judge cars just by their sound. So together they went and stood on a street corner in Calcutta. The friend blindfolded the other man, and as each car passed by, the man would identify it: “That is a Cadillac..., that is a Buick...” Then a donkey came walking by, dragging some tin cans, and the man said, “Oh, that is a Ford.”

Kṛṣṇadāsa and Uddhava told Prabhupāda about the San Francisco Ratha-yātrā, and they handed him a newspaper clipping. Prabhupāda read the headline aloud: “S.F. Paraders Hail Hindu God Krishna.” After noting with pleasure the large photo of devotees pulling the ropes of the “2½ ton wagon on long haul to celebrate Ratha-yātrā festival,” he handed the newspaper back to Kṛṣṇadāsa: “Read it.” After hearing the article, Prabhupāda praised the devotees—especially Śyāmasundara and Jayānanda—for constructing an attractive cart and holding such a successful festival.

Then Prabhupāda began to talk of other successes within his new movement. He had heard reports that in San Francisco Tamāla Kṛṣṇa had organized the devotees to go out and chant Hare Kṛṣṇa every day and that in one day they had sold a hundred copies of Back to Godhead. Devotees in New York and Boston, he said, were also going out and chanting, distributing magazines, and collecting as much as forty dollars in a day. He told the disciples gathered in his room that they should all expect to perform public kīrtana in the important cities of the world. Taking mṛdaṅgas and karatālas, they could perform kīrtana anywhere and get the blessings of Lord Caitanya. In this way their numbers would increase. Prabhupāda told them, “If you want to live alone in a secluded place and practice yoga for your own personal advantage, that is very good. But if you want to help others by spreading Kṛṣṇa consciousness, that is far better.”

Prabhupāda said that although a Kṛṣṇa conscious person is not anxious on his own behalf, he is anxious for those who are not Kṛṣṇa conscious, the mass of people who simply engage in sense gratification within a civilization of illusion. Quoting the great ācārya Jīva Gosvāmī, Prabhupāda said that a devotee who chooses to sit in Vṛndāvana and chant Hare Kṛṣṇa should make only one or two disciples; but a missionary, who preaches Kṛṣṇa consciousness all over the world, should make as many disciples as possible.

"So you are being initiated," Prabhupāda addressed the devotees in his room, "therefore you should make it your responsibility and duty to spread this message—to follow the principles strictly and become pure Vaiṣṇavas and preach all over the world. Don't worry about where you will sleep or eat, Kṛṣṇa will see to all these things. You simply have to become sincere in service. That's all. Just be sincere."

Govinda dāsī raised her hand. "Prabhupāda," she asked, "what does it mean exactly to surrender?"

"Surrender," Prabhupāda replied, "is to know that 'I am nothing...'" As Prabhupāda spoke, Govinda dāsī, accustomed to taking dictation, wrote down the answer, while other devotees—some seated on the floor around Prabhupāda's desk, some standing in the doorway—listened attentively. "I should know," Prabhupāda continued, "I am less than the stool of a hog. And Kṛṣṇa—You are everything. That is very difficult. We can find millions of Isaac Newtons and Einsteins, but one very rare soul might be surrendered to Kṛṣṇa. Because it is very difficult. So as long as you are thinking that 'He is more learned than me' or 'I am more learned than him'—that is material. You must know that you are nothing and surrender."

A new boy who had been attending Śrīla Prabhupāda's classes asked, "Why is it that one time I feel this way, like you say, 'surrendered,' but at other times I forget?"

Prabhupāda: "That is māyā. That is our battle with māyā. We are in māyā's kingdom, so we have to fight. It is like an ocean, birth and death. There are so many universes and so many species of life, and we are transmigrating birth after birth. It is like you are standing on the edge of a boat, and just a little shove and you may fall into the ocean. Then you do not know where you are going, here or there. So it is like that. If you want to keep back even one percent—to surrender all but one percent—then you have to stay here. Kṛṣṇa is so strict. If you have any desire for material enjoyment, you have to remain. Just one percent may take millions of years. So you have to surrender everything.

"Kṛṣṇa consciousness is already there within you and within everyone, but it has to be invoked. It is like a match, and if you rub it, fire comes out. And that rubbing process is chanting. So we have to inject Kṛṣṇa consciousness into the ear, and we have to go on injecting. Wherever you go, you have to chant—and without any motive."

Gaurasundara brought in a plate of cut fruit, which Śrīla Prabhupāda distributed to each person. It was late, but Prabhupāda continued speaking: "People want to go on asking God for bread. But as soon as there is bread elsewhere, they won't go to church. But if you teach people to love God—that they will never forget." Prabhupāda smiled. Finally the devotees left him, satisfied. They would see him in the temple in the morning.

Montreal temple, established now for a year and a half, occupied a former bowling alley on the third floor of a building near McGill University. Although the gutters on either side of the eight bowling lanes had been filled in with wood, thus creating a smooth, level floor, the eight hardwood lanes were still prominent. An altar and vyāsāsana stood against one wall, and a temporary wall partitioned off the men's quarters. There was also a kitchen and separate quarters for the women. With difficulty Prabhupāda would daily climb the two flights of stairs and enter the spacious temple room. On the day of his arrival in Montreal, several devotees had carried him up the stairs in a palanquin, but the winding staircase made that too difficult to do daily. So Prabhupāda chose to walk.

The original Montreal devotee was Janārdana, a Canadian attending McGill University. Janārdana wore a beard and long hair, even after his initiation, and lived in an apartment with his wife, who was staunchly opposed to Kṛṣṇa consciousness. Acknowledging Janārdana as an intellectual, Prabhupāda had written him long letters answering his philosophical doubts and requesting that he write essays and books on Kṛṣṇa consciousness.

When the temple had first opened, the McGill Daily had given Janārdana a full page to introduce Swami Bhaktivedanta and Kṛṣṇa consciousness. The headlines had read, "Mind Expansion Under Spiritual Guidance." Montreal's French daily newspaper, Le Nouveau Samedi, interviewed Janārdana and published an article: "They claim that the Hindu God Krishna is the Father of Christ and that the inhabitants of the moon are invisible."

About a dozen members had joined the Montreal temple, but so far they had done little to spread Kṛṣṇa consciousness in Montreal. They had spent most of their energy maintaining themselves spiritually and financially. Although they had held some public kīrtanas at the 1967 World's Fair, mostly they had concentrated on transforming the bowling alley, cleaning, cooking for Kṛṣṇa, and meeting together for classes and kīrtanas.

When Śrīla Prabhupāda saw Janārdana's academic studies distracting him from temple management, he asked Janārdana to appoint a temple commander. One night when Prabhupāda came to the temple for his lecture, as soon as he sat on the vyāsāsana, he looked out to Janārdana and asked, "So, have you found a temple commander yet?"

"Oh, no," Janārdana replied, "not yet."

Prabhupāda then turned toward the altar and beheld the Deities. "That's all right," he said. "Lord Jagannātha is the temple commander. We are His servants."

* * *

One evening in the temple, as Prabhupāda concluded his lecture about Prahāda Mahārāja, he asked if there were any questions. Himāvatī, one of the women disciples, raised her hand.

Prabhupāda: "Yes?"

Himāvatī: "Prahāda Mahārāja was such a great devotee that he said, 'nothing is mine.' But then why does he say 'my God'? How could God become his? Why does he say that?"

Prabhupāda: "Then what shall he say?"

Himāvatī: "I don't understand. How can he say it? If you understand nothing belongs to you, then how can you say, "God is mine'?"

Prabhupāda: Kṛṣṇa is the Lord of everyone. Therefore everyone can say "my Lord.' That does not mean if somebody says "my Lord,' God becomes monopolized. You are speaking on the platform of monopolizing, "mine.' But God is never monopolized. He is everyone's. So everyone has the right to say "my God, my Lord.' In the material sense, when I say, "It is my wife,' that means she is not any other's wife. But God is not like that. I can say "my God,' but you can also say "my God,' he can say "my God,' everyone can say "my God.' This is the absolute "mine.'

"Kṛṣṇa says, "All these living creatures are My parts and parcels.' Mamaivamiṁśo. Mama means "My.' So why the living creatures shall not say "my God'? Do you follow? Kṛṣṇa says, "You are Mine.' Why shall I not say, "Kṛṣṇa, You are mine'? Your husband says, "You are mine.' Why shall you not say to him, "You are mine'? But don't take it in the material sense. In material sense, as soon as I say, "This is mine,' then it belongs to no one else. It is my property. But Kṛṣṇa is not like that. So you can say, "Kṛṣṇa is mine.' There is no harm. Rather, if anyone wants to possess something as his, that position should be Kṛṣṇa's. That is the ultimate conception of "mine.' That is the perfection of the word "mine.'

"So this is quite nice, quite fit. In the Bhagavad-gītā Kṛṣṇa says, "He is Mine, and I am his.' Kṛṣṇa says. So this is not wrong. And what is your idea? That because everything belongs to Kṛṣṇa therefore I shall not say "mine'? That's your idea?"

Himāvatī: "I didn't understand this, that Kṛṣṇa is the Lord. So my Lord is everyone else's Lord."

Prabhupāda: "Yes."

Himāvatī: "He is the controller, and that's why He is mine."

Prabhupāda: "He's mine, He's yours, everyone's. That's all."

Himāvatī: "I can understand."

Prabhupāda: "That's all."

Rukmiṇī: "I feel so far away from you, you know, when you are not here."

Prabhupāda: "What is that? I can't follow. Janārdana?"

Janārdana: "She is saying she felt so far away from you when you were not here."

Prabhupāda: "Oh, that you should not think. There are two conceptions, the physical conception and the vibration conception. The physical conception is temporary, and the vibration conception is eternal. Just like we are relishing the vibration of Kṛṣṇa's teaching. So my vibration is also present. As soon as we chant Hare Kṛṣṇa or chant Bhagavad-gītā or the Bhāgavat, so Kṛṣṇa is present immediately by vibration. He is absolute. Therefore vibration is more important than physical presence.

“When you feel separation from your spiritual master, you just try to remember his words and his instructions, and you will not feel separation. You will feel like he is with you. So we should associate by the vibration, not by the physical presence. That is real association—śabdat anavṛtti—by sound. Just like we are touching Kṛṣṇa immediately by sound. So we should give more stress on this sound vibration, either of Kṛṣṇa or of the spiritual master. Then we will feel happy and no separation.

“When Kṛṣṇa departed from this world, at that time Arjuna was overwhelmed with sorrow, and he began to remember the instruction of Bhagavad-gītā. Then he was pacified. Immediately he began to remember the teaching which was taught to him on the Battlefield of Kurukṣetra, and he was pacified. Kṛṣṇa was his constant friend, so when the Lord went to His abode, Arjuna was feeling overwhelmed. But he began to remember His teachings. So whenever we shall feel separation, the best thing is to remember the teachings. Then it will be very nice. Is that clear?”

Rukmiṇī: “Yes.”

One of the girls asked, “Prabhupāda, will you be our father eternally? Will you always be our spiritual master, eternally?”

Jokingly, Prabhupāda said, “Yes, I think so.” Then he quoted a verse, cakhudāna dilo yei janme janme prabhu sei, but he said, “ñjanme jan me pītā sei. The one who has opened my eyes—he is my father life after life.”

Prabhupāda was concerned about the weak financial condition of the Montreal temple. Although some of the devotees were employed, their work wasn't very auspicious. One disciple had a job—at the No Sags Spring Factory—which Prabhupāda called “ugra-karma,” bitter, unwholesome labor. When Nanda-kīśora told Prabhupāda about his job as a busboy in a restaurant, Prabhupāda replied, “Oh, a blind uncle.” Nanda-kīśora looked puzzled. Prabhupāda told him the story of a boy who had no uncle. One day a blind man came to the boy's home and said, “I will be your uncle.” “Well,” the boy replied, “a blind uncle is better than no uncle.” But when Nanda-kīśora told Prabhupāda the details of his work and that he was sometimes cooking meat, Prabhupāda remarked, “Oh, but not so blind.”

The question of financing the Montreal temple puzzled Prabhupāda, and he carefully analyzed the situation. There were two paths of Kṛṣṇa consciousness, he said: one for those who were renounced, eating fruits from the trees and living in caves; and the other for those who were married and honestly employed, like Kṛṣṇa's friend Arjuna. Both paths were good, but the question for Prabhupāda was which path his disciples should take. If they attempted to take the path of ascetics like Śukadeva Gosvāmī, they would probably remain hippies, and Prabhupāda wanted many big centers with respectable guests coming to take prasādam. Yet if to maintain such temples the devotees had to engage in ugra-karma, then who would preach? It was a puzzle.

"I have either to stop this brahminical system," Prabhupāda said, "or I have to have brāhmaṇas work." He thought of starting his own business; he had had a little capital, and there was organization. Then he thought of enlisting the support of the Indians in Montreal.

Montreal had a large Indian community, and families were already attending the Sunday feast at the temple. Of those who came forward to meet Prabhupāda, the most promising was young Gopal Khana, a business major at McGill University. Although raised in an orthodox Hindu family, Gopal knew little of the Vaiṣṇava philosophy.

The day before Śrīla Prabhupāda had arrived in Montreal, Gopal had received an invitation card from a devotee. Because for the past year Gopal had been seriously wanting to understand God, he had been interested. In his spiritual search he had been attending services at a Hindu temple in Toronto as well as visiting various other churches and temples; he had given up meat-eating and smoking. On coming to the temple and seeing the excitement of the devotees in preparing for Prabhupāda's arrival, Gopal had asked to help, so one of the devotees had instructed him to help clean Prabhupāda's apartment. Prabhupāda had taken an interest in Gopal, who, although he had never met a sādhu before and didn't know what to think at first, respected Prabhupāda.

A friend of Gopal's, a Mr. Mukerjee from Calcutta, also began attending Prabhupāda's lectures. Mr. Mukerjee, who claimed to have spiritual knowledge, told Gopal that, although he had touched the feet of many Indian sādhus throughout India, never had he met anyone as saintly as Prabhupāda. Gopal took his friend's endorsement of Prabhupāda very seriously, and soon he was attending all the lectures in the temple and chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa on his beads, acting like a regular devotee. He would usually be the only Indian to remain through the kīrtana and lecture in the temple. Then afterwards he would stay and have hot milk with the devotees, returning home around nine-thirty.

Associating with the devotees and being of the same age as they, Gopal automatically included himself among the intimate disciples who regularly visited Prabhupāda at his apartment. Prabhupāda asked Gopal about his family and background in India and encouraged him to take up Kṛṣṇa consciousness. When Gopal told Prabhupāda that he had been chanting om̐, Prabhupāda explained that by itself om̐ was incomplete. If he wanted to chant om̐, Prabhupāda said, then he should chant om̐ kṛṣṇa.

One night Gopal was present as Prabhupāda discussed the financial problems of the Montreal temple. Although the temple rent was only $150 and expenses were minimal, the devotees were struggling. At one point in the discussion Prabhupāda turned to Gopal and asked, "So, Gopal, what is your solution to this financial problem?" Guessing that Prabhupāda might be hinting for him to contribute money, Gopal said he didn't have a solution.

Prabhupāda lectured at a nearby Christian school, and Gopal and his friend Mr. Mukerjee attended. When, after the kīrtana and lecture, Prabhupāda asked if there were any questions, Mr. Mukerjee raised his hand, stood up, and, to the shock of the devotees, began insulting Prabhupāda.

"It is not a fact that Kṛṣṇa is the Supreme Personality of Godhead," Mr. Mukerjee said before the hall filled with Christian students and ministers. "You should not speak like this in a church. Why do you say that Kṛṣṇa is the supreme and that we should surrender to Him?"

Prabhupāda remained calm. Although the attending devotees, looking furiously at Mr. Mukerjee, could barely restrain themselves, Prabhupāda didn't even speak. He simply called on someone else in the audience and allowed the unpleasant event to pass.

Some days later Prabhupāda asked Gopal about Mr. Mukerjee, who hadn't come by recently. To Gopal's surprise, Prabhupāda asked to see Mr. Mukerjee again. Gopal, considering Mr. Mukerjee too envious and blasphemous, advised Prabhupāda against it. "No, it does not matter," Prabhupāda said. "I must have done something against him in my past life, and now he has taken his revenge. Please call him."

Gradually some of the Indian visitors responded to Śrīla Prabhupāda and began to give money to support the temple. Most of them, however, were reluctant to spend money or time apart from their careers and families. Indian culture, Prabhupāda said, had completely fallen, due partly to foreign invasions into India and partly to India's leaders' madly abandoning their original culture in favor of Western materialism. "But still," Prabhupāda told the devotees, "if there is any civilization left any where, it is in India. In India they are all originally Kṛṣṇa conscious, and with a little chanting and taking prasādam their material covering can be removed."

Prabhupāda compared modern-day Indian civilization to a dead elephant. An elephant is such a valuable creature that even when dead, because of its tusks and hide, it remains almost as valuable as when alive and working. Similarly, although the Indian culture was practically dead, India still had great potential. Most Indians in the villages still retained a simple faith that their present suffering was due to karma of their past lives and that they would have to transmigrate to another body in their next life. That basic transcendental knowledge, commonly understood by the Indian masses, was unknown in the West even to the most sophisticated and advanced members of society.

But Prabhupāda was sorry to see the Indians in the West abandoning their piety and taking the cheap life of sense gratification. He compared the Indian immigrants to the "new crows." When crows eat garbage, after a while they are full. But if a new crow arrives, he becomes especially eager. Similarly, many Indians, newly arrived in the West, were more eager for material advancement than the Westerners. Yet despite Prabhupāda's criticism of Indians, whenever he met anyone of Indian birth—in the temple, in his room, or elsewhere—he seemed to become especially sympathetic and friendly, conversing with them in Hindi or Bengali as if talking with old, familiar friends.

Janārdana was concerned about presenting Kṛṣṇa consciousness to Montreal's main religious contingent, the Catholics. Because he came from a French-Canadian Catholic family, Janārdana thought Prabhupāda and his disciples should learn to present Kṛṣṇa consciousness in terms of Biblical teachings. It was possible, Prabhupāda agreed, but it would require great expertise. It would be better, he said, to stress the universal, nonsectarian nature of Kṛṣṇa consciousness. Christianity, Hinduism, Islam, and all other religions had some idea of God, though not much realization of pure love for God. Kṛṣṇa consciousness, however, was like a postgraduate study for persons of all religions. Prabhupāda requested his disciples not to divert their attention to criticizing the Christian or any other sectarian faith. Rather, they should simply preach Bhagavad-gītā and Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam.

When Śivānanda and Nanda-kīśora brought an Indian Christian to Prabhupāda's apartment, Prabhupāda demonstrated the art of preaching to a committed follower of a sectarian religious faith. "We don't say you have to be this religion or that," Prabhupāda told the man. "The real test of religion is how one is awakening his dormant love for God." Prabhupāda went on—without attacking the man's religious affiliation—to describe the degradation of Kali-yuga. "At the present moment," he said, "never mind whether one is Christian, Hindu, Jew, or Muslim, most people are godless and don't care for God. They simply take an official stand. But actually, in the depth of their heart, they have no idea what God is. If a Christian believes in God, let him love God more prominently than matter." The man agreed.

Janārdana took Prabhupāda to see some of the great cathedrals in Montreal. Entering the spacious Notre Dame, Prabhupāda said, "Yes, this is worship of God as Lord Nārāyaṇa—in awe and reverence." The church tour impressed Śrīla Prabhupāda, and the next day he revealed his thoughts in a letter to Aniruddha.

Yesterday, Janardana took me to a nice church here called Notre Dame, a very nice wooden structural workmanship with colorful figures and windows, decorated with nicely painted pictures of the crucifixion of Lord Jesus Christ. Everything was grotesque. Generally, the Roman Catholic religion depends on this crucifixion incident in the life of Lord Jesus Christ, but I think depiction of this incident simply stimulates the tensions of differences of opinion, and differences of religious principles, between Jews and Christians. My idea is that, if simply by narrating the crucifixion incident of Lord Jesus Christ, the Roman Catholic religion can spread to such a wide area of the world, how much there is great potency of spreading our Krishna consciousness by depicting many hundreds and thousands of such incidents in different appearances of the incarnations of Lord Krishna.

Prabhupāda and Janārdana visited another church, which displayed the relics of a saint who had been adept at healing. Walking through the exhibit of the saint's clothing, desk, bed, and personal effects, Prabhupāda was unimpressed. "Just see," he said. "They are adoring him for healing bodies that are now dead. But they do not take interest in the healing of a soul in his eternal situation."

Questions about Christ and the Bible often arose after Prabhupāda's classes in the temple. One night Prabhupāda explained that even the most learned man studies in terms of the body only. Although a person may have many Ph.D.'s and may be talking philosophy, when he is asked, "Do you know what the soul is?" he will stop.

A man raised his hand. "I have here a Holy Bible," he began. "Yes," Prabhupāda acknowledged.

"So the Holy Bible is also written by the Holy Spirit of mankind. Should we believe in the Bible or not?"

"You can say it is written by mankind, but so far as I know, those who wrote, wrote with revelation."

"The Holy Spirit?"

"Yes," Prabhupāda said. "Therefore, you should read. Otherwise, if a man writes a book on his own, he will write on his own experience. And it will be imperfect."

"You were speaking about men only knowing the body. What about the body of Christ?"

"Body of Christ is not ordinary body," Prabhupāda said. "That is spiritual body. Kṛṣṇa says in the Bhagavad-gītā: sambhavāmy-ātma-māyayā. So this is a very subtle point. One has to understand that when God comes or God's son comes or God's representative comes, they do not accept a body like us. They have their spiritual body."

"Kṛṣṇa means Christ," the man replied. "He's the whole spirit. So we are also in the body of man. That is the body of God?"

"No," Prabhupāda replied. "The body of man is not exactly the body of God. With God there is no difference between the body and the soul because He is all-spiritual. Just like if you have a golden body and a golden soul—then there is no difference between the soul and the body. But in our case, as we are, we are spirit soul, but the body is material. Therefore I am different from this body. But when we are liberated, we get a spiritual body like Kṛṣṇa's. At the present moment there is a difference between our body and soul. Therefore, as soon as a soul goes away from the body, the body, being matter—"Dust thou art, dust thou be-est"—mixes with the matter, and the soul takes another body. The whole problem is that we have to stop repetition of migration from one material body to another material body. That is the highest perfection of life."

During Prabhupāda's stay in Montreal, Janārdana showed him several news items concerning Pope Paul VI. The Pope was staunchly supporting the Catholic stand against abortion, despite a large protest movement within the church. Prabhupāda admired the Pope for upholding the scriptures, even though millions of Catholics didn't; he decided to write him. He had tried such things before: writing to Gandhi and writing to Nehru. And in that same spirit he dictated a letter one morning and sent it to the Vatican.*

In his letter, Prabhupāda explained his personal background and mission. He then defined love of God (as it is explained in Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam) and stated that human life is especially meant for learning to love God. Noting that people were mostly interested in sense gratification, Prabhupāda remarked, "This tendency is very much deteriorating. Because Your Holiness is the Head of a great religious sect, I think we should meet together and chalk out a program for cooperation."

Prabhupāda went on to describe some of the symptoms of society as degradation, including the pro-abortion movement within the Catholic faith. "I understand it from reliable sources," Prabhupāda wrote, "that people are trying to get Your Holiness's sanction for contraceptive method, which is certainly against any religion of the world. In the Hindu religion, such contraceptive method or abortion is considered equivalent to murder." Prabhupāda said the same degradation was affecting India, and he suggested that the guardians of society treat this situation as a very serious one. Prabhupāda closed his letter, "If you think that a meeting with You will be beneficial for the human society at large, I shall be very much pleased if Your Holiness will grant me an interview."

Janārdana mixed with many liberal, academic religionists interested in ecumenical aspects of religion, and he wanted to introduce Prabhupāda to these scholars of various faiths. He arranged a private get-together at a friend's house, and Prabhupāda very willingly went and spoke about Kṛṣṇa consciousness. The next day he summarized his experience in a letter to Satsvarūpa.

Yes, I am getting good opportunities to meet here several learned scholars. Last night we had a meeting in the house of Mr. Abdul Rabbi, and there were some university professors and a Dr. Abbott, a Dr. MacMillan, and many others. Two clergymen were with their wives. One Father Lanlais was without a wife. So there was a very good discussion, and by the grace of Krishna, I was able to give them some impression of this philosophy, that it is nicer than anything. Professor Abdul is Mohammedan, and he is writing a thesis of Sufi religion. And he was also impressed. Unfortunately, I had to eat there, but I accepted a little fruits only, while they were eating all sorts of nonsense, but at least they did not drink. We were the only two persons, Janardana and myself, who avoided all kinds of nonsense.

Prabhupāda attended a more formal ecumenical meeting, a religious conference. About fifty people, including Prabhupāda and a group of his devotees, attended. A panel, representing various religions, honored Prabhupāda as the main speaker as well as a member of the panel. Prabhupāda lectured. After the lecture, a Catholic priest asked how Prabhupāda could be so sure of his statements about God.

"Why not?" Prabhupāda said. "What is the difficulty? I have consciousness. There is God. Now I have forgotten Him. I have to revive my consciousness of God. What is difficult in knowing that much?" The questioners were not his submissive young disciples, and this was not Prabhupāda relaxed and sitting back on a pillow in his room. He was alert, logical, and very sociable. But some of the panel were not satisfied with his presentation. The moderator took up their cause.

Moderator: "Are you saying that you are perfect?"

Prabhupāda: "I am imperfect—that's all right. But I know what is perfection."

Moderator: "But I cannot see that."

Prabhupāda's disciples laughed at this, and Prabhupāda turned to reprimand them: "Don't laugh." Then returning to his debate with the moderator: "Therefore, you are here. You have to go to London. If you have purchased a ticket for London and if you have gotten to the airplane, so even if you have not gone to London, you are sure that you are going to London."

Moderator: "Yes, I can be sure. I understand that. I have no doubt about that. But how can your security—"

Prabhupāda: "No, no. If I have understood that my destination is London, I feel secure that I am going to London. Then that is my happiness."

Moderator: "So you are completely happy."

Prabhupāda: "Yes, because I know that if I go to London I will be happy. And I am going there."

Moderator: "But you're not in London yet."

Prabhupāda: "That's all right!" Prabhupāda raised his voice confidently. "I have already told you that when you purchase a ticket and you understand that you are surely going to London—that is happiness."

Moderator: "But then there is no question."

Prabhupāda: "Hmm? But what is this? If my destination is London, why then question? There is no need of question."

Moderator: "Well, then why a conference with men of other religions?" The other panel members listened intently as the moderator pursued a line of argument many of them empathized with. They wanted to see Prabhupāda defeated.

Prabhupāda: "That conference is used to consult together that London is the destination."

Moderator: "But then you know the destination."

Prabhupāda: "Right."

Moderator: "The idea that you have behind your mind is to tell other people where the destination is."

Prabhupāda: "Yes."

Moderator: "Not to search for it with them."

Prabhupāda: "No, I don't say search. I have already searched out."

Moderator: "Yeah. So then I feel myself that this is not a conference."

Prabhupāda: "Hmm? Then if I have got some good news to tell you, it is not conference?" Prabhupāda's disciples burst into laughter despite themselves. This time Prabhupāda did not check them. He was too busy, too alert with the debate, as several persons started talking at once.

Panel member: "As far as you are concerned, it may be London. As far as I am concerned, it may be Paris or Hawaii."

Prabhupāda: "No, then we have to consider where is real happiness, whether it is in Hawaii or in Paris or—"

Moderator: "You! But if you are not willing to concede"—the moderator could not help becoming accusative in his tone—"that it is not London, and if I say I am not going to that place—"

Prabhupāda: "That is going on, that is going on. There are innumerable planets, and in the Bhagavad-gītā it is said: yānti deva-vratā devān pitṛn yānti pitṛ-vratāḥ. So if you think that London is not good for you, Paris is good for you, then it is good for you."

Another panel member (with a German accent): "Well, therefore, conference is all useless."

Prabhupāda: "No. If you don't agree, if you do not understand what is the highest goal, then conference is useless. If you keep yourself to the understanding where you are, then there is no need of conference." Several persons, some on the panel and some even in the audience, began to speak at once in protest of Prabhupāda's remarks.

Prabhupāda: "That is conference—I want to convince you that London is the real place of happiness."

Moderator: "But I think that I know better than you."

Prabhupāda: "You may think, but you have to be convinced that your thinking is wrong."

Moderator: "Or maybe I can convince you that your thinking is wrong."

Prabhupāda: "That's all right. Therefore, conference is required." Prabhupāda began to laugh. Finally everyone laughed, and the tension that had been building to animosity relaxed. But the formal order of the conference had been lost, and now everyone began to speak at once.

Moderator: "Excuse me, Swamiji, but the time is running out..."

Prabhupāda: "Yes."

Moderator: "And I would like to thank you very much for coming."

Prabhupāda: "Now you are convinced that conference is required?"

Moderator: "Yes."

Prabhupāda: "You have to convince me, and I will have to convince you."

Moderator: "And I think that's true. These confrontations, these listenings, lead to further understanding."

The program ended, and the crowd began dispersing, talking among themselves, moving out into the summer evening. The moderator, still intellectually piqued by Prabhupāda's brand of ecumenicity, approached Prabhupāda amid the crowd moving toward the exit.

"The question is," the young minister pursued, "where should we go, if you believe that you must go to London, yet I believe very strongly I must go to India, and I am convinced that, at least for me, India is wonderful?"

Prabhupāda: "No. If you are convinced that going to India is good for you, so similarly you must accept that going to London is also nice."

Minister: "Yes. But so may you also be convinced that India is better than London."

Prabhupāda: "Yes, if you can convince me."

Minister: "But if you believe that you cannot be convinced..."

Prabhupāda: "No. You can convince if we are reasonable."

Minister: "But then we have to search together to become complete."

Prabhupāda: "No, my version is complete."

Minister: "Then I cannot convince you of anything."

Prabhupāda: "No. Why not? You have got reason, I have got reason. You have to show me that there are favorable conditions in Paris or India..."

Minister: "But how can I convince you, because you say that you cannot—"

Prabhupāda: "No, no, no, no. Convince means you have to convince me with your reasoning power of presentation."

August 1968

Śrīla Prabhupāda was in his room with several devotees. "So, Annapūrṇa," Prabhupāda said, "you have got some news?" Annapūrṇa was a young British girl. A few months previously her father had written her from England that he might be able to provide a house if a group of devotees came to England.

"Yes," Annapūrṇa replied.

"So, what is our next program?"

Annapūrṇa was reticently shy. Once before, when Prabhupāda had asked her whether she chanted sixteen rounds a day, she had blushed, stammered, and then, on the verge of tears, had said, "Some days I chant more than sixteen rounds!" And Prabhupāda had had to laugh.

"That letter from your father is encouraging?" Prabhupāda inquired further.

"Yes," Annapūrṇa answered. "He encourages me. But he says he can't provide any place if we come there."

"That's all right," Prabhupāda said, a little disappointed. "It's up to Kṛṣṇa. When we go to someone to preach, we have to stand before them with folded hands, with all humility: 'My dear sir, please take to Kṛṣṇa consciousness.' "

"Swamiji?" Pradyumna asked. "I was reading a book by Vivekananda."

"Hmm?"

"There are some letters in the back of the book, and I was looking at them."

"Vivekananda book we have nothing to do with," Prabhupāda said curtly.

"I wasn't looking at his philosophy," Pradyumna explained. "I was just looking at his techniques for when he was in America. He wished to go to Europe. So he had one man who was a rich benefactor, and he went on a six-week tour of France, England, Germany, Switzerland, Holland, and then back. That's how he did most of his tour. He had one or two influential people, and he did everything just like that. And the lectures were arranged, and the society..."

"So, can you arrange like that?" Prabhupāda asked.

"I was thinking that there would be a Royal Asiatic Society in London. I think Ṭhākura Bhaktivinoda was a member of that."

"But where is Ṭhākura Bhaktivinoda's saṅga*?" Prabhupāda asked.

"No," Pradyumna continued, "but there will still be some people there that we might open correspondence with. They might be interested in sponsoring you."

"Is there anything about Kṛṣṇa in Vivekananda's speech?" Prabhupāda asked.

"No, I wasn't reading his speeches."

Prabhupāda sat thoughtfully. If he were to go to England, he would have no place to stay. Pradyumna might talk of influential persons traveling ahead and making all arrangements, but where were such persons? Here was a shy girl who could hardly speak up and whose father would not help, and Pradyumna reading Vivekananda and talking of a Royal Asiatic Society—but nothing practical. Prabhupāda had also been thinking of sending some devotees to London right away and then joining them later. He wanted to start something in Europe as soon as possible. Mukunda and Śyāmasundara were eager to go and would be arriving in Montreal in a few days.

“Prabhupāda?” Śivānanda spoke up, breaking the silence.

“Yes.”

“May I go to England?” Śivānanda had asked once before, and Prabhupāda had told him no, that he should stay in Montreal and help. He was only twenty, and his desire to go seemed to be mostly restlessness. He was sincere but inexperienced. But now he was asking again—and it was timely.

“My mother will give me money for the trip,” Śivānanda continued. “She says it’ll be all right as long as I go back to college after opening a temple there.”

Prabhupāda nodded. “Yes, that’s all right. You can go. You are sincere. But be careful. I was an old Calcutta boy, and so when I came to New York I never got cheated.”

Prabhupāda’s spiritual master, Śrīla Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī, had wanted to spread Kṛṣṇa consciousness in Europe. He had sent his most experienced sannyāsīs, giving them financial support from India; but they had returned, accomplishing nothing. Perhaps these boys and girls could succeed where others had failed. Prabhupāda felt it was possible. He knew it would greatly please Śrīla Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī.

Prabhupāda had faith that his disciples would be able to establish something in Europe, just as they had done in America. He gave the example that if someone finds a gourd lying on the road and picks it up and finds a wire and picks that up, although the two parts are in themselves useless, if he puts them together to make a vīṇā, he could play beautiful music. Similarly, Prabhupāda had come and found some hippies lying here and there, and he himself had been rejected by the people in New York City; but by Kṛṣṇa’s grace it had become a successful combination. If his disciples remained sincere and followed his orders, then they would be successful in Europe.

When the three married couples—Mukunda and Jānakī, Śyāmasundara and Mālatī, and Gurudāsa and Yamunā—arrived in Montreal, they created a new enthusiasm in the temple. These three couples had begun the temple in San Francisco and had had close association with Prabhupāda. They had helped Prabhupāda make kīrtana, feasting, and Ratha-yātrā successful among the hippies of Haight-Ashbury. Now they were eager to help Prabhupāda bring Kṛṣṇa consciousness to London.

It was an emotional reunion. Jānakī began crying, and Prabhupāda patted her head, saying, “There is no need.” When Prabhupāda saw Sarasvatī, Śyāmasundara and Mālatī’s daughter, he said, “I dreamed of that child last night, that exact child.” And he took the baby in his arms and gave her his garland. Prabhupāda laughed. “They will say, ‘What kind of sannyāsī is he?’ ”

Prabhupāda wanted these three couples to stay with him for a week or two so that he could train them to perform kīrtana very expertly. Of course, chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa was not a theatrical performance; it was an act of devotion. In fact, it could only be properly done by pure devotees—not by professional musicians. Yet if these disciples could learn the standard tunes and practice singing together, Londoners would better appreciate Kṛṣṇa consciousness.

Prabhupāda wanted to teach his London-bound disciples to sing and play instruments in a specific way. Someone should learn to play the harmonium properly—following the melody, not simply pumping it, as the devotees had been doing for years. And the Sanskrit mantras and bhajanas should be pronounced properly and the melodies sung correctly. Some melodies were to be sung in the morning, others in the evening. Each word was to be pronounced correctly and with the right intonation.

Prabhupāda liked Yamunā's singing, and Mukunda was an expert musician for organizing the party. The spacious Montreal temple was a suitable place for them to practice. Ideally, Prabhupāda said, the party should have two mṛdaṅga players, one harmonium player, one tamboura player, and at least six karatāla players. He talked about sending the group not only to London but to the European continent and then to Asia also. So he wanted them to become expert at kīrtana.

"Can we put on plays and things like that?" Gurudāsa asked.

"Yes," Prabhupāda said, "you can put on plays in the street with a Lord Nṛsiṃha mask and costumes and wigs. Or one boy can be dressed as Lord Caitanya, another as Lord Nityānanda, Gadādhara, Advaita with a white beard, and Śrīvāsa."

Prabhupāda became ecstatic at the thought of his disciples performing kīrtana in England. They would become more popular than the yogīs with their gymnastics and impersonal meditation. Sometimes they could dramatize scenes from Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam, sometimes they could recite Sanskrit verses and explain them by singing in English. Now that the London program was a tangible fact, Prabhupāda voiced one visionary plan after another. To the devotees it seemed that Prabhupāda had already thought out in detail hundreds of plans for implementing Kṛṣṇa consciousness around the world and that all he needed were some willing helpers.

Prabhupāda began holding daily kīrtana rehearsals, teaching the devotees to chant Hare Kṛṣṇa, very slowly at first, gradually building the tempo. Regularly he would interrupt and have them begin again. As Yamunā led the singing, Prabhupāda would listen carefully, stopping her at times to correct her Sanskrit pronunciation.

The six London-bound devotees had arrived in Montreal only a few days before two of the biggest festival days of the year: Janmāṣṭamī, the appearance day of Lord Kṛṣṇa, and Vyāsa-pūjā, the appearance day of Śrīla Prabhupāda. Now, with the festival days approaching and devotees from other cities arriving to be with Prabhupāda, the usually quiet Montreal temple began to stir with activity. Cooking became so enthusiastic that it was like a big kīrtana in the kitchen. Prabhupāda supervised the cooking of some of the preparations and then returned to his apartment, where he personally cooked several special dishes.

The Janmāṣṭamī festival was scheduled to last all day and on through the night until midnight, the time of Lord Kṛṣṇa's appearance, culminating in a midnight feast. Gopal had mailed invitations to many Indians and had made hundreds of phone calls. As a result, more than three hundred guests attended. Prabhupāda spoke in the evening before a distracted, talkative audience of Indian families with children. Afterwards he had Gaurasundara, Mukunda, and Yamunā speak in turn. Pleased by the large gathering of guests and devotees in the bowling-alley-turned-temple, Prabhupāda considered the Janmāṣṭamī festival the high point of his stay in Montreal.

After the midnight feasting, as Prabhupāda was leaving the temple, he stopped at the door and turned to Hamsadūta, who had done most of the cooking. "The sweetballs were very good," Prabhupāda said.

"Thank you, Prabhupāda."

"But mine," Prabhupāda smiled, "were better."

The next day, Prabhupāda's appearance day, the devotees gathered again, fasting until noon and then feasting. In the morning they offered little speeches in praise of their spiritual master. After most of the disciples had spoken, Prabhupāda turned to a new boy and indicated that he should speak. The boy stood and said that although he didn't know much about Kṛṣṇa consciousness, he was serving Prabhupāda each day by rolling capātīs in the kitchen. He said he loved hearing Prabhupāda's taped lectures and rolling capātīs and that he was satisfied and happy and simply wanted to go on eternally rolling capātīs and hearing his spiritual master's tapes. This simple talk caused Prabhupāda to smile, and he thanked the boy for his realization.

Then Prabhupāda spoke, describing the spiritual master as a transcendental broker. The broker acts only on behalf of his firm, and the customer must deal with the firm through the broker. Approaching Kṛṣṇa through the spiritual master was like that.

The London party, now ready to go, went for a final meeting with Prabhupāda. He was sending them to start a center in London and thus fulfill his spiritual master's dream. The sannyāsī Śrīla Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī had sent to London had lectured in a few places, posed for photos with lords and ladies, and then returned to India. But Prabhupāda said his disciples should boldly go out and chant the holy name and attract others to chant. Then, when those persons were practiced at chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa, they could continue on their own, and the devotees could move on to another place and chant. Prabhupāda was enthusiastic about London, and as he spoke he filled his disciples with the same enthusiasm.

When Mukunda asked Prabhupāda if he had any specific instructions, he replied with a story. In his youth, Prabhupāda said, he had seen a movie of Charlie Chaplin. The setting was a formal ball held outdoors, and off from the main dance arena were lanes with benches where couples sat. Some mischievous boys plastered glue on a bench, and a young man and his girl friend came and sat down. "When the young man got up"—Prabhupāda laughed as he told the story, and his disciples, who could hardly believe their ears, were also laughing—"his tailing coats tore up the middle."

The man and woman didn't notice what had happened and returned to the dance, where they began to draw stares from the other dancers. Wondering why he was suddenly drawing so much attention, the young man went into the dressing room and saw in the mirror that his coattails were torn. Deliberately, he then tore his jacket all the way up to the collar, returned to his partner, and began dancing exuberantly.

Then another man decided to get into the spirit and, ripping his own coattails, began dancing with his partner almost in competition with the first couple. One by one, the other dancers all followed suit, ripping their coattails and dancing with abandon.

By the time Prabhupāda finished the story, the devotees in his room were all laughing, forgetting everything else. Then, as the laughter subsided and the meeting drew to an end, Mālatī asked, "Prabhupāda, I don't think we can go to London unless we have the shelter of your lotus feet. May we kiss your lotus feet?"

The other devotees were taken aback at her sudden request. No one had ever done such a thing before. But neither her husband nor the others said anything to oppose her, and Prabhupāda consented. One by one, the six London-bound preachers came and offered their obeisances, kissing the bottom of their spiritual master's feet.

Not until the devotees were already at the airport did Mukunda, talking with Śyāmasundara, begin to appreciate and marvel that Prabhupāda had expertly answered his question by telling the story of the ripped coattails.

Mukunda: I realized that Prabhupāda was telling us that preaching Kṛṣṇa consciousness may be difficult or unpopular in England at first. But if we preached boldly, enthusiastically, and purely, then everyone would follow.

SPL 60: Seattle

CHAPTER SIXTY

Seattle

= September 21, 1968

The immediate reason Śrīla Prabhupāda went to Seattle was that two of his disciples, Upendra and Gargamuni, had just begun an ISKCON center there and had invited him. For several years, this had been Prabhupāda's method of spreading Kṛṣṇa consciousness in America: he went to a city, stayed, preached, and directed his disciples. He had done so in New York, San Francisco, Boston, Montreal, Los Angeles—all with good success. As he had written in a letter of March 1968, "We want to open hundreds of centers so that people may take up Kṛṣṇa consciousness. And we need many enthusiastic boys and girls for carrying on this great mission of Caitanya Mahāprabhu."

Prabhupāda's Guru Mahārāja, Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī, had not mentioned Seattle or even the United States when he ordered Prabhupāda to preach in the Western countries. But Lord Caitanya Mahāprabhu had said the chanting of the Lord's holy names, Hare Kṛṣṇa, would go to every town and village of the world. The street chanters and Back to Godhead magazine distributors in Los Angeles and San Francisco wanted to try Seattle to test the chanting in the streets of a conServative city. Seattle, the home of Boeing Aircraft Manufacturers, had a population of 560,000, a university, and several good colleges. On Prabhupāda's order, the devotees went ahead to join the Seattle temple in time for Prabhupāda's arrival.

While Gargamuni was still desperately trying to find an apartment he could afford, the devotees received Prabhupāda in a hotel room. From Prabhupāda's room, the window looked out at the six-hundred-foot-tall Space Needle and the monorail—leftovers from the 1962 Seattle World's Fair. The devotees squeezed into the small room as Prabhupāda sat behind a low desk and pulled his harmonium to him. "Should I play?" he asked, smiling. They pleaded, "Yes!" and he began playing, the fingers of his right hand moving deftly across the keyboard, while his left hand pumped the harmonium's bellows. He sang, gaurāṅga balite habe pulaka śarīra/ hari hari balite nayane vabe nīra. Their meeting with him in the room was happy, but the song was not a light thing. The sound poured forth, both from him and from the little harmonium. They were bhajanas, he had explained to them, songs of devotion, this one by Narottama dāsa Ṭhākura: "When will the time come when, while chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa, there will be tears in the eyes?" He played, and the expression of his face in singing seemed like crying. The song, he said, meant, "When the mind is completely purified, freed from material anxieties and desires, then I shall be able to understand Vṛndāvana and the love of Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa; and then my spiritual life will be successful."

The first night in town, Prabhupāda was to drive from the hotel to the ISKCON temple, a house rented by the devotees in a quiet suburban neighborhood. A devotee-carpenter, Nara-nārāyaṇa, had done excellent work with $50 converting the living room into a temple room. Enclosed behind long red satin curtains was an impressive three-tiered altar. The altar was paneled with the same cedar as the walls. The altar's bottom shelf had a brass incense holder, brass flower vases, two silver double candle holders, a conchshell, and a picture of Lord Viṣṇu. On the middle shelf were a black-and-white close-up of Prabhupāda, a large color poster of Lord Caitanya, and a simple ink drawing of the Pañca-tattva by Prabhupāda's disciples Gaurasundara and Govinda dāsī. The top shelf held the twelve-inch deities of Lord Jagannātha, Subhadrā and Lord Baladeva, who were clothed in simple golden satin, without jewels or garlands.

Around the room were nicely framed pictures. To the left of the altar was an Indian print of Gopāla with His arm around a calf. Forming a border near the ceiling were several of Gurudāsa's captivating black-and-white close-ups of Śrīla Prabhupāda on morning walks in San Francisco. On the left wall was a painting of Kṛṣṇa driving Arjuna's chariot. To the right of the altar was Śrīla Prabhupāda's vyāsāsana.

The room was small. The devotees had designed a vyāsāsana, three feet high, wedged into the corner so that the room could accommodate many people. The back of the seat was cushioned with deep blue velvet inset with large and decorative golden upholstery buttons. The seat itself was gold velvet, with a gold bolster pillow. A small gold velvet canopy with a fringe hung above the vyāsāsana.

Śrīla Prabhupāda arrived at the temple accompanied by his servant, Kartikeya, and his secretary, Govinda dāsī. Coming up the steps onto the porch, they were greeted at the front door by the welcoming kīrtana of the devotees in the small temple room. As Śrīla Prabhupāda made his way from the door toward his vyāsāsana, all the devotees in the room, except for one, bowed down. The exception, standing midway between the front door and the vyāsāsana, was a newcomer, a girl named Joy Fulcher, who had only met the devotees that very day. And as Śrīla Prabhupāda passed by her, she also bowed down.

As Śrīla Prabhupāda was taking his seat on the vyāsāsana, while Kartikeya adjusted the microphone and Govinda dāsī adjusted the tape recorder, the devotees sent Joy forward to offer Prabhupāda a garland of red roses and red carnations. Joy had made the garland, stringing the flowers in a symmetrical pattern. But when she placed it around Prabhupāda's neck, the garland fell asymmetrically. Feeling undone, she turned to go sit down. "Thank you very much," said Prabhupāda in a soft but deeply resounding voice.

Joy Fulcher: So I sat down and listened to his lecture. But I could not understand his accent. I was struck with the impression that here was a very elderly person who had taken great difficulty to come and speak to us. I could understand there was nothing motivating in it for him. I felt very much that he didn't want to cheat me. I also had the conception that this person was inconceivably humble, because of his quoting the scriptures, because of his references to his Guru Mahārāja, and because of his general attitude and his soft-spoken voice. I could understand that he was not trying to impress anyone and that he was very humble and dependent on his Guru Mahārāja.

After the lecture, I raised my hand to ask a question. Answering three or four questions first, he finally took my question. I asked him, "Śrī Bhaktivedanta, how is it that this universal presence which is humanly inconceivable, at least to me, at this time..., how can it have the form of Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa?" The devotees had preached to me, prior to his arrival, that the Absolute Truth, which I, from my reading in yoga philosophy, impersonally called "universal presence," was actually Kṛṣṇa, the Supreme Personality of Godhead, and His consort, Rādhārāṇī.

Śrīla Prabhupāda very distinctly answered, "By His mercy." But then he spoke loudly, "You cannot make the sun rise, and similarly you cannot make God appear before you to answer your doubts!"

I was thunderstruck that he chose this particular example, since only four months earlier I had climbed a mountain by myself and sat there all night waiting for dawn, when I would "make the sun rise." But when dawn came, it was a cloudy day, and so, of course, I did not make the sun rise. The fact that out of all examples Prabhupāda chose that particular thing to answer me hit me like a thunderbolt.

Then His Divine Grace softened his voice, like a rose, and indicating his disciples with a wave of his arm, he said, "But you just associate with these nice boys and girls here, chant this Hare Kṛṣṇa mantra, eat kṛṣṇa-prasādam, study my books scrutinizingly, and engage yourself in a little service, and then the Lord will reveal Himself to you from within your heart, in His own time, by His own sweet will, with all His name, fame, form, pastimes, paraphernalia, and entourage."

Within a few days, Gargamuni found an inexpensive two-room apartment for Prabhupāda. Gargamuni, who was accustomed to the Lower East Side of New York City, thought this Seattle apartment a good bargain. By New York slum standards it wasn't bad, but there were much better places in Seattle.

When Prabhupāda entered with the devotees, it became obvious to everyone that the apartment was a disaster. Prabhupāda went to the windows and looked out—at the brick wall of the building six feet away. Because of this building, no sunlight could enter the room. Prabhupāda looked below at the dark, dingy alley littered with garbage. The curtains in the room reached only half way down the wall, the tiles were peeling in the bathroom, nothing was clean, and there was no bed. Anyone staying with Prabhupāda would have to walk through his room to reach the bathroom. Only when Prabhupāda entered, with his bright, transcendental presence, could his disciples fully understand that the apartment was not at all suitable. Prabhupāda, however, didn't complain. "It doesn't matter," he said. And taking his cādar and placing it on the floor, he sat down.

Although the neighborhood was noisy, Prabhupāda was tolerant. But he admitted, "This place is not nice." And then, looking up at the devotees in the dingy room, he asked, "Why have you put me in this dungeon?" Struck at heart by these words, the devotees knew they had to find a better place, and several of them went out to search.

Why had they put him in a dungeon? Jayānanda, Nara-nārāyaṇa, and Govinda dāsī got into the van and drove off, vowing not to return until they found a place Prabhupāda would like. They moved toward the Capitol Hill area and finally found a "For Rent" sign on the lawn of a nice house situated near a lake. Although it was a basement apartment, the many ground-level windows made the rooms bright and sunny. Jayānanda and Govinda dāsī talked to the landlord, and Prabhupāda moved in the next day.

He liked the tulips lining his windows and the view down the sloping green lawn to the shore of the lake. He liked walking in the backyard, from where he could see boats passing. "That other place," he chuckled, "was like being in the womb of the mother, and this place is like coming out into the world and seeing the light." The apartment was well furnished, and Prabhupāda put his Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa Deities on a dresser before the mirror, which made a nice backdrop.

Early every morning Prabhupāda would go on a walk, usually to Volunteer Park, where he walked by the reservoir. The path around the reservoir's perimeter was several miles long, and although some of the young men would become exhausted from the walk, Prabhupāda enjoyed it. One morning, while Jayānanda was walking with Prabhupāda, they approached a man who had just pulled a fish out of the water. The fisherman held up his catch, dangling it as if offering it to Prabhupāda. "Anyone for a fish dinner?" the man asked cheerily. Prabhupāda smiled, "No, you enjoy." Prabhupāda kept walking until he was past the man and then added, "And suffer."

They also walked in an area filled with many rose bushes and many birds. Peacocks roamed freely. It is written in the śāstras that wherever a saintly person goes becomes a tīrtha, or a place of pilgrimage. In India are many tīrthas, most of which are places where the Supreme Personality of Godhead or His great devotees enacted some līlā. There are no such tīrthas, however, in America. But after Prabhupāda's preaching—beginning in New York City in place like 26 Second Avenue and Tompkins Square Park, and later in Golden Gate Park, at Stowe Lake, Venice Beach, or Volunteer Park—then even these American places became, for Prabhupāda's followers, significant, never-to-be-forgotten sites.

Prabhupāda took advantage of the presence of the traveling saṅkīrtana party in Seattle. He told Tamāla Kṛṣṇa he wanted to organize a world saṅkīrtana party, with twelve men, twelve women, and himself going all over the world. But for the present, the devotees went out daily in the downtown city. In Seattle, citizens were astounded to see young Americans with shaven heads, saffron robes, women in sārīs, playing cymbals and singing “Hare Kṛṣṇa, Hare Kṛṣṇa, Kṛṣṇa Kṛṣṇa, Hare Hare.” The devotees would chant Hare Kṛṣṇa for hours, give out cards with the mahā-mantra printed on them, and sometimes bring people back to the temple. As a result, attendance was good at Prabhupāda's evening lectures. With the devotees chanting on the streets during the day and Prabhupāda speaking at night, the city was quickly becoming spiritualized. Therefore, each evening the small cedarwood-paneled temple room of Lord Jagannātha was filled with considerable transcendental excitement. For Prabhupāda, it was very encouraging to lecture to a hall crowded with both disciples and guests.

After the evening kīrtana, everyone would sit down on the floor, and some people would even stand outside the house, looking in and listening at the windows. Prabhupāda invariably began by chanting, in a strong, simple melody, the refrain govindam adi-puruṣaṁ tam ahaṁ bhajāmi. And everyone would repeat in chorus, govindam adi-puruṣaṁ tam ahaṁ bhajāmi. He would chant it half a dozen times and then begin his lecture.

Prabhupāda's Teachings of Lord Caitanya had recently been published, and he often lectured by having a devotee read out loud. Prabhupāda would listen, and whenever he felt moved to, he would interrupt and begin speaking. “This Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement,” Prabhupāda explained, “has to be understood through the teachings of Lord Caitanya. He appeared in Bengal, a province in India, five hundred years ago. And He specifically preached the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement. To execute that order we have come to your country. My request is that you try to understand this Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement with all your knowledge, scrutinizingly. Don't accept it blindly. We have this book Teachings of Lord Caitanya, and other books also, many books. So try to read them. And we have our magazine Back to Godhead. We are not sentimentalists that we are simply dancing. Dancing has got great value. That, if you dance with us, you will feel. It is not that some crazy fellows are dancing. The most intelligent persons are dancing, and yet it is so nicely made that even a boy like here, he is a boy, he can take part.”

Prabhupāda emphasized that Kṛṣṇa consciousness was universal. It was full of sound philosophy, and yet it was very simple. The simple message was, “God is great, and we are His part and parcel.” And to prove it, he gave simple examples: The hand is part of the body and has great value when working as part of the whole. A small screw in the typewriting machine is very valuable as long as it is working as part of the machine; otherwise it is useless. Similarly, unless the individual spirit soul engages in devotional service to Kṛṣṇa, he is incomplete.

Prabhupāda spoke some basic Kṛṣṇa consciousness for about a half-hour and then asked for questions. Always at least a few hands raised. He recognized the outsiders first. It was not unusual in those days to find young people, college students and hippies, asking cosmic questions, dabbling in yoga and Eastern philosophy. Often, however, they had many different things on their minds, including drugs, and were frequently confused. But Prabhupāda, experienced with over three years of constant preaching to young Americans, had already heard almost anything they could possibly ask.

Young man: "Is there a communication that is not the word itself but beyond words, perhaps a vibration reaching for the om? I mean, does one attain a communication, something understood between you and myself and my brother, an experience like the sound dong or aung? Is there something else beyond the verbal?"

"Yes," Prabhupāda replied, "this Hare Kṛṣṇa."

Man: "Hare Kṛṣṇa?"

Prabhupāda: "Yes."

Man: "But can you tell me how this can be? How to talk that language all the time rather than English or other languages?"

Prabhupāda: "It doesn't matter that Hare Kṛṣṇa can be sounded in Sanskrit only. You can sound it in English tone also, Hare Kṛṣṇa. Is there any difficulty? These boys are also sounding Hare Kṛṣṇa. Just like the piano. If you touch, there is sound. It doesn't matter whether an American is striking or an Indian striking or a Hindu striking or a Muslim striking, the sound is sound. Similarly, this piano, Hare Kṛṣṇa, you just touch it and it will sound. That's all."

Someone asked about meditation.

Prabhupāda asked, "What do you mean by meditation?"

"Sitting alone quietly."

"How is it possible?" Prabhupāda asked. "Is there any experience that the mind is not acting when you sit silently? You have to engage your mind in something."

"What do you engage it in?"

"Yes," Prabhupāda replied. "That is Kṛṣṇa. We engage our mind in Kṛṣṇa, the beautiful Supreme Personality of Godhead. Not only simply engaging the mind, but engaging the mind in action with the senses. Because mind is acting with our senses. Your mind said, 'Let us go to that newly started ISKCON society.' So your legs carried you here. So mind—thinking, feeling, willing—these are the functions of the mind. You have to fix up your mind not only thinking of Kṛṣṇa, but also working for Kṛṣṇa, feeling for Kṛṣṇa. That is complete meditation."

Someone asked if a Christian, by reading the Bible and following Jesus's words, required a spiritual master. As soon as you read the Bible, Prabhupāda replied, that means you are following the instructions of Lord Jesus Christ, so where is the opportunity of being without a spiritual master?

"I was referring to a living spiritual master."

Prabhupāda: “You may accept this spiritual master or that spiritual master. That is a different thing. But you have to accept. When you read the Bible, that means you are following the spiritual master represented by some priest or clergyman in the line of Lord Jesus Christ. So, in any case, you have to follow a spiritual master. There is no question of being without a spiritual master. Is that clear?”

“Many different sects of Christianity interpret the Bible in different ways.”

Prabhupāda: “There cannot be any interpretation in the Bible; then there is no authority. Just like this is a watch. Everyone has called it a watch, and if I call it a spectacle, then what is the value of my being spiritual master? I'm misleading. It is a watch, and that I must say. This intelligence you must have—who is a pseudo spiritual master and a real spiritual master. Otherwise, you'll be cheated, and that is being done. Everyone is interpreting in his own way.

“There are thousands of editions of the Bhagavad-gītā, and they have tried to interpret it in their own way—all nonsense. They should all be thrown away. Simply you have to read the Bhagavad-gītā as it is, then you'll understand. If anyone can understand the clear passage, just like the Bible, “God said, “Let there be creation," and there was creation.' What is the question of interpretation? Yes, God created. You cannot create. Where is opportunity of interpretation?

“Am I right, in the beginning of the Bible it is said like that: “God said, “Let there be creation," and there was creation.' So what is your interpretation? Tell me what is your interpretation. Can any one of you suggest? One can explain; that is a different thing. But the fact that God created, that will remain; that we cannot change.

“Now how the creative process took place, that is explained in the Bhāgavatam. First of all there was sky, then there was sound, then there was this, that. But the primary fact that God created, that will remain in any circumstance. Not the rascal scientist who says, “Oh, there was a chunk, and it split up, and there was this planet. Perhaps this and likely this,' all this nonsense. Why “perhaps'? Here is clear statement: God created. That's all. Finished.”

Another guest said he didn't feel subordinate to anyone, therefore he didn't feel he had to bow down to anyone. Indirectly, he was criticizing the devotees' offering of obeisances to Prabhupāda. It is a material disease, Prabhupāda replied, to think that we don't have to bow down. He demonstrated logically that nature forces each of us to be subordinate, “to bow down” to old age, disease, death, and many other things.

Guest: “O.K. But who or what should I bow down to?”

Prabhupāda: “Since you are being forced to bow down, now you have to find where you shall be happy even by bowing down. And that is Kṛṣṇa. Your bowing down will not be stopped, because you are meant for that; but if you bow down to Kṛṣṇa and Kṛṣṇa's representative, then you become happy.”

The disciples were submissive, and therefore only to them could the spiritual master impart knowledge of Kṛṣṇa consciousness. But some of them were also doubtful, and Prabhupāda had to convince them with the same logical arguments he used with the outsiders.

Devotee: "Prabhupāda? How do you logically explain to impersonalists the existence of the Personality of Godhead?"

Prabhupāda began to explain the three features of the Absolute and compared them to the three features of the sun, namely the sunshine, the sun disk, and the sun-god. Using the well-known example, he thoroughly explained the existence of the Supreme Person as the source of all expansions, including the impersonal Brahman.

"But [the devotee was not yet satisfied] how does one explain to such an impersonalist the Absolute Truth logically. I was told Śrīla Bhaktivinoda had such a proof."

Prabhupāda: "Apart from Bhaktivinoda, try to understand in your common sense." Painstakingly, Prabhupāda explained again, this time at greater length. He quoted the Vedānta-sūtra verse janmādyasya yataḥ, explaining how everything in existence comes from the Supreme Absolute. Therefore, as we are persons, there must be a Supreme Person, the reservoir of all personality, from whom everything comes. As we experience that our father is a person, therefore we are persons.

Often Prabhupāda was simply saying there is God and one should love God. But one student protested why love of God should come in the form of the Kṛṣṇa consciousness movement.

Student: "If our first concern should be to serve God, or Kṛṣṇa, then why should there be a movement? You might get so caught up in the movement that you're forgetting about serving God."

Prabhupāda: "Why am I serving God? This movement means I am serving God. What do you mean by 'serving'? If Kṛṣṇa says, 'You obey Me,' and if I say, 'You obey Kṛṣṇa,' is this not service?"

Student: "Yes."

Prabhupāda: "So we are doing the same business. Kṛṣṇa says, 'Surrender to Me and give up all other engagement, and I shall give you protection.' And we are saying the same thing, that you surrender to Kṛṣṇa and you'll be happy. So we are voluntarily giving service to Kṛṣṇa. Preaching work is the best service, if you preach rightly. If you preach wrongly, that is disservice. You have to simply say the same thing as Kṛṣṇa."

Student: "But the movement might get in the way of serving Kṛṣṇa."

Prabhupāda: "It is service to Kṛṣṇa. Because we have understood what Kṛṣṇa wants, we are preaching the same thing."

Student: "Was there always a kind of movement?"

Prabhupāda: "Yes, the movement is always there. Just like in the Bhagavad-gītā it is said, 'My dear Arjuna, whenever people are misguided and there is too much irreligiosity, at that time I appear Myself.' The material world is such that, if something is set right, still some time it will be distorted. Therefore a movement is required whenever there is deterioration of the real truth. But it is the same movement, not a new movement. The movement means God is there, He is great, and we are all subordinate. Our duty is to abide by the order of God, then we are happy. The movement is simple. The same movement was preached by Lord Kṛṣṇa. The same movement was preached by Lord Jesus Christ. The same movement we are also preaching. Simply accepting the authority or the greatness of the Supreme Lord and engaging oneself, that's all. There is nothing new. Don't try to see something new. It is the oldest because God is the oldest, you are also the oldest, and your relationship is also the oldest. Therefore the movement is also the oldest. But the process adopted is suitable for this time. That is also not new, not manufactured. It is recommended for this age. Just like during the winter season, the process is to protect your body from being affected by cold. Similarly in this age, Kali-yuga, it is recommended that God realization is only possible by this chanting of Hare Kṛṣṇa."

Many of the youngsters would try to catch Prabhupāda in contradictions. One boy noted Prabhupāda's statement that it was natural for a child to drink milk and not eat the meat of an animal. The boy argued that if Prabhupāda's emphasis was on being natural, then is it natural for a child to grow up, shave his head, and serve God, or was that just another form of socialization? Another challenger asked why the International Society for Krishna Consciousness was "incorporated." Another asked if the sādhus in India who wore long hair and wandered in the woods needed spiritual masters.

The questions revealed the guests' uneasiness. Prabhupāda was demanding a full commitment to the truth. They could understand that if they accepted that he was presenting the truth, then they, too, like the bright-faced disciples sitting beside them in the crowded temple room, should bow down to Prabhupāda and Lord Jagannātha, join "the movement," shave their heads, and go out chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa. At least that was the implication. So those who deeply wanted to avoid the austerity, the surrender, the uprooting of a whole lifetime of illusion, sought out the flaws, the possible contradictions. But kind and lenient though he was, Prabhupāda—never demanding that they shave their heads or live in the temple—continued to defeat their doubting arguments, expose the weakness of their atheistic reasoning, and smash the folly of their material desires. He ruled forth as Kṛṣṇa's representative, speaking from the blue and gold velvet vyāsāsana in the front room of the Seattle house.

Woman: "I wish to see proofs of afterlife, in writing, so that I can read it and study it and examine it carefully. Is it available in writing?"

Prabhupāda: "Read Bhagavad-gītā. You'll understand everything."

Woman: "That's sixty-eight volumes?"

Prabhupāda: "No, Bhagavad-gītā is one volume only. Eighteen chapters, seven hundred verses. You can read it in three days. It is not very difficult. We have published Bhagavad-gītā As It Is, and I think if you read it, you will get so many nice informations. After reading Bhagavad-gītā, you read Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam. Then you get further enlightenment. Then you read Teachings of Lord Caitanya, and you get further enlightenment. And for general information, we have this Back to Godhead you can read. It is not that simply we are talking. We are backed by sufficient knowledge and literature."

And so it went into the evening, nine o'clock turned to ten o'clock and ten o'clock to ten-thirty.

Is bhakti-yoga for everyone? What about kuṇḍalini-yoga? Why did Kṛṣṇa ask Arjuna to fight? What about Christ consciousness? What about the Trinity? Prabhupāda was completely absorbed in defeating arguments and answering questions about Kṛṣṇa—a samādhi of debate on behalf of his Lord Kṛṣṇa. Yes, he did expect them, if they were gentlemen, to accept his presentation as correct and to make a real commitment to Kṛṣṇa consciousness. "So here is the offering," Prabhupāda said. "Take Kṛṣṇa consciousness. Now it is your choice. If you can take it, it is good. If you don't take it, that is your misfortune. Is there any difficulty to accept our formula? I ask all of you, is there any difficulty? I am asking this. You have asked so many questions of me. Is there any difficulty to accept this formula?"

The assembled guests and devotees murmured in reply, "No."

"So why don't you take it?" Prabhupāda laughed. "It is so simple, nice. Try to understand by your knowledge. We are not pushing forcibly. You have got your intelligence, argument, logic, everything. But you'll find it sublime. The author of Caitanya-caritāmṛta says that we are placing it for your judgment, not that we are pushing it by force. Sometimes it is said that the Mohammedans propagated their religion by holding a sword in one hand and the Koran in another hand: Either you accept Koran, or there is sword for you. Kṛṣṇa consciousness is not like that. It is placed for your judgment. And if you like, you can accept. Otherwise, I came here empty-handed, I shall go back empty-handed. There is no loss, no gain."

Prabhupāda laughed with the satisfaction of the completely surrendered servant. Then he asked them all to chant Hare Kṛṣṇa.

Tamāla Kṛṣṇa: At that point, I could recognize that Prabhupāda was my complete lord and master. Whenever he would get up from the vyāsāsana I would just grip his feet and hold them and hold them. I would hold his feet at my head, and I wouldn't let him walk at all. I was so eager to be at Prabhupāda's lotus feet. I wanted to be with him as much as I could. I would feel very torn apart when he would go to another temple. I remember sometimes after the program, he would finish eating a piece of fruit and would throw the peel on the floor. We would all jump for it and fight with each other in front of the altar and Prabhupāda. We would be scrapping around like little puppies. Prabhupāda would lean back and laugh. He thought we were making very nice advancement by this.

Word got around that Prabhupāda—whose disciples were chanting downtown every day—was himself chanting Hare Kṛṣṇa and speaking in the temple on Roosevelt Way. A local TV station came out one evening to film the proceedings, bringing big cameras, microphones, and bright lights into the temple room and shooting Lord Jagannātha, the devotees dancing and singing, and excerpts of Prabhupāda speaking. The following day they returned to Prabhupāda's apartment and filmed him playing harmonium and speaking with a woman interviewer. They turned their cameras on his personal altar, with close-ups of his Rādhā-Kṛṣṇa Deities as well as the covers of his books, Bhagavad-gītā As It Is and Teachings of Lord Caitanya. When Prabhupāda saw the footage on color TV—a few minutes of the evening news—he thought it was good. He wrote to the devotees in London, "This newscast should help our movement here in Seattle, as so many people will see, and come to our temple. You can try for television appearances there also if possible."

After the TV showing, there was a brief fame. When Prabhupāda came to the lecture the next night, the temple room was filled with about fifty extra guests, young men and women. Prabhupāda seemed pleased, but actually they were all one group, a fun-seeking fraternity house with their dates. They managed to stay through the kīrtana, but as soon as Prabhupāda began to speak, they all got up and left, leaving the devotees and the usual number of about a dozen interested guests.

The devotees were also going to the university, and among the students was considerable interest, at least casually. A representative of a student newspaper came and talked at length with Prabhupāda.

When two men came to Prabhupāda's apartment and presented themselves as reporters, Prabhupāda's secretary allowed them in, thinking they also wanted an interview. But their interview became an interrogation. They challenged Prabhupāda as to why he was not teaching that Jesus Christ was the only way to God. They were angry that Prabhupāda was preaching on the campuses. When Prabhupāda informed them that he accepted Jesus Christ as the son of God, they demanded, "But do you believe or not that Jesus is the only way?"

Prabhupāda replied, "Do you believe that God is limited or unlimited?"

"Unlimited," they admitted.

"Then why are you limiting Him," said Prabhupāda, "by saying that there is only one way to get to Him? Even an ordinary man can have twenty sons. Do you mean to say that God can have only one son? Why are you limiting Him?"

Within a few minutes, the men were speaking to Prabhupāda in loud voices. It became obvious they were not reporters, and they told him they were, in fact, local ministers. When they became blasphemous, the devotees asked them to leave the house. Prabhupāda wrote in a letter to a disciple in New York,

The priestly class of Christian and Jewish churches are becoming envious of our movement. Because they are afraid of their own system of religiosity, because they see so many young boys and girls are taking interest in this system of Krishna consciousness. Naturally, they are not very satisfied. So we may be facing some difficulty by them in the future. So, we have to take some precaution. Of course, this priestly class could not do anything very nice till now, but the dogmatic way of thinking is going on. So anyway we shall have to depend on Krishna.

Before Prabhupāda's arrival in Seattle, Upendra had written the head of the Asian department at the University of Washington, requesting a speaking engagement. The professor wrote back entirely in Sanskrit, knowing well that the boys would not be able to read his letter. Upendra gave the letter to Prabhupāda, who immediately translated it and answered the professor with a letter written in English, but quoting many Sanskrit verses. Prabhupāda concluded his letter, "I am sorry that we cannot reply in Sanskrit. Our process is not academic, but purely spiritual." Prabhupāda had Upendra sign the letter as if he had written it himself.

Prabhupāda went out himself to speak in several colleges. At the University of Washington, he had Tamāla Kṛṣṇa give an introductory talk. Speaking directly what he had heard from Prabhupāda, Tamāla Kṛṣṇa spoke boldly about "so-called holy men or swamis who are cheating the public." He took considerable care to demonstrate that "our spiritual master" is in complete agreement with Lord Jesus and the Bible. The Bible is bona fide, he said, but like a pocket dictionary compared to the unabridged.

"There is a need to hear a person like our spiritual master, A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami, speak," said Tamāla Kṛṣṇa. He then read an article from the New York Daily News, headlined "Retreat for Priests Who Drink," featuring a sanatorium that had been opened for some of the five thousand alcoholic priests in the United States. "I'm not saying that all priests are like this," he said. "That's not at all what I'm trying to get at. But the article goes on to say that alcoholism is not treated as a moral failure, but as a disease. But that's absurd. It is a moral failure. These priests have the choice to drink or not to drink. They chose to drink and get drunk. These are men who are leading us back to God.

"The point is, you must have someone who is pure. To teach about God requires a moral qualification. Our spiritual master spends a hundred percent of his time in praise of the Supreme Lord. We ask you today, please listen closely and just try to understand his teachings. Just listen and test with your reasoning ability and your intellect to see whether this is not the bona fide way to the Absolute Truth. Now let His Divine Grace A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami Prabhupāda speak."

Prabhupāda listened from the orange cloth-covered dais where he sat in the auditorium. Tamāla Kṛṣṇa had stood and spoken, and now he joined the other saffron-robed men and the women in sārīs who sat at Prabhupāda's feet. His voice echoing with amplification in the large hall, Prabhupāda spoke to an audience of over a hundred. He quoted the verse om ajñāna-timirāndhasya, explaining that everyone in the material world is in darkness, and the spiritual master is he who opens our eyes with the torch of knowledge. If human society does not have the urge to come to the light by searching after God, then mankind is no better than the animals.

To illustrate the point that human society is in a precarious condition for lack of God consciousness, Prabhupāda told "a very nice story."

"One rat," he said, "was troubled with a cat, so he came to a saintly person.

"“My dear sir, I am very much troubled."

"“What is the difficulty?"

"The rat said, "The cat always chases, so I am not in peace of mind."

"“Then what do you want?"

““Please make me a cat.’

““All right, you become a cat.’ But after a few days, the cat returned to the saintly person and complained that he was being chased by the dogs. The saintly person gave him the benediction, “All right, become a dog.’ Then the foxes chased the dog. The saintly person blessed him again, “All right, become a fox.’ Then the tigers chased him. The saintly person turned him into a tiger.

“And when he became a tiger,” Prabhupāda continued, “he began to stare his eyes on the saintly person, “I shall eat you.’

““Oh! You shall eat me? I have made you tiger, and you want to eat me?’

““Yes, I am a tiger and I shall eat you.’

““Oh,’ then the saintly person cursed him, “again you become a rat. Again you become a rat.’ So he became a rat.

“So our human civilization is going to be like that. The other day I was reading in your world almanac. In the next hundred years, people will live underground like rats. So our scientific advancement has created this atomic bomb to kill man, and it will be used. And we have to go underground to become again rat. From tiger again rat. That is going to be. That is nature's law: daivī hy eṣā guṇa-mayī mama māyā duratyayā. If you defy the laws of your state, then you are put into difficulty. Similarly, if you continue to defy the authority, the supremacy of the Supreme Lord, Personality of Godhead, then the same result—again you become rat. As soon as there is atomic bomb, everything, all civilization on the surface of the globe, will be finished. So people may not like it. It may be very unpalatable, but the fact is like that.”

Prabhupāda explained that the God consciousness he was advocating was not a particular rigid religion like Christian or Hindu or Muslim, but it was universal. He explained the word dharma as one's characteristic, that which cannot be taken away. The unalterable characteristic of the living entity, he said, is the tendency to love and do service, and that is our eternal religion.

“So I do not wish to take much of your time,” Prabhupāda concluded after no more than ten minutes, “but simply I want to impress upon you that this chanting of Hare Kṛṣṇa is so nice that if you give an experimental way, you can see. You chant for at least one week, and you see how much you have changed. So these boys, they are chanting in the street. We have got many branches in your country, one in London, one in Germany, and everyone is taking part. It is increasing. So we don't charge anything, neither you have got any loss. If there is any profit, you can try it, but there is not loss. That is guaranteed. Chant Hare Kṛṣṇa, Hare Kṛṣṇa, Kṛṣṇa Kṛṣṇa, Hare Hare/ Hare Rāma, Hare Rāma, Rāma Rāma, Hare Hare. Thank you very much.”

During his stay in Seattle, a few people came to join his disciples, living with them and aspiring to become devotees. After several weeks, Prabhupāda held an initiation for students who had already been with ISKCON for about six months. Prabhupāda held the traditional initiation ceremony with mantras and fire yajña in the temple room. He had just completed the last mantras, had turned to the devotees, and said, "Now chant Hare Kṛṣṇa," when a guest, a woman who had some local fame as a haṭha-yoga instructor, interrupted the proceedings.

"Excuse me," she began, "I have to speak to you."

"Please wait," said Prabhupāda.

"Why are you sitting on a raised seat?" she exclaimed. "You are sitting up there, and all these people are sitting here, and you're like you're on a throne." Devotees tried politely to check her, but she wanted to be heard. Prabhupāda was silent.

"Why does everyone bow to you?" she demanded. "Don't you know God is everywhere? Everyone is God."

"That's all right," said Prabhupāda. "Let us chant." Her argument was drowned out by a rousing kīrtana celebrating the completion of the initiation ceremony. When the kīrtana ended, Prabhupāda was still thinking of the disruptive guest.

Prabhupāda: "Where is that girl? She is gone?"

Viṣṇujana: "I think Madhudviṣa explained to her. She didn't know about the bowing down and everything."

Prabhupāda: "What was her question?"

Viṣṇujana: "She was thinking that we were bowing to you as if you were God. She resents this because in the Christian religion it says, 'Bow down to no man.'"

"What did you explain?" Prabhupāda laughed. "Did you not explain that we are bowing down not as God but as God's representative? Could you not explain like this?"

"She's over there, I think," said Madhudviṣa, "if you'd like to talk to her." But the yoginī had left the room and was now out front talking with the new girl, Joy, who had been living with Prabhupāda's disciples since his first night in Seattle. The yoginī was trying to revive Joy's old interest in impersonal yoga and was criticizing Prabhupāda. Although Joy had cried when Prabhupāda was blasphemed, she became confused hearing the yoginī speak impersonal, antidevotional philosophy.

Then as Prabhupāda was leaving the temple to get into his car, the yoginī obstructed his path and continued her blasphemy.

"No one should bow down," she railed, "because everyone is God."

Prabhupāda became angry, a fiery look in his wide eyes. Suddenly Joy Fulcher came forward and threw herself on the ground before Prabhupāda, placing her hand on his foot. She had been confused about whom to accept, but now felt compelled to surrender to Prabhupāda. He allowed her to keep her hand on his foot while the yoginī gradually subsided before Prabhupāda's angry silence and let him pass. Getting into the van, Prabhupāda bumped his head on the inside of the roof. The devotees were furious and blamed the blasphemous girl for what happened. As the van drove away, Prabhupāda turned to Nara-Nārāyaṇa, who was driving. "That girl said everyone is God. But she objected that they were bowing down to me. But if everyone is God, am I not also God?"

The devotees in Seattle were trying to save Joy, who had become confused by the visit of the yoginī. The next day they arranged that she should go see Prabhupāda on the plea that she was an artist and could perhaps do some devotional paintings. Prabhupāda agreed, and she waited outside his room while he gave Jīvānanda a drum lesson. Finally, she entered Prabhupāda's room.

Jāhnava dāsī (Joy Fulcher): Prabhupāda asked, "What kind of girl is it who sees every man as God?" He was referring to the troublesome girl who had blasphemed at the initiation. I didn't understand him, so he repeated the question, then a third time, and added, "She's a prostitute, isn't she?!" Fortunately, Govinda dāsī walked in at that moment and was able to tell me later what his question had been. At the time, all I knew was that I accepted His Divine Grace as spiritual master and that the answer to his question (no matter what it was) was "Yes." So I answered, "Yes, Śrīla Prabhupāda." And he was pleased. Then he warned, "Don't associate with nondevotees."

I wanted him to know that I accepted him without doubt as my spiritual master. Very sentimentally, I said, "Śrīla Prabhupāda, I have always had trouble with my material father and mother, but now I can understand that you are my real father." His Divine Grace mercifully matched my tone and gently said, "Everyone has a material father and mother, but you have a spiritual father. You are very fortunate."

I was crazy and had trouble seeing him because he appeared very effulgent, so I was wiping my eyes with my hands. Also I couldn't understand his accent, so I kept wiping my ears with my hands. His Divine Grace took compassion on my struggle to be Kṛṣṇa conscious. He then penetrated my impersonalism with a beautiful description of Lord Kṛṣṇa's form. As I sat facing him, he was looking past me, over my shoulder. His Divine Grace said, "Just see how beautifully Lord Kṛṣṇa's hair is resting on His shoulders. Just see how His eyes are beautiful, like two lotus petals. Just see how nicely Lord Kṛṣṇa has wrapped His shawl about His thighs. Just see how nicely He has put on His dhotī." He also mentioned the Lord's lotus feet. I don't know whether he was looking at a Deity or a picture of Kṛṣṇa or whether Lord Kṛṣṇa was standing there, as he looked up and down, describing His form. All I knew was that if I turned around I would see a painting or brass or air. So I decided just to look at His Divine Grace and hear him describe Lord Kṛṣṇa as he saw Him.

After I left the room, Govinda dāsī asked what His Divine Grace had said about painting. She couldn't believe it when I told her we didn't discuss painting for the whole hour. (Knowing that the spiritual master knows everything, I had waited for him to bring up the subject and give me that service.) She brought me back and explained to him the purpose for which I had come. He asked my artistic background and was unimpressed when I rattled it off, because I was proud. Then he ordered me to paint the Pañca-tattva.

Not only new recruits but older devotees were being drawn closer to Prabhupāda by the mercy of Kṛṣṇa. In the Sanskrit scriptures, the word upanīti means “coming closer to the spiritual master for the purpose of receiving more confidential instructions in Kṛṣṇa consciousness.” Prabhupāda also took the opportunity of any meeting with his disciples to try to bring them closer to the Lord.

Nara-Nārāyaṇa: One of the most deeply impressive things that happened to me was the very first time I sat alone with Śrīla Prabhupāda. I had been with Śrīla Prabhupāda in San Francisco before in his room, but there were other people there, and I was a newcomer. But then I sat alone with Śrīla Prabhupāda, and I was terribly fearful because I didn't know what to do, what to say. I was a little spaced out from all my karmic activities and was totally tense, like I was going to explode like a jack-in-the-box, because I didn't know what to do. I watched Śrīla Prabhupāda opening letters. He opened the envelope all the way out and saved it and used it later to write on in order to save paper. He showed me some letter from somewhere and asked my opinion. Then he asked me to get something from his cabinet, and I did.

His room was surrounded by windows, with light shining in from a very nice angle because of the way it was a little subterranean. The table was very low, just like a coffee table, and he was sitting behind it. I happened to be in the back against the wall, and he asked me to get something from one of his cabinets which was also behind there. So he and I both ended up behind his low table. He was standing and I was crouching. When I stood up, Śrīla Prabhupāda, out of the blue, began to talk to me. I was just so flabbergasted. Anytime he spoke to me, I became so disconcerted that I could hardly hear what he was saying. He pointed to the table.

He said, “You see this little ant?” I looked at the table and no ant was there. Prabhupāda was pointing his finger. He said, “Do you see that little ant?” I said, “Yes, Śrīla Prabhupāda.” He said, “We should think that our goal should be how to make this ant Kṛṣṇa conscious.” I was just sort of blown away by what he said. He said, “We should go to this ant and we should lean down,” and Prabhupāda leaned down to the invisible ant on the table where he propped his forefinger and thumb together, poking toward the ant. “You should chant Hare Kṛṣṇa.” And he said, “We should give a little prasādam. If we do that,” he said, “our whole movement will be a success.” I was completely impressed by the statement because I understood even though Śrīla Prabhupāda always had big schemes for a big world ISKCON, yet his heart was always lined with these small items, and this was so wonderful. If one person hears Hare Kṛṣṇa, then it is worth the whole effort.

Love for Śrīla Prabhupāda was also brought out by the prospect of separation from him. Govinda dāśī and her husband had been Prabhupāda's secretaries for a year. They had been with him wherever he went—from the West Coast, to Boston, to Montreal, to Santa Fe. They were always with him, like a part of his intimate family, and they had become very attached to being with him. But in his desire to spread Kṛṣṇa consciousness, Prabhupāda sent Govinda dāśī's husband, Gaurasundara, to Hawaii before coming to Seattle, to open an ISKCON center there. In Seattle Prabhupāda asked Govinda dāśī to join her husband.

Govinda dāśī: If Prabhupāda said, “Very nice,” your life was perfect—whether he said it for your cooking capātis or peanuts, or doing a drawing, or a kīrtana, or anything. If he said, “Very nice,” and smiled and nodded his head, then your life's ambition was achieved, for that moment anyway. Getting him to smile, seeing him happy, was the goal of life, and you didn't really remember things like liberation. It was almost as if the idea of going to a heavenly planet or even Kṛṣṇaloka became distant.

But at this time I knew that I was going to have to leave Śrīla Prabhupāda soon. I was so very, very attached to him that I would wake up in the middle of the night crying. Almost every night I would invariably be crying in my dreams or in my sleep because of having to leave him soon, and I didn't want to. It was a very painful time.

On one of his last evenings in Seattle, Prabhupāda gave a lecture at the temple as usual, and then he returned to his apartment. The devotees at the temple took hot milk and prepared themselves for rest. But suddenly Prabhupāda reentered the temple. It was very unusual. They offered obeisances and waited in keen anticipation. His mood was very grave. He again sat on the vyāsāsana and asked them to sit. He had his servant adjust the tape recorder and play a tape of Prabhupāda singing and playing the harmonium. Puzzled, the devotees looked at each other. For about thirty minutes, a beautiful bhajana of Prabhupāda singing the “Vande 'ham” prayers played in the room before the assembled devotees.

Afterwards, Prabhupāda said, “I have just received one telegram from India. The person who gave me sannyāsa has left his body.” Prabhupāda continued to explain.

“One has to accept the renounced order of life from another person who is in the renounced order,” he said. “I never thought that I shall accept the renounced order of life. In my family life, when I was in the midst of my wife and children, sometimes I was dreaming that my spiritual master was calling me and I was following him. When my dream was over, I was thinking I was a little horrified. “Oh, Guru Mahārāja wants me to become sannyāsī. How can I accept sannyāsa?’ At that time I was feeling not very much satisfaction that I have to give up my family and become a mendicant. At that time it was a horrible thing. Sometimes I was thinking, “No, I cannot take sannyāsa.’ But again I saw the same dream. So in this way, I was fortunate. My Guru Mahārāja”—here Prabhupāda's voice choked, and he became overwhelmed with emotion, “he pulled me out from this material life.” For moments Prabhupāda could not speak. Everyone present saw tears pour from his eyes, and then he spoke further. Although the occasion was the passing away of the person who awarded him sannyāsa, Prabhupāda was now speaking more of how his own spiritual master, Bhaktisiddhānta Sarasvatī, had called him and saved him and made him take sannyāsa through his sannyāsa-guru.

“I have not lost anything,” Prabhupāda said. “He was so kind upon me. I have gained. I left three children; I have now got three hundred children, so I am not loser. This is material conception. We think that we shall be loser by accepting Kṛṣṇa. Nobody is loser. I say from my practical experience. I was thinking that, How can I accept this renounced order of life? I cannot accept so much trouble. But I retired from my family life. I was sitting alone in Vṛndāvana, writing books. So this, my Godbrother, he insisted me, “Bhaktivedānta Prabhu.’ This title was given in my family life. It was offered to me by the Vaiṣṇava society. So he insisted. Not he insisted—practically my spiritual master insisted me through him, that you accept. Because without accepting the renounced order of life, nobody can become a preacher. So he wanted me to become a preacher. So he forced me through this Godbrother—“You accept.’ So unwillingly I accepted. And then I remembered that he wanted me to go to the Western country.

“So I am feeling now very obliged to my, this Godbrother, that he carried out the wish of my spiritual master and forced me to accept this sannyāsa order. So this Godbrother, His Holiness Keśava Mahārāja, is no more. He has entered Kṛṣṇa's abode. So I wish to pass a resolution of bereavement and send that. And I have composed one verse also in this connection in Sanskrit. So you all present, you sign this. I shall send it tomorrow.

“The verse I have composed, it is in Sanskrit. Vairāgya-vidyā-nija-bhakti-yoga. This Kṛṣṇa consciousness is vairāgya-vidyā. Vairāgya-vidyā means to become detestful to this material world. That is called vairāgya-vidyā. And that is possible simply by this bhakti-yoga. Vairāgya-vidyā nija-bhakti-yogam apāyayām mām. This is just like medicine. The child is afraid of taking medicine. That also I have experience. In my childhood, when I became ill I was very stubborn: “I won't accept any medicine.’ So my mother used to force medicine within my mouth with a spoon, I was so obstinate. So anyway, similarly I did not want to accept the sannyāsa order, but this Godbrother forced me, “You must.’ Apāyayām—he forcefully made me to drink this medicine. Anaviṣyum andham. Why I was unwilling? Anaviṣyum means unwilling. Andham means one who is blind, who cannot see his future. This spiritual life is the brightest future, but the materialist cannot see to it. But the Vaiṣṇavas, the spiritual master, they forcefully, “You drink this medicine.’ You see—apāyayām mām anaviṣyum andham śrī-keśava-bhakti-prajñānam.

“So this my Godbrother, his name is Keśava, Bhaktiprajña Keśava. Kṛpāmbudhi. So he did this favor upon me because he was an ocean of mercy. So we offer our obeisances to Vaiṣṇava kṛpāmbudhi. Vāñchā-kalpa-tarubhyaś ca kṛpā sindhubhya eva ca. The Vaiṣṇavas, the representatives of the Lord, they are so kind. They bring the ocean of mercy for distributing to the suffering humanity. Kṛpāmbudhir yas tam ahaṁ prapadye.

“So I am offering my respectful obeisances unto this, His Holiness, because he forcibly made me adopt the sannyāsa order. So he is no more in this world, he has entered Kṛṣṇa's abode. So I am offering my respectful obeisances along with my disciples. On the first day of my sannyāsa I never thought... But I remembered that I'll have to speak in English. I remember on that sannyāsa day when there was a reception. So I first of all spoke in English. So it is all arrangement of Kṛṣṇa, higher authority.

“We are writing like this: “Resolved that we the undersigned members and devotees of the International Society for Krishna Consciousness Incorporated, in a meeting under the Presidency of His Divine Grace A. C. Bhaktivedanta Swami, today the 21st of October, 1968, at our Seattle branch, express our profound bereavement on hearing the passing away of His Divine Grace Oṁ Viṣṇupada Śrī Śrīmad Bhaktiprajñāna Keśava Goswami Mahārāja, the sannyāsa guru, preceptor, of our spiritual master. And on October 6th, 1968, at his headquarter residence in Navadvīpa, West Bengal. We offer our respectful obeisances at the lotus feet of Śrī Śrīmad B. P. Keśava Goswami Mahārāja with the following verse composed on this occasion by our spiritual master.’ This verse I have already explained to you. So I wish that you all sign this, and I'll send it tomorrow by airmail. You have got pencil?”

Prabhupāda first signed his own name and then gave the letter to Kartikeya to take to each devotee in the room. One by one, they placed the paper on the floor and signed it. The devotee carrying the paper was about to pass by several guests, but Prabhupāda said, "No, no. Everyone here is present, and so they are all a witness." The last one to sign was Prabhupāda's servant, Kartikeya. Kartikeya put the paper on the floor and slowly signed his name, while Śrīla Prabhupāda leaned forward on the vyāsāsana, watching very intently.

Before Prabhupāda left Seattle, most of the devotees returned to their temples in San Francisco and Los Angeles. Only half a dozen people remained with him for the few days before his departure. Prabhupāda had to go to Montreal for an interview with the U.S. consulate there. Accepted as an immigrant in Canada, he was now trying to get permanent residency for the U.S. Because of the expense, he would fly to Montreal unaccompanied. He planned to stay there a few days and then fly to visit the new ISKCON center in Santa Fe, New Mexico, and then go back to Los Angeles.

Govinda dāsī made Prabhupāda his favorite food, kachaurīs, to take on the plane. Prabhupāda had taught her how to cook them. One of the secrets was to put the kachaurīs into hot ghee once so that they puffed up, but then cool them and recook them in the ghee. "Cook them twice," he said, "until it becomes reddish." As she cooked them, and while they were still hot, Prabhupāda wanted to try one. When he began asking for one after another, Govinda dāsī said, "Prabhupāda, you are going to eat them all, and you won't have any for your journey."

"Never mind," he replied. "Bring me more. Never mind my journey." According to Govinda dāsī, he ate eight kachaurīs, and she made more for his journey.

Jāhnava dāsī: The next day His Divine Grace was leaving for Montreal, so I was told to make the garland for him. I took too long and made it on thin thread. We were already late, but I made us even later in picking up His Divine Grace to take him to the airport. When we arrived at his apartment about one half-hour from the temple, Harṣarāṇī ran out of the apartment and told us that she had never seen him so furious. She warned us that we were "really going to get it" for being late. Then Govinda dāsī came out and confirmed what Harṣarāṇī said. Then Kartikeya came out, visibly shaken, followed by His Divine Grace. Instead of garlanding him, Upendra bowed down and with shaking hands held the garland above his bowed head. His Divine Grace simply put on the garland and, without a word of remonstrance, got into the van.

Nara-Nārāyaṇa: Bilvamaṅgalā didn't know how to drive; he was swaying this way and that way. And as we were going toward the downtown area, Prabhupāda said, "Who knows how to get to the airport?" We all looked at each other. Not one of us had ever been to the Seattle airport, and it was late for his plane. I said, "I think it is this way." Prabhupāda looked at me as sharply as a razor blade and said, "Think? 'Think' means you do not know." Finally there was an entrance onto the freeway, and I stopped there. Prabhupāda said, "I want to take a taxi. You do not know." He said heavier things than that, which my mind has blocked out. I stopped and said, "Śrīla Prabhupāda, let's wait a moment. Surely we will find a way." I quickly called out the window to a hitchhiker on the side of the freeway, "Where is the airport?" And he told us how to get there. Prabhupāda was angry, because he not only liked to be at the airport on time, but ahead of time by at least an hour. So we got on the freeway, and this boy obviously did not know how to drive. The car was swaying and rocking back and forth like a boat in a heavy storm, and Prabhupāda was looking disturbed. I was sitting in the back, and to make matters worse, every time the car swayed like that, the girls put their hands together and started chanting tava kara-kamala-vare. We drove on, and by the grace of Lord Kṛṣṇa, we got to the airport a half hour ahead of the flight.

Jāhnava dāsī: When we got into the airport, His Divine Grace stepped through the front doors, and immediately his knee-length garland on the thin thread broke, but he simply cradled the two fallen ends in his arms and walked on with great dignity, his head held high and tilted back. Then the devotees gave me petals to throw at his feet. I thought that we would disturb the airlines by leaving petals everywhere. I threw the petals clumsily because I was distracted by my doubt, until His Divine Grace said, "That's all right, no more petals." Then when we sat waiting for his flight, I was pretty morose at his feet. He looked down and spoke that familiar blessing, "Is everything all right?" Then the devotees gave me a particularly exquisite and fragrant red rose to give to him. As he boarded the plane, he kept the rose and gave his garland to Upendra to distribute. Although I had only been a devotee for a month, still I, too, was faced with that unbearable separation from reciprocating with him in his physical form. His Divine Grace sat by the window, and he waved the long-stemmed rose slowly, and then he ducked out of view while we were dancing and having ecstatic kīrtana. Then he came back to the window and waved the rose and then ducked out of sight again. He did this several times, and we responded each time with more forceful chanting and dancing. Then he left.

October 27, 1968

Prabhupāda was traveling alone when he arrived in Chicago on a morning flight from Montreal. Inside the busy terminal building of O'Hare Airport, people rushed down the corridors or looked anxiously at the airport television screens overhead to find the right gate. Prabhupāda was to immediately catch a connecting flight to Santa Fe, New Mexico.

Prabhupāda checked the overhead television screens for his flight's gate number and made his way down the crowded corridor. The rush and congestion made stopping even for a moment hazardous. As Prabhupāda headed down the long corridor, passersby eyed him curiously. He came to a flight of stairs and started quickly down them, moving with the crowd. Suddenly he tripped and lost his balance. He dropped his bag and fell down several stairs. He didn't get up. His hand was cut, and he felt pain in several places. Then a gentleman came, helped him stand, and handed him his bag. The stream of passengers continued to rush past while the gentleman waited, asking Prabhupāda if he was all right. Prabhupāda thanked the man and said that he would be able to proceed by himself.

On the plane for Santa Fe, Prabhupāda looked at his hand. The cut had bled a little but had now stopped, and he saw a bruise appearing.

When Prabhupāda arrived at the Montreal airport, a reporter had asked him, "Swami, in the course of your travels, what difficulties do you encounter?" And Prabhupāda had replied, "I have no difficulties. You have difficulties."

And it was a fact. Prabhupāda was simply depending on Kṛṣṇa, and so he had no problems. That had also been Prahlāda Mahārāja's prayer: "O best of the great personalities, I am not at all afraid of material existence, for wherever I stay I am fully absorbed in thoughts of Your glories and activities."

My concern is only for the fools and rascals who are making elaborate plans for material happiness and maintaining their families, societies and countries. I am simply concerned with love for them."

The reporter, however, had only written something foolish: "Hush-Puppied High Priest." A television news team, with cameras and lights, had come to the Seattle temple to interview Prabhupāda, and that night part of the interview had been televised. It had been favorable coverage. A Christian minister, however, a Mr. Miller from the University of Washington, had written in protest of Prabhupāda's preaching at the University. But Prabhupāda had replied that the Church had failed to satisfy so many boys and girls. So if some of them were following him and giving up sinful life, why should the Christians protest? They should be glad.

At the Albuquerque airport, Harināma, president of the Santa Fe temple, and Govinda dāsī met Prabhupāda. But they greeted him with strange news. "Prabhupāda," Govinda dāsī said, "the temple here has no money. You can't stay. You will have to go on to Los Angeles."

Prabhupāda turned to Harināma. "Why did you ask me to come here?" Harināma glanced at Govinda dāsī and then shifted his foot, which seemed to be causing him pain. He apologized and explained that the night before, he had been bitten by a black widow spider. But Prabhupāda's question was unanswered.

"So what are you going to do?" Prabhupāda demanded. "I can't go to Los Angeles tonight." He looked from Harināma to Govinda dāsī. "I must stay here in Albuquerque at least for the night in a hotel."

Govinda dāsī assigned herself to calling motels to find a suitable, reasonably priced room. While she was gone, Harināma found Prabhupāda a seat. "Govinda dāsī said you are not feeling well," Harināma said.

"Don't worry about my health," Prabhupāda said. "I am not a sick man. Govinda dāsī is sick. I am not sick. So what are you going to do?" Govinda dāsī returned and said she couldn't find any reasonable motels. Then she began to cry.

"You know Kṛṣṇa, Prabhupāda," she pleaded. "What does Kṛṣṇa want us to do?"

"That is not the point," Prabhupāda said angrily. "Kṛṣṇa wants to know what you want to do!"

Harināma, disgusted with Govinda dāsī's attitude, suddenly became decisive. "I think we should go to Santa Fe," he said. Prabhupāda agreed; it seemed the only thing to do. Getting into the temple Volkswagen at four in the afternoon, they started the sixty-mile drive from Albuquerque to Santa Fe. The clouds overhead formed unusual symmetrical patterns on either side of the road. "I have never seen the clouds so beautiful as today," Harināma said.

An hour and a half later, as they pulled into the driveway of the little storefront building, Prabhupāda noticed a handmade sign: "SWAMIJI IS COMING." "Yes," he said. And he smiled—his first expression of pleasure since arriving in New Mexico. "You were expecting me."

Coming in through the back door, Prabhupāda, escorted by Harināma, entered a newly painted room. A rug partially covered the linoleum floor, a wooden table was an altar, and a madras-covered crate with a pillow was Prabhupāda's seat. Prabhupāda, however, chose to sit on the rug instead of the crate, and the devotees and guests sat around him.

"This is a nice room," Prabhupāda said, looking around. "I will stay here."

Govinda dāsī brought Prabhupāda a plate of cut fruit, and Prabhupāda opened a lunch bag containing laḍḍu and kachaurīs. About eight guests (hippies) were present, and Prabhupāda distributed prasādam to everyone. One of the guests, never having tasted laḍḍu before, remarked, "This is the best peanut butter I've ever eaten."

"This is the preparation," Prabhupāda explained, "that the mothers make for Kṛṣṇa and the friends of Kṛṣṇa to take with them in their lunch bags. They put this in their lunch bags when they go and play." One of the guests asked Prabhupāda, "Who is Kṛṣṇa?"

"Kṛṣṇa," Prabhupāda replied, "is the Supreme Personality of Godhead, who is playing with the cowherd boys."

Prabhupāda asked to spend the night in the Santa Fe storefront, but the devotees told him that, as the heater was too loud, he would be more comfortable staying in an apartment nearby. He complied. Harināma assigned a recently initiated boy, Toṣaṇa-kṛṣṇa, to be Prabhupāda's servant.

When Prabhupāda got to his room and found it dark, Toṣaṇa-kṛṣṇa had to replace the burned-out bulb in the ceiling socket. When the light came on Prabhupāda looked around the room and found it practically bare. There was a mattress on the floor but no pillow. There was no desk, so Prabhupāda made his own desk by setting his books on his suitcase, a wooden chest a devotee in Seattle had built.

"So," Prabhupāda said, "do you know how to type?"

"No."

Prabhupāda was unable to sleep that night because of the glare from the streetlamp, so he sat at his desk writing purports for the verses of Śrīmad-Bhāgavatam. As he wrote, his pen scratched with a hollow sound across the wooden suitcase. Toṣaṇa-kṛṣṇa took rest in another room, while Prabhupāda went on writing all night, his pen scratching on the hollow wooden desk. Then, at four in the morning, Prabhupāda rang the little bell Toṣaṇa-kṛṣṇa had left with him and called, "Toṣaṇa-kṛṣṇa."

Toṣaṇa-kṛṣṇa came running. "Yes, Prabhupāda?"

"It is four o'clock," Prabhupāda said. "You should get up." Toṣaṇa-kṛṣṇa had run to the door without his glasses, so he hurried back to get them. He then ran back again to Prabhupāda's room and sat down before him.

"The first thing," Prabhupāda said, "is you haven't paid your obeisances." Toṣaṇa-kṛṣṇa slapped his hand to his head, and Prabhupāda began to chuckle. As the boy put his head to the floor in honor of his spiritual master, Prabhupāda said, "That's all right. It is just for practice."

Then Prabhupāda spoke sternly. "Why have you brought me to Santa Fe and then told me to leave? Hmmm?" Toṣaṇa-kṛṣṇa, a devotee for only two months, didn't know what to say.

Prabhupāda persisted. "Why is this? Why have you done this?"

"Well... Govinda dāsī..."

"Govinda dāsī! Never listen to a woman!" Prabhupāda smiled as he spoke, but then again he sternly cautioned Toṣaṇa, "Don't laugh! So what did she say?"

"Well, she was concerned about your health—because of the altitude. She had talked with some doctors and friends of hers, and she became concerned that the altitude might affect you. As a matter of fact, she was sick herself. As soon as she got here, she became sick. So she convinced Harināma that they should tell you that you shouldn't stay here."

"Govinda dāsī will always be sick. She will be sick in heaven." Prabhupāda began laughing, but Toṣaṇa only looked back nervously. "So they think Swamiji will come here and die." Prabhupāda gestured towards the window. "There are so many people living here."

Toṣaṇa-kṛṣṇa: It became cold in the morning, so he told me to turn on all the burners on the stove. He rubbed his head and started singing the prayers to the spiritual master. He half-sang, half-said them, and when he was done, we both chanted japa together. I knew I was very fortunate. Then he had me do little things like turn off the burners on the stove—"Now you can turn one off. Now you can turn another one off." It was getting warmer. Later we went for an early-morning walk. I had nothing to ask Prabhupāda, since I knew so little of the philosophy. He was telling me that one's fortunate life begins when he meets a devotee.

That night about forty guests came to the temple—a big increase over the usual attendance. The audience was almost entirely young couples, and Prabhupāda talked about Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa in a way that seemed most fitting.

"Rādhārāṇī is the most beautiful girl," he said, "and Kṛṣṇa is the most beautiful boy." He explained that Rādhā and Kṛṣṇa are the perfection of the conjugal relationship, and when that same conjugal relationship is exhibited by the conditioned souls in the material world, it is only a perverted reflection.

After the lecture, as Prabhupāda spoke casually with the guests, an elderly woman introduced herself as the head of the Albuquerque Yoga Club and invited Prabhupāda to come there to speak.

Prabhupāda said he would be happy to come and, turning to Harināma, said, "We should go. They have invited me."

"But they already have another engagement for you in Los Angeles," Harināma replied. So Prabhupāda ended his short stay in Santa Fe after only one day.
